Mdlle. Pauline Lewitzky, a prepossessing stranger, with good credentials, is very young, and it is said that until her appearance at Drury Lane, in the Ora del Cairo of Mozart, she had never set foot on any stage. Her voice is a light soprano, agreeable in quality, but not at all powerful. Her engaging appearance and unobtrusive demeanour would alone suffice to exercise a certain attraction; but we are not prepared to say that she is destined at any time to reach a very high position. That Mdlle. Lewitzky has talent, however, was proved by her undertaking important parts in two of the operas of Mozart, and coming forth from the ordeal with fairly earned applause. As a piece of acting her Zerlina is to be preferred to her Cherubino, neither (which, her extreme youth borne in mind, we are glad to record) being at all "demonstrative." On the other hand, she seems more at home in the music of Cherubino than in that of Zerlina; at any rate she sings the airs and the Canzonetta with much more satisfactory general effect. Mdlle. Lewitzky, Russian by birth, is a pupil of M. Wartel, the same master who directed the riper studies of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. Last not least, among the recently acquired prime donne is Madame Volpini, a very sprightly lady, with a clear and resonant soprano voice, who may also be remembered at Her Majesty's Theatre, in the same year as Mdlle. Rebeux, playing a small part and singing a pretty song ("Io sono pastore"), in Mireille, that same unaccountably neglected opera by M. Gounod. Since 1864 Madame Volpini has been winning laurels abroad, more particularly at St. Petersburgh, where she is reported how truly we cannot say, to stand almost as well in public favour as Madame Adelina Patti herself. This is no affair of ours; but taking Madame Volpini as we find her, we confess our inability to discover qualities entitling her to such exceptional consideration. She is no doubt a lively, natural actress, and a thoroughly competent musician; but that she should have selected the part of Lady Enrichetta in Flotow's hackneyed Martha, for her first appearance in London after a retirement of six years, was greatly to her disadvantage in favour of her taste; it absolves us, however, from saying more than that she plays Martha much in the same way as every other practised actress plays Martha, and sings "Qui sola, vergin rosa" ("The Last Rose of Summer"), much in the same way as every other practised vocalist sings it. Of the vocalization of a far more legitimate test of Madame Volpini's capabilities was afforded by Susanna (Nozze di Figaro), in which piquant character she replaced Madame Sinico, and, what is more, surpassed Madame Sinico. Later in the season Madame Volpini rendered valuable aid by her impersonation of Filina in the Mignon of M. Ambroise Thomas. The remaining new acquisitions may be dismissed in a sentence. Signor Perotti, a young German tenor, with an Italian name, made a tolerably good impression in the character of Faust, afterwards distinguishing himself more prominently as Erik, the Huntsman, in Herr Wagner's Olandese Dannato; the chief distinction earned by Signor Rinaldini, another and still younger tenor, was in a subordinate part belonging to the same opera: Signor Vergara, a baritone from the Théâtre Italien, has done nothing fortunate to talk of; Signor Castelli, a basso, in various characters, and especially in Leporello, has, with a good voice and considerable cleverness, declared himself one of those "bouffe qui ne font pas rire" who did not exactly hit the taste of a certain King of Prussy; and Signor Ragusei, baritone, has been more or less useful in minor parts, the most important being Giarno, in Mignon—of which opera, and of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson's very remarkable performance in the character of the heroine, we shall have by-and-by to speak.

The talk of M. Faure as a débutant, and to parade before our readers a history of his artistic claims, would be alike superfluous. Although he has been four years absent, he was as cordially welcomed on stepping forward in the well-known costume of Mephistopheles, as if he had always been among us. M. Faure is now precisely what he was before him four years since—the "gentilhomme par excellence" of the operatic stage, with the voice sympathetic though trembling, broad vocal phrasing, studied declamation, and keen perception of dramatic colour, which need not again be described. Not merely M. Faure, however, but other topics of interest connected with the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, remain for consideration; and of these, or some of these, we hope to treat in another article.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL.

(From a Correspondent.)

Mrs. Dauncey Maskell, the eminent elocutionist of the London Academy of Music, gave a dramatic performance at this Hall on Thursday evening, the 4th instant, assisted by the pupils, with unqualified success. The opening drama, Nine Pins All, calls for no special mention, if we except the favourable impression made by Mdlle. Honoria Elphi, who enacted the part of Laura Leeson with much grace and tender feeling. The feature of the evening, however, was the début of Miss Laura Joyce (pupil of Signor Schira), who, as the unsophisticated Gertrude in Planché's charming vaudeville, The Loan of a Lover, carried the house by storm with her natural style of acting and her excellent singing. This young lady has a pure contralto voice of great compass, and bids fair, with energy and perseverance, at no distant date, to take up a leading position, both in operas and oratorios. She was repeatedly encored.

BEETHOVEN'S PIANOFORTE SONATAS.

From Domenico Scarlatti down to Frederick Chopin, a series of cembalists, clavecinists, and pianists, rich in talent, art, and genius, have produced such a collection of select works, that the like of it can probably be shown by no other branch of musical literature. But there are two collections pre-eminent above the rest in this abundant store of rich musical creations: the Fugues and Preludes (the Wohltemperirtes Klavier) of Johann Sebastian Bach, and the Sonatas of Ludwig Beethoven. Both works have been so fully discussed and so fully analyzed; such varied meanings have been attributed to them; they have been so celebrated and praised from so many different points of view, that every person who thinks about the matter must come to the conviction that they are inexhaustible. And so they are. They are a never-failing source of study for the composer and the pianist, and of delight for the educated listener. At present, however, our business is confined to the Sonatas of Beethoven, and these we will now proceed to consider.

Most of our German composers have grown up at the piano. They learned to employ practically this compendium of instrumental sound, vocal melody, harmony and polyphony, and it became for them an organ, a second tongue, a part of themselves. Upon it they could adequately render even the slightest musical emotions—could, so to speak, lend words to every momentary mood of their tone-filled soul. What Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven expressed upon the piano in their hours of solitude, exceeded, probably, in purport, if not in finished form, anything they ever noted down. But this confidential intimacy between a composer and his instrument, strikes us in no case with such marvellous clearness as in that of Beethoven. If, in his mighty Symphonies, he speaks like, as it were, some ideal popular orator to the masses, raising them to the highest sentiments of refined humanity; and if, in his stringed Quartets, he endeavours to attain almost dramatic multiplicity of form, in his Pianoforte Sonatas he talks to himself, or, if the reader prefers it, to his instrument, as to his most dearly loved friend. He tells his most secret joys and woes, his yearnings and his love, his hopes, and his despair. We perceive bared before us an entire, full, genuine, inward human life—healthy, solid, and manly. Whether Beethoven gives way to the outpourings of passion, or to mournful laments; whether he jokes, plays, dreams, laughs, or weeps, he is always simple and true. We discover in him nothing far-fetched, nothing stilted, nothing affected, and nothing falsely sentimental; the profoundest things appear before us unvarnished and unpretentious. There are some great and extraordinary men who utter the most important things, without desiring them to be heard; and, at the same time, have no reason to dread anyone hearing their slightest utterance—and this is the case with Beethoven in his Pianoforte Sonatas.

We frequently come across people who have a notion that, contrary to other composers of the highest rank, Beethoven is more especially the singer of sorrow and of mourning, of the most violent and passionate anguish of the soul. Nothing can be less true. It is certainly a fact that he has lent the night sides of the mind such tones as no one ever lent it before. But, if we glance over his compositions as a whole, we find, even in his latest and most rugged ones, that the most prominent feature in them are vigorous cheerfulness, good natured joy, pleasing reflection, serious and resolute vitality. How often does he sink into blissful dreams? how often give himself up to the most childlike enjoyment? The high spirits of a youth seize on him, even after he has attained ripe manhood; the battle of life renders him serious, and sometimes gloomy, but never down-hearted, far less sick of existence. "He was a man—take him all in all," we never looked upon his like before.

The application of what has been said to the various Sonatas separately would lead to nothing. Just as it is indisputable that these Sonatas run through an endless circle of human sensations and moods of mind, it would be difficult to designate, in the case of each one, those sensations and moods, by words, the assumed precision of which would in the end prove insufficient after all. It is no empty phrase, though it has been so often repeated, that music commences where speech leaves off—provided, of course, that the former is content to exercise sway in its own proper sphere. How often would the character of different compositions, even though a man possessed Goethe's copious vocabulary, have to be described by similar, nay, by counterpart, words; and yet how great would be the variety of tone-forms apparent to the most musically ignorant hearer!

A much more important occupation than discovering or accepting expressions pourtraying our various mental moods, is, without a doubt, for those who intend devoting themselves to the study of Beethoven's Sonatas, the task of obtaining a clear idea of the structure of those Sonatas, both in the general outlines and in the details. By doing this, they will more easily understand the Sonatas, and derive higher intellectual gratification from them. Is it not something elevating to see how the boldest fancy, after seeking sustenance in the deepest recesses of the soul, willingly performs a subject's duty under the ordering mind? Never, not even in what was apparently the wildest flight of his genius, never did Beethoven lose the reins; however high the regions to which his Pegasus may rise, he is able to guide and manage him.

No serious, conscientious teacher should neglect explaining to those entrusted to his charge the principles and nature of the laws developed, for centuries, by a sort of natural necessity, in the forms of instrumental music. They are so simple that their leading characteristics may be made clear to the most childlike intellect—every step forward will of course enable the student to penetrate into them more deeply. That Beethoven, in close connection with his great predecessors, submitted to these laws renders him doubly great; he did not come to annul the law, but to fulfil it.

Would that our art, which is more full of soul than any other, were not bound by so many tight bonds to matter! Would that Beethoven's Sonatas were as accessible to every educated man, as the poems of our great lyric poet! But the nature of our art not only forbids this—it even deprives the majority of those who busy themselves with music and the piano, of the full enjoyment of these high works, at least in their entirety. For these works make demands upon the executant which it is not easy to satisfy. The necessary natural gifts are found here and there; would that the indispensable seriousness and industry were always found with them!

Beethoven's pianoforte music—even leaving out of consideration the few extraordinarily difficult pieces—requires thoroughly good and solid execution. But the first requisites of such execution are, likewise, almost the rarest—a vigorous, and yet soft touch, and the greatest possible independence of the fingers. Beethoven never writes difficulties in order that the executant may gain laurels by overcoming them, but he is deterred by no practical inconveniences which may be necessary to express decisively and clearly his idea. Thus we meet in works which are reckoned among his easier ones, detached passages presupposing a tolerably high degree of digital dexterity, and if a fine style of execution always demands, properly speaking, that whatever the performer executes should be half play to him, this is an almost indispensable condition with compositions of such intellectual profundity as Beethoven's. It is, therefore, not advisable that his Sonatas should be taken by, or confided to, hands not properly prepared for them. If anyone is so far advanced as to be able to master their execution, he will derive double pleasure, and double advantage from a thorough study of them, and be able to raise himself without hindrance by their aid.

The most essential figures employed by Beethoven are based upon the scale, and upon broken chords. They belong to that style of playing which is described more especially as the Clementi-Cramer school. The Studies of these noble representatives of sterling pianoforte playing will always constitute the best foundation for playing Beethoven's works, and the practice of the former should be uninterruptedly pursued with the study of the latter.

Fortunately, Beethoven's fertile creative powers have produced fruit for every epoch of life, and—of pianoforte playing. We may reward even the zeal of a studious child by letting him play the two short Sonatas published after the composer's death, Sonatas which seem to us rather as though written for beginners, and not by a beginner. But care should be taken not to offer young minds, while too immature, pieces which, though easy (but, in some degree, easy only apparently) as far as absolute execution is concerned, demand a power of conception and of realization far beyond the demands which can be made on the fingers. What person with any experience of musical life does not remember, for instance, having heard the pathetic Sonata played with a naïveté of style proving how near the Sublime and the Ridiculous lie to each other! Such mistakes are of everyday occurrence.

We have endeavoured to append to those lines a list of Beethoven's Sonatas, arranged with regard to the demands they make on the heart and mind, as well as upon the fingers of the performer. It is hardly necessary to say that such a list could not be drawn up with mathematical accuracy, and that, besides this, it was necessarily influenced by personal views, perhaps more so than was right. What is more or less easy to master or to comprehend depends, in every case, on different premisses. But if our well-meant experiment simply resulted in our reordering the task of selection more easy for any one, or in our saving him from any very great mistakes, we should not consider the pains we have taken as being thrown away.

The present system of music-publishing has facilitated, in a manner which would formerly have been incredible, the acquisition of our classical masterpieces. New editions of them, especially of those by Beethoven, are published everywhere. Any one can purchase his Beethoven for a very little. It is only to be hoped that the master will be as frequently played as purchased, and realized by the finger as beautifully as by the graver; in which case he will become an inmate not only of every house but of every heart.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

On Wednesday afternoon a large crowd was attracted to the Crystal Palace by the announcement that the "annual concert of the 4,500 certificated singers of the Tonic Sol-Fa Association" would be held. There were other inducements—such as a series of orchestral performances by the Crystal Palace Band, under the direction of Mr. Manns, an exhibition of the Terrace Fountains, a selection of pieces from various composers, played by Mr. James Coward, official organist of the Crystal Palace Company, &c.; but the conspicuous feature among the entertainments of the day was the programme of vocal music set down for the members of the "Tonic Sol-Fa Association." The immediate objects of this association need not be explained to our musical readers; nor would it be requisite, even had we space at disposal, to weigh the chances of ultimate success attendant upon a system one of the admitted purposes of which is to substitute a new method of "notation" for that which has obtained since music became an art, and which has long made that art universally intelligible. Not absolutely to shirk the question, however, we are ready to own that, in our opinion, the idea of changing the signs which represent the language of music all over the civilized world is simply preposterous. There is no likelihood of its ever winning general acceptance; but, even supposing there were, we are unable to see what advantage could accrue. The whole library of musical compositions recognized as "classic" would, for instance, have to be reprinted, in characters intelligible only to a certain few—a manifest inconvenience, and of the gravest kind, without taking into consideration that to do this effectually, supposing it under any conditions possible, would require at least a century. But, implicitly believing what the promoters of the "Tonic Sol-Fa Association" themselves tell us in their prospectus—that "the system, as such, would be complete without the notation"—we refrain from further discussing a scheme, to designate which as "Utopian" would, while suggesting its impracticability, at the same time be paying it a compliment.

The performance of Wednesday afternoon, in the great Handel Orchestra—which was crowded to the roof by the "4,500" singers (we take the numbers for granted)—was supposed to give a fair sample of what the labours of the "Tonic Sol-Fa Association" had been able to effect since 1857, when they held their "first great concert" at the Crystal Palace. It was not the "children from the schools in and around London" who officiated on this occasion; they did their work fairly enough last June; it was for the most part the advanced adult members of the evening classes—"each possessor of, at least, the first, or 'Elementary' Certificate." Admitting, as we do, that a finer body of voices, young, fresh, and vigorous, could scarcely be heard in combination, admitting that more or less judicious training has brought these voices in a measure under control and helped them to a certain degree of proficiency, we cannot shut our eyes (or ears) to the truth that 13 years of practice and experience (we purposely date from the "first great concert" at the Crystal Palace, in 1857) have proved less fruitful of results than might have been anticipated. There was in many of the performances yesterday not only a want of style, but a want of precision. How far the conductors, Messrs. Sarll and Proudman, were answerable for this we do not pretend to say, although those gentlemen's reading and conception of several of the most familiar pieces might fairly, in some instances, be objected to. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Soli and chorus, "National Anthem."
Chorus "The King shall rejoice"...	...	...	Handel.
Soli and chorus, "Hear my Prayer"			Kent.
Anthem, "Cry aloud and shout"...	...	...	Croft.
Chorus, "God of Israel"...	...	...	Romini.
Swiss Hymn, "Morn awakes"	...	...	Frant Abt.
Sanctus, "Holy, holy" (12th Mass)	...	...	Mozart.
Psalm XLIII., "Judge me, O God"	...	...	Mendelssohn.

PART II.

Prize Glee, "Fairies' Song"	...	...	F. L. Robertshaw.
Part Song, "The Three Chafers"	...	...	H. Trubu.
Part Song, "Parting"	...	...	Mendelssohn.
Glee, "Red Cross Knight"	...	...	Callcott.
Chorus, "May no Rash Intruder"	...	...	Handel.
Part Song, "John Anderson my jo"	...	...	Scotch.
Glee, "Blow, Gentle Gales"	...	...	Bishop.
Soldier's Chorus, "Faust"	...	...	Gounod.

The National Anthem was a matter of course; but we do not think that either the chorus from Handel's "Coronation Anthem," or Kent's "Hear my Prayer" (which Mendelssohn has set so much more eloquently) were well chosen. Dr. Croft's anthem is made of very different stuff from that of Kent, though Kent's anthem was sung much better than Croft's. The chorus, "The God of Israel," taken from one of the operas of Rossini, and in some places admirably, in others rather comically fitted to the words, was given with spirit, encored, and the first verse repeated. Abt's "Swiss Hymn," a piece of smooth twaddle, was also well sung; and as much may be said of the "Sanctus" from the 12th Mass, attributed to Mozart. Better than any of these, however, was Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God" (43rd Psalm), the extremely good execution of which showed that vocal writing in eight parts offers no difficulties to the "Tonic Sol-Fa" singers. The "Prize Glee" and the "Part Song" (so-called) with which the second part of the concert opened, were unworthy a place in the programme. Both are rubbish; but the last is rubbish of the most offensive, because demoralizing kind. Nevertheless, the last was encored; and thus whoever may have been answerable for its selection was justified in his choice by the verdict of a numerous and enlightened audience. That it made the judicious grieve, and that the tranquil and exquisite beauty of Mendelssohn's part songs, immediately following, it went far near to nothing, mattered little. All that had been done creditable and decent was undone by this piece of imbecile drivel. Dr. Callcott's well-known glee went well; not so the chorus from Solomon—altogether out of place. "John Anderson my Jo, John" was no better than a burlesque, so slowly was it taken, and so silly was the reading of the last line of each verse—"John—An—der—son—my—jo"—each syllable uttered "staccato," with a breath between one syllable and the next. Bishop's melodious glee was equally spoiled by being taken nearly twice as slow as the composer intended. The chorus from Faust made a loud and brilliant finale.

On the whole this concert did not speak highly for the progress of the members of the "Tonic Sol-Fa," whether the "system" be taken into consideration or the contrary.

Fines for Music.*

Now from all parts the swelling kensels flow,
And bear their trophies with them as they go,
Filth of all hues and odours seem to tell
What street they sail'd from by their sight and smell.
They, as such torrent drives its rapid force
From Smithfield to St. Pulchre's, shape their course,
And in huge confluence joined at Snow Hill ridge,
Fall from the Conduit prone to Holborn Bridge;
Sweepings from butchers' stalls, dung, guts, and blood,
Drowned puppies, stinking sprats, all drenched in mud,
Dead cats, and turnip-tops, come tumbling down the flood.

MR. BENEDICT'S ST. PETER.

The critic of the Birmingham Daily Post attended the band rehearsals for the Birmingham Festival, held in St. George's Hall this week, and wrote long reports thereupon. We may doubt the propriety of comments upon mere band rehearsals, but we reprint our contemporary's observations upon Mr. Benedict's oratorio—observations which are certain to be read with interest:—

"Mr. Benedict's St. Peter, which constituted the second and weightiest subject of rehearsal yesterday, is still in too imperfect a state to allow of detailed description or definite judgment, more particularly in the absence of the choral effects; but it is evident, by the care and elaboration bestowed on the instrumental parts, and the general elevation and refinement of the principal vocal themes, that the composer has laid himself out in this instance for a test work—one that may bear the same relation to his St. Cecilia as Mendelssohn's Elijah did to his St. Paul. The theme is certainly a suggestive one, and worthy of the loftiest effort of musical art which it may inspire. Mendelssohn long ago recognised its suitableness for musical treatment, and in a long and thoughtful letter which he addressed to Pastor Schubring, the friend to whom he was so deeply indebted for suggestions and contributions for St. Paul, he discusses at considerable length the merits of the theme. 'Several out-ward reasons,' he observes, 'are in favour of choosing St. Peter' for the particular festival he had then in view; but independently of these, he had a great wish in connection with some plan for a later oratorio "to bring the two chief apostles and pillars of the Christian Church side by side in oratorio'—in short, that he should have a St. Peter as well as a St. Paul. There were sufficient internal grounds to make him prize the subject, chief among them being the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, which he thought should form the central point or chief object; but he was apparently in doubt if the position occupied by St. Peter in Scripture, and apart from the dignity he enjoys in the Catholic and Protestant Churches as Pope and Martyr, would suffice for the purposes of a symbolical oratorio, and it was chiefly to resolve this doubt that he consulted Pastor Schubring. What was the issue of that consultation we are not informed, but, inasmuch as the projected oratorio was never begun, we may assume that Pastor Schubring's reply did not favour the possibility of a treatment of St. Peter derived from Scripture. As Mendelssohn's ideas of the manner in which this subject should be treated necessarily possesses great interest in connection with Mr. Benedict's work, we extract the passage in which his difficulties are expressed. It is as follows:—'The question, therefore, is and this you can decide far better than I can (because you possess the knowledge, in which I am deficient, to guide you), whether the place that Peter assumes in the Bible divested of the dignity which he enjoys in the Catholic or Protestant Churches, as a martyr, or the first Pope, &c., &c.—whether what is said of him in the Bible is alone and in itself sufficiently important to form the basis of a symbolical oratorio. For, according to my feeling, the subject must not be treated historically, however interesting this was in the case of St. Paul. In historic handling, Christ must appear in the earlier part of St. Peter's career, and, when he appears, St. Peter could not lay claims to the chief interest. I think, therefore, it must be symbolical; though all the historical events probably be introduced, such as the betrayal and repentance, the keys of heaven given him by Christ, his preaching at Pentecost—but all this, not in an historical, but prophetic light. If I may so express myself, in close connection.' * * * 'The chief thing, however, in the first point, for I am still in the dark about it, is in fact, about the possibility of the whole undertaking. Write to me as soon as you can on the matter. In thinking it over, my first idea was that the subject must be divided into two parts: the first, from the moment of forsaking the fishermen's nets down to the 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' which it must close; the second to consist of the Feast of Pentecost only; from the misery after the death of Christ and repentance of Peter, to the outpouring of the Holy Ghost.' We have been thus circumstantial in setting forth Mendelssohn's views as to the mode in which the theme might be treated, not only on account of the interest always attaching to the plans of so accomplished a master of oratorio, but because we are still in the dark as to that which Mr. Benedict has followed. At present, our only information regarding either the text or the music, is derived from the vocal solos and band parts rehearsed in London, yesterday; and even these, we understand, were not complete. Under these circumstances it would be manifestly impossible to furnish any outline of the oratorio, and we can only speak in the most vague and general terms of its distribution and style. As well as can be gathered from the skeleton programme contained in the Festival scheme, the work consists altogether of some fifty-four numbers, comprising, besides the more ordinary elements and combinations peculiar to oratorio, an orchestral interlude suggestive of evening prayer, followed by the rising of a storm, a dead march, a choral recitative, an unaccompanied quartet, and choruses, for male and female voices separately. Many of the most effective numbers consist of solos accompanied by, or interspersed with, chorus—a combination to which Mr. Benedict is very partial. Even a catalogue raisonnée of so lengthy a series of movements would be beyond our time and limits, besides being unfair to the composer in the present stage of his work: and we must therefore defer all analysis. We may observe in general terms, however, that the writing is in a much stricter style than any of the composer's previous works. The fugal form is freely employed in more than one of the choruses, and in all the ideas are developed with great thoroughness and elaboration, and with every diversity of contrapuntal treatment. Although the composer appears to have chosen for his oratorio the historical, in preference to the symbolical form favoured by Mendelssohn, and to have relied mainly, if not wholly, on Scriptural texts, the treatment is less dramatic than might be supposed from the known predilections of Mr. Benedict. Nevertheless there is a striking example of tone painting in the orchestral interlude already referred to, and the accompaniments to the contrary recitative, 'But the ship,' All the phases of a sea storm are here suggested in forms as impressive as they are artistic and appropriate; and not even the composer's old master, Weber, could have depicted the fury of the winds, and the trouble of the waves, or the flashing of the lightning or the rolling of the thunder, with more vividness and vigour, than they are here represented. The unaccompanied quartet which ushers in the final chorus of the first part is remarkable chiefly for the skill and ingenuity of its modulations; but its melodic beauty is not in proportion to its harmonic subtlety as the extreme difficulty of the music for unaccompanied voices renders a certain loss of tonality in the course of the performance scarcely avoidable. Though the chorus was absent yesterday, the general effect of some of the choral numbers could be fairly gathered from the morning's rehearsal performance; and among these may be mentioned as specially impressive the opening chorus, 'They that go down to the sea,' an exceedingly graceful and captivating movement, in six-eight time; the so-called 'chorus of Benediction' commencing 'The Lord be a lamp unto thy feet,' a sweet and soothing andante very charmingly instrumented; the descriptive storm chorus, 'The deep uttereth;' the grand final chorus of the first part, 'Praise ye the Lord,' which is developed with impressive breadth and vigour; 'How art thou fallen?' an exceedingly spirited and dramatic allegro, in six-eight time, and the angry and not less dramatic chorus, 'They are deceivers,' with its fine antiphonal effects and agitated accompaniment. All the solos and concerted pieces are of great merit, and several of them are extremely captivating. There is an exceedingly brilliant and effective bravura for the tenor voice, with chorus, 'The Lord hath His way,' in which Mdlle. Tietjens yesterday produced a great sensation; and in a different style the tender, plaintive wailing air, 'I mourn as a dove,' for the same voice, is also deserving of high praise. For the chief contrasts there is abundance of excellent recitatives, in addition to a fine air in triple time, 'O thou afflicted,' which is as melodious as it is plaintive and expressive. Madame Patey's fine voice was heard to great advantage yesterday in this music. In the absence of Mr. Sims Reeves from the rehearsal, we can only faintly imagine how his voice is likely to be suited in the principal tenor music of St Peter; but the composer, at all events, has provided ample opportunities for the tenor voice in the airs, 'I am the voice,' 'O, house of Jacob,' and 'The Lord is very pitiful' to say nothing of numerous recitatives and concerted pieces. Mr. Santley, who is always in earnest in what he attempts, produced a great impression by his singing of the fine baritone air, 'How great, O Lord,' 'Now know I,' 'Though all men shall be offended,' 'O that my head,' 'Remember, O Lord,' 'I call upon Thy name,' and the solo with chorus 'As thy soul lies.' Indeed the baritone voice has been specially favoured by Mr. Benedict."

MUNICH.—In consequence of the war, both the Theatre Royal and the National Theatre are closed by order of the King.

CARLSRUHE.—In consequence of the present state of affairs, the Grand Ducal Theatre was not re-opened on the 1st inst., as announced. It remains closed till further notice.

GRATZ.—Suppé's Jungfrau von Dragant, a three act operetta, has been produced with great success. The overture and principal pieces were encored, and the chief artist called on several times at the fall of the curtain. Die Jungfrau von Dragant is, it may be observed, a parody on Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin.

VENICE.—Two new operas will be produced during the ensuing season at the Fenice. The first, entitled Gustavo Wasa, is by Signor Apolloni. The second, of which the title is at present not generally known, the public will owe to Signor F. Maliplero, as far as regards the words, and to Signori Sagglotti and Bonmartini, as far as regards the libretto, which is said to be of a fanciful and romantic nature, affording great scope for spectacle.

VIENNA.—Herr Joseph Strauss was buried on the 25th ult. He was accompanied to his last home by thousands, including all his relations and friends, the only one among the former who was not present being his brother, Johann Strauss, who was himself lying on a bed of sickness. The violin of the deceased was laid, with broken strings, in the coffin with him.—The separate ballet performances have now been brought to an end, and the Imperial Operahouse is closed until the 31st inst.—Herr Theodor Wachtel has left his villa near Wilsbaden, and taken up his residence here during the present disturbed state of things in Rheinland.—Mad. Clara Schumann accepted the invitation to take part in the Grand Beethoven Festival only on condition that Herr R. Wagner did not conduct.—The King of Wurtemburg has conferred the large gold medal for Art and Science on Herr Franz Suppé, conductor at the Carithtaeter.

MARRIAGE.

On the 9th inst., at St. Nicholas Church, Brighton, by the Rev. J. O. Davis, ALBERT BEATUS PROLER HOLMES, of No. 1, Cambridge Gardens, Notting Hill, elder son of W. H. Holmes, Esq., of 36, Beaumont Street, Portland Place, to CATHERINE, youngest daughter of the late WILLIAM NEWMAN, Esq., of Charleston, Sussex.

FESTIVAL ARRANGEMENTS.

HAVING laid before our readers the Hereford scheme last week, we come, now, to the much more important programme of Birmingham. Something like despondency appears to exist with regard to the greater Festival, if we may judge by the local Daily Post, which uttered the following jeremiad in a recent number:—

"In presence of the stirring national events of the last few days, it would almost seem as if some apology were necessary for alluding to a matter of such purely peaceful interest as the preparations for the forthcoming Birmingham Musical Festival It is not every one who is gifted with the composure of the Roman Emperor of old, who fiddled whilst Rome was burning, and it is not to be supposed, therefore, that the Birmingham Festival will engage much attention outside the circle immediately concerned, whilst the Franco-Prussian war is raging almost at our doors. Nevertheless, the interests involved in the success of our Festival are so great, not to Birmingham only, but to Charity and to Music also, that even at the risk of being neglected, we think it right to remind our readers that Peace hath her triumphs as well as War, and that Birmingham is taking every precaution to insure a very substantial one on the four busy days commencing with the 30th instant. For the moment, we must confess the prospect is rather cloudy. What with singers who won't sing and with composers who decline to compose, to say nothing of the war and the money market, and the badness of trade, it is impossible to deny that our Festival generals are taking the field under very serious disadvantages. Still the morale of their troops, as another general would say, is excellent, and after the experience of Monday's rehearsal, we have every confidence that, with average good luck, the Birmingham Festival of 1870 will come out in the end all the brighter for its temporary obscuration."

We shall not presume to set our opinion against local knowledge; but it may safely be asked what the writer means by "composers who decline to compose," when the Festival programme abounds in novelty to an extent which has already called forth the remonstrances of those who think it is possible to have too much even of so good a thing. If the Post's other remarks are as wild as this, there need not be the slightest foreboding of evil in anybody's mind. At all events, we will presume to anticipate success. Now for the programme:—

TUESDAY MORNING.—Elijah. Indispensable at every festival, Mendelssohn's greatest work has a prescriptive right to the place of honour at Birmingham. It is, in some sort, the child of the "Hardware Capital" (so-called); and to omit it would be not only bad policy, but a gratuitous disowning.

TUESDAY EVENING.—Novelty No. 1. Mr. J. F. Barnett's Paradise and the Peri. We remember the successful performance of Mr. Barnett's Ancient Mariner three years ago; and have noted how the work has, since then, achieved a far-reaching popularity. Another composition from the same pen does not surprise us, therefore; and we have but little doubt but that Paradise and the Peri will be worthy the Ancient Mariner. It is tolerably certain, moreover, that it will speedily become better known than Schumann's cantata, on the same subject, which our young English musician very properly thought left room and to spare for his own ideas. The second part of this concert consists of detached pieces, all, more or less (greatly more than less), known to London concert-goers, and not worth mention here.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.—Naaman. The performance of this work is a very natural compliment to its author, and the conductor of the Festival, Sir Michael Costa, as well as a proper recognition of the fact that it was written for Birmingham. A very fine rendering may be expected, judging from the pains taken at the band rehearsal of Monday last, on which occasion Naaman had the lion's share of notice.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.—Novelty No. 2. Professor R. P. Stewart's Ode to Shakspere, about which we can say nothing, and the character of which we dare not even venture to anticipate. But the Professor is an able man (though a Professor), and it may safely be assumed that he has done his best for a great occasion. Novelty No. 3 is Mr. A. S. Sullivan's Ouvertura di Ballo (why not Ball Overture, Mr. Sullivan?—you are English, are you not?)—a very gay, lightsome, and effective piece of work, but not such as should alone represent the composer of the Prodigal Son at a Birmingham Festival. The second part faintly recognizes the Beethoven Centenary by being all Beethoven; moreover, while inadequate as a commemorative act, the selection is more inadequate as a selection. We welcome the E flat Concerto and eke the Egmont overture; but why has not one of the "immortal nine" a place? A Beethoven programme without a symphony carries its own condemnation between the lines.

THURSDAY MORNING.—The Messiah.

THURSDAY EVENING.—Novelty No. 4. Herr Ferdinand Hiller's Nala and Damayanti. Compared with the story of this work Homer's Iliad is a modern poem; but, though written at a period so remote, that to go back thither is to jostle against Shem, Ham, and Japhet, the Hindoo narrative is instinct with beauty. Herr Hiller, we may venture to say, has done it more or less of justice. Beethoven's sonata for piano and violin (Op. 24) follows the new work; and the second part is an olla podrida, concocted after the well-known benefit concert recipe.

FRIDAY MORNING.—Novelty No. 5. Mr. Benedict's St. Peter and Mozart's Requiem. The former is anticipated with much interest; and we may indulge a tolerably confident hope of success for the veteran composer, whose most serious effort it is. After so long and absorbing a work, the Requiem (still called Mozart's by people who cannot be persuaded that Süssmayer was a great genius) will fall on well-nigh unheeding ears.

FRIDAY EVENING.—Samson, with which the Festival ends. Let us hope there may be vigour enough left in band, chorus, and principals, to carry them safely through a work that exacts a good deal of effort.

Comment upon the above is annecessary, and if the case were otherwise, we should decline to forestall observations which will have more weight in their own proper time.

It appears from a case in the Common Pleas that the manager of the Alfred Theatre let a box and ticket office for from £360 to £400; that his net profit was from £10 to £4 a week. The programmes he disposed of yielded a fair return, selling from 3d.—his lowest charge—to 2s. 6d. An opera-glass ought to have been a modest annuity to Mr. Hirschfield, as he hired it out at from 2s. 6d. in the boxes to 2s. and 1s. 6d. elsewhere. His scale of charges to different classes of clients reminded one of Douglas Jerrold's innkeeper's soda-water—sold for 3s. 9d. a bottle to the rich and 2s. 6d to the working classes. Mr. Hirschfield's labour and responsibility in taking charge of coats was moderately recompensed by over £150 annually. Are charges in St. James's and in the Strand much more reasonable than in Church Street, Edgware Road?

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Signor Schira has left London for Milan—his native city, which he visits as an annual custom. Among the greatest disappointments to subscribers at the Drury Lane Italian Opera this year, and to amateurs of the opera generally, was the non-production of Signor Schira's new opera, Selenopia, which had been announced in the prospectus, and was, indeed, one of the chief attractions. Signor Schira, however, can afford to wait another season. What he composes in the dramatic way is, as all amateurs are aware, sterling stuff that cannot spoil by a twelvemonth's keeping.

That inclination of the French to express political feeling in song, so manifest during the Wars of the Fronde and in the days of the Revolution, is again conspicuous. At almost every theatre somebody has sung, is singing, or is about to sing the "Marseillaise" and "Le Rhin Allemand." The last of these, by the late Alfred de Musset, is the song of the day, the old melody being thrust into renewed eminence by a vague sort of patriotism, analogous to the enthusiasm of Irish demonstrators, who consider that "Vive l'Empereur" and "Vive la République" are synonymous expressions. "Le Rhin Allemand," music by M. F. David, was sung at the Opéra Comique by M. Achard. The poem was written by De Musset just when Becker's celebrated "Rhine song" had begun to make a noise. A French translation of the German Lied became a subject of discussion in the salon of Madame Emile de Girardin, and the hostess expressed a wish that it should be answered by a poet. M. de Musset, one of the party, asked for a cigar, with ten minutes' leave of absence, and, his request granted, he descended to the garden. When he returned, the cigar was not finished, but the poem was. M. Musset's song was followed at the Opéra Comique by the "Marseillaise," executed by Madame Galli-Marié, draped as the Genius of Liberty, and bearing a tricoloured flag. On a subsequent occasion the singers were M. Melchissédek and Mdlle. Marie Rose. At the Vaudeville there was a special performance for the benefit of the wounded, and the lyrical part of the entertainment was found so attractive that it was repeated on subsequent evenings. Here the "Marseillaise" was sung by Madame Marie Laurent, and "Le Rhin Allemand," by M. Roger, who also made public "La Française," a new patriotic effusion by M. Gustave Nadaud. At the Opéra, de Musset's poem, the music by M. Deminex, was sung by M. Faure and chorus, in front of an appropriate decoration. The programme of a performance at the Palais Royal on Saturday week, for the benefit of the wounded, announced the "Marseillaise" by Mdlle. Reboux—the trio from Guillaume Tell (why?), by MM. Villaret, Devoyod, and David, "Le Rhin Allemand," by Roger, and the "Bataillon de la Moselle en Sabots," by Darcier.

We hear a good deal about the "envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness" which reign in the bosoms of artists, and it is generally believed that musicians share among them the very strongest specimens of that class of natural phenomena. We would, however, back the professed religionists at long odds. In a ritualistic print called the Church Herald, certain Portsmouth petitioners against "Catholic" innovations are styled "a pack of ill-conditioned petty tradesmen and adulterous wine-bibbers." There, let the most rival-hating artist who does not profess to be made "a child of God" by sacraments, beat that if he can.

Florence is no longer an economical abode. House rent is up to the level of Paris or London. The hotels are more numerous and much improved, and the restaurants were always excellent for those who look on tobacco as Molière's blue stocking did on Greek—"Monsieur, avec du Grec on ne peut gâter rien;" smoking and eating going on in them together. Progress is not, however, uniform. The opera is bad. Cosmo III. pronounced the music in England and in France inferior to that of Florence, and Rousseau at a later period wished to be blind at the Italian and deaf at the French opera. But Mendelssohn in his "Letters" says, "If I desire to hear Italian music I must go to London or Paris." On the other hand the Florentine ballet is among the best in Europe. Victor Emmanuel, like Napoleon I., is peremptory that his danseuses shall be pretty.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Coalition Opera.

In a general notice of the past season at Covent Garden, the Sunday Times remarks:—

"The past season at Covent Garden will be remembered as the last of a coalition management which had no raison d'être in the presence of a rival house. When Mr. Mapleson joined his forces to those of Mr. Gye, he did so on the assumption that the resultant strength would secure unchallenged possession of the field; that, in other words, nobody would venture to oppose resources so great, or hope to outdo the attractions of an establishment commanding the very flower of lyric artists. This assumption was not unreasonable; and we may safely venture an opinion that upon it alone the coalition was based. We doubt if, under any possible circumstances, it could have been justified by results, for monopoly is an unpleasant word in the public ear; under the actual conditions there was no chance of success. The coalesced directors acted as though bent upon making their management obnoxious to all who looked upon the opera as other than a fashionable lounge. We need not bring forward any facts in proof, the reader's recollection being able to supply them abundantly; nor need we state how sharp ayes noted the blunder and active brains prepared to turn it to account. Very soon the resources of the coalition began to disintegrate and fall away. The end of the first season brought with it the secession of nearly all Mr. Mapleson's contingent, and Covent Garden lost the services of Mdlle. Nilsson, Madame Sinico, Madame Trebelli, Signor Mongini, Signor Bettini, Mr. Charles Lyall, Signor Foli, Mr. Santley, besides others of less note. This was a heavy blow and sore discouragement, but the alliance was threatened in its very existence, when Mr. Wood's prospectus appeared, and Drury Lane opened its doors as a second Italian opera. From that time Messrs. Gye and Mapleson were check-mated, and there was nothing for it but to fling up the game, dissolve partnership, and resume the old tactics of each one for himself. This has been done, and the coalition is at an end. For well nigh over the month, especially as the second season, though carried on in the face of opposition, was no improvement upon the first. The directors, like the Bourbons, seemed able to learn nothing, and the tactics which failed to conciliate the public in 1869 were reproduced with minute exactness in 1870."

PROVINCIAL.

Morpeth.—We take the subjoined from the Newcastle Daily Chronicle of the 5th inst.:—

"The new organ just erected, in the north transept of St. James's Church, Morpeth, was opened yesterday, by Mr. H. A. Oakeley, Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh. The instrument, was built by Mr. T. H. Harrison, of Rochdale, and its case of stained pine has been designed so as not to interfere with the architectural features of the building. The cost is 1,000*l.*, and as it will rank as one of the largest organs in the North of England, the following description will be read with interest:—It has three manuals of 4½ octaves each, and 2½ octaves of pedals. The height is 31 feet, the breadth 19 feet, and the depth 12 feet; this exclusive of the space occupied by manuals and pedals, which are brought forward as far as the back of the choir stalls, so that the organist may be near the choristers. Including couplers, there are 48 stops, and the number of pipes is 2 292. The wind, supplied by two large double action bellows, runs at three inches, and regulated by a parallel motion, is also an invention of the builder. By means of the above the touch of the manuals, when fully coupled, is as easy as that of a pianoforte. Professor Oakeley presided at the organ at both services. The voluntaries were a prelude, Bradley; Aria from Cantata No. 68, Bach; Occasional Overture, Handel; and Motet, 'Insane at Vanæ Curæ,' Haydn. At Even-song the voluntaries were Andante, Lefebure-Wely; Andante, Quartet No. 2, Mozart; extemporaneous Prelude; Fugue in G minor, Bach; and Handel's 'Let their celestial concerts.' In the morning the preacher was the Rev. T. Harris, Dean of Honolulu; in the afternoon the Rev. W. Dunn, incumbent of North Gosforth. In the evening the Professor gave a recital upon the organ, and displayed its powers by many combinations of the stops."

Milan.—The worth of the numberless recalls, with which it is at present customary in Italy to greet a composer on the first night of his opera, may be gathered from the following little anecdote. A short time since a new opera, entitled The Three Musketeers, was produced at one of the theatres here. At half-past eight o'clock the audience, including the critic of our facetious contemporary, Il Trovatore, amounted to 25—twenty-five! Towards the end of the performance, however, a number of persons, friends of the composer and of the management rushed in, and called on the former four or five times.

Salzburg.—Herr Joachim has again come to spend his annual holiday, at the Villa Mac Caffri, as he did last year.

BEETHOVEN AS A "POSTILLON D'AMOUR."

In an article headed "A Contribution to the Beethoven Festival," in the Neue Freie Presse, appears the following account of the meeting of Beethoven and Herr Ludwig Löwe, of the Imperial Theatre, Vienna. The circumstance was known probably to but very few, and was never before published.

Ludwig Löwe—says the writer of the article in question—that ever-lastingly youthful artist, who is quite as captivating a virtuoso in narrating in private, as he is in impersonating on the stage, told me a good deal of his eventful life one evening as we were sitting in the gardens of the jovial "Spezi-Wirth," at Velden, on the banks of the Wörthersee. We were about separating, when Löwe stopped me by exclaiming, "Halloa! I must tell you about my acquaintanceship with Beethoven." What! did you really know Beethoven?" I enquired with joyful curiosity. "Aye, that I did. He was my postillon d'amour at Teplitz." Taking a complacent puff at his pipe, Löwe continued: "It was in the summer of 1811. I was a perfect novice, and obtained an engagement at Prague, under the celebrated manager, Liebich. At his order, I began, however, my professional duties at the watering-place of Teplitz, where a part of his company performed during the summer. I used to dine regularly at a modest inn called the Blue Star, between the 'Plata' and the Post Office. It is no longer in existence. The landlord's daughter, a well-behaved, charming creature, used, in the old patriarchal fashion, to wait upon the customers. She and I soon took a liking to each other; our glances kept meeting more and more frequently, and growing more and more expressive, but the number of other customers, who were impatient and wanted to be served, rendered all conversation between us impossible. 'Come at a later hour,' she whispered to me one day, 'when the other customers are gone. At three o'clock you will seldom find any one, except Beethoven, the composer, and he will not be in the way. His hearing is bad.' I joyfully took the hint, and used to go every afternoon at three o'clock, Beethoven, who dined at a side-table, really being the only person there. As he paid little attention to us, he proved not merely not to be in the way, but was even welcome as a means of diverting suspicion. My liking for the maiden was profound and passionate, and it was my intention to marry her. Her stern parents looked, however, askance upon her acquaintanceship with the poor young actor, and at last, without more ado, forbade me their house. How great was our despair. We wanted to correspond secretly, but through whom? Suddenly I thought of my neighbour at table, Beethoven. He should help us. Despite his serious taciturnity, he had struck me as not being unfriendly. A gleam of kindly feeling frequently shot from out his bold and defiant face. He was accustomed to take a walk every morning at eleven o'clock, in the most retired part of the Park., I lay in wait, and approached him with a most respectful salutation. He recognized me instantly, and enquired why I did not dine any more at the Blue Star. The question greatly facilitated the introduction of the subject for which I had come. With the utmost frankness, I told him all about the state of my heart, and my expulsion from my Paradise, concluding with a timid interrogation as to whether he would not take charge of a note, and give it, unobserved, at dinner time, to the maiden. 'Why not?' he exclaimed, seemingly pleased at my confidence in him, 'You mean nothing wrong; so hand it over.' With these words he stuck the note in his pocket, and was again about to set off at a trot. 'I beg your pardon, Herr van Beethoven,' I said, detaining him, 'that is not all.' 'Oh! what else is there?' 'You must also in; tack the answer.' 'All right! Then wait for me to-morrow in the walk.' I really received the coveted answer through Beethoven. In this manner, like a good fellow as he was, he carried our love-letters backwards and forwards for five or six weeks, until he—and, shortly afterwards, I myself—was obliged to leave Teplitz."

Such was Löwe's story; I cannot convey in writing the charm with which it was told, but (with Löwe's express permission) I have given a correct account of its purport. I have simply to add that Löwe corresponded for a year or so with the landlord's pretty daughter. Typhus, the unfailing follower of a period of sanguinary war, carried her off. Löwe, whose brilliant talent had soon displayed itself at Prague, obtained an engagement, in 1824, at the Burgtheater, Vienna. He lost no time in visiting Beethoven. He found him very much aged; broken physically and morally, and completely deaf. Beethoven did not recollect his visitor, who despite all his endeavours, could not make himself understood. So their second meeting was their last. But Löwe preserves a grateful remembrance of the service which Beethoven rendered him at Teplitz, and which was probably one of the most original and friendly episodes in the great composer's life.

DR. HILLER'S *NALA AND DAMAYANTI.

The poem, Nala and Damayanti, is founded on a Hindo poem of great antiquity — the Nala, which in itself only one of the episodes of the Mahabharata. The two great epic poems of Ancient India, the Mahabharata, and the Raymeyana, bear something like the same relation to Hindu literature, with respect to national importance, as the Iliad and the Odyssey to the literature of Ancient Greece. The Mahabharata is an aggregate of epic poems founded on popular legends. Though impossible to fix the date, it may be mentioned that the compiler is said to have been Vyasa, who lived about 500 years before Homer.

The episode of Nala occurs in the Mahabharata as incidental. A holy Brahmin, to restore hope to a fallen prince, ruined by gambling, relates to him the history of the Raja. Nala, who, in older times, had, like him, lost everything at two games at dice, and nevertheless had not sunk into despair. This episode is the subject of the third of eighteen cantos, or parvas, of the Mahabharata. King Bhima has a fair daughter, Damayanti. Nala hears praises of Damayanti, and the Princess like praises of Nala. Though at a distance, they fall desperately in love, and miraculous swans convey tidings of fondness. The king desiring to marry his daughter, there is a competition of princes for her hand, but Damayanti will not accept anyone but Nala. Nala appears at last in person, but has a message to deliver from the gods, who have bound him to declare to Damayanti that she must choose one of the immortals. Fortunately the gods do not insist. The marriage takes place, and Nala conducts his wife to the kingdom of Nishadha. Misfortune comes. The god, Kali, jealous of Nala, induces him to play at dice with his brother, and Nala loses all—wealth, chariots, robes, kingdom, and wife. Nala flies to a wild forest: his wife will not forsake him, but he cannot bear the idea of dragging her into his misfortune. He flies again from her. Damayanti wanders in search of him; each encounters dangers and sufferings, racked by the thought of the possible fate of the beloved one. The constant lovers, wife and husband, at last succeed in finding each other, and, by a fortunate occurrence, Nala wins again his treasures and his kingdom, and lives happily with Damayanti.

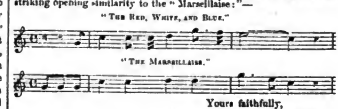
The subject of the dramatic cantata, set to music by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, is the earlier part of the story of the loves of Nala and Damayanti. It comprises the desolation of the princess, dreaming of her unseen lover; the ceremony, ordained by King Bhima, of disposing of her hand by choice among royal suitors; the communication of the behest of the gods to Nala; Nala's despair; his appearance on the scene of competition at the climax of Damayanti's anxiety, only to give his stern message; Damayanti's refusal and choice; the appearance of the gods, offering her immortality, and their retirement before the unflinching resolve of the Princess; the cantata concluding with the union of Nala and Damayanta.

* To be performed at the approaching Birmingham Festival.

A QUERY.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Amidst the present race for national songs, and when the authorship of most of them is matter of curiosity and comment, perhaps you can inform a humble enquirer as to who composed the song known as the "Red, White, and Blue," and to what cause can be assigned its striking opening similarity to the "Marseillaise:"—



Yours faithfully,

INQUISITOR.

OBER-AMMERGAU.—It has already been announced that the run of the celebrated Passions-spiel was brought to a premature termination, in consequence of the principal actors having to join the Bavarian army-corps. The representative of Peter rides in a light cavalry regiment, and the young man who sustained the part of the Redeemer is a corporal of artillery.

ECHOMETRY.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—PARENTHESIS—In the early period of his brilliant career an astute statesman and splendid orator of the British House of Commons was wont to say that he never expected "justice." Neither, Sir, do I. But what Mr. Disraeli had to complain of too little recognition, I get too much. Too much "justice" is dealt out to my expressed opinions and remarks; casual observations being commented upon as though they were the greatest imaginable deliverances. Not only by means of editorial foot-notes, but by inquiring correspondents am I requested to give "additional information" and "further particulars," just as though, instead of being a peaceful "day-dreamer," I was a "war correspondent." To one's thoughts a portent never conceived; to one's words an import their primary meaning never suggested, and to one's aims and proceedings a significance I would fain disclaim. One, "Nibbs," knows my effusions by perusing them from beginning to end—then exalts me by esteeming it his mission to occupy the chair of critic concerning "my style." So unexpectedly, and so undeservedly heaped upon me, how could I rest without attempting some meagre return for such fulsome and unmerited compliments. I would much rather, seriously, he had found fault with me, for then I could not have failed to profit more greatly thereby. But, perhaps, he wisely concludes, "censure is the sincerest flattery" (ah! Tom Hood, or somebody else has said), and has mercifully decided not to spoil so promising a fellow by making him over-vain. Be that as it may, I thank "Mr. Nibbs" for his notice of me, not quite equal, I am afraid, to a just appreciation of all his generous humour, and will endeavour in reply to his queries. Since he appears not to have consulted his "Johnson" (those dictionaries are horrid dry reading), I will save him that trouble in this instance. He asks for the meaning of the word, acroteria; here it is:—"Todd's Johnson," quoted "Acroteria" (Architecture), "the extremity of the body, as the end of a finger." The word ir, of course, in both numbers. "Manual acroteria" means fingers; more particularly their ends—that is to say, the thirty articulations (joint-) branching from the palms of the hands. The "development" of each of those thirty powers, so as to produce all the varied delicacy and expression residing in that wonderful gift of heaven, the human hand, is usually the first object of the pianoforte player. Beginning from the root of the central finger, the lowest joint should first be cultivated; (it is presumed that, dating all thought- and action from the brain and heart, the shoulder, arm, forearm, including the wrist, and but of the hand, have been at least recognised, if not otherwise prepared for work;) then the next-joints of the fore finger and thumb, and the fellow: next the ring finger, lastly the little finger. Next the middle joint of the middle finger should be exercised and all the others in the same way. Of course the whole process may go on almost simultaneously, each separate division tiring after a few dozen efforts. This much, even when practised with but a dumb piano or with no instrument at all, cannot fail to impart both vigour and smoothness to anyone wishing to master the pianoforte. Especially if commenced and persevered with when young. By enabling the student, when wishing to play four, as well as one, two, or three, notes at a time; two, or three, at will, a valuable faculty will be given him. With the extreme joint a "reliable" yet "gentle touch." "Kaleidoscopic, from an optical toy." The allusion here is to those exercises which, from being composed of the same primitive notes, yet ever changing their patterns within a described radius, without altering their component parts. Some students term them "gown-patterns," "vest-patterns," others "kaleidoscopics," which last has been regarded as a fairly expressive school-boy name. Such are the dactylion paradigms of Herz, Schmidt, Chaulieu, Dreyschock and others; without attention to some of which no one, however gifted, can hope ever to develop the manual acroteria, so as to perform respectably upon the pianoforte. I shall pass over your eccentric orthography; no doubt it is exceedingly amusing to those who have a taste for it. I had once; but since the decease of Mr. Jeames Plush and Artemus Ward, I have lost my relish for that sort of thing. It must be funny or the editor could not have inserted it; I must get you to explain it to me when we meet. Various-tinted is not grammar: "variously tinted." Nor, as I previously hinted, I don't intend to use anything I may have been the means of communicating to you a matter of obligation on your part. No, not indeed. Not the spelling, nor the meanings, nor the grammar, nor the music; for have you not generously become the means of instructing me in that invention of my own propositions, "good humour," the chief point in which intricate study, as I understand it, is,—with the view of prom-ting friendship in its highest form,—to put the best possible construction upon another's words, and even upon his "animadversions." End of parenthesis.

Echometry, or the art of measuring the duration of sounds, suggests a wide field of observation to the thoughtful musician. "Sounds are either long or short," so runs the catechism. It is, indeed, the first instalment of information in most of them. Two kindred ones following:—viz., sounds are either high or low; sounds are either soft or loud. Let me solicit, at the outset, that no one will conclude the subject too recondite on account of one "unfamiliar" word; nor too elementary because of the "simplicity" of certain premisses; Not that they will bear me through. Of the paramount importance of a correct estimation of the comparative duration of sounds, not one word need be said. It is this first amongst all musical gifts—it might even be placed before that, commonly-called, an "ear" for music—that imparts such a marked difference to each other in various players, and, to my mind, that distinguishes a rare performer on the organ or pianoforte more than any other quality. Since on these instruments the notes are prepared to the performer's hand by the builder and tuner, no indiscretion on the part of the player could alter the intonation in the least degree. The chief distinguishing feature, then, in the master-hand is that wonderful sense as to the relative duration of sounds, possessed in a remarkable degree by so few that the gifted ones stand apart from all their kind, separate and alone: that impassable gulf betwixt them and all competitors—that gulf is innate sense of time. To those who would demur might I beg again to wait a little. Recall your impressions when a really great player has enchained you? Was it not more than in anything else by your impression of the deliverance as a "whole?" What is that inexpressible charm which, in some musicians more than in any others, compels recognition and commands attention? It is the perfect periodicity of the utterances. The notes fall so steadily, with such unswerving exactitude, that the very physical frame of the listener is enthralled, and his pulsations are literally linked with the music. The very atmosphere becomes alive and pendulous. If, however, the waves of air become disturbed by irregular percussions in the sounds, they will militate against, and destroy, one another. A slight effort of the memory will recall two or three great names who could thus awe to silence, and impress at will, ten thousand listeners. Other qualities are indispensable, it is granted; but this gift of "echometry" I place first. Even if there be multitudes of notes, or two or more themes, the perfect equality of the subsidiary ones only charms us the more. Six to one, or twelve, twenty-four, forty-eight or more notes in one part against one note in another, but increases the general satisfaction. However intricately the parts may be woven, the unfailing march of the rhythm still imparts many most sympathetic delights. And upon the rhythm symmetry, all but imperceptible trifle of time is gathered up in one place, it is immediately repaid with such rigid accuracy that expectation, apparently for the moment frustrated, is only the more completely captivated by the exactness of the compensation which keeps the periodicity of the phrasing completely unimpaired. Such a musician is in harmony not only with all minds but likewise with the spheres themselves, as it would be by no means difficult mathematically to demonstrate. But it may be asked—"Do not all play by the metronome?" They do; just as all sing an accurate scale. Yet some singers can be more perfectly in tune than others (as I remarked at length in my first letter on Melody), having in their nature a more subtle conception of musical scales than others; so if you persons performing a piece of music in the same number of seconds, the divisions of time and niceties of phrasing may cause the performance of the one immeasurably to transcend that of the other. In the compass of a letter such as this all I can do is to indicate a line of thought afterwards to be followed up with some practical suggestions. I will conclude by stating but one idea. What we gain in speed we necessarily lose in power. How, therefore, skilfully to blend the two, the slow notes with the quick is one of the most important and interesting inquiries that could possibly engage the attention of the musical composer, and is of no less moment both to the conductor, executant, or choralist.—Yours very truly, IDEALIZER.

August 9th, 1870.

P.S.—On "change of air" we are perfectly at one. That is precisely what, more than anything else, every lover of music desires.

La France Musicale, to which paper we have often been indebted for both information and amusement, has ceased to appear. So, at all events, says the Gazette Musicale.

New Songs and Music of the Future.

"Looking Back:" a Companion to "The Snow Lies White." By Arthur Sullivan.

"The Stationary Gentile:" Companion (as far as possible) to "The Wandering Jew." By J. L. Molloy. This (the "W. J.") has been sung, and, of course, well-sung, by Mr. Santley. Our great baritone has lately identified himself with two cheerful characters, i.e., "The Flying Dutchman" and "Wandering Jew." Here Wagner might be invoked to consider these two subjects together, and combine the ideas. The notion of the plot would be, perhaps, something of this sort:—Act 1. The Wandering Jew, while walking, annoyed by the Flying Dutchman.—W. J. tries to catch the F. D.—and fails. Of course, they will both be in love with the same young woman; and, in the last Act, the Flying Dutchman flies off with the lady, struggling. The Wandering Jew (now more than "wandering," in fact, almost mad) seizes a gun and shoots the F. D., who falls with his lovely burden (this would be the burden of a trio) on the luckless wanderer, and all three perish in the crash. Punch.

MAJOR AND MINOR.—JOY AND GRIEF.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Some composers of note appear to entertain the idea that music, per se, is capable of expressing all the emotions of the human soul, and that, in this connection, its language is almost as copious and facile as the vernacular of any civilisation. This assumption has betrayed them into absurd excesses, and lured them blindfold into invading the regions of poetry, painting, and sculpture. Whatever the merits of any composition touching its individual conception and total mechanism, it can express definitely but one of two sentiments only—that of joy or sorrow; and this it does because the one or the other is in natural accord with the major or the minor mode, either of which is an essential of every individual composition, and may be termed the light or shade—the smiles or tears of music. You may laugh, or free yourself from care in the major; but in the minor you must weep, or, at least, give way to some shade of melancholy. When, therefore, you would force either of these modes out of its natural channel, or constrain it to become analytical, or descriptive of foreign sentiments or their outgrowth, it ceases to be intelligible, unless accompanied by words or some exponent outside its own resources. Hence the impossibility of purely dramatic compositions for instruments only, and the insurmountable difficulty of expressing clearly through a simple orchestra any sentiment beyond the two already mentioned. Where this has been attempted the composer has not philosophised. He has not perceived that he has built a model that he himself comprehends only, and that the musical garments in which he has clothed it may suit various others differing from it in almost every particular. The mood that can be expected in this relation, is appositeness of the costume to the subject that it is intended to drape, which subject, if the composition would be at all comprehensible, must be familiar to the listener. Scarcely an air from Mozart, Rossini, or any of the great masters, but has the sentiments set half a dozen different stories, as the libretto chances to determine: but in no case can a thorough expression of grief be achieved through the major, or of joy through the minor. Outside these two sentiments we have nothing but neutral tints, so to speak, which, if they are to perform any missionary mood that involved in exquisite combinations of sound, must receive their colouring from without, through the agency of language, spoken or implied. To attempt, then, to pourtray with unerring fidelity any of the passions save joy or grief through the medium of music, is to fail; for in so far as the sentiments are concerned, music has but little, if anything, to say in any other relation than the two already mentioned; and with them even, it deals in but a general manner. These few observations are thrown out in the hope of eliciting some more competent opinion on this subject. GRADGRIND.

New York, July, 1870.

WAIFS.

M. Flotow's L'Ombre will shortly be produced at Brussels.

Mr. Charles Lyall has left town on a visit to the Channel Islands.

Don Ramon Vilanova, a Spanish composer of eminence, died recently at Barcelona.

Miss Laura Harris has signed a five months' engagement at San Carlos, Lisbon.

The septuagenarian, Déjaset, sang the "Marseillaise" at Passy's theatre a few days ago.

M. Fanre has been unable to appear in public of late, owing to another family affliction.

Madame Adelina Patti has left, or will soon leave the Isle of Wight (if she ever was there) for Boulogne.

M. Offenbach, dining with M. Sardou, called the King of Prussia "Le Roi Carotte." Surely the French are avenged.

Mr. Santley is engaged for a series of performances at the Gaiety Theatre in the "fall." [Quid tum postea?—A. S. S.]

We are informed that Mr. Vernon Rigby has declined to sing at the approaching Birmingham Festival. The reasons for this step will doubtless appear when the proper time comes. [If it ever does come.—A. S. S.]

Among the artists engaged at the Barcelona Cirque are Mesdames Artôt, Scalchi, and Trebelli; MM. Graziani, Bettini, Gassier, Junca, and Ronconi.

It is rumoured that Mr. Bryant, encouraged, we presume, by the success of his version of the Iliad, is devoting himself to the task of translating the Odyssey.

Marguerite Blinden, the original Precious of Weber's opera, died on the 8th of July, and was buried at Hosterwitz, where the German master wrote his work.

M. Deldevez, late chef d'orchestre at the Grand Opéra, has been succeeded by M. Farrand, sous-chef at the Opéra-Comique, and Secretary to the Conservatoire concerts.

It is said that Mdlle. Fioretti, who recently married M. Verger, has definitely retired from the stage. If this be true, the stage has lost one of the best dancers of recent years.

Mr. C. A. Barry has returned safely from Germany, having barely escaped the declaration of war, and bravely endured six of Wagner's operas. Mr. Barry must carry a charm.

Mdlle. Nilsson passed through Paris the other day, on her way to visit the Duchess de Frias at Biarritz. She found time, says Le Ménéstrel, to call at Madame Ollivier's and leave her subscription for the wounded. [How much?—A. S. S.]

Mdme. Patti, Mdme. Volpini, and Mdlle. Nilsson have agreed to give their services at a concert of Italian artists in Paris, the proceeds of which are to benefit the Patriotic Fund.

The Maharajah of Rewah has given 2,000*l.* to the pundits of Benares, who composed a poetical garland of flowers for the Duke of Edinburgh, on his Royal Highness visiting the sacred city.

Mr. Sims Reeves was to have been singing during the past week at the Ryl Eisteddfod. Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Kate Roberts, and other artists were also to take part in the Welsh Festival.

Mr. G. Hodder has died of the effects of the injuries he received some weeks ago at Richmond. Mr. Hodder, educated at Christ's Hospital, was long and honourably known as a London journalist.

Mr. Strange was to open the Théâtre Châtelet last Wednesday as a Parisian Alhambra. M. Mangin is appointed chef d'orchestre, and, on the first night, the "Marseillaise" is orchestrated by Berlioz, was to be performed, with a chorus of 200 voices.

The performances at the Gallery of Illustration, under the management of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, terminate this evening, and will be recommenced in November, Mr. Reed having obtained from the lessees an additional term of the property.

There will be no gratuitous performances at the Paris theatres on the 15th inst., the Patriotic Fund benefitting by the amount usually devoted to public pleasure. But the fête itself may not take place. Who knows where the Prussians will be on the 15th?

Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Cox and Box is now playing at the theatre in the Crystal Palace, with full orchestral accompaniment, and Messrs. Shaw (Cox), Rouse (Box), and Ainsley Cook (the "Military Man"). This performance alone is worth a visit to the Crystal Palace.

The Gazette Musicale says that a new opera in four acts, by Verdi, will be performed at Cairo in January. Its title is Aida, its subject ancient Egyptian, and its libretto the work of M. du Locle. The Viceroy, says our French contemporary, has given the director unlimited credit.

If report may be credited, among the engagements already made by Mr. Gye for the Royal Italian Opera are Signor Mongini, the celebrated tenore robusto, and Mdlle. Ferneci, a soprano, hitherto unknown to England, but in certain parts of the Continent vaunted in equally glowing terms for the beauty of her voice and the comeliness of her person.

At a moment when the Pope is putting himself on an equality with God, it may be of interest to know that in the year 1707 the French Academy offered a prize for a poem the subject of which was that the French Monarch was at least superior to humanity. The theme for the poet to illustrate was "That the King's wisdom renders him superior to all manner of events."

The following was the patriotic programme of the Théâtre Français on Saturday last:—Les Ouvriers, by Mons. E. Manuel; Chorus, Enfants de Paris; Recitation, Le Rhin Allemand; Horace, tragedy by Corneille; Recitation, Le Départ; Dialogue, Pour les Blessés; Chorus, Les Girondins; Le Lion Amoureux, comedy by Ponsard; Chorus, La Marseillaise. The proceeds of this performance went to the Patriotic Fund.

Revised estimates have been published for the following public Services:—Science and Art department buildings, new building at South Kensington, 62,500*l.* increase, 28,500*l.*; auxiliary museum in the East of London, 5,000*l.* increase, 2,000*l.*; total increase, 30,500*l.* In aid of the expenditure of certain learned societies in Great Britain, 12,450*l.* in addition, to advances for the new Courts of Justice buildings, 21,450*l.*, of which 16,000*l.* is intended for the erection of the building. Of course this will be repaid to the Treasury out of the surplus interest on money in the hands of the Court of Chancery. For the National Gallery enlargement, 40,000*l.* is asked, of which 20,000*l.* is for the acquisition of land, and 24,000*l.* for clearing the site acquired, and for new buildings.

According to an American contemporary, the literary men in the States are to be privileged with hearing Mdlle. Nilsson's first song in the New World, the favourite artist having engaged to sing before the members of the Lotos Club immediately after her arrival. If the members of the Lotos Club be lotos-eaters, we can understand the meaning of our American contemporary.

Why do not Ritualists invoke George III. in defence of sundry peculiarities? In all accounts of their ceremonial, we hear of bowing to the altar. They should turn to Mdme. D'Arblay, and see how the "Head of the Church" behaved in 1787, when an installation of Knights of the Garter took place at Windsor. There to solemn music, as soon as the Dean began "Let your light so shine before men," the King advanced up the chapel, and about a third of the way, stood and bowed to the altar; then walked forward and bowed again; after a third bow reaching the altar and making the accustomed offering of ten pounds in gold and silver.

M. Ingres, the French painter, who died not long since, was not only a member of the Senate, but a grand officer of the Legion of Honour, historical painter to the Crown, Member of the Institute, and past director of the French Academy at Rome. His foreign honours were hardly less conspicuous. He was knight of the Order of Civil Merit of Prussia, Commander of the Order of Leopold of Belgium, Knight of the Order of St. Joseph of Tuscany, and honorary member of the Academies of Florence, Berlin, Vienna, Amsterdam, and Antwerp. Had M. Ingres been an Englishman in favour at Court, he would, perhaps, have died a knight, and being a good portrait painter, President of the Royal Academy.

Nicolini goes to the Lisbon San Carlos for the winter. Consequently he is no longer able to sing with Patti, Trebelli, Wilhorst, Marimon, and others:—

We've got no work to do-o-o-o-o,
We've got no work to do-o-o,
We're all drummed out, poor opera folk,
And we've got no work to do.

The death, on the 26th ult., Mr. Edmund Foster Blanchard, youngest son of Mr. Laman Blanchard, is announced. He was well known in literary and journalistic circles, and much liked on account of his genial nature, and for the spirited and generous manner in which he treated the subjects with which he had to deal. He contributed to many magazines and reviews, and was for a considerable time connected with Lloyd's Newspaper. Jointly with Mr. Edward Wilberforce he published, a few years since, a small volume of poems.

No words have been more frequently quoted in England as Goethe's than the following:—

"Im Ganzen, Guten, Wahren resolut zu leben."

This makes a plausible Alexandrine, but is only a misremembered passage from one of the Gedichte, in which some god is supplicated to pardon sins of commission and omission perpetrated against him. The half-drained glasses is the subject of this confession, and the singer promises for himself and companions earnestly to strive in future:—

Uns vom Halben zu entwohnen,
Und im Ganzen, Guten, Schönen
Resolut zu leben.

The rhyme makes an alternative reading impossible.

On Wednesday morning Messrs. Thomas & Homan, of Rochester, commenced selling the effects of the late Mr. Charles Dickens at Gadshill Place, and every article of furniture, all the china, glass, plants, carriages, even the broken jars about the place, will be disposed of under the auctioneer's hammer. There was not a large assemblage, but those who were present bade high for what was offered to them. The day's sale comprised the articles from the yard, meadow, garden, vinery, conservatory, coach-house, harness-room, stable, and chalet—upwards of 277 lots in all. Amongst the lots were such as the following: "Twelve spring mouse-traps and long-spouted waterpot;" "twelve paving stones, old tub, sundry wood, old iron door, and quantity of bricks;" "six birch brooms, five flats, and two flower-boxes." Flowers in pots, worth a few pence, sold for as many shillings; and garden implements, much damaged, brought more than their original cost. Some Chinese lanterns which hung in the conservatory fetched high figures, the purchaser in one case being a butcher. The old grey cob, Trotty Veck, brought 20 guineas; and the brougham, by Offord, 34 guineas. A smart competition took place for the possession of a set of horse-bells, five in number, affixed to a piece of leather. They were ultimately knocked down for 3*l.* 10*s.*; but there was a dispute even then about the bid. When the miscellaneous articles had been disposed of, the auctioneer proceeded to the Swiss châlet in the shrubbery. In the upper two rooms Mr. Homan stated that Mr. Dickens spent the last afternoon of his life, and the competition for the tables, stools, and chairs in the room was very keen. A bird's-eye maple cane chair, which Dickens used, realized 11*l.*; the oak table, 4 feet by 2 feet, on which he wrote, brought 5*l.*; the stools from 14*s.* to 18*s.*; and the looking-glasses, 36 inches square, in maple frame, prices varying from 32*s.* to 36*s.* An empty oak tool box, which was in the lower room, and which happened to have "Charles Dickens" on the lid, sold for 3*l.* 6*s.*

REVIEWS.

Three Short Pieces for the Organ, intended as Introductory Voluntaries. By Edward J. Hopkins, Organist to the Honourable Societies of the Inner and Middle Temple. [London: Metzler & Co.]

We are glad to see the third set of Mr. Hopkins's "Short Pieces," because, while not accepting every movement as perfect, we esteem the entire work as a very valuable contribution to organ music—all the more valuable for its thoroughly practical character. The pieces before us are an andante for the diapasons; an andante cantabile, with solo for great organ, swell accompaniment; and an andante gravioso, which employs the great and swell manuals in very effective fashion. The same hand is apparent in all three—a hand that works after the model of Spohr, with fidelity and skill; but their merit is not equal. The first we account somewhat dry; the second presents greater interest; the third is best of all.

Te Deum Laudamus, with Chant Music written specially to it. By E. J Hopkins. [London: Metzler & Co.]

Benedictus, with Chant Music in A major. By E. J. Hopkins. [London Metzler & Co.]

The Te Deum, we take it, will be more often chanted than sung, spite of all that is said against the practice, and Mr. Hopkins does well to make the best of a popular resolve by providing good and well-arranged music. His three chants to the grand old hymn are excellent, and their arrangement to the words are simple and intelligible in the highest degree. The Benedictus is set upon a similar plan, the only difference being one instead of parts for the congregation, and a free organ accompaniment, in which Mr. Hopkins appears to special advantage.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS—DRURY LANE

The production of Weber's Abu Hassan in an Italian dress, conjointly with L'Oca del Cairo, a comic opera begun by Mozart with great enthusiasm in 1783, the year after Die Entführung aus dem Serail, but, when scarcely half completed, abandoned for Le Nozze di Figaro, would alone have conferred a mark of distinction upon the Drury Lane season just expired. It is refreshing now and then to get away from the well-worn groove which has confined us for so many years to certain works of Donizetti, Bellini, Verdi, Flotow, &c., comparatively excluding even Mozart and Rossini, and positively excluding other composers, Italian, German, French, and English, who have written much that is worth hearing, but who rarely, if ever, get a chance of being heard. That the musical public were indebted for these interesting operas of Weber and Mozart to the same praiseling intelligence which at Her Majesty's Theatre was the cause of several neglected masterpieces of Gluck, Mozart, Cherubini, Weber, Otto Nicolai, &c., being revived, is, we believe, a fact. Mr. Jarrett has done for Mr. Wood at Drury Lane what he did for Mr. Mapleson at Her Majesty's Theatre. He would be just the "acting manager," if permitted to follow the dictates of his own conscience, to give us an operatic season without one single performance of Lucia, Lucrezia, Linda, Norma, La Sonnambula, Martha, Il Trovatore, La Traviata, and the like. What a refreshing season that would be for musicians and connoisseurs! But "Fashion" stands in the way; and "Fashion" would have nothing to do either with Abu Hassan or the Oca del Cairo. Nevertheless, both were most effectively presented. The Abu Hassan of Weber, a comic opera in one act, built, as everyone knows who cares to look upon the tale of "The Sleeper Awakened" in the Thousand and One Nights, is as pure Weber as Der Freischütz itself, though produced in 1811, some ten years earlier than Der Freischütz. The Oca del Cairo, while in some sort a concoction—pieces from Zaide, the Sposo Deluso and other works being introduced to fill up the gaps left by the composer, those numbers which he left barely sketched being instrumented for the orchestra by a modern hand, and a new libretto founded upon the original one of Abbe Varésco of Salzburg,* with whom, as his correspondence shows, Mozart was dissatisfied, contains nevertheless, for music produced when the genius of the author of Figaro and Don Giovanni was in its prime. The whole, moreover, is so skilfully arranged that few unacquainted with the historical facts would guess that the opera had not come from Mozart's own portfolio just as it is now heard at Drury Lane. Mr. Wilder, who prepared the new libretto for the French theatre at which the Oca del Cairo was first produced, deserves great credit; and still greater credit is due to Signor Bottesini, who has set the dialogue to musical recitative for the Italian version. Both pieces, we have hinted, received every justice at the hands of the chief performers at Drury Lane. Mesdames Trebelli-Bettini and Monbelli, as Abu Hassan and Fatima, especially distinguished themselves in the opera of Weber—for which, by the way, Signor Arditi had composed recitatives with facility not less considerable than that displayed by Signor Bottesini in the Oca del Cairo. In Mozart's work the principal singers were Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Lewitzky (of whom we have already spoken), Mr. Charles Lyall, Signors Gassier and Gardoni. We need not go into details; but we must add, with great regret, that the united attractions of these scarcely known works of Weber and Mozart amounted to little. Abu Hassan and L'Oca del Cairo, in fact, did not "draw," and were consequently played but twice or thrice at the most.

To say truly, our great operatic public, which arrogates to itself the prerogative of arbiter elegantiarum in matters connected with musical art, cares little or nothing for music in the abstract. It cares for executive "combinations"—as, for example, in the Flauto Magico, Don Giovanni, and Figaro, when a number of recognized artists of the first class can be heard together on the same night; and it cares still more for the popular prima donna of the hour. That the popular prima donna just now, and likely to be so for some time hence, is Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, can hardly be denied; and the mere announcement in the bills that Mdlle. Nilsson would appear in such or such a night in such or such an opera, sufficed to keep numbers away from the theatre, in anticipation of that glad event. Her first part was the well-worn Lucia, in which though evidently (not affectedly, as was afterwards clearly shown) indisposed, she brought back the old impressions, and again with her incomparably beautiful voice, reminded her hearers of the ars celare artem which lends to her singing a charm so strong, so fresh, and so abiding. Shortly afterwards, however, she achieved a still greater success in Robert le Diable. Her impersonation of Alice was by many amateurs thought less than compared with that of another celebrated Swedish songstress, who when, in 1847, Mr. Lumley revived the earliest French opera of Meyerbeer at Her Majesty's Theatre, made her début among us in the same character. We do not care to institute comparisons, but are willing to own that there is much in common both as to conception of character and execution of the music, between the Alice of Mdlle. Nilsson and the Alice of Jenny Lind. Nevertheless, if our advice be worth anything, we urgently counsel Mdlle. Nilsson to play such parts very seldom, and indeed, as a rule, to avoid Meyerbeer as much as practicable. Her voice is not fitted to stand the necessary strain and consequent fatigue attendant on such exacting music. After two or three performances in Robert le Diable and one in Faust (with M. Faure) Mdlle. Nilsson fell ill; and her illness endured so long as almost to ruin the theatre. Nothing else would attract—not La Nozze di Figaro or the "combination;" not Madame Volpini, with her well-feigned espiéglerie; not M. Faure, with all his popularity; not even what was perhaps the most admirable performance of Dinorah ever witnessed in this country, when Mdlle. Rina di Murska, the most genial, shadowy, and best of all Dinorahs, Mr. Santley, the best Hoel, Signor Gardoni, the best Corentin, and Madame Trebelli-Bettini as the Goatherd, combined their talents in honour of Meyerbeer. Nothing would attract; and thus we had another exemplification of the questionable tendency of the "star" system. Fine music and a fine ensemble pass for nought; but let once the popular lady of the hour show herself, and all is immediately couleur de rose, all goes well and smoothly, every one is pleased, and art may take its chance. On her recovery Mdlle. Nilsson appeared as the Countess in Le Nozze and as Elvira in Don Giovanni—both revealing her as an adept in the classic school of Mozart. Elvira she had played already; but the Countess was a new part, and a new success. It would be difficult to sing "Porgi amor" and "Dove Sono" better. Rossini's Otello came next, and afforded Mdlle. Nilsson yet another opportunity of distinction in a part she had never previously assumed. No character in the established repertory can be imagined more happily suited to her than the gentle, suffering Desdemona; and few who witnessed her graceful delineation, or listened to her touching accents in the "Willow" song, with which Desdemona mainly tries to alleviate her sorrows, could have left the theatre unmoved by an exhibition of art at once so genuine and effortless. With the florid music of Rossini's earlier period,† of which Otello contains many striking examples, Mdlle. Nilsson showed herself thoroughly conversant. But we must not linger on details. It will answer all purposes to add that the Desdemona of the accomplished Swede more than came up to general expectation—great as that expectation had been. The opera was in almost every instance well represented. If Signor Mongini's vocal proficiency and dramatic intelligence were equal to his physical gifts, he would be the precise Othello Rossini must have had in his mind. Donselli himself could not have a more magnificent voice. The Iago did not. Faure has only been surpassed by the Iago of Rossini; Signor Gardoni is an excellent Roderigo, Signor Foli is an imposing Elmiro, and Mdlle. Cari an Emilia alike prepossessing and unobtrusive. It was, moreover, a treat to listen once again to melodies which time cannot make stale, and to contrast pieces as ingenious in design as they are masterly in treatment. Either of the finales in Otello would be the fortune of a modern opera.

Upon Mignon, which followed Otello, and, thanks chiefly to Mdlle. Nilsson's impersonation of the heroine, became the attractive feature of the season, we need not dilate. Our musical readers are acquainted with all that they need care to know about it. How MM. Barbier and Carré have accommodated Goethe and his famous romance to their purpose has been described at such length by our contemporaries, daily and weekly, that we refrain from approaching it, after all, but over-fertile topic. Besides, it little matters. Romeo and Juliet, Hamlet, and other works of genius, have been handled in the same fashion, and with a similar object in view. On the whole, too, what MM. Barbier and Carré have done (the custom being winked at, be it understood) they have done so cleverly that we have no wish to arraign them for high treason against the majesty of Goethe. M. Thomas was, we think, more successful in finding pleasing and appropriate music for Mignon than after-wards, when undertaking the same duty for Hamlet. The subject lies easier within his grasp, inasmuch as while Ophelia remains more simple and more or less supernatural, Mignon is surrounded with types of ordinary humanity. M. Thomas has given to each of these a distinguishing character. Filine, the coquette, Lothario, the old harper, and above all, Mignon, stand out in well-defined individual prominence. The overture, if not strikingly original, is full of stir and bustle, and the passages in which Mignon is directly concerned are sentimental without any approach to that maudlin expression which, especially with French composers, so often passes for sentiment. The general performance of the opera of M. Ambroise Thomas, as well as the manner in which it was put upon the stage, reflected credit on the theatre. Nothing could be more impressive than the Lothario of M. Faure, nothing more brilliant than the Filine of Madame Volpini. Of Wilhelm Meister himself (as those acquainted with the German romance might have guessed in advance) neither the authors of the book nor the composer of the music could make anything; it was therefore not surprising that Signor Bettini, a very useful and painstaking tenor, should equally fail to endow that personage with interest.

Not less unanswerable to dramatists and composer was Frederick, Wilhelm's rival in the graces of Filine; and though M. Thomas added a song, expressly to reconcile Madame Trebelli-Bettini, that practised singer could succeed in making little out of the music and less out of the character. But in her impersonation of Mignon Mdlle. Nilsson achieved one of those successes which, in French idiom, "font époque." Reports from abroad had been circulated about this unique performance; but the reality surpassed anticipation. Each phase in the life of the dreaming maiden is poetically realized;—used drudgery under Giarno, her cruel master, before Mignon is conscious that she has a heart; the growing love for Wilhelm, her deliverer; the jealousy of and subsequent hatred for Filine, her dazzling and unscrupulous opponent; the despair turned into unbounded rapture when she finds that at last her love is reciprocated by Wilhelm—each and all were depicted to admiration. The liberty taken by the French dramatists in causing Mignon to live for happiness, instead of dying suddenly of a broken heart, is forgotten, or at least forgiven, under the attractive spell of Mdlle. Nilsson's delineation. Her singing equals her acting; and so charmingly does she recount to us through the music of M. Thomas the characteristic features of her lost home, that we would give something to hear her tell the same story in the healthy and vigorous music of Beethoven—himself of opinion (and who could judge better?) that his own setting of "Kennst du das Land?" was perfection. That Mdlle. Nilsson is an unqualified success is notorious. But for the unavoidable departure of Madame Volpini, and the difficulty of finding at a moment's notice a substitute, it might have been repeated, from time to time, up to the end of the season, instead of being given thrice and then abandoned. Why Madame Sinico, who is in every way competent, had not been advised to understudy the part of Filine, is hard to explain. In fact, with Madame Sinico in the theatre, we cannot see how Madame Volpini, who is in no way her superior and does not possess half her versatility, was wanted at all. As a result of this embarras de richesses, the opera was laid aside, and works already too familiar had again to be resorted to.

* Who also wrote the libretto for Idomeneo.

† Otello was composed in 1816, just after the Barbiere and just before the Cenerentola. Rossini was then in his 25th year.

At length, however, Herr Wagner came to the rescue, with his Fliegende Holländer, "done into Italian," by Signor Salvatore Marchesi, under the name of L'Olandese Dannato. We have several times been threatened with Tannhäuser, and more than once with Lohengrin, in the prospectuses of Her Majesty's Theatre. Tannhäuser, we understand, was even put into rehearsal, and the chorus of the indefatigable Signor Sanelli had almost mastered the first of the score. But, for reasons unexplained, season after season went by, and no opera exemplifying the "Art-work of the Future" appeared to enlighten while charming us. This time we are in luck. Whoever hit upon the idea of bringing out the first, and therefore the simplest among the operas in which is revealed the system by which all operatic art-work must henceforth be regulated deserves the thanks of the community. Rienzi, its immediate predecessor, would not have served the purpose half as well. In Rienzi we find nothing of the real Wagner, but, on the other hand, a great deal of weak Meyerbeer. The Fliegende Holländer, however, is the production of a wholly independent mind—we mean as regards form, because in so far as simple melodic invention is concerned, we are scarcely able to point out an original idea from the beginning of the score to the end. Nevertheless, the entire thing is more or less interesting; and the music, in many respects, bears so close a resemblance to the music of ordinary mortals, that we can follow it without pain, and hear much of it with satisfaction. But it should be borne in mind that, although the Holländer is the first of three operas of which, in 1852, Herr Wagner published the librettos (Drei Operndichtungen), as models, with an explanatory communication "to his friends," it came into the world, somewhat spontaneously, before the infallible formula had been issued, which, condemning all past attempts, asserts that "the error in opera, as a species of Art, has consisted in the fact, that a means of expression (Music) has been made the end, while the end of expression (Drama) has been made the means, so that the actual lyric Drama has been forced to rest upon the basis of absolute music;" thus at once disposing of Mozart, Cherubini, Beethoven, Rossini, and (excepting Rameau and Gluck, by the way) the rest of them. The Holländer also came long before that other tremendous oracle, abolishing the "patriarchal system of modulation," and proclaiming about that—"all keys being equal and essentially related, the privileges of one families are abolished!" It was happy enough to be conceived in more bucolic times, when Herr Wagner was not a self-constituted demigod, and before Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft, Kunst und Revolution, Oper und Drama, and other remarkable treatises had seen the light, before their author enjoyed the patronage of Liszt, and before Herr Brendel, the Leipsic publisher, had declared, in the Neue Zeitschrift fur Musik, that in Wagner's operas, and in them only, was the hope of music.

The Olandese Dannato was brought out too late in the season to enable us to judge what might have been its success under more favourable circumstances. We are inclined to think that it would have been real, and, not unlikely, to be permanent. The well-known legend of the Flying Dutchman is treated by Herr Wagner in his libretto with wonderful terseness and simplicity. Each of the characters is sharply defined, the most interesting being of course the fatestruck sea captain, and Senta, the pensive and enthusiastic maiden, who, at once deeply interested in the story of his life and ensnared of his person, determines an inward hope that the task of rescuing him from perdition may one day be her own. Daland the skipper, Senta's father, the unconscious instrument of fulfilling his daughter's aspirations, makes a pleasant contrast to this somewhat gloomy pair; while Erik, the hunter, Senta's human suitor, effectively completes the quartet of principals—choruses of Norwegian sailors and Norwegian peasant girls forming an effective and enlivening back-ground. Of the music we have not space to say more than that it is characteristic, dramatic, highly coloured, and occasionally beautiful. The orchestration, proceeding from a composer who contends that music should only play a subordinate part in the lyric drama, appears to us overwrought and extravagant; but those acquainted with the subsequent operas of Herr Wagner will bear us out that, in spite of the storm which, from the overture to the end, is almost incessantly raging, the share assigned to the orchestra in the Fliegende Hollander is comparatively modest. In one respect the system of Herr Wagner is as clearly exemplified in this work as in any of the successors; a certain number of characteristic phrases, each appertaining to a particular character, a particular emotion, a particular incident, or a particular reminiscence, constituting the material out of which the entire fabric is constructed. One or more of these phrases, or passages, is invariably present, heard in this or that shape, and conferring a kind of homogeneity by no means either illogical or unacceptable.

The performance at Drury Lane Theatre was for the most part so good as to deserve not only applause but crowded audiences. Of applause there was plenty, but of the latter, to spare; but at Saturday's matinée it was fairly attended. What had become of the "faithful" it was impossible to say. Every absent Wagnerite lost an opportunity of fortifying his belief that, for some time at least, may not again occur. The overture to the Hollander, a boisterous prelude, in which all the individualizing phrases we have referred to as helping to make up the musical structure are jumbled together pell-mell, was grandly executed; and, indeed, the perfection generally of the orchestral accompaniments bore witness to the pains Signor Arditi must have taken in rehearsing a work the major part of which to a well-ordered Italian mind could hardly represent anything better than cacophony. The chorus, too, was efficient, if not quite as well up to the mark as the orchestra. The chief characters were mostly in competent hands, the exception being that of Erik, in which Signor Peretti exhibited more zeal than discretion. Signor Foli was excellent as Daland, and Signor Rinaldini excellent as the Helmsman. But Senta and the Dutchman were of course the prominent features. Mr. Santley, who, all through the season, in opera after opera, has been rendering valuable service to the cause, and who, at the eleventh hour, undertook the part, afforded of creating for himself a new part—an opportunity of which he took signal advantage. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, his associate, has never produced a more marked, or a more legitimate effect than in the character of Senta.—Der Freischutz," and Herr Wagner himself calls her, in the Mittheilung seine Freunde, the preface to the book already cited. These two were absolutely irreproachable, and their united efforts contributed more than anything else to the triumph of L'Olandese Dannato. We cannot enter into details; but let us express a hope that next season should there again be two Italian houses, which, as Mr. Gye and Mr. Mapleson have dissolved partnership, is not unlikely, a fairer chance may be vouchsafed to the musical public of appreciating this, the best of Herr Wagner's contributions to the lyric stage—in operas which, compared with Tristan and its successors, is as harmony to chaos.

A miscellaneous entertainment, for the benefit of Mdlle. Nilsson, brought the Drury Lane performances to an end. Much has been done since the 16th of April, when the theatre opened; but the promise of Mignon and L'Olandese Dannato alone suffice to stamp the first season of the new management as exceptional. That the opera of M. Thomas should have drawn money, while Herr Wagner's opera did nothing of the kind, involves a question which may be discussed on some future occasion.

A POLONAISE BY CHOPIN.

So rarely does a musical thought gain, by a change of the language in which it is transmitted, that when an exception is met with, it may be worth noticing.

Most pianists, it is to be hoped, now that the Polonaises by Chopin,—of their kind, as incomparable and original as his Mazurkas—and among the most picturesque and characteristic pianoforte music in existence. One or two of them, however, may be cited as almost impossible to be performed, so as to work out the conception of the author, which includes gorgeous pomposity of sound, as well as dignity of idea. The Polonaise in A major is of the number. Even when given by the accomplished hands of the greatest pianists, and the most penetrated by the characteristics of the music, it must disappoint the ear, because keys and strings and fingers are limited in their power of expression. I have heard it again and again—always with the same result. This shortcoming suggested the idea of arranging it for a band of "harmony music" (to use Beethoven's German phrase). The experiment has been carried out lately by the excellent conductor of the music at Scarborough—Herr Meyer Lutz,—and the result was as magnificent and inspiriting as that of the "Torch Dance" of Meyerbeer to be heard here, concerning which a paragraph will be found in a former number of the Athenæum. Indeed, Chopin's "Polonaise," because simpler and nobler in its phrases, produces the greater effect of the two,—even under the disadvantage of its being an arrangement; whereas Meyerbeer's was calculated for the instruments which perform it, and if presented on the piano would lose no small part of its stately brilliancy. I have never heard a more superb piece of pageant music nor one more fitted for the most magnificent locality—or for the largest assemblage of instruments, be it as overpowering as that which Herr Wipprecht, of Berlin, brought together for the memorable serenade at the Bruhl Palace, near Bonn, given when our Queen entered the Rhineland, for the Beethoven Festival. As an exception I repeat, which proves an established rule—the effect of this splendid piece of music will not soon be forgotten by any who have "ears to hear."

THE DRAMA IN SPAIN.

The intensely local character of the Spanish stage in its best days has given posterity so clear an insight into the life of the period, that its decadence must ever remain matter for regret. The Spanish stage of to-day, somewhat like our own, is fed by importations from Paris: occasionally originality finds an audience, but an attempt by one of that school of dramatists who maintain that Julius Cæsar in his toga was, after all, a human being, has proved a failure; not from want of merit in the author, but because the Potts and Slurks of a Spanish Eatanswill have damned it utterly.

A curious scene, or rather an unmistakable row, has lately occurred in the Theatre of Lope de Rueda, at Madrid. On the introduction of a comedy called La Carmanola, depicting, in the author's idea, the inner life of this hour, he seems to have dispensed with those set appliances which make up the fun of a Spanish comedy,—the comic man—the triangle of cupboards, where somebody is always hiding from somebody else—where nobody overhears a word, although everybody is within ear-shot; no tables were upset, or hats crushed, for the amusement of the gallery:—in fact, none of the ordinary aids to success were used. The author essayed a realistic "dress suit" comedy, and the press, not relishing its satire, while they deny its truth, have condemned it. La Carmanola, having been produced at a time of great political excitement, created a sensation which should have brought profit to both author and manager.

La Carmanola had already been before the public some months; the author published it last year, but suppressed his name, and adopted that of "A Wit of this Court." His preface is as follows:—"This comedy is printed without having been represented at any theatre. The reason of this will be plain to the reader taking into consideration the times and circumstances of the hour; but if now, or at any future time, a manager shows the desire to represent it, it is hardly necessary to say that the author will not object." So much for the printed comedy. Of the acting one, the author, the manager, the Carlist press, the radically liberal press, and the outside public, those who paid to hear it and did not, are only competent to speak. The second representation has not taken place; the more sober Madrileno is, therefore, precluded from taking part in this misunderstanding. The first scene set is an editor's room: a round table, of gigantic dimensions, covered with inkstands, pens, &c.; piles of periodicals fill the centre of the stage; authors writing, others scissors-and-pasting, &c.; the walls, according to stage directions, are covered with ink-splashed announcements and pictorial representations, but not of saints; broken or ricketty stools fill in the foreground. In this den sits supreme the director of La Carmanola: the author has chosen that the journal he seeks to immortalise shall be of the scurrilous and scissors-and-paste school. The editors are rather black sheep. One has brought nothing away with him from Salamanca but slang songs and a recipe for salad. He has been successful in an official capacity, and thinks it capital fun to turn editor, finding the occupation profitable. Another has written bad comedies by the dozen, which no manager will accept, and spends five hours daily in writing about everything, understanding nothing.

Don Rafael, the director, whom the author leads you to believe is to be the villain, but who turns out in the end to be all virtue and abnegation, foods his small vanities by printing constant eulogiums upon himself. Eduardo, an assistant, whom Don Rafael is supposed to have perverted, and who, forgetting the lessons of virtue and abnegation taught by his parents, pens and publishes a scurrilous article vilifying a most respectable gentleman and the wife of his friend. Edmardo has not the slightest knowledge of the individuals calumniated; has overrun the constable, and a money-lender becomes trouble-some; Don Rafael finds the money, and Eduardo the brains for the article. Presently Don Rafael desires to be introduced to Eduardo's parents, and becomes enamoured of his sister, who, he has heard, has been visiting the sick during the cholera epidemic. When Eduardo returns home, his father, Don Antonio, is furious; the lady calumniated is his wife, and of course Eduardo's mother. Don Antonio is determined to have judicious, not judicial satisfaction: he will not fight a duel because he may get the worst of it; so he determines to call on the director, and, "six-shooter" in hand, compel him to write, print, and publish a retraction. Don Rafael refuses to name the author or retract, and induces Don Antonio to withdraw, pocketing his six-shooter: and so ends the first act. The second is set in the house of Don Antonio. Don Rafael presents himself as a suitor for the hand of his daughter, Eduardo's sister. Don Antonio, ashamed of his choleric course of action, turns his choler upon his wife and his old friend, Don Manuel, who, it now turns out, went together in a hackney-carriage to secure the overdue acceptances of Eduardo. Don Rafael recognises in the father of his amante the gentleman who violently assaulted and threatened to shoot him in his editorial capacity: Maria discovers her would-be lover to be the monster of iniquity vituperated by her parents. Eduardo now finds that he has vilified his own mother and his own and his father's best friend, on the occasion of their seeking to become possessed of the overdue documents. They strike—picturesque attitudes; and so closes the second act. In the third, Eduardo, to facilitate the dénouement, attempts suicide. Don Rafael prevents it. The latter decides to hand over to Don Manuel the directorship of La Carmanola, as a set-off against the vilification. Don Manuel accepts the post, although he does not think much of journalism in general, and less of journalists in particular. He moralises thus upon military matters:—"It appears to me undesirable that rogues should parade the streets armed with muskets, while honest people go about their business unarmed"—a sarcasm on the volunteers of liberty. Don Antonio at last becomes reasonable, pardons his son, offers his friendship to Don Rafael, seeks forgiveness of his wife and his friend, Don Manuel; and thus ends the play. "We can hardly forgive the author (says Señor Cos-Gayon, from whose article in the Revista de Espana we quote), who, desiring to present a type of rectitude and good sense, makes Don Antonio from first to last act as a madman or a fool."

This is the outline of a comedy which set all the press of Madrid in motion, and brought the Potts and Slurks to the Lope de Rueda to applaud or hiss. The little preface, and the other means taken to call public attention to the production of La Carmanola, led up to this dénouement. "What was the author's object in vilifying the press? No doubt journalists commit errors, are like other men mortal, and if an author chooses to burlesque a profession, why not? If the play was slow, the dialogue was chaste and elegant. Nothing can discredit journalism: those who abuse it are like dogs who bark at the moon. Still, if the dogs who bay heavenward cannot stop the motion of a star, they may annoy the neighbourhood. La Carmanola will not slay journalism; but after the manner which was decided upon of announcing and discussing it the result was not doubtful. The press on this has shown itself to be the enemy of the press; for any scenic representation which shall rival the unwholesome food of the café chantant should not only be tolerated, but applauded. Serfior Nocedal's sin is, that he has burlesqued the press. His comedy is a caricature, but it offends neither in word nor deed, as too many others have offended, and do offend, the eyes, ears, and consciences of decent people. The press is, indeed, weak, if it admits of no other solution but violence and disorder when it is clumsily burlesqued, as in La Carmanola.

Song of the Day.*

Tramp, tramp, tramp!
With sabre and with gun,
To glory on the battle-field
The warrior hosts march on.
Tramp, tramp, tramp!
And still they onward go,
To fight for country, wife, and child,
And crush the daring foe.
Ah! why is it that thus,
For kings' ambitions greed,
So many loving, gallant hearts,
Should in the struggle bleed?

But, tramp, tramp, tramp! &c.

Tramp, tramp, tramp!
With trumpet, fife, and drum,
With flag and banner waving high,
The cry is "still they come!"
Tramp, tramp, tramp!
With cymbal's clashing sound,
On, on they march to victory,
Or death upon the ground.
And yet, oh Lord, how sad!
For kings and kaisers show,
That man with man should madly fight,
And blood in torrents flow.

But, tramp, tramp, tramp! &c.

Tramp, tramp, tramp!
In rank and serried file,
Let's pray that such may never be
In this our happy Isle.
Tramp, tramp, tramp!
But should e'er danger show,
Then Britons all with one accord,
Would rise and beat their foe.
Yet, Lord, protect our land
From all such horrid strife,
We war not—tho' we fear not—
And in peace would pass our life.

Tramp, tramp, tramp! &c.

ON ECHOMETRY.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—You complain that I have set forth facts as to classical music being considered too weary for many people. It was not my own sentiment, therefore, in stating it, my responsibility ceases if I can make good my facts. Nor am I the first or only one who has noticed that such is frequently the case. The last time I was present at two great performances, I noticed especially that many people went away before the finale had begun. In one instance some Royal visitors took their departure: there followed, of course, quite an exodus. The two pieces escaped from on these two occasions were the Choral Symphony, and the Septet in E flat, both by Beethoven, each lasting about an hour. As I was never present when either of these works were performed previously, I can of course only speak from my impressions caused by what actually occurred. Heaven forfend the time when gasconading should become so much the rule that to record facts should be deemed "idiotic." Let us look the facts steadily in the face. Pray do not for one moment imagine that I can have any sentiment save such as can be comprehended in the word "reverence" for standard classical works, nor that I can treat the honestly conceived and faithfully-expressed opinions of any worthy man otherwise than with sincere respect. I say unhesitatingly that our classical works are too few. If an individual has heard, for instance, a symphony of, say, Mozart's, one hundred times over (and very many have heard all the good symphonies one hundred times over), is his judgment to be deprecated because he asks for a change of diet? Two of the best men of the century possessed such good musical memories that the first bar of most sterling pieces was enough for them—memory supplied the remainder. This is, of all things else, the essential first quality of an original mind, in music, as in other matters. Perfect satisfaction with "things as they are," never yet gave the primary impetus to statesman, philosopher, or artist. If his "ideal" be not in advance of the actual, there is an end to progress. The first essential experience, then, of the musician comprises a memory of all the good that has been achieved before him, and a certain dissatisfaction with what is fast arising from a perception within his own mind of more beautiful ideas yet to be embodied. Were every artist to coincinde that the best had been done art would die. So, if a musician, possessed with one of these "iron memories" (such men are to be found in every age), were invited to sit out for an hour a classic work already heard many times and clearly remembered, would it be a matter of wonder if he ventured to enquire for "change of air?" I think not. The wonder would be if he did not desire a change? What would be said if the Royal Academy Exhibition opened every year with but two new pictures; all the others newly exhibited having been on the walls for a generation at least? That is just the aspect of affairs in music. All the great symphonies, except about two each season, have been (the very youngest of them), heard over and over, again and again, for forty years a perfect ritual and rubric of symphonies and overtures. And then the impudence of the public (who are willing to pay their guinea at last) asking for "change of air?" "I never go to the play now," replied an elderly friend, whom I had asked if he was going to see Macbeth; "I saw Mrs. Siddons once, Sir, and I don't want to have my recollection disturbed." Can it be looked upon as strange that after hearing an artist, who, perhaps, stands alone, render a choice classical work, that a true lover of music, with even but a fair memory should dread an infinitely inferior reproduction of the same work by some unknown Brown, Jones, or Robinson. Smith may have made a very good copy of a Raphael; but is one to be blamed for preferring the original, and desiring not to have his recollection disturbed respecting it?

So much for controversial gossip. I will offend no more by wordiness. One object I have distinctly in view in treating of the "duration of notes," is to assert that, "What we gain in speed we lose in volume." If in one part there are four notes and in another but one, other things being equal, the part having the fewer notes will be much weaker than the part having but one note. Perhaps but a fourth part of the power will be manifested by the short notes: some would think this too much difference. Something depends upon speed (as to both), but yet I do not think the proportion excessive. Put eight notes in one part against one in another, and you will have but one-eighth of the power. Sixteen, or thirty-two, and a band of that number of very rapid notes (say if the passage be in violins) be reduced in power to the volume of one note drawn by Joachim. If it is thought I am over-stating the facts, let those who doubt recall their experience. The stridulous sound of the bows of thirty violins, when playing a rapid passage, is a material increase of their united small volume of actual noise; but even with this accretion, I feel that I am safely within the bounds of fact in stating that a solo violinist produces more in one long note than the thirty in thirty quick notes. However, I make the suggestion for those who care to think about such matters, without in any way vouching for mathematical correctness as to quantity. If what I have said sets any one enquiring, that is all I can wish or hope. Next, the rapid notes fail from the impossibility of all the atoms of atmospheric air in any apartment being, as a whole, so quietly set in motion as to become all media for the production and conveyance to the ear of the same harmony. (I am really very anxious not to be wordy, and with this remark I will cease altogether. By conscience will, upon this score at least, then be easy.) Just as a small drum can be quicker sounded than a large organ-pipe, so a small room quicker resounds than an expansive hall. The room should be imagined as one vast "organ-pipe." In large assemblies, therefore, the music has rarely time to reach all must be apparent. How to better the building is for sound, the more necessary should this conception be realized. If a large cathedral, small notes—pretty to those near—will be altogether lost to those at a distance. Illustrations of these fundamental principles so crowd upon me that I know not which to select, and I know that the briefer I am the better you will love me. Suppose, then, the rapid passages on the violin reached one hundred feet, the passages half as rapid, twice that distance; the slow ones, without any exaggeration, will reach the ear at half-a-mile. These considerations should guide conductors a little—composers a great deal. If a passage occurs—some of Handel's great cadences illustrate this—where the chorus in one part have a holding note for four or more slow bars, by the time the fourth bar is reached, if in such a place as Exeter Hall or the Crystal Palace, that note (like the old prophet's rod) will have swallowed up all its contemporaries. So that at certain points the conductor would do well to consider from such a basis as this:—If it takes the hundredth part of a minute to elapse between giving the valve and the full discharge of sound from a sixty-four feet organ-pipe —(I think it will take more)—what period is required for the perfect reverberation of a space so many times larger than the guage mentioned? Until such a calculation enters into the mind, in some sort, of the musical director or composer, his conceptions, in proportion to the extent of his orchestra, or the grandeur of the music before him, must fall short of their possible result. In the chorale this is of the first importance. Conductors who overlook this are constantly urging their choirs to a speed that entirely destroys the music. If, in striking at the root of what I believe to be an evil, I have expressed myself too strongly, forgive me. If my statements are incorrect, no one would be more pleased than myself to have them contravened. Far beyond this very slight statement of the case the difficulty extends, in fact, to the very heart of all music, or indeed I should not go thus far out of my way to risk the disapprobation of many estimable people in making known these sentiments. You cannot move a "division" as you would a "light brigade." What is "echelon" but a suggestion that "full points" are necessary? How gratefully do we hail a bar's rest in grand choral music, that we may hear the "echo." Above all, let the young writer trace in Handel (more than other knew the elements of the principle) how he keeps one slow subject, such as "I will sing," in Israel, or "For the Lord," in the "Hallelujah," always going. He gives his notes "time to speak." And yet he is by no means dull, because he has the counterpoint all the time, both lovely and lively.—Yours very truly,

IDEALIZER.

DR. STEWART'S NEW ODE.

(From the "Birmingham Daily Post.")

By way of overture to the day's proceedings the orchestral parts of Dr. Stewart's Ode to Shakspere were again tried over, under the direction of the composer, but as the result showed, the precaution was superfluous, and the band had practically nothing either to learn or unlearn. Further experience of Dr. Stewart's music serves only to confirm the favourable impression we have already expressed of it. So far, at all events, as concerns the instrumental score, it must be pronounced an exceedingly creditable piece of work—broad, rythmatical, well-balanced, and spirited. If the ideas do not quite rise to the level of the subject—we do not speak of the text—it is perhaps, because the subject is, intellectually considered, beyond the reach of musical art. Handel or Beethoven might doubtless have formed an adequate conception of the sublimity of Shakspere's genius, but even they must have failed to realize its many-sidedness. Dr. Stewart has not apparently aimed at exemplifying or delineating the genius of the immortal bard. He has been content to extol it, and this, judging from the instrumental portion of the work, he has accomplished in a highly satisfactory manner. If there be a fault to find with the orchestration, it is that it lacks the relief which a judicious economy of power would impart. It is of a too uniform strength and consistence throughout, and in many places, therefore, greatly over-weights the voice parts, especially in the solo passages. The ideas, though neither very profound nor very original, are often ingenious and always pleasing, while their treatment, as already intimated, leaves little or nothing to be desired.

THE Choir Benevolent Fund is to hold a Festival Service at Lincoln Cathedral on the 27th proximo.

THE LATE JOHN COOPER.

Somebody should give us a sketch of John Cooper. He was a type of the conventional actor, but he was a very good actor, minded his business conscientiously, and always did all that he knew. Jacopo was his name in a Drury Lane adaptation of the American Mr. Cooper's Bravo (I think that was the novel, and that the drama, which was musical, was called The Red Mask), and on the first night Mr. Cooper knelt at the block and was duly beheaded. But audiences had not then learned to love the horrific, and the Drury Lane people made such a terrible disturbance about the execution of their favourite—like the "Cornish Boys" when Bishop Trelawny was in danger—that on the next night, as the death procession was crossing the grand square, a white handkerchief flew out at a window, and the chorus exultingly struck up—

> "Doubt is ever; see, of mercy > Yonder waves the happy sign."

Many who read this will remember Cooper as the Prince in that splendid spectacle and very effective drama, The Jewess, which has never been beaten except by some of the Covent Garden Meyerbeer representations. He had behaved ill to the heroine (exquisitely played by the lady who was then Miss Ellen Tree), and she went in search of him, and fell exhausted at the door of the palace, in an attitude which still dwells on one's eye, just as does that other wonderful bit of silent effect, Charles Kemble's "stroll into Angiers with indolent grace." But I am told that Cooper's Othello had singular merit. I should have thought him a good deal over-parted there; but I have heard the reverse from men who went to theatres when there were great actors. His Cassio was exceedingly good—the remorse of a genteel kind of person who had had the misfortune to get drunk, and who thought the world was therefore at an end, was just, I think, what we wanted. You did not feel in the least with the donkey; but Cooper made him manly enough at the end, and said, "Dear General, I never gave you cause," in a tone that I remember after twenty years. At one time no Drury Lane play in which he did not appear seemed complete; and the Times expressed what we all felt when it called him "our friend." He has helped me through many a pleasant evening; I am very glad that his own evening was pleasant.

SHIRLEY BROOKS.

THE OLD STORY OVER AGAIN.

That master of humour; that wondrous pen-and-ink photographer of men (under which head are included women), and manners, Augustus Mayhew, once gave a highly amusing exemplification of Virgil's celebrated lines:

> "Fama, malum que non alind velocius ullum; > Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo," etc.

drawing the said exemplification from the apparently harmless fact that a worthy and respected family once lived in a London "Row," or "Crescent," and asked some friends to stop with them for a few days. The result of their hospitality was that tradesmen after tradesman first ceased to call for orders, and then refused to serve them any longer; that the Water Works requested immediate payment of "those arrears;" that the Gas Company threatened to cut off the supply; and that their neighbours looked on them with an evil eye—or, rather, with as many evil eyes as they possessed eyes among them—and were evidently not particularly proud of their acquaintance. And what was the cause of this series of annoyances, this of credit, and eventually almost ruin, which overtook this luckless family? Their visitor's name happened to be Sheriff! "Mr. and Mrs. Sheriff are stopping at No. 20," says No. 1 in the Row to No. 2. "The Sheriffs are at No. 20," says No. 2 to No. 3. "No. 20 is done up; the sheriffs are in the house," says No. 3 to No. 4. The reader may easily imagine with what keen satire and rollicking humour the story is carried out by Augustus Mayhew. A somewhat similar specimen of the mode in which facts may be distorted has just occurred in relation to M. Offenbach. A great many leading papers of Germany announced that M. Offenbach, a born German, being a native of Cologne, "had not blushed to compose, on the outbreak of the war, a hymn antitled, 'Dieu garde l'Empereur,' thus playing the traitor to his country," and much more to the same effect. The Vossische Zeitung, which was one of the said papers, contained, however, the following notice in its issue for the 6th inst.:—"Out of respect for the German name, we expressed, in our Parisian correspondence of yesterday, our doubts about the report that the well-known composer, Jacob Offenbach, had composed a new French war-song, 'Dieu garde l'Empereur.' As we expected, the refutation follows quickly on the heels of the charge. We beg to-day to call attention to the fact that the composition in question dates from the year 1862 (as is proved by a catalogne of the publisher's), and was placed among the novelties of the day by being advertised afresh at the present moment."—"The sheriffs are in at No. 20!"—"Lor! are they though? Well, I never did think much of that lot!" These are not your words, Augustus Mayhew, but they are what you have proved beyond a doubt some one in the "Row" must have said to some one else.

THE LAST OF THE "MASTER-SINGERS."

"Master-song" ("Meistergesang") survived, at Ulm, the horrors of the wars of the first French Revolution. As late as 1830, there were, in that city, twelve old "Singmasters," who, after being expelled from their "Schaustube," or "Show-room," in the Town Hall, as well as from many other localities belonging to the Corporation, used to meet in the inns and lodging-houses frequented by artizans, and there sing their old tunes, without printed music or words, but simply from memory, so that it was quite incomprehensible how the artificial verses and the still more artificial melodies could have been preserved so long by mere tradition. In the year 1839, there were four of these old men still left. They represented the crafts of the gunsmiths, the locksmiths, the "Werkmeister," and the "Kronmeister." On the 21st October, 1839, they solemnly closed the old Mastersong, formally handing over to the Ulm Liederkranz the books, the books of notes, school-boards, &c., &c., with a prayer that "Just as the tablet of the Mastersingers had for centuries invited their pious forefathers to listen to their songs, the banners of the Liederkranz might wave for centuries to come, and its songs be heard by a remote posterity." A few years after the dissolution of the guild, there was only one Mastersinger remaining, a linen weaver, of the name of Haberle. He was not averse to strong drinke, and his business was not so flourishing as he could have desired—and did desire, by the way. In order to ameliorate his circumstances, from a pecuniary point of view, he made up his mind, without more ado, to become towo watchman. He possessed a good strong pair of lungs, and the musical education requisite for the post to which he aspired and which he obtained. His humour and facetious remarks caused him to be a welcome visitor at the wine shops and inns, and many a glass of liquor did he earn by his jokes and his singing. If ever he took a little too much, he used to jump on the table, and begin, with all his might and main, the old Master-Singers' strains, interpolating many a full-flavoured joke, and finally dropping into the usual watchman's cry. If, however, anyone indulged in the insulting quotation:

> "Die Leinweber haben eine herrliche Zunft,
> Titscharum, Titscherum, Titscharum,
> Am Galgen ist ihre zu sammenkunft,
> Titscharum, Titscharum, Titscharum!"*

he would boil over with rage, resembling in appearance a perfect maniac, and swearing like an entire regiment of troopers. He would jump off the table, gulp down a glass of beer, seize his tremendous halberd, and rush out. Then would be heard the melancholy sound of his watchman's cry, growing gradually faioter and fainter:

> "Hört, ihr Herrn, und lasst Euch sagen,
> Die Glock hat elf geschlagen."†

And with this cry, the respectable old songs of the German Mastersingers died out. The Minnegesang had stepped down a hundred years previously from the the proud princely castle and into the workshop of honest burghers, where it grew so coarse and ossified as to be no longer recognizable. It disappeared from the world on the lips of a watchman.

* "The linen-weavers boast a fine craft, do you see,
Titscharum, Titscharum, Titscharum!
They'll all hang some day on the tall gallows tree,
Titscharum, Titscharum, Titscharum!"

The sarcasm in these lines does not certainly strike a dispassionate person as excruciatingly severe, still, if he be impartial as well as dispassionate, he will frankly confess that it is quite as scathing as that lurking beneath the question: "Who eat the puppy pie under Marlowe Bridge?" a question in it-elf apparently harmless, not to say, stupid, but which, nevertheless, will lash into foaming fury any Thames Bargee to whom it is addressed.

† The above German doggrel may be thus rendered in the subjoined English doggrel:

> "'Tis eleven you're just heard;
> That's the time, upon my word."

MUSIC AND WAR.

THE connection of Music and War is one of very old date, but no advance of time seems to loosen the chain that binds together these apparently uncongenial allies. What the one was to the other when Joshua's trumpets blared round the walls of Jericho, so it is now, as Frenchman and German commit musical slaughter on the plains of Champagne. It might even be said with truth that at no period did music play a more important part in this connection than at present. Napoleon let slip the "Marseillaise" as though it were one of his most trusty dogs of war; and ever since the "Marseillaise" has raged up and down France with the effect of the Fiery Cross upon a Highland clan. King William had no need to let slip anything upon his people, because, always addicted to shouting themselves hoarse about their river god—the Rhine—the Germans had only to shout themselves quite hoarse to be equal to the occasion. So, from the one side come the determined phrases of "The Rhine Watch," and "Where is the German's Fatherland?" answering to the passionate strains of Rouget de l'Isle's hymn; and "Mourir pour la Patrie" from the other. With these notes upon their tongue, and ringing in their ear even above the din of battle, many a sturdy Teuton and daring Gaul die, as their fathers died before them. We, who love a beautiful art for its own sake, may regret to see it thus prostituted, and made the machinery for unscrupulous monarchs, and still more unscrupulous ministers, to work out their vile designs. We may sorrowfully look on as the power of music over men's passions is used to stir them up to mutual hatred and a common bloodthirstiness; but we cannot deny that the machinery is obvious, and the power great. Neither can we deny that the homage thus paid to the influence of music and song is the greatest it is possible to conceive. At times like the present we see, as at no other, what a mighty spell the art exercises over the minds and resolves of men. We can understand why great emperors have trembled at the sound of a people's hymn; and why, when it suits their purpose, they can bid it ring from frontier to frontier. The oft-quoted saying of a nameless philosopher—"Let me make the nation's songs, and I care not who makes the laws"—is no exaggeration, depend upon it; but rather one of those profound truths which, always visible to some, are seen by the many only when convulsions throw them on the surface. Out of a lamentable prostitution of art, therefore, some crumbs of comfort may be gathered; especially may he whose business it is to create or interpret the people's songs learn to magnify his office and measure his responsibility. As is the power exercised, so is both the importance and accountableness. That the power may be beyond measure, the spirit of Rouget de l'Isle, supposing it able to take note of passing events, can testify.

The tendency of war to enlist on its behalf every possible auxiliary is proverbial; and when the religion of peace and love is made to do duty in both the opposing ranks, music can hardly expect to escape. We have seen within the last few weeks an Emperor and a King declaring, with hands upon each other's throats, that the God of Battles is on their side, and invoking His aid with a pious unction many a Dissenting parson might envy. We have seen the King (the Emperor seems to have thought a like act superfluous) order his people on their knees to pray for victory; and we have seen the King (the Emperor has not had the chance) returning thanks for victory as though the Lord had fought against the French as He did against the Canaanites of old. This is very pitiful; but the mention of it may serve to show what an all-absorbing demon is War, and how the noblest and purest things are not safe from its blood-stained hands. There is need for patience, while we listen to those instinctive utterances from our inner nature, which speak of the halcyon time when the nations shall learn war no more; and Art and Religion—twin sisters of equal loveliness—may walk as unmolested as did Una under the protection of her chastity.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

We have heard the story of the man who offered a reward to be informed of the most extraordinary profession, and gave the prize to a poet who lived by his profession. The profession of a poet nowadays is not such a bad one—if we may judge by the balance-sheet which M. Victor Hugo, with that modesty which distinguishes him, has published in a French paper. "I am possessed," writes the author of the Legende des Siecles—

	Yearly.
In Belgium, of 300 shares in the National Bank, producing about.....	£1,360
In England, £17,000 of Consols, producing annually	500
In France, from the Institute.....	40
In Guernsey, Hauteville House	40

M. Victor Hugo adds that his property in his works is disposed of for years to come; that he pays over to his children £1,200 a year, and lives himself on £500. To this should be added the droits d'auteur from the theatres of France and Belgium—a considerable source of revenue, no obstacles being now placed by the French Government in the way of M. Victor Hugo's pieces. Even Le Roi s'amuse, prohibited under Louis Philippe, has been performed at Nantes. A part of M. Victor Hugo's fortune is placed in the country which, in L'Homme qui Rit, he has so ridiculously misrepresented.

If the accident at the Alhambra leads to any improvement it should extend to the clothing, or, rather, underclothing, of the dancers. It would be presumptuous to question the taste of the present day. We might point out that the ballets at the Alhambra are not exactly like the ballets in which Taglioni, Duvernay, and Carlotta Grisi were wont to perform. The world has made a considerable advance of late in appreciation of art, and there is little doubt that the present generation, which applauds the contortions of half-naked women in Leicester Square, is a vast improvement on our ancestors who only patronized the legitimate drama. Still there is something wanting at the Alhambra, and that is—clothes.

Dresden.—Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger has been revived, with new scenery, dresses, and decorations, the first ones having been destroyed at the burning down of the Operahouse. Judicious "cuts" have been made in the long-winded score. The author-composer is extremely indignant at this, but the management has taken no notice of his displeasure.—Nothing definite is yet known concerning the erection of the new Theatre. The old building was insured in the Madgeburgh Insurance Company, for a sum of 120,000 thalers. This sum the Company refused to pay, for reasons which they, no doubt, deemed valid, and the matter was referred to the legal authorities. Unfortunately for the Company, the latter took a different view of the reasons aforesaid, and the Company had, therefore, to pay.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

August, the great excursion month, has already brought large numbers of visitors. The three last fireworks evenings alone have attracted between 60,000 and 70,000 persons. The next display has been postponed a little longer than usual, in order that a great representation of the blowing up the railway bridge over the Rhine connecting Kehl with Strasburg may be prepared. Considering the interest taken in all matters connected with the present lamentable war, it is thought that such a representation will possess special attraction.

The mammoth shells displayed by Mr. Brock on the last occasions were of great splendour. Some of them were twelve inches in diameter; and, bursting into thousands of stars of all colours, the effect was surprisingly beautiful. The two greatest gatherings in August have hitherto been the Foresters and Temperance League Fêtes, each attracting between fifty and sixty thousand people. The Foresters' Day this year was on the 16th, and the Temperance League Fête will be held on the 30th. Balloon ascents, ballad operas, processions, and great fountains, are attractions common to each. In addition to these the Temperance League gives a choral concert of 5,000 children, and holds meetings in the grounds on behalf of its cause. A new Fête has this year been organised which will doubtless compete with the two last-named bodies for high numbers. It is in aid of the Metropolitan Police Orphanage. Amusements will be provided to last throughout the day. Nineteen police bands will compete for prizes, and there will be cricket and other matches in which members of the force will take part. The grounds now look very beautiful, the recent rain having freshened them considerably. The flower beds on terrace and round the rosary never looked more gorgeous.

MR. JOHN COOPER.

This name, once so familiar to old playgoers, has appeared not in a play-bill, but in the obituary. John Cooper died, last week, at Tunbridge Wells, aged seventy-seven. He may be said to have been the last actor of the Kemble school, which, no doubt, was what Mrs. Crawford called it, a "a paw and paune school," but which had one merit, in the clear and distinct enunciation even of words (like tejious for tedious, Room for Rome, suerin for sovereign, &c.) which were excruciatingly mispronounced. John Kemble recognised young Cooper's adhesion to his school, by presenting him with a sword, as a testimony of the old actor's admiration of the young player's Romeo. That young player came from Bath to the Haymarket, in 1811, at which time he was but eighteen years of age. He made his début as Count Montalban, in The Honeymoon (Elliston was the Duke Aranza). Cooper soon withdrew, to make himself more practised, if not more perfect by a course of provincial stages. He chiefly distinguished himself at Liverpool, whence his old colleague, Elliston, invited him to Drury Lane, where, in 1820, he made his first appearance as Romeo to the Juliet of his cousin, Mrs. W. West. From that time till Charles Kean left the Princess's a few years ago, Cooper was constantly before the public, playing everything, from Shakesperean heroes to rattling gentlemen in farces, and in later years the heavier personages generally. He played everything well, without showing any brilliancy of genius, but he had sound common sense, carefulness, and was in every respect a conscientious actor. He was the last of the many players of the second order whose industry and thriftiness begat riches. John Cooper might have sung "My banks are well-furnished." But we chiefly notice this highly-respectable player, to contrast the labour which the performers of his time had to undergo, with the luxurious ease enjoyed by actors now. In our days, pieces run for hundreds of nights, and the player has no new study during the whole of that time. Some actors have but two or three characters in their repertoire, and these are played till the public are wearied. It was different in Cooper's time. Take for instance his first season at Drury Lane. During that season Cooper played three dozen different parts. He appeared in nine or ten characters, in old plays, for the first time; and he was the original representative, that season, of twelve parts in new pieces, some of which were five-act plays. What like this would make the young stagers of to-day go mad. The Dolittles of this age have no conception how their grandfathers in the drama laboured. Among the varied characters which Cooper created in his first year at Drury Lane, were the Doge in Byron's Marino Faliero, and Prince King in Monsieur Tonson; Gerald Duval, in the piece so-called, and Mr. Nicodemus in The Spectre Bridegroom. He also played Captain Smith to Mrs. W. West's Pocahontas in a melo-drama by Barker, which was first played in Philadelphia, in 1808, under the title of The Indian Princess, or La Belle Sauvage. At Drury it was called Pocahontas, or the Indian Princess. In this piece, the Indian Opechancanough was acted by Booth, the father of the man who shot President Lincoln. We have only to add, that Mr Cooper's home was at Ealing, where he was much respected. The figure of the upright, gentlemanlike, old player walking sedately cheerful, to or from Ealing Church, will be missed with much regret by those among whom he lived in that pleasant village.

The death, at Pilnitz, of Madame Bender, for whom Weber composed Preciosa, is announced.

PROVINCIAL.

The Carmarthen Journal of August 12th has the following :—

"The inhabitants of Cross Hands, a colliery district about 12 miles from Carmarthen, have a resident amongst them in Dr. Norton, of Manigias (Norton Brothers, proprietors of the Cross Hands Colliery), who spares no trouble nor expense in getting up yearly a concert of vocal and instrumental music in aid of the School-Church, which has but a short time since been erected at Cross Hands for the spiritual benefit of the mass of colliers and their families, who inhabit the neighbourhood. On this occasion, the 31st ult., a most efficient company of amateurs gave their services, and Herr Hauptmann, of Cheltenham (late of Tenby), the celebrated violinist, as well known in Carmarthen, being on a visit to Dr. Norton, also lent his powerful aid, and enraptured a large audience by his extraordinary and impressive playing, which comprised De Beriot's first Air Varie, charmingly accompanied by Mrs. Higginson, another on popular airs from Lucia, and the ever popular 'Yankee Doodle,' which he gave as an encore after a most vociferous demand."

DR. SPARK ACROSS THE LEEDS ORGAN.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—I have just returned to Leeds from the Continent, and find the organ controversy still going on. I wish to say, with reference to the very sensible letter of the Rev. Henry Greeves, of Selby, in your issue of July 2nd, with which I entirely agree in all respects, that I think it only right to explain that those commendations of the Leeds Town Hall organ which originated with the Corporation authorities, and which he might think unjustifiable, were, in my opinion, rendered absolutely necessary by the long course of malicious attacks made upon this instrument, without the slightest semblance of fair criticism, obviously from interested personal motives, and which we found to be really operating to prevent people from coming to hear the organ for themselves.

I am glad to say this necessity has now disappeared, and with it the remedy we thought it desirable to apply. The Leeds organ can speak for itself to all who listen with unprejudiced ears, and, for my part, I wish nothing better for it than that all who take real interest in the matter should thoroughly hear and examine for themselves, and they would soon be able to discover how far the statements of which I have complained are founded on truth.—Faithfully yours. Wm. Spark.

Leeds, 3rd August, 1870.

THE ORGAN CONTROVERSY.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Dear Sir,—After perusal, by the kind permission of my captors, of the straightforward and very comprehensive account of the organ in the Leeds Town Hall, given in your number of this date, and in order that there may be no further dispute as to which is the largest organ in the world, pipes, accessories, and all included, and granting that a stopped diapason bass, and a stopped diapason treble, constitute two draw stops, I beg you will notify to your multitudinous subscribers that in addition to the data given regarding the organ in question, this fact, an important one, must be taken into account when comparing it with the much-vaunted Liverpool monster. That, as the official in charge of the bellows of the latter instrument has only one leg, and a wooden "accessory," while the superintendent artificer at Leeds possesses two bona fide fleshly supports, that organ must be credited with one leg, and that seems to be the only one it has to stand upon in the comparison. We take great interest in the controversy here, and hope to see some of your correspondents are long. My love to the American. He knows what an organ is, he does. We think we have seen him on one, busily confined by a chain round his waist. Why not let him go, poor beggar? He's no madder than I am, and I live here, in perfect harmony, with five other fellows, but we want a flat seventh. Mad Tom.

Hanwell, 6th August, 1870.

Leipsic.—Herr Stägemann has been starring in Hans Heiling, Der Fliegende Holländer, Wilhelm Tell, Le Nozze, and Don Juan. Die Meistersinger was to have been produced somewhere about this time but, for some reason or other (on account of the war, perhaps), that great treat—for the Wagnerites—has been postponed.—The Stadttheater is now under a new manager, Herr F. Haase, as celebrated an actor in Germany as his English equivalent, Hare, is in England.

Vienna.—Herr Abert's opera, Astorga, has been produced at the Carl Theater, under the auspices of Herr Sontheim. It proved a complete failure. The press are particularly unfavourable to it.—The post of Artistic Director has been offered by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde to Herr Johannes Brahms, in the place of Herr Herbeck, resigned. As yet, Herr Brahms has not accepted.

MDLLE. NILSSON AND THE APPROACHING AMERICAN MUSICAL SEASON.

The coming of Mdlle. Nilsson, now so near at hand, is looked forward to with all the more interest from the fact that it is so long since we have been visited by a really great prima donna. Those we have had have become almost traditions. Grisi and Sontag were of the number, but both of these illustrious singers were past their prime when they arrived in this country. Grisi helped out her failing powers as a vocalist by her noble presence and fine acting, but at times it was the reverse of pleasant to listen to her endeavours to repeat her former triumphs in some great aria that had already passed beyond her reach. Bosio and Patti were young when they went from here, and it was reserved for Europe to mature their powers, and hear them at their best. Steffanone was great, but unreliable. La Grange stayed long enough to let us all witness the decay of her fine powers. Miss Kellogg, charming singer that she is, has never been able to cope successfully with the great tragic parts, and has given us satisfactorily only the comedy side of the lyric stage. Parepa was accepted as a prima donna on account of her great ability as a vocalist, but it was always somewhat under protest, and with much abutting of the eyes to the many obvious incongruities and shortcomings.

But Nilsson comes without any drawbacks. She is in the prime of her youth and beauty, in the meridian of her powers as a singer, at the full tide of her triumphs upon the European stage. She comes of a people who have already given to us certainly one of the greatest singers that ever lived, being born of humble parents, in the south of Sweden. She is the eighth child of the family.

As has been almost without exception the case with all truly musical natures, hers was one of inheritance, and, as has always happened, the musical instinct manifested itself at a very early age. Her father was an ardent lover of the art, and had charge of the music at the church in the little village of Hnsaby. He was but a peasant, but his life was refined by this beautiful art. He taught his son Carl the violin, and Christine, the fifth sister, would get the boy's fiddle and play it out for herself on the tunes she had heard him play. Her proficiency soon became so great that the neighboring people came to listen and admire, and finally Carl took her with him to the country fairs at the market towns, and there she attracted great attention. Happily, she attracted that of the good Themerlund, magistrate of Lhnby, who offered to provide for her musical education.

The offer was accepted, and Mdlle. Valerius afterward Baroness of Leuhusen became her earliest instructor. The little peasant was soon put to school, and afterward sent to Stockholm and placed under the care of a composer and teacher of talent, Mr. Franz Berwaid. From Stockholm she went to Paris, and there studied carefully for three years before she went upon the stage. Her debut was made in 1864, in Verdi's Traviata a character not specially to her taste, and in which she failed then to make a great success. Mozart's music suited her better, and in the Magic Flute she gained her earliest triumph. From that time to the present her career has been one of uninterrupted success. Marguerite in Gonnod's Faust, Alice in Robert le Diable, Cherubino in the Marriage of Figaro, Lucia in Donizetti's opera, and Ophelia in Ambrose Thomas's Hamlet have been among her important rôles. Of late she has been singing at Drury Lane, in opposition to Patti at Covent Garden, and has, so far as popular enthusiasm goes, certainly borne away the palm. The marvellous purity of her voice, her great beauty, the excellence and loveliness of her private character, the charm of her acting which gains constantly in fervour, seem to be the principal elements of her success.

That she will be fully appreciated in this country there can scarcely be a doubt. Her renown as an oratorio singer is in no way inferior to that she possesses as a prima donna. At the Handel Festival in 1868 at the London Crystal Palace, and at the Birmingham Festival of the previous year, she took the same position that Mdme. Parepa holds with us. It is almost safe to say that the company that supports her will be a good one, and that the whole success of the enterprise may not be made to depend on her single talent. If she is really well supported we may look for a more brilliant season of opera than we have seen since the days of the Havana Italian company.—New York Sun.

CERDAT JUPLES APELLA.—According to the Continental press, a French provincial manager has invented a mechanical claque, to supply the place of the human aforesaid, which was dear, and not particularly popular, having, on several occasions, been lustily hissed by the respectable portion of the audience. The mechanical claque consists, in the first place, of some hammers concealed in the four corners of the theatre, and which, when set going, imitate the sound of sticks rapped on the floor; and, in the second, of pairs of castagnettes covered with leather, and which, when struck together, produce a marvellous imitation of the clapping of hands. The wires leading from these castagnettes, situated under the rows of benches, termieate in a kind of massive keyboard, with six large wooden keys, in the manager's room. Whenever the manager thinks it necessary, he presses down those keys, or as many of them as he chooses, and a storm of applause breaks forth, electrifying the public, who, on the principle of "follow my leader" a principle much more prevalent than most persons suppose—zealously continue the applause thus begun by the manager.

DICKENS'S FAVOURITE AUTHORS.

There are certain books of which Dickens liked to talk during his walks. Among his especial favourites were the writings of Cobbett, De Quincey, the Lectures on Moral Philosophy by Sydney Smith, and Carlyle's French Revolution. Of this latter Dickens said it was the book of all others which he read perpetually and of which he never tired—the book which always appeared more imaginative in proportion to the fresh imagination he brought to it, a book for inexhaustibleness to be placed before every other book. When writing the "Tale of Two Cities," he asked Carlyle if he might see one of the books to which he referred in his history; whereupon Carlyle packed up and sent down to Gad's Hill all his reference volumes, and intrusted them faithfully. But the more he read the more he was astonished to find how the facts had passed through the alembic of Carlyle's brain, and had come out and fitted themselves, each as a part of one great whole, making a compact result, indestructible and unrivalled; and he always found himself turning away from the books of reference, and re-reading with increased wonder this marvellous new growth. There were certain books particularly hateful to him, and of which he never spoke except in terms of most ludicrous raillery. Mr. Barlow, in Sandford and Merton he said, was the favourite enemy of his boyhood and his first experience of a bore. He had ae almost supernatural hatred for Barlow, "because he was so very instructive, and always hunting donkis with regard to the veracity of 'Sinbad the Sailor,' and had no belief whatever in 'The Wonderful Lamp' or 'The Enchanted Horse.'" Dickens rattling his mental cane over the head of Mr. Barlow was as much better than any play as can be well imagined. He gloried in many of Hood's poems, especially in that hitting "Ode to Rae Wilson," and he would gesticulate with a fine fervour the lines:—

> ". . . . the hypocrites who ope Heaven's door
> Obsequious to the sinful man of riches,—
> But put the naked beggar by
> In parish stocks instead of breeches.

One of his favourite books was Pepys's Diary, the curious discovery of the key to which, and the odd characteristics of its writer, were a never-failing source of interest and amusement to him. The vision of Pepys hanging round the door of the theatre, hoping for an invitation to go in, not being able to keep away in spite of a promise he had made to himself that he would spend no more money foolishly, delighted him. Speaking one day of Gray, the author of the Elegy, he said: "No poet ever came walking down to posterity with so small a book under his arm." He preferred Smollett to Fielding, putting Peregrine Pickle above Tom Jones. Of the best novels by his contemporaries, he always spoke with warm commendation, and Griffith Gaunt he thought a production of very high merit. He was "hospitable to the thought" of all writers who were really in earnest, but at the first exhibition of floundering or inexactness he became an unbeliever. People with dislocated understandings he had no tolerance for.—Atlantic Monthly.

WAIFS.

Herr Ferdinand Ludwig has left London for Germany.

Mr. Henry Haigh is engaged for the operatic performance at the Gaiety Theatre.

Fraschini is once more engaged by M. Bagier for the Theatre Ittiliena at Paris.

Don Ramon Vilanova, a Spanish composer of sacred music has just died at Barcelona, in his seventieth year.

Miss Laura Harris, who sang some seasons since at Her Majesty's Theatre, has been engaged for the San Carlos at Lisbon, in October.

The church of St. Andrew, Plaistow, has been completed and consecrated, and will, we are leformed, be supplied with an efficient choir.

Mdme. Asea Bishop is about to visit Canada with a company from New York, for a series of out-door concerts at Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, and the other chief cities.

The Nilsson party will leave Paris for America on the 27th of August, and will give their first concert in New York on the 19th of September.

Watson's Art Journal describing a performance of "Since first I saw your Face," at the recent Beethoven Festival, says it was sung in "a psalm-smiting manner."

An Association has just been established in West Cornwall, called "The West Cornwall Plain Song Association," to promote the use of the plain song music of the Church, and the dignity of the Eucharistic service.

There is a talk at Dresden of building a large theatre in the Neustadt. Hitherto the drama has had its chief — we may say only — home in the well-known Hof-theater, which was burnt down some time ago, and is rebuilding.

Non è vero, secondo Filippi, che la musica sia per il popolo. No; essa è fatta soltanto "per le persone educate, per quelle che assistendo a un dramma in musica debbono conoscerne ed apprezzarne le ragioni storiche ed estetiche!"—Starebbero freschi allora gl'impresari!

Signor Francesco Coletti, the best modern writer of Italian farces, has just published, at Milan, a collection of his farces in two volumes, which afford the reader nearly as much amusement as if they were being acted before him; such genuine fun and humour are to be found in these pages.

At a recent meeting of the Worcester Cathedral Restoration Committee Lord Lyttelton and Sir John Packington reported the result of the appeal to the diocese for funds. Including the contributions of Earl Dudley, and the Dean and Chapter, the sum obtained was nearly £16,000.

Madame Cora De Wilhorst (Miss Withers that was, of New York) has been singing with moderate success in Paris; and has now been engaged for the Italian Opera at Homburg, to sing, with Patti, such parts as Margaret of Valois, in The Huguenots, and Donna Elvira in Don Giovanni.

The Life of our Saviour, written by Dickens for his children, is to be published soon. Blanchard Jerrold says in an article in the last number of the Gentleman's Magazine:—"The Life of our Saviour was written by Charles Dickens to guide the hearts of his children; and if ever a labour of love was done by that most affectionate parent, this was pre-eminently it. By the eloquent pages that now will shortly be put within the reach of every English and American household, the children of Charles Dickens were taught their first lessons of Christian love and Christian chivalry."

Oxford wit at Commemoration-tide is generally obvious, and the pun are, as a rule, intelligible even to the mildest of undergraduates; but we question whether anything more common-place was ever perpetrated than the cry for "some Corfe mixture," which was heard from the gallery when Dr. Corfe took his place as conductor for the performance of the ode at the Chancellor's Installation. Bad as the joke was, however, it served to raise a laugh, and resulted in a word of advice to the worthy doctor, that he must be content for once to play second fiddle to Sir Frederick Ouseley, who, as the professor, occupied the seat of honour.

Of our two prime donne, an American contemporary says:—

"It is hard to imagine anything more exquisite than that wondrous voice of the lovely Swede, whose liquid purity and crystal clearness reminds the hearer of the fountain of molten diamonds celebrated in the Eastern fable. Nilsson has been reproached with a want of dramatic fervour, and it is true that her voice is of too celestial a quality to adapt itself readily to the accents of earthly passion; but the innocence of Marguerite and the sublime devotion of Alice have never found a more perfect interpreter. In the latter rôle (in Robert le Diable) she is the embodiment of a guardian angel. Patti has changed wonderfully little since the days when New York first went wild over the marvellous little singer. The rosebud has bloomed into a rose, that is all. Beauty and voice have alike developed into fuller perfection, and are alike unchanged in every other respect. She is still the dark-eyed, winsome damsel of pre-accession days, and her voice still possesses that exquisite, bird-like carol which distinguishes her notes from any songstress I ever heard. Patti reminds one of 'the lark that at heaven's gate sings,' but the voice of Nilsson seems a strain from the other side of the gate."

DICKENS'S HOME AT GAD'S HILL.

The spot is one of the loveliest in Kent, and must always be remembered as the last residence of Charles Dickens. He used to declare his firm belief that Shakspere was specially fond of Kent, and that the poet chose Gad's Hill and Rochester for the scenery of his plays from intimate personal knowledge of their localities. He said he had no manner of doubt but that one of Shakspere's haunts was the old inn at Rochester, and that this conviction came forcibly upon him one night as he was walking that way, and discovered Charles's Wain over the chimney, just as Shakspere has described it, in words put into the mouth of the carrier in King Henry the Fourth. There is no prettier place in England than Gad's Hill in all England for the earliest and latest flowers, and Dickens chose it, when he had arrived at the fulness of his fame and prosperity, as the home in which he most wished to spend the remainder of his days. When a boy he would often pass the house with his father, and frequently said to him, "If ever I have a dwelling of my own, Gad's Hill Place is the house I mean to buy." In that beautiful retreat he has for many years been accustomed to welcome his friends, and find relaxation from the crowded life of London. On the lawn, playing at bowls, in the Swiss summer-house, charmingly shaded by green leaves, he always seemed the best part of summer, beautiful as the season is in the delightful region where he lived. In a letter written not long ago to a friend in America, he thus describes his home:—

"Divers birds sing here all day, and the nightingales all night. The place is lovely, and in perfect order. I have put five mirrors in the Swiss châlet (where I write), and they reflect and refract, in all kinds of ways, the leaves that are quivering at the windows, and the great fields of waving corn, and the sail-dotted river. My room is up among the branches of the trees; and the birds and the butterflies fly in and out, and the green branches shoot in at the open windows, and the lights and shadows of the clouds come and go with the rest of the company. The scent of the flowers, and indeed of everything that is growing for miles and miles, is most delicious."

There he could be most thoroughly enjoyed, for he never seemed so cheerfully at home anywhere else. At his own table, surrounded by his family and a few guests, old acquaintances from town,—among them sometimes Forster, Carlyle, Reade, Collins, Layard, Maclise, Stone, Macready, Talfourd,—he was always the choicest and liviest companion. He was not what is called in society a professed talker, but he was something far better and rarer.—Atlantic Monthly.

SIR,—Your musical critic has made a serious mistake in his report of the concert at the Crystal Palace, which I hope you will allow me to correct. He speaks of the 4,500 certificated singers connected with us as though these were the only results of our efforts in individual examination. The truth is that, during the past year only, we have granted 9,872 Elementary Certificates, and 1,827 Intermediate Certificates. The full total of those who have successfully passed is—68,000 Elementary, and 16,000 Intermediate; besides 250 Members, and 140 Advanced—making, altogether, more than 85,000. As some intelligent friends have been misled by your critic in this matter, and as this constant process of individual effort and examination never pauses and never lessens, and is a thing to be proud of, I trust you will insert this note.—YOURS, &c.,

OLD-FASHIONED MUSIC OF THE FUTURE.—Some short time since, Mad. Alboni was asked by a lady, with whom she was stopping on a visit, for a line from her hand. Taking up a score of Rossini's Cenerentola, she wrote on the title-page: "This is really the music of the future."

Say, my Heart, can this be Love?

BY HENRY C. WATSON.

Ever still he hovers round me,
And his presence wakes a thrill;
Yet, while others hourly praise me,
His alone is mute and still.
Though sweet flattery pleases ever,
And the sternest hearts can move,
Praise is tame unless he praises—
Say, my heart, can this be love?
Wayward heart, can this be love?

Night and day his image haunts me,
In each breeze his sighs I hear:
Some strange feeling thrills my bosom,
Is it love?—it is not fear!
Fear, oh no! those eyes so tender,
Voice so soft, his kindness prove,
Not from fear do I so tremble—
Say, my heart, can this be love?
Wayward heart, can this be love?

He shall never know my feeling;
I will hide it from all eyes!
Silly heart, thy love concealing,
Let no tell-tale blushes rise.
Should he never seek to woo me,
Time my heart can never move;
Vainly would another sue me—
Own, sad heart! this, this is love!
Wayward heart—ah, this is love!

New York papers assert that Mdme. Lind-Goldschmidt will sing in the United States during the autumn and winter.

A correspondent of a contemporary reminds us that in the first Great Exhibition of 1851, were exhibited sets of steel bars, straight and circular, for use instead of church bells, giving a clear ringing note, and much cheaper. He asks whether any reader can give information as to where such bars can be obtained.

Mr. Willert Beale, son of the late Mr. Fredrick Beale, who was the manager of the Royal Italian Opera, when it was opened in 1847, is conductor of Signor Mario's farewell tour. Signor Mario will have the co-operation of Fräulein Liebhart (vocalist), Signor Sivori (violin), and the Chevalier de Kontski (pianist).

There are two competing operahouses in the capital of Catalonia one at the Liceo, with Mesdames Marinali, De Ballieu, Ferrer, Mas-Porcell, Signori D'Antoni, Minetti, Varvaro, Baraldi, Merely, Rodas, and Bargagiia; and the other at the Circo, with Mesdames Peralta, Ariôt, Scaichi, Trebelli; Signori Graziani (tenor), Palerni, Bettini, Fagotti, Padilla, Gassier, Junca, Zucchini and Honconi, to whom the Sisters Marchisio, will be added for a few nights. The Circo has decidedly the more formidable troupe.

The advisability of the use of the orchestra in church, though frequently debated, is so seldom put to the test that it is worthy of notice, that at the recent consecration at Arkesy Church, near Doncaster, by the Archbishop of York, the absence of an organ rendered some such expedient necessary, and a militia band accompanied the choir throughout the service. As there seems to have been no lack of money for the restoration, which has been carried forward under the superintendence of Mr. Scott, we conclude that the organ will soon be supplied.—Choir.

A discovery in printing has recently attracted notice, namely, photographing the copies of the parts from the original score, and transferring the photographs to the printing-press. This process is a great saving of time, and secures accuracy in the instrumental parts, the correction of which occupies so long, and is a tedious interruption to the continuity of rehearsals. In Mr. Sullivan's Overture di Ballo, at the first rehearsal in St. George's Hall for the Birmingham Festival, there was not a note to correct in the copies, all the string parts having been supplied by the new process.

As Madame Patti (Marquise de Caux) was unable to go to Homburg on account of the war, the committee of the Birmingham Musical Festival offered her an engagement, but the terms asked by the prima donna being £200 for each time of singing, which for eight performances would amount to £1,600, it need scarcely be added, that the negotiation came promptly to an end. This is an illustration of the pernicious "star" system, which has the effect of making prima donne believe that their services are indispensable. Firmness on the part of the managers would soon undeceive them.—Athenæum.

Whatever degree of truth there may be in the report which has gone the round of the Church papers with reference to St. David's Cathedral, there can be very little question that the service as rendered in anything but a creditable manner. According to the account given by the correspondents of the Church Times and its contemporaries, the service is not even choral, and Tate and Brady furnishes the hymnal of the congregation. At first sight such a statement seems to be incredible, but the ominous fact that it remains uncontradicted lends no slight weight in favour of its truth.—Choir.

The example of the Queen in providing English part music as one of the attractions of her last "garden party" was, we are glad to see, followed by Sir Edmund and Lady Lechmere, in the entertainment they offered to the Prince and Princess Christian, at Blydd Court, near Worcester. A trip up the Severn in two steam frigates formed a part of this excursion; and on a raised platform in the vessel where the royal guests were assembled, was stationed a party of glee singers, including three lay vicars of Worcester Cathedral. On their return to Sir Edmund's mansion, a selection of glees and madrigals was performed on the lawn, including German and English compositions.—Choir.

Old and middle-aged Italian operahouse frequenters will be shocked to learn the misfortunes which have befallen Signor Tamburini, the once-renowned baritone-bass. He had divided a large fortune in Paris, where he resided since his retirement from the stage, amongst his children, reserving only a portion of capital, which was left in the hands of his eldest son, who was an "agent de change." Heavy speculations on the Bourse, and the fall of prices on account of the war completely ruined the younger Tamburini, who committed suicide last week. Although the father has lost all his earnings by this sad event, he has, fortunately, an affectionate son-in-law in Signor Gardoni, to provide for his old age; Signor Tamburini being now upwards of seventy.—Athenæum.

REVIEWS.

Select Practices for the Pianoforte, consisting of Forty-two Progressive Lessons, intended as an Introduction to the Works of the Great Masters, selected, edited, and fingered by JULES BENEDICT. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THE title of this work is itself a recommendation. Bearing in mind with what distressingly vague notions pianoforte improvers (and some pianoforte teachers) choose subjects for study, the term "Select Practice" brings comfort, especially as the themes are progressive, and act as an "Open, Sesame!" to the works of the great masters. The name of Mr. Benedict makes satisfaction complete. Nobody could wish a safer guide than this distinguished pianist and musician, or hesitate to follow him in implicit reliance upon his directions. The field from which Mr. Benedict has selected his examples is a wide one, embracing composers as various in character as Cherubini, Hummel, Glück, Bellini, Handel, Dussek, Haydn, Liszt, Schubert, Beethoven, and J. S. Bach. This being the case, it is hardly necessary to say that thoughtful students may find in the work before us an epitome of the pianoforte répertoire, and so get a first insight into the diverse styles it is necessary they should know. A progressive character is well sustained from beginning to end. Commencing with a simple soldnied, by Weber, the work concludes with a presto by Mendelssohn; and takes the learner from one extreme to the other by stages so easy that he may well be surprised to find the journey so pleasant. Mr. Benedict has arranged all the pieces with a due regard to their educational character, and his fingering serves as a guide to wellnigh every passage likely to be met with elsewhere. For all these reasons we give the work our heartiest recommendation.

Twenty Popular Melodies for the Pianoforte, selected, arranged, and fingered by JULES BENEDICT. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THIS extract from the author's "Instructions in the Art of Playing the Pianoforte" will be found very valuable by young students. The melodies are well known, with few exceptions, and their arrangement is simple enough for the most elementary use.

The Major and Minor Scales for the Pianoforte, with Preliminary Remarks and fingered by JULES BENEDICT. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

IT is unnecessary for us to point out the supreme importance which belongs to a correct knowledge of the pianoforte scales. No time nor attention can be thrown away upon this essential study; and the publishers of Mr. Benedict's pianoforte instruction-book have done well to print the chapter on scales in a separate form. The fingering is all cases may not be that usually adopted, but Mr. Benedict supplies an alternative as well as his own suggestions; and it must be remembered, moreover, that anything from so great an authority carries with it no little weight. Let these scales be once mastered, and the student is more than half-prepared to face any executive difficulty.

My Nora. Song. Words by T. J. Onsely, Esq.: Music by ARTHUR FOX [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THE words of this song are very graceful, and, though sentimental enough to gratify the most exigeant of drawing-room tenors, have no trace of the sickliness affecting many of their kind. Mr. Fox has written very appropriate music. The melody has sufficient character to distinguish it from the mass of tunes poured forth by song-composers; and the accompaniment shows in addition to correctness, a facile adaption to the changing sentiment of the poetry. We see no reason why this song should not win favour both in public and private.

Two Epitaphs. Herrick. (As One Compositioo.) For Three Equal Voices. With Pianoforte Accompaniment by J. MCMURDIE, Mus. B. OXON. [London: Lamborn Cock & Co.]

WE think the design of this work unhappy. The two epitaphs, though each good by itself, do not harmonize, either in style or subject, while even the grammatical "person" is different in the one to what it is in the other. The result is that the transition from epitaph to epitaph has the effect of a very unpleasant jerk. Mr. McMurdie has endeavoured to imitate the formalism of old English music, and to some extent with success. The composition, however, is not a pleasant one.

Journal of the London Society of Amateur Flute-Players. No. 5, "Sonata for Flute and Pianoforte," by G. A. MACFARREN. [London: Rudall, Rose, Carte, & Co.

THE amateur flute-player who can take part with efficiency in this important work may pride himself upon no small skill. Mr. Macfarren has produced a regularly-constructed sonata, of full average length. Moreover, he has brought to it all the resources of his undoubted talent, and thus paid the special public for whom he wrote a compliment we hope they appreciate. Without discussing the work minutely, we may say the flautists have now a classical composition of their own worthy all the attention they can bestow.

"A PRODIGY;" A TALE OF MUSIC.*

A man's written works may fairly be considered as affording an accurate indication, no less of his acquirements than of himself, his mind, and the manner and fashion of it. But it may be doubted whether a three volume novel is in this sense to be regarded as an "opus," an opyon, the outgrowth of the man, or an accident of a particular mood assumed for the occasion. And, indeed, it is well that this should be so; for otherwise we should be driven to say that the author of A Prodigy was a gentleman (or lady) of the most confiding simplicity, combined with the weakest credulity. For what are we called upon to believe? First, that a child of ten years old may possess prodigious talents for music, for conversation, for repartee, for practical joking, along with the most headstrong violence of passion and of will, and the most complete abscence of wisdom in opinion and propriety of conduct —an imp of darkness and an angel of light at one and the same time. Secondly, we are to believe that we live in a world where a man residing in an insignificant town, without a pound to start with, may, by the time he has reached the age of 50, amass a stupendous fortune; that he may, simultaneously with the purchase of a landed estate, be created a peer of the realm, without either having had a seat in Parliament, or having, so far as we know, done one atom of good to his fellow-men; and that Royalty may invite itself to visit him, en famille, out of curiosity to see his newly-built palace. Again, we must believe that the mother of a prodigy of genius, in whose life and its success her own life is entirely bound up, upon whom she lavishes affection at once extravagant and unjust, may with little apparent difficulty be brought to give up the darling of her heart for the sake of a second husband as rich as Croesus, and the acquaintance of a month. We confess to thinking that events such as these do not occur in the world in which we are living, and we are very glad they do not.

This marvellous young gentleman, after fascinating half Germany with his music, his beauty, his waywardness, and his curls, before he has reached the age of twenty, goes in search of the young sister of a school friend, who like Mr. Dickens's Smike, seemed to have been hardly used by every body, but unlike him, came to a miserable and untimely end by being drowned on the very night that would have made him a hero. The young lady was worth the search, being represented as a very queen of beauty and loveliness, and endowed with every conceivable charm and grace of person. She was to have been a danseuse, and it is to be feared that the indispensable training for her profession had sadly interfered with other less showy branches of education; her mind had received little cultivation, and we suspect it was not capable of receiving much more. The Prodigy finds her at last in most questionable company, has his first interview with her on a certain evening; at midnight he runs away with her; by good fortune a carriage and a priest are at hand, and the happy pair are made man and wife before morning. But angel though Marie is in form and feature, she can deceive. Her husband goes to England to fulfil a professional engagement; she chooses to remain in Germany, on the plea of approaching maternity, but nevertheless follows him within a fortnight, that she may appear in London as a ballet-dancer. Her début is unsuccessful, an uproar ensues at the opera; Charles, whose suspicions of her arrival in England have been aroused, rushes to her arms, to not be recognised (for his wife has become insane) but to be disowned, cursed, and ultimately stabbed by a knife, which, we are informed, "she drew from her bosom," though we should rather have supposed it came from under her pillow. The wound is not mortal, for a hint is given at the end of the story that Charles most probably married a little Quaker girl whom he had known in childhood, and whom he had met on some few subsequent occasions.

The reader will have gathered from this survey that there is no lack of startling incident in the book, and if this were all we cared to look for in a novel, we might heartily commend it. But our sense of the fitness of things refuses to be entirely satisfied with a work of fiction unless it introduces to us some character to admire, to love, or at least to be interested about. Now, there is nothing of the sort here. We cannot be brought to care a pinch of snuff about any one of the actors in the drama. To be sure Marie is devoted to her husband; that is, we are told so, but her conduct and even her language fail to shew it. Yet, if there is no one to love, there are many to hate, especially a grand villain, who reminds us of Wilkie Collins's Fosco, with much of his cunning and very little of his cleverness. We close the book with this very devout hope, that no one belonging to us may have a son of such surpassing genius for music as Charles Einstern, or a daughter with such a passion for dancing as his unfortunate wife.

"This song has the rare merit of combining within itself a triple inducement for its selection, viz.: good poetry, a graceful melody, and an exceedingly well written accompaniment; success equally rewarding the poet and the composer; for while the numbers of the former are vitalized by the true spirit of the lyric muse, they are embodied by the latter in a tuneful melody, and clothed by him with an accompaniment full of grace and fancy well worthy of the favourable recognition of the true lovers of musical art."—Medical Counter Herald.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

HEREFORD, August 23rd, 1870.

The Three Choirs of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester began their 147th Festival to-day with full choral service in the justly-admired Cathedral of this ancient city. The almost continuous rain of yesterday went far to shake anticipations of a prosperous result; but this morning the weather had cleared up, and should it continue fair during the week there can, we are informed, be little doubt of a successful meeting. The origin, purport, and history of these mid-England festivals need not be told now, nor is it requisite again to dwell upon the attempts that from time to time, and proceeding from quarters more or less influential, have been made to put a stop to them—the more so inasmuch as such attempts have almost invariably proved unsuccessful. The temptations resisted by Worcester last year were a constant theme of discussion, and now Hereford goes further in what certain well-meaning persons insist on condemning as the wrong path. Not only are we to have the full number of day performances of oratorio at the Cathedral, but, as a substitute for the traditional miscellaneous concert in the Shire Hall on Tuesday, we are promised Parts 1 and 2 of the Creation—the sacred building to be lit up with gas for the occasion. That this is an improvement will hardly be denied. The credit of having suggested it belongs to Mr. Townshend Smith, the local organist, who, besides acting as honorary secretary and superintending the musical arrangements, conducts the performances morning and evening. There is another substantial excuse for the innovation—the three miscellaneous concerts never "paid," but there is little cause to doubt the attraction of Haydn's chaste and beautiful music when presented under such exceptional circumstances.

The Festival this year is well backed up by those whose co-operation is of material importance, there being upwards of 60 responsible "stewards," including the Lord Lieutenant of the county (Lord Bateman), who acts as president. Among them we are glad to remark the names of not a few of the clergy, whose countenance is as welcome as it is beneficial, and who should feel an especial interest themselves in this admirable charity, of which these meetings have for so long a period been one of the main supports. In engaging his artists, vocal and instrumental, and in making out his programmes, Mr. Townshend Smith has displayed his customary intelligence and activity. His chorus, including many if not all the members of the Three Choirs, strengthened by delegates from various societies in the neighbourhood, and some few singers from the capital, is no less zealous, and, it should be added, no less efficient, than on former occasions; while his orchestra, chiefly selected from London players of eminence, is more than 60 strong—numerous enough for all that is required of them, the acoustical properties of the church and the limited accommodation of the Shire Hall taken into consideration. An orchestra of "60," moreover, was presisely the orchestra which, according to Beethoven himself, was required for Beethoven's symphonies; and Mr. Smith has done well, if on this account alone, to include the Symphony No. 4 ("B flat") in one of the evening programmes. The names of the principal vocal performers may speak for themselves:—Mdlle. Tietjens, Miss Edith Wynne, and Madame Sinico (sopranos); Madame Patey and Miss Marion Severn (contraltos); Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Montem Smith (tenors); Messrs. Santley and Lewis Thomas (basses).

Mr. Done (of Worcester) plays the organ at the performances in the Cathedral, and Dr. S. S. Wesley the pianoforte (and organ first evening), Conductor, Mr. Townshend Smith. The general programme of the week having already appeared in the Musical World it will suffice to notice each performance in particular as it occurs.

The Cathedral was not so fully attended this morning as might have been expected; and this seems the more extraordinary inasmuch as the members of the Three Choirs are afforded no other opportunity of distinguishing themselves apart from the general proceedings of the Festival. True, their combined efforts are not always exactly what they ought be; but it should be remembered that at one time the Three Choirs unaided were virtually the Festival, and that a large party even now exists which would, if it could, restrain once more the Festivals within the same narrow limits—or at least confine them to choral services on a grand scale to the exclusion of oratorios and other forms of sacred music. We are not called upon to criticize an act of worship, and need, therefore, only say that the musical part of this morning's services (which the Mayor and Corporation attended in State) comprised Orlando Gibbone's well-known service in F, and Attwood's not less familiar anthem, "I was glad when they said unto me, We will go into the house of the Lord;" besides a hymn—

> "The Church's one foundation > Is Jesus Christ our Lord,"

—set to music by Dr. Wesley, in which the congregation might, had they chosen, have also taken part—such being the evident intention of the composer in writing it. That the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Jebb (Canon Residentiary), who selected for text, 68th Psalm, 5th verse —"He is a father of the fatherless and defendeth the cause of the widow, even God in his holy place"—was an appeal on behalf of the "widows and orphans" it is superfluous to say, or that in the course of it the preacher made becoming reference to Chancellor Bysse and his famous inaugural sermon at the institution of the meetings of the Choirs, nearly a century and a half ago. Though somewhat long and entering into what, under the circumstances, we can hardly think an appropriate critical digression upon the present method of conducting the Festivals, which Dr. Jebb by no means entirely approves, the discourse was otherwise earnest, unostentatious, and to the purpose. The organ voluntary was an elaborate fugue, the composition of Dr. Wesley, played in masterly style by his pupil, Mr. Pyne, who has shown his proficiency on similar occasions.

About to-day's performance of Elijah, which, owing to the previous service, did not begin till 1 o'clock, we have little to say; and had we ever so much to say, there would be but scant time to say it in, as the mail leaves here at 5 p.m. In so far as the chorus and orchestra were concerned it may be pronounced a more than fair average Three Choir Festival display. Some of the choruses were admirably executed; but in fact by this time our country choirs, just like our London choirs, know Mendelssohn's great work pretty well by heart, while our London orchestras could almost play the overture and accompaniments without book. Much of the solo singing was beyond praise. Mr. Santley has never given the music of the Prophet more impressively, nor Mdlle. Tietjens declaimed the great air, "Hear ye, Israel," with its brilliant pendant, "Be not afraid," more superbly. To Miss Edith Wynne was assigned the soprano music of Part I., which could scarcely have been in more competent hands. The contralto music was divided between Miss Marion Severn and Madame Patey; the tenor music between Messrs. Montem Smith and Vernon Rigby, Mr. Lewis Thomas taking part in some of the concerted music. All did their best; and for the greater part that best was all that could be desired.

WEDNESDAY, Aug. 24.

The substitution, last night, of sacred music, in the Cathedral, for the ordinary miscellaneous concert at the Shire Hall, which, time out of mind, has been the custom, on the first day of the Festival, proved a genuine success. The attendance in the sacred building was more than double what it used to be in the secular one, and the performances lost little or nothing by the absence of the audible marks of approval in the shape of applause and encores, which, under the altered circumstances, would of course have been intolerable. Much cannot be said in praise of the manner in which the church was illuminated, though the argument that a glare of artificial light would be indecorous in such a building is perhaps not wholly without its weight. At all events, the performance was thoroughly enjoyable. Why Haydn's very popular and perennially beautiful oratorio was shorn of its third, last, and, tuneful as is all that goes before, assuredly its most tuneful portion, we are at a loss to explain. Mr. Barnby's Rebekah is not long, and the serene and flowing strains put by the genial master into the mouths of his Adam and Eve—strains as primitively innocent as becomes the theme—would have left the audience in a frame of mind so happy as to dispose them to look at all things rather from an indulgent than from a critical point of view. The execution of Haydn's familiar music, under the direction of Mr. Townshend Smith, was generally effective. The only serious objection to be urged was against the somewhat slow time indicated by the conductor for a good many of the movements, which in the case of the bright and animated "Heavens are telling" (the chorus with trio at the end of Part I., otherwise admirably given), was particularly noticeable. Among the most entirely satisfactory of the choral displays were "Awake the harp" and "Achieved is the glorious work." The solo singers in Part I. were Mdlle. Tietjens, to whose share fell "The marvellous work" and the ineffably melodious "With verdure clad;" Mr. Montem Smith, always a favourite here, who gave "Now vanish" and "In splendour bright;" and Mr. Lewis Thomas, to whom were allotted "And God made the firmament" and the recitative and air, "Rolling with foaming billows," the three combining their voices in the trio which is ingeniously mixed up with "The heavens are telling." In the second part Madame Sinico took the place of Mdlle. Tietjens, and Mr. Santley that of Mr. Thomas—for Mr. Montem Smith (a special mark of distinction) being assigned the tenor music here, as in the introductory part. To Madame Sinico was allotted the florid air, "On mighty pens;" to Mr. Santley the important recitative and air, "Now heaven in fullest glory shine," in which the creation of the lower animals is descriptively set forth; and to Mr. M. Smith "In native worth and honour clad," dedicated to the primary apparition of man. The trio which forms an integral portion of the final chorus, "Achieved is the glorious work" was thus no less fortunate than its predecessor, already cited. How the familiar solos were delivered by these practised and well-known artists may be readily imagined; and it will suffice to add that not one of them ever sang better, often as they have taken part in the same oratorio.

Mr. Joseph Barnby's Rebekah, appropriately styled a sacred idyll, was, though it has once been given in London, as good as new to those who heard it last night in the Cathedral. The "libretto" (if such it may be termed), by Mr. Arthur Matthison, is of the simplest possible construction. It is apportioned into a couple of scenes. The first scene relates to the mission of Eliezer, enjoined by Abraham, to seek out from among their kindred a wife for his son Isaac; and his interview, at the well of Nahor, with Rebekah, whom, after explaining the reason of his coming, he persuades to accompany him. The second scene comprises the meeting between Isaac and Rebekah; their mutual declarations; and a song of thanksgiving and praise to the Almighty. Nothing in substance more bucolic, however fantastically idealized in working out, could well be thought of; and the wonder is that Mr. Barnby should have found music, which, while everywhere thoughtfully and carefully composed, is, at the same time, in character the very reverse of the story which Mr. Matthison has built upon one of the most primitive passages in the Jewish Testament. Such, however, is the case. Among the choral pieces there are even two lengthy and elaborate fugues, while the approach of Rebekah is illustrated by a march ("the Bride's March"), the chromatic harmony and restless tonality of which are strangely out of keeping with the subject. The most enthusiastic disciple of Spohr himself,—for whose manner, not so say mannerism, Mr. Barnby appears to entertain a rooted predilection, — in the moments of most laboured inspiration, could hardly have produced anything more laboured. There is, however, a great deal that is good in Rebekah; and the promise of something still better. Mr. Barnby's chief effort now should be to seem natural instead of seeming artificial. He has genuine feeling, a certain vein of melody, which, if he would only let flow unimpeded, might serve him to good purpose, and considerable fancy in his management of the orchestra. The chorus for women's voices, "Who shall be fleetest and first?" Eliezer's air, "The daughters of the city come," and Isaac's air, "The soft southern breeze plays around me," to instance no other numbers, are enough to show this, and more. Moreover, Mr. Barnby is young, and, with his evident ambition and resolve to make progress in his art, there is no knowing what he may do hereafter. With the performance of his "sacred idyll," which he conducted himself, Mr. Barnby could hardly have felt otherwise than satisfied. The Herefordshire singers did themselves infinite credit by the manner in which they got through choruses not merely strange to them, but complex and difficult as well; the orchestra, which has no very easy task to accomplish, took infinite pains; and the solo singers Mdlle. Tietjens (Rebekah), Mr. Vernon Rigby (Isaac), and Mr. Lewis Thomas (Eliezer), were fairly irreproachable. To have heard his music, and some of the best passages in it, sung as it was sung on this occasion—more especially the solos of Mdlle. Tietjens, who always does her utmost towards insuring the success of a new work—should encourage the young composer to new exertions.

The success of Mr. Townshend Smith's innovation was so unequivocal that there can be little doubt that it will be accepted as a precedent, and invariably acted upon at future meetings. Perhaps, eventually, the miscellaneous evening concerts may be altogether done away with, and the performances exclusively confined to sacred music in the Cathedral. That such a result would enhance the dignity of the Festivals is unquestionable; and that it would add to their attraction in a financial sense is more than likely.

The performance this day at the Cathedral was a very long one, consisting of Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Prodigal Son, Spohr's Last Judgment entire, and Mozart's so-styled "Twelfth Mass." The Prince and Princess Christian, who came to-day from Stoke Edith, accompanied by Lady Foley and a large party, intend, it is understood, to pass the Festival week at Hereford. As they did not arrive till half-past one, they could only hear the second half of the selection; and thus escaped the Prodigal Son and Part I. of the Last Judgment. Nevertheless, the very admirable performance of Mr. Sullivan's work, under the composer's own direction, with Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Patey, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Santley in the solos, was, for reasons easy to understand, the most interesting feature of the programme; and the Royal and distinguished visitors may, therefore, be condoled with on having experienced a decided loss. The Prodigal Son gains with each new hearing; and on that account alone it is to be hoped that its composer may be already engaged in something else of the kind, if not on something of a still more ambitious form. For more about the performance of to-day—which did not terminate till half-past four—there is no time at present.

THURSDAY, Aug. 25.

The first miscellaneous concert in the Shire Hall (yesterday evening) was not so well attended as might have been expected. The sacred performance in the Cathedral on Tuesday had probably something to do with this. If so, it further encourages a hope that, not long hence, the Festivals of the Three Choirs will be able to dispense altogether with concerts of secular music. Everything seems to point that way; and the idea surely, if slowly, gains ground. The programme provided last night by Mr. Townshend Smith was, on the whole, better than usual, containing more music worthy the name of music. According to custom, the programme is here submitted in extenso:—

PART I.

Overture—"In Memoriam"	...	...	...	Arthur Sullivan.
Aria—Madame Patey, "Per Pieta"	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Song—Mr. Santley, "A life that lives for you"	...	...	...	Arthur Sullivan.
Cavatina—Madame Sinico, "Qui la voce"	...	...	...	Bellini.
Concerto Violin (No. 6)—Mr. H. Blagrove	...	...	...	Spohr.
Song—Mr. Montem Smith, "Spring-tide of youth"	...			Mendelssohn.
Air—Miss Edith Wynne, "Scenes that are brightest"	...			Wallace.
Duetto—Madame Sinico and Mr. Vernon Rigby"	...			Donizetti.
Selection from "Loreley"	...	...	...	Mendelssohn.

PART II.

Symphony in B flat, No 4	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Aria—Madame Sinico (Faust)	...	...	...	Gounod.
Aria—Madame Patey (Abu Hassan)	...	...	...	Weber.
Song—Mr. Vernon Rigby, "The Message"	...	...	...	Blumenthal.
Cavatina—Mdlle. Tietjens, "Com's bella"	...	...	...	Donizetti.
Ballad—Miss Marion Severn, "The Lady of the Lea"	...			H. Smart.
Trio—Mesdames Tietjens, Sinico, and Patey (Falstaff)	...			Balfe.
Song—Mr. Lewis Thomas, "Oh, firm as Oak"	...	...	...	Sir H. R. Bishop.
Welsh Air—Madame Patey "Ash Grove"	...	...	...
Air—Miss Edith Wynne, "O bid your faithful Ariel"	...			T. Linley.
March and Chorus—(Ruins of Athens)	...	...	...	Beethoven.

It was satisfactory not only to find so many good things in the selection, but also for the greater part they seemingly gave pleasure to the audience. Mr. Sullivan's overture (conducted by himself) was well played and loudly applauded. The absence of an organ was a drawback to the performance, as may be easily understood by those who know how materially the composer has strengthened and enriched his score by the introduction, in the coda, of that solemn and weighty instrument. In Memoriam is unquestionably the best piece of orchestral music Mr. Sullivan has written; and it is rapidly winning the place in general estimation to which it is entitled. Madame Patey's beautiful contralto voice is always heard to such advantage in songs intended expressly for its register that she need not have borrowed the slow movement from Beethoven's grand scena, "Ah! perfido," and transposed it for the occasion. She imparted the true expression, however, to the melody, and thus deserved and obtained unanimous approval. Mr. Sullivan's new song is tuneful and spirited, and, sung with uncommon earnestness by Mr. Santley, it won a general encore. Madame Sinico was recalled after the hackneyed cavatina from I Puritani, and Mr. H. Blagrove's brilliant execution of the adagio and first movement from Spohr's sixth violin concerto was warmly appreciated. The song chosen by Mr. Montem Smith, one of the least pretentious from Mendelssohn's Op. 59, was much liked, and the popular romance from Vincent Wallace's Maritana, Miss Edith Wynne's singing of which was nothing short of perfection, even more. That the pretty duet from the garden scene in Don Pasquale was done full justice to by Madame Sinico and Mr. Vernon Rigby need hardly be stated. The great feature of the first part, however, was the selection from Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, comprised in the "Ave Maria" (with chorus), Miss Wynne's tranquil and unpretending delivery of which was exactly to the purpose, the jovial "Song of Vintagers," admirably given by the chorus (encored and repeated), and the superb finale to the first act, the solos of Leonora being magnificently declaimed and sung by Mdlle. Tietjens, although the general execution of orchestra and chorus was too uniformly loud to be uniformly effective. Of the symphony—listened to for the most part with attention—the movement best understood, and, indeed, best played, was the adagio, which many regard as Beethoven's most perfect achievement of the kind. Madame Patey is to be thanked for bringing forward the air from Weber's Abu Hassen though the accompaniments were not altogether in order. To say anything about such familiar things as the cavatina from Lucrezia Borgia, the "Jewel song" from Faust, "The Message," or the "Lady of the Lea," would be superfluous; nor is it necessary to add more to this cursory notice than that the very animated and dramatic trio from Mr. Balfe's Italian opera was capitally given; and that Bishop's vigorous ballad, the pretty Welsh ditty (harp accompaniment, Mr. Lockwood), and Thomas Linley's once admired air were each and all extremely well sung by the well known artists whose names are affixed to them in the programme above quoted. The fault of this concert was its undue length. If one song had been allotted to each singer, instead of two, and occasionally three, the enjoyment of the listeners would have been enhanced. A miscellaneous performance of three hours and a half in duration is just one hour and a half de trop. It would have been advisable, under the circumstances, even to omit the symphony.

This morning their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess Christian again visited the Cathedral, and arrived in time to listen to the whole of the first part of the performance. As the distinguished visitors were led to their places the theme of the National Anthem was heard from the orchestra, the first verse being then sung, with true earnestness, by Miss Edith Wynne, the rest, or so much of the rest as was given, being confided to the chorus.

The programme was once more a lengthy selection from various sources, the first part being exclusively devoted to Mendelssohn, who, though standing in little need of such honour now, was luckier in obtaining the ear of Royalty, than our clever English composer, Mr. Sullivan. A more imposing prelude to the day's proceedings could hardly have been thought of than the Reformation Symphony, that noble work long withheld from the musical world but now already, within so short a period of its first hearing at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham (1868)—in England at all events—everywhere popular and everywhere appreciated at its worth. Although the performance under Mr. Townshend Smith's direction can at the best be pronounced with justice only a tolerably fair one, it is questionable whether on any previous occasion the symphony has created a deeper and more lasting impression—upon those, be it understood, capable of entering into the spirit of such music. Its effect was surpassingly grand. The peculiar acoustic properties of the sacred building seemed to favour the design of the composer in bringing out emphatically the diverse themes and contrasts of tone and colour which are special characteristics of the first and last movements. Nothing could be more solemn and majestic than the introductory andante, in which some of the distinguishing features of the splendid allegro con fuoco which forms its sequel are set forth. Even the playful allegro vivace with its exquisitely tuneful episode (standing in place of minuetto and trio) seemed thoroughly in keeping, and this may be attributed to the fact that there is not a touch of levity in them from beginning to end, each phrase, in its serene and gentle course, suggesting rather the notion of innocent candour than of anything more worldly. The pathetic slow movement which follows and prepares the way for the first utterance, by a single flute, of the people's choral, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott"—afterwards so wonderfully developed in the final movement—still further heightened the impression, which culminated with the delivery by full orchestra, fortissimo, and in graver measure, of the theme which is the key stone of the work. A hearing of the "Reformation' Symphony under such exceptional circumstances must have brought to many the conviction that if, at any future time, what has been briefly hinted should be made a rule, and the whole of the Festival performances be held in the Cathedral, there is no reason why the orchestral symphonies of the great masters should be excluded. God made art as God made all things, and the symphonies of Beethoven, as well as many of those composed by Haydn and Mozart, being among the highest manifestations of an art which, worthily employed, has not been inappropriately termed "divine," would surely not be out of place on such occasions as those referred to. Of course, a severe discretion should be exercised in the choice of the works to be given, and even single movements might be detached from the rest where the character of an entire symphony would appear to be in the slightest degree unsuitable.

Of the fragments from the unfinished oratorio, Christus, the 42nd Psalm, Mr. Henry Holmes's new cantata, and the selection from Handel's oratorios, also included in to-day's performance, we must speak next week.

The second miscellaneous concert in the Shire Hall to-night, and the Messiah in the Cathedral to-morrow bring the Festival to a close. Of its success, we believe, there is now no doubt; but this and other matters connected with the meetings must be left for another occasion.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF 1871.—We are requested by Her Majesty's Commissioners to state, that there is no foundation for the rumour that the International Exhibition appointed for 1871 is to be postponed by reason of the war. The first of the series of Annual International Exhibitions of selected Works of Fine and Industrial Art and Scientific Inventions will take place next year, as already announced.

WIESBADEN.—Herr Hagen, formerly conductor of the Opera here, died on the 18th inst., of apoplexy.

STUTTGARDT.—Having completed his engagement at Vienna, Herr Sonntheim has returned here.

MOSCOW.—Herr Wilhelm Fitzenhagen has been appointed professor of the violoncello, in the place of Herr Cossmann, at the Conservatory.

TRIVES.—The Town Band, which was established in 1865, the funds to maintain it being guaranteed for six years by the Corporation, has just been dissolved.

COBURG.—Herr Caspar Rummer, who enjoyed a high reputation both as a performer on, and as a writer for, the flute, died here lately, in his seventy-fifth year.

ROME.—Connected with the recent declaration of infallibility, a new Papal Hymn has just been composed. It was recently performed before the Pope.

"ALL THE WORLD'S A STAGE."—and Herren Niemann and Betz, of the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, are now playing on it the part of "Krankenwärter, in the Second German Army Corps. Krankenwärter, as most of our readers are, doubtless aware, means in English, "attendants on the sick, or wounded."

THE PARISIAN STAGE.

We read that the French theatres were never more crowded than during the old Reign of Terror. This fact, if fact it be, proves the danger of reasoning by analogy when we strive to derive practical wisdom from the study of historical records. Several Parisian playhouses are now closed; and a theatrical journal that has appeared twice a week for nearly half a century declares that it can only appear once a week till the arrival of better times. The editor is in a position like that of another editor who one day shut up his shop and posted up a placard declaring that as no news had arrived no paper would be published.

Nevertheless a few theatrical events crop up, looking like the shipwrecked companies of Æneas, Rari nantes in gurgite vasto. At the Théâtre Français, Une Fête de Néron, a tragedy by M.M. Alexander Sommet and Louis Belmontel, originally produced at the Odéon in 1869 with enormous success, has been revived. A French version, by M. E. Taillade, of Der Fechter von Ravenna, a play by Friedrich Halm, which found great favour all over Germany, has been brought out at the Ambigu-Comique with the closely translated title, Le Gladiateur de Ravenne. The incidents of this piece occur under the reign of the Emperor Caligula. Thumelica, the widow of Arminius, a German chief defeated by the Romans and consequently massacred by his own subjects, has been taken to Rome, where, when the curtain rises, she has been a captive for twenty years. The sentiment which keeps her alive is the desire of finding her son, who was stolen from her cradle by the Romans. She at last discovers him in the lowly condition of a gladiator, one among fifty hirelings, who are chosen to fight with each other in the Circus for the entertainment of the Emperor. She reveals herself in her true character, gives the degraded Thumelica (as he is now called) "le sabre au poing," and tries to awaken in his heart something like a feeling of patriotism. Thumelica is, however, not only degraded but degenerate. The word "Vaterland" or "Patrie" has with him no significance, and his sole notion of honour is the applause that he gains by his exploits in the Circus. Another drawback to his elevation is his passion for a courtesan slave, named Lycisca. The favourites of Caligula, wishing to afford their master a highly seasoned recreation, and having learned the relation between Thumelicus and Thusnelda, hit on the happy thought of making the son fight with a dangerous adversary in the presence of his mother. Thumelicus finds the proposition reasonable. In vain do his mother and his mistress entreat him to abstain from the combat; the voice of the only honour which he understands calls him to the Circus, and to the Circus he would go, did not Thusnelda stop him in his downward career by killing him with his father's sword. He dies still stupid, wishing prosperity to Cæsar, as all good gladiators should, and Thusnelda stabs herself over his corpse.

The Palais Royal has made some noise with a one-act farce by MM. E. Grange and V. Bernard, entitled La Belle aux Yeux d'Emaille. The beauty in question is a doll, the chef-d'œuvre of Coclarius, a mediæval constructor of automata, who like Pygmalion, falls in love with his own work. He is not alone in his predilection. Fritz, a German student, who has seen the doll at the window, becomes enamoured likewise, and enters the house of the great mechanist. He is discovered and ejected by Coclarius, who, freed from the intruder, reflects on the possibility of conferring a soul on the inanimate object of his affections. Chance throws in his way a leaf torn from a book, which reveals a strange system of psychology—namely, that a soul can be made out of a quarter of pepper, with the aid of a little pepper, salt, and vinegar. While he is in the kitchen, reducing this theory to practice, Floristin, a young lady attached to Fritz, enters his sanctum, and, hearing his approach conceals herself in the cupboard appropriated to the doll. Saucepan in hand, the sage commences his invocations, and is almost terrified with his success, when Floristin, who has substituted herself for the doll, leaps from her hiding-hole. So mischievous, indeed, does she appear, that Coclarius feels convinced that he put too much vinegar into the mixture. After a series of odd incidents, Coclarius is forced to repair a pecuniary wrong which he has done to Fritz, and discovers the mistake which led to his operations in the kitchen. The stray leaf belonged to a cookery-book, and, this being produced, it turns out that the instructions conveyed referred to the preparation of an Epigramme d'Agneau. The fragment Epig was on the preceding page, and the remainder, amme, did duty for âme. We conclude that, although the action of the piece takes place in Germany, the cookery book was in French, as it would be difficult to conceive the name of any dish with "seele" as its latter half.

"DIE WACHT AM RHEIN."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I call your attention to an article in the Kolnische Zeitung of Sunday the 14th inst., written by Dr. K. Hundeshagen, Professor of Theology at this University, who reveals to the world the author of the poem, "Die Wacht am Rhein," in the mouth of every German at the present time. The author is Max Schneckenburger, who died in 1851. The poem was produced in February, 1841, at Burgdorf, near Bern, and set to music by G. Mendel in 1842. It is now the favourite song of the German troops, and the Queen of Prussia has conferred the dignity of Poet Laureata on the author.

Bonn-am-Rhein, Prussia, Aug. 15. A SPECTATOR.

AMERICA.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, July 28.—I do not know precisely what "going to blazes" is, but what we are at present enduring in New York is probably something very like it. For the last fortnight we have been "among the nineties," the temperature varying from 95 to 99. The Herald has termed the present "heated term" as being "without precedent in North America," and has recently been publishing every morning a list of deaths by sun-stroke, which occurred the day before. One day last week they amounted to no less than sixty! It is quite common, too, to see horses drop down and die on the street. Every imaginable annoyance which a fierce sun can produce seems to afflict us at once. "Prickly heat" is a sensation akin to that which might be created by the simultaneous application of stinging nettles all over the body, only much more prickly and considerably hotter. Everybody has the "prickly heat." Mosquitos are graceful little creatures with long, slender legs—they pounce upon you with inconceivable rapidity, stinging as they pounce, and no one was ever yet known agile enough to dodge this inconceivably rapid pouncing, which generally eventuates in the closing of an eye or two, or fiery swellings somewhere. Roaches are of a somber hue, but yet uncommonly sprightly; they run nimbly up and down the walls, over your bed-clothes, your table-cloth, or papers; glide swiftly across your face or limbs, but do not bite (fortunately), unless very sharp set indeed. They seem destined to excite unmitigated disgust rather than to inflict corporal punishment. Roaches, and mosquitos, like the "prickly heat," are inevitable. I could mention some more agile evidences of an American summer, which would find their way even into the king's chamber, if America had a king; but I have said enough to show you how very pleasant the "happy land" is just now, more especially to foreigners, and most especially in New York City, the most scorching and sultry place I know of. Of course all leave it who are able at this time of year, to seek refreshing breezes at Long Branch, Saratoga, Newport, Cape May, White Mountains, Cat's Hill, &c.; but I just now belong to the "can't get away club," and therefore must seek my shade and breezes in the parks, and my watering-place and rural gossip from the hordes of press reporters and "interviewers," whose powers of exaggeration and utterance of an infinite deal of nothing could not be matched throughout the world.—What the beautiful Mrs. —— is at the afternoon promenade. How the lovely Mrs. —— was attired at the midnight "hop"—how the luscious Mrs. —— looked in her bathing dress—how the Long Branch belles are "after" Lord Wodehouse and Lord Alexander Campbell, two "sprigs" of British nobility—how John Hay (whose wife is one of the fashion-leaders here), drove Lord Wodehouse behind a team of 2.30 trotters, and how his lordship declared that they were "dooced fawst, pon honour." This kind of small talk, accounts of the races and other amusements, with gushing descriptions of scenery familiar to everybody, are what we get from the gentlemen "detailed," as they say here, by the various New York journals, to write about the watering places. It does not amount to much.

The President is at Long Branch with his family, where, in spite of a publicly expressed desire to have peace for a while, he is awfully bored. A strange news the other day took General Grant in hand in the matter, and held it tightly for some time, while he vainly endeavoured to get an opinion from the Chief Magistrate with respect to Cuba. It is really astonishing what the President of the United States has to put up with.

The New York theatres are nearly all closed, the overpowering weather is so bad for theatrical business. Notwithstanding there have been some highly successful novelties quite recently; two at Wallack's Theatre from the prolific pen of Mr. John Brougham, entitled respectively, The Red Light and Minnie's Luck. Brougham, who, whether as author or actor, is an immense favourite throughout the States, took prominent parts in both these pieces, and, by his inimitable histrionic abilities, contributed largely to their success. In the latter he personated a newspaper "interviewer" (a character, thank Heaven, unknown to British journalism), presenting a most life-like picture of that audacious intruder upon everybody who has been unfortunate enough to attract public attention in any way. In Minnie's Luck, too, a young lady named Leona Cavender made her début before the New York public, and pleased very much. She possesses a large amount of that frolicsome gaiety and sparkling vivacity which characterise the famous Lotta, who, by the way, is now in London, and going, I presume, to play there. A débutante of more mark and likelihood than Miss Cavender in the special line of business she has chosen I have not seen. The other novelties are Mr. Gazler's Brits, our Cousins Germans (Wallack's Theatre), and the grand ballet of Gazelle, or the Willis, at "General" "Commodore" Fisk's grand operahouse. The former was written by Mr. Gazler to exhibit the peculiar abilities of Mr. Emmet, who seeks to introduce a new line of business to the New York stage—that of the German American. With so large a lager-beer-drinking population and the high estimation in which the "Dutchman" is generally held as the best of naturalized citizens, Mr. Emmet's talent, which revels in the delineation of robust jollity, racy humour, and hazy metaphysical ideality, all essentially Teutonic in character, has every chance of appreciation. In England his success would be problematical. The ballet of Gizelle with Adolph Adam's charming music and the delightful dancing of Madame Kattie Larmer and her Viennese corps de ballet drew crowded houses for a time, but soon failed to attract. But everything, in short, droops or slopes off at this time of year. Even the sensational persons are breaking down, though one of them, at least rejoicing in a cool name,—Snow—Bishop Snow, has not yet melted, for quite recently he was vigorous enough to attack Gordon Bennett's paper in very stirring language. The rev. gentleman opened his discourse from the pulpit by accusing one morning journal of having told a "blasted lie," and then turned upon the Herald, saying, "it is written for by rogues and liars, inspired by the devil," characterising it generally as a "dirty, ignorant, shabby, filthy, infernal rag," which he finally left with other hideous sheets to the vengeance of God! Another parson, the Rev. Mr. Orr, has been displaying his Christian meekness by pitching into the late Charles Dickens, with respect to whose works he says, "the regenerate soul would loathe such garbage. I pass no sentence on this poor foolish creature who will have to appear before his Judge and Maker, but I feel and am grieved for the people who can enjoy such company and such trash!" Such manifestations are really acceptable in the dull season; and then we have had something more than words to shake us out of the torpor produced by what they describe in the Herald as the "deadly sun." Recently there was a sanguinary "faction-fight" in New York between Catholic and Protestant Irishmen. The Orangemen had determined to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne by a grand picnic in Elm Park, and their Catholic countrymen had equally determined that they should not. So, just as the farmers with their wives and children were beginning the festivities, an alarm was given that the Park was surrounded. Immediately after several shots were fired, and volleys of stones flung among the revellers, several of whom fell mortally wounded. The Orangemen then drew their revolvers, and armed themselves as they could and commenced a terrible retaliation. The battle soon became general—hundreds took part in it; pistols, pikes, knifes, pickaxes, and stones, being freely used on both sides. Women and children were frightfully mixed up in the belligerents, who intentionally, or unintentionally, trampled them under foot, and injured them dreadfully. From the Park the mob fought their way into the streets, and the horrors of the scene naturally deepened. Some of the combatants, anxious at last to escape with their families from the strife, sought refuge in the street cars, but were stopped by an infuriated crowd who fired shots into the densely crowded vehicles at the risk of killing anybody or everybody; and for a long time there were only nine policemen present, out of 2,500, the effective force of New York, to quell this outrageous riot, which might easily have been foreseen, as a similar scene took place last year on the same occasion, and, doubtless, was foreseen. But what could Irish police authorities, elected by the Irish population of New York, do? Were they to break the heads of their constituents? Who can fail to see here the splendid working of the Republican system. About the same time there was a terrific "firemen's fight" in the "City of Brotherly Love." One party set a house in flames on purpose to bring an old quarrel to an issue. Stones, revolvers, knives, &c, were used indiscriminately, and many lives were lost.

The death of Charles Dickens made an immense sensation here, and I believe there was genuine sorrow for the unlooked-for event all over America; but now nothing is spoken of but the great European war the ocean yacht race, and Christine Nilsson, whose pretty face may be seen in every shop, and to whom six columns of the Herald were devoted the other day, besides a leader, in which the writer (who has not yet heard her), fully endorses the six column puff.

The German-Americans are most enthusiastic in the cause of Prussia; and, indeed, the general feeling both of the American press and public is against France. It is only the Irish here who throw up their caps for the Emperor. They are going to make a grand demonstration in his behalf by parading the streets of New York with banners, &c. If this be allowed, there will be more blood shed to a certainty.

I have been waiting to close this dispatch for news of the ocean yacht race, which was hourly expected. It is come. I need not tell you what you must have known immediately after the event, by telegraphic cable, but may give you some idea of the impression made here by the Gambria's victory. It is that of profound disappointment, and mortification from one end of America to the other. No European war news—no gold panic, no anything could have created half the excitement which this ocean yacht-race has occasioned here during the last few days. Every American, I am sure, thought the Dauntless would win. Immense sums were bet upon her, while British seamanship and British pluck seemed to be held in no account. Imagine, then, the state of feeling produced here by the generally-unexpected result! From the moment when the fine French steamer, the Ville de Paris, arrived with the unwelcome news that she had seen the Cambria at sunset the only 200 miles from Sandy Hook, all New York was on the qui vive! Reporters and interviewers, en masse, were dispatched to Sandy Hook, a frightfully barren region, where they had to endure dry, scorching heat, and the exquisite tortures which only sand-flies can inflict, for many dreary hours. As time progressed, so increased the general anxiety. Captain James Cosgrove, a well-seasoned old salt, placed in command of the light ship (the winning-post of the race), who had been on the "look-out" for more than a week, could scarcely exercise his functions in consequence of the troublesome crowd which surrounded him. Eager reporters and "interviewers" plied their race-glasses in vain; they could make out nothing in the vasty deep like what they fondly expected. In fact, they could make out nothing at all beyond a limited distance. It requires an experienced sailor's eye to scan the ocean. Old Cosgrove, taking little notice of his fussy companions, steadily keeps the faithful telescope close to his eye, while those who surrounded him listened breathlessly for a word, as the heathen believers would have listened for the voice of an oracle. Now and then he lowered the glass and gave a kind of nautical grunt, which his observers were at liberty to interpret each in his own way, not much information being gained by anybody. At length, after very long and painful waiting, some one ventured to ask if he saw anything. "Hmm!" said he "I see something now; but it is a speck." On the instant no end of glasses of every description was raised under the direction of his telescope; but no human being but Cosgrove could see anything. The excited reporters and "interviewers" declared their ocular inability with something like a reproachful tone, thinking, perhaps, they were being "chaffed." "Ha!" said Cosgrove with an odd nautical grin, and then relapsed into silence. At last the oracle spoke—"I make out something with queer looking sails coming towards us at a tremendous pace—it is a yacht—but not the Dauntless." And so she came on and on—the gallant little British ship—until there could no longer be any possible mistake; and a mighty cheer rent the air—a cheer honourable to those who gave as to those who received it. The Cambria was alongside the light-ship; the owner, Mr. Ashbury, shouted from the deck through his speaking-trumpet—"Dauntless arrived?" to which old Cosgrove promptly shouted "No;" and then the gallant little crew of the gallant little Cambria cheered—not to crow over a rival's defeat, but because their hearts were full and they could not help it; and then everybody cheered, and hundreds of guns were fired, and hundreds of gay colours displayed, and dipped in honour of the victors. The Cambria could not have had a more generous, a more magnificent reception than she had from American yachtsmen and the American public. In the midst of this great scene, in which so many thousands took part, there was no accident, so well was everything managed. One daring act, on the part of a Herald reporter and "interviewer," might have led to disastrous consequences, but fortunately did not. In his eagerness to obtain news he threw himself from the light-ship into Mr. Ashbury's vessel where he fell upon his back, but fortunately without injury, for, once there, he refused all assistance, saying that he had no time to get up, and taking out his note-book as he lay screamed loudly for Ashbury's log-book and instant information about everything. At least so runs the story. I send you some extracts from the New York papers that you may observe the general tone of the press here upon this most remarkable contest.

SANS WAGNER.

'Au Redacteur du "Musical World."

Monsieur,—Récemment (avant la guerre, bien compris) on a donné Oberon au théâtre royal de Munich, et cet opéra, qui exige, comme on sait, un grand luxe de décors et de machineries, laissa beaucoup à désirer, surtout sous ce dernier rapport. Le roi, informé des inconvénients qui avaient accompagné la première représentation de cette intéressante reprise, s'empressa d'assister à la seconde; et y resta du commencement jusqu'à la fin. Après le spectacle, sa Majesté monta sur le scène pour faire de nouveau tous les changements à vue et faire jouer toutes les machines. Sa Majesté, pour se rendre un compte exact, fit également essayer le char en forme de coquille traîné par des paons, dans lequel monta d'abord l'intendant, puis le directeur, ensuite le régisseur, et enfin le roi lui-même.—Et voilà comme on s'amuse à la cour de Bavière . . . . quand Richard Wagner n'est pas là.—Agreez, &c.,

From the Rio Janeiro "Journal of Commerce."

Ecco alla fine, a voi giunta, la Patti
Sciogliere il dolce canto in sulla scena,
Ove di popol scelto immensa piena
Vede il promesso a ognun ridotto a fatti;

Eccola in suoni artistici ed esatti,
Spiati fuori a bell'agio e senza pena,
Spiegersi d'armonia si larga vena
Da farne gli uditor stupiti a matti.

E il rider suo, che in gorgheggiar sfavilla
Sul gentil labro, che soave incanta,
Due sensi slentica, e all'anima ci brilla.

Donna non è, ma un usignuol che canta;
Che dico?... augel nessun tanto ben trilla:
Mai fior avemmo qui d'arte cotanta!

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1870.

IN accordance with a rule, perhaps necessary, certainly inexorable, London is just now without music. Impresarios and concert-givers are resting from their labours with grief or gladness, according to circumstances; while singers and players rusticate, or, disdaining repose, make what they can off "fresh fields and pastures new." It is not our present business to inquire why this should be to the extent it is. Otherwise we might pnt and follow up certain very pertinent questions; asking, for example, why London, always inhabited by from two to three millions of people, crowds its music into those few months when the highly-exalted "ten thousand" are supposed to grace the metropolis with their lofty presence? Our belief is that if no further query be pnt till this be satisfactorily answered the querist will need patience. Happily, however, there are signs, even in this matter, of the levelling process which is gradually but surely exalting every social valley and bringing low every social hill. The purveyors of music are beginning to see that "well born" folk are not their best patrons, and they will soon learn that insulting millions by becoming inactive when thousands draw down the blinds of west-end houses and leave Belgravia desolate is not a profitable course. As soon as this happens the provincial festivals will pass a very bad quarter of an hour. Now they are exalted into a sort of fictitious importance by the total collapse of music elsewhere, and the consequent fact that they alone are, pro tem., the representatives of a popular art. For these reasons London journals give a national dignity to the country gatherings, and send forth men who duly and faithfully record for the benefit of an admiring world how Mr. Townshend Smith conducted the Messiah, and how Mr. Santley was encored in "O Ruddier than the Cherry." We do not say that, under the circumstances, this is wrong. Readers of musical reports and criticisms count by the hundred thousand, and their desire to know all that is going forward at a generally stagnant time ought to be gratified. We do say, however, that when the London music season lasts all the year round, instead of a few months, the provincial festivals will have seen their best days.

Our readers must be aware that the ancient Meeting of the Three Choirs began at Hereford on Tuesday morning last, and lasted till Friday night. This year the gathering seems never to have been in such danger as it was last year at Worcester, and the year previous at Gloucester, through the opposition, direct and indirect, of Ritualist or Puritan, or both combined. Either these zealous parties have no influence in Hereford, or their influence is so small as to be powerless even for self-assertion. Anyhow the Festival preparations were made without let or hindrance, the managers even going so far as to give a first evening performance in the Cathedral. We do not expect that this will at all discourage the fervent opponents of "desecration." Knowing very well that success in one of the three sister towns, means the ruin of the Festival in the other two, they are likely to redouble their efforts in Gloncester next year, and it may even be that victory will render unnecessary the exodus of the Cathedral clergy and the locking up of their uncontaminated surplices

Apart from the evening concert in the Cathedral, the general arrangements at Hereford differed in no respect from those of previous gatherings. Mr. Townshend Smith, by virtne of a system, wielded the conductor's bâton, and a body of London artists, including Mdlle Tietjens, Mdlle. Sinico, Miss Wynne, Mdme. Patey; Messrs. Rigby, Smith, Thomas, and Santley, were engaged as "principals." Mr. Blagrove again acted as leader of an efficient London orchestra, and the chorus came from well-approved sources. In all respects the Festival was well equipped.

Referring to the programme, we find Elijah and the Messiah occupying a prominent place; those being, in fact, the only works which had an entire concert to themselves. Decision in their case must have cost the managers little reflection; for long ago Mendelssohn's great work joined the masterpiece of Handel in claiming, as of indisputable right, the first honours at every festival. The remaining two morning programmes had crowded into them many things, some of small value, but all, we must presume, more or less acceptable to a Hereford audience. Thus, the scheme of Wednesday morning comprised Mr. Sullivan's Prodigal Son, Spohr's Last Judgment, and Mozart's 12th Mass; that of Thursday being devoted to the Reformation Symphony, Christus, Mr. Holmes's psalm, "Praise ye the Lord," and a miscellaneous selection of sacred pieces. We doubt, nevertheless, whether the choice of one great work at each performance would not have better agreed with the dignity of the occasion. At the Cathedral evening concert on Tuesday, Haydn's Creation (Parts I. and II.), and Mr. Barnby's Rebekah were given; both works being sufficiently light to extort a groan from those jealous for the "house of the Lord." This time there were two, instead of three, evening concerts in the inconvenient Shire Hall; the programmes consisting, as usual, of hackneyed pieces familiar to every London concert-goer, and, therefore, unnecessary to specify. We look in vain, however, for a recognition of the fact that there was such a thing as a piano, not a single piece for that instrument being set down. Bearing in mind its importance and the nature of the music written for it, we may well call for an explanation, which, at the same time, we never expect to get. On Friday evening (last night) a concert of chamber music was to take place in the little College Hall; and here, again, where we should most have looked for it, the piano was absent. Has Mr. Townshend Smith an antipathy to the popular "box of wires," or are there local prejudices.

The Birmingham gathering commences on the morning of Tuesday, and, like that at Hereford, closes on the ensuing Friday night. Its arrangements are on the usual complete and extensive scale, Sir Michael Costa again acting as general-in-chief, and having under him the following band of principal artists:—

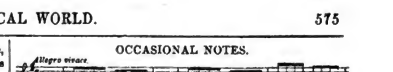
Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Madame Arabella Goddard, and M. Sainton. The orchestra, led by M. Sainton, consists of twenty-eight first, and twenty-six second violins, seventeen violas, seventeen violoncelli, seventeen double basses, and a double proportion of "wind;" making, in all, 137 instruments. The chorus numbers 363 voices —a small body for so great an occasion; but it must be borne in mind that none are "dummies," and the difference between the paper strength of a choral host and its effective strength is generally as great as that we sometimes read of in connection with hosts martial. On the whole, there is every reason to anticipate a Festival musically up to the high standard of its predecessors, and, therefore, one of which, not Birmingham alone, but all England will be proud. The programme would have satisfied those ancient Athenians who, a high authority tells us, were always on the look out for some new thing. It contains not less than five novelties, some of the greatest pretensions, and, possibly, of the greatest importance. In the order of presentation, they are Mr. J. F. Barnett's cantata, Paradise and the Peri; Professor R. P. Stewart's cantata, Ode to Shakspere; Mr. A. S. Sullivan's Overtura di Ballo; Herr Ferdinaud Hiller's cantata, Nala and Damayanti; and Mr. Benedict's oratorio, St. Peter. We shall be excused from passing any criticism upon these works so far as they are yet known to us—criticism which, based upon imperfect acquaintance, may possibly be unjust—but we have a right to acknowledge the spirit which determined upon producing so many new things. Clearly the Birmingham managers put our metropolitan societies and concert-givers to shame. The latter think they do well if, after much goading from the public press, they bring out one novelty in the course of a season. The former, working at high pressure, but without noise and fuss, give us five in four days. We are bound to say within hearing of Exeter Hall, "Well done, Birmingham!" The not unfamiliar items in the programme consist of the Messiah and Elijah, Sir M. Costa's Naaman, Mozart's Requiem, and Handel's Samson; in addition to which the following important works have a place at the secular evening concerts:—The overtures to Der Freischütz, Egmont, and Guillaume Tell; Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in G minor; Beethoven's pianoforte concerto, in E flat, and his sonata for piano and violin (Op. 24), "Adelaide," and a long selection from Fidelio. The vocal pieces are numerous and generally such as justify their choice, so that, from the highest matter to the lowest, the Birmingham Festival is well arranged with a view to complete artistic as well as pecuniary success. Whether both objects have been secured, it will soon be our duty to tell.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The concluding choral rehearsal of Mr. Benedict's St. Peter was held on Tuesday evening, when the composer expressed his warm thanks for the care bestowed upon his work, which he said had cost him many sleepless nights. Dr. Hiller will be present on Thursday evening for the rehearsal of his cantata, Nala and Damayanti. The application for tickets and requests for lodgings are said to be numerous, and there is every prospect of the forthcoming Festival being quite as successful as the last, which was the best on record.—Birmingham, Aug. 24.

THE MANAGER OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—Our readers will be grieved to hear of the sudden death of Mr. Bowley, the well-known manager of the Crystal Palace and treasurer of the Sacred Harmonic Society. He accidently fell from a river steamer near Greenwich on Thursday, and though promptly taken out by Inspector Goode, of the Thames Police, life was extinct before he could be got on shore.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.



VERY much more than a pleasant volume—a book of sweet and permanent interest, commanding serious attention, and giving deep and enduring delight—is Arne: a Sketch of Norwegian Country Life, translated from the Norwegian of Björnstjerne Björnson. (London: Alexander Strahan.) Björnson is a writer in the prime of his powers, which are great and unique; and yet it does not strike the reader of this beautiful little book that he is likely to leave much work behind him. There is a wild flavour in his character and life, so far as we are informed of them, which does not suggest high productiveness. The characteristic of his style is such a naïveté as might exist in a high-born well-nurtured child that had been stolen and brought up by gipsies. The characteristic of his matter (to adopt for a moment a distinction which can never be made absolute) is a free poetic humour which reminds you now of Richter and now of Andersen. The essence of it is, that the mind of the writer is vitably possessed by the humour of life as a whole and the poetry of life as a whole. This is a thing which rarely happens. For a thousand who can catch the humour and poetry of particular situations there is barely one, if one, who can see everything in the light of the humour and poetry of the whole spectacle. That Björnson does this is the secret of his peculiar power. There is humour, awful humour though it be, in the dreadful scene in which the lad Arne takes up the axe to his own father, who, in a fit of delirium tremens, is trying to throttle the wife; and there is scarcely a page of the book which will not provoke a gentle inward smile, though there is scarcely a page without a passage of poetic description such as this:—

"It was twilight; and Eli stood at the window, looking away over the ice which lay bright in the moonlight. Arne went to the other window and looked out also. Indoors it was warm and quiet; outdoors it was cold, and a sharp wind swept through the vale, bending the branches of the trees, and making their shadows creep trembling on the snow. A light shone over from the parsonage—then vanished—then appeared again—taking various shapes and colours, as a distant light always seems to do when one looks at it long and intently. Opposite, the mountain stood dark, with deep shadows at its foot, where a thousand fairy tales hovered, but with its snowy upper parts bright in the moonlight. The stars were shining, and northern lights were flickering in one quarter of the sky, but they did not spread. A little way from the window, down towards the water, stood some trees, whose shadows kept stealing over to each other; but the tall ash stood alone, writing on the snow."

It is not often that one is prompted to speak so warmly, but we are unable to say less of Arne than the best of our contemporaries have said—namely, that it is one of the most beautiful love stories ever written.

M. A. (M. A.)

DR. JEBB'S sermon in Hereford Cathedral was in many respects an excellent and appropriate one. But we would respectfully submit that the Rev. Dr. would have given a more effective justification of the Festival if he had confined himself to the enforcement of the claims of the charity in support of which it is held, instead of rushing into topics calculated to provoke controversy. We expect the clergy on these occasions to remind their hearers of what is due to the spirit of religion; and we should be very sorry to find the Cathedral turned into a place of merely secular entertainment. But to insist in the first place that the Oratorio shall only be given in the Church as a part of its established form of Divine Service, and then, secondly, that it shall never be given anywhere else but in the Church, is to set up an utterly impracticable theory, which would circumscribe the freedom of the religious spirit, on the one hand, whilst doing gross injustice to the claims of high art as such on the other. What would Dr. Jebb say if we were to insist that he should never discourse on anything but theology, and that he should never discourse on theology anywhere but from the pulpit? He is a good theologian and an eloquent speaker. In the pulpit let him be reverent by all means, but a sermon is not a legitimate means of doing good simply because it is delivered in connection with a set service of worship, and religious oratory does not necessarily become impertinent or mischievous when exercised for philanthropic objects and in good faith on the unconsecrated public platform.

On Tuesday the experiment was made of an evening occupation of Hereford Cathedral, and the result proved that the idea was a happy one. The novelty of the thing created a haze in the minds of some people as to whether it was to be regarded, as, we are glad to say, it was regarded up to a certain point, as a religious service or an evening entertainment. It was satisfactory, therefore to find that those who were present observed the same laudable decorum as was noticeable in the morning. It was unsatisfactory, however, to see that the good behaviour, of which the sanctity of the place in which they were assembled ought to have sufficed to ensure an observance, forsook some of the audience at the end of the proceedings. When the last chorus of Rebekah commenced, approse ladies and gentlemen in all parts of the Cathedral, just as they are accustomed to do before the conclusion of a concert, and sought to evade a crush by obtaining an early egress from the sacred building, of course distracting the attention of those whose sense of decency compelled them to keep their places until the proper time of departure had arrived. This was bad enough, but when the example was set by a steward it was utterly inexcusable. What would have been thought if every twentieth person in an ordinary Sunday evening congregation were to start upon a race for Booth's porch immediately the Bishop commenced the Benediction? Still more, what condemnation would there be if the clergy in the choir were, upon the Bishop beginning his concluding utterance, to commence their departure from the building?

It is curious to compare the war-songs of nations—those not written in time of peace, commemorating great events, but struck off at fever heat, in which the resolve and the rage of the people may find expression. Our literature is singularly poor in battle-songs. It would be difficult to name one worthy a great nation, those only being redeemed from mediocrity which commemorate our naval battles; we have no song to rouse the people, and serve, words and music, as fitting outlet for enthusiasm, which else might be dissipated in mere shouting. The best we have are the Jacobite songs of Scotland and the patriotic songs of Ireland. It proves the pacific tenour of English thought, and illustrates the fact that for six generations no battle has been fought on our soil—the '45 troubles excepted; that not one war-song has become popular among us, even when such songs were plentiful and the war fever high. We neither have nor wish to have a poetry of war. On the Continent things are different. There we find the war poetry of the last ninety years, and singularly illustrative of the national genius of each country. Take Germany and France. From their war songs the character of either land may be read. The German goes to war with words not the less burning because there is a depth of melancholy in them. He leaves his home, wife, children, with sorrow. Says Korner, who, at twenty-two wrote his last song on the field of Rosenberg, an hour before he fell:—"If tears rise at the thought of home, tears disgrace not the eyes of valour." The pageant of war awakes little joy in the German. He fights well when he loves his cause, and in the piety which lies at the bottom of his heart, can pray in the midst of battle. The buoyancy and joyousness of war are seldom to be found in German songs. There is none of the rattle and activity of camp life; no beat of drum and blare of bugle. The German sings in his tent songs tinged with sadness; he fights for no glory, thinking of those at home who love him well and bid him do his duty. But while the German is the armed custodian of his own, the Frenchman is the agressor. The songs of Germany breathe resistance, those of France a crusade. "The French nation," says Carlyle, "distinguishes itself among nations by the characteristic of excitability, with the good, and also the perilous evil, which belongs to that." The good is, perhaps, that hope which, in disaster, perennially renews itself in a Frenchman's heart. Easily disheartened, he is easily revived. Ragged, barefoot, starved, the Republican armies marched to the fight as to a wedding feast. Every man was a missionary; before him trembled tyrants; at his aspect mercenary hosts broke ranks and fled; their guns were avenging arms of Providence; they represented liberty and the love of country. Has not every French army since 1792 thus marched to war? Italy and Mexico have seen the Eagles of Deliverance; Algiers, the Eagle of Civilization. Casimir Delavigne, in the "Parisienne," Rouget de l'Isle, in the "Marseillaise," Chenier, in the "Chant du Départ," have all harped upon this strain. Not that every French soldier is fired with the consciousness of a divine mission, but that his love of war, for war's sake, its splendour, excitement, dangers, pride, is deepened by a conviction that he is fighting for great ideas, and that the French army is the vanguard of civilization.

The subjoined is an extract from a letter to an American paper describing Madame Goldschmidt's last appearance in Exeter Hall, London:—

"We waited very impatiently through Herr Goldschmidt's ambitious 'Instrumental Prelude,' and through the first of his jerky choruses. It was not entirely the fog which made our eyes see dimly the sweet-faced woman sitting on his left-hand; thinner, older, sadder, but still with the same winning, pathetic atmosphere about every pose, and every expression which conquered all hearts twenty years ago, disarms all criticism to-day, and will continue to do so so long as Jenny Lind's soul dwells in Jenny Lind's body. If there be such things as perfect grace of clumsiness, perfect beauty of homeliness, she has them; and they are more lasting than the grace of gracefulness, or the beauty of good looks. As it is with her face, her movements, her attitudes, so it is with her voice. Sacred above all it has lost, it has kept something of such individuality that one would know it for Jenny Lind's voice. In spite of the husky chest tones, in spite of the strained and hardly reached upper C, there is a peculiar soulful quality in it which has been rarely heard on any stage, except when Jenny Lind has sung. Critics would say—and perhaps, by rules of art, the assertion cannot be contradicted—that Jenny Lind's voice is gone. But men and women are still moved to their hearts' depths by her singing. I believe if she sings when she is three-score years and ten it will be the same."

The German papers complain of the patriotic songs with which they are overwhelmed, and which they are obliged to refuse en bloc. Occasionally, however, exceptions are made. Thus the Cologne Gazette published three poems, one by the veteran Simrock, another by Giebel, and a third, in English, by a minstrel who as yet has only initials. Simrock's poem, entitled "Kugelspritz-neultur," begins in this wise:—

"Marschirt Du an der Spitze
Der Civilization
Mit deiner Kugelspritze [mitrailleuse]
Dritter Napoleon?

Des frommen Landmanns Saaten
Zerstampfen wider Zug,
Wär' Dir nicht Gräu'ls genug,
Du willst im Blute waten?" &c.

Of Geibel's "Kriegslied" we give the first and last stanza:—

"Empor, mein Volk, das Schwert zur Hand,
Und rück hervor in Haufen!
Vom heil'gen Zorn um's Vaterland
Mit Feuer lass dich taufen!
Der Erbfeind bent die Schmach und Spott,
Das Maas ist voll—zur Schlacht mit Gott!
Vorwärts!

Flieg, Adler, flieg! Wir stürmen nach,
Ein ewig Volk in Waffen;
Wir stürmen nach, ob tausendfach
Des Todes Pforten klaffen,
Und fallen wir: flieg, Adler, flieg!
Aus unsrem Blute wächst der Sieg.
Vorwärts!"

The Englishman, become a poet through indignation, sings:—

"O, England, England! once so proud,
When on thy glory's sunny light,
How are thy spirits now so low!
How are thy stars so little bright!"

And then follows another "word-play" upon glad stone-still, which we, however, will spare our readers.

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

I returned this morning from the concert which the incomparable Madame Arabella Goddard has given for the benefit of the wounded soldiers. It would be impossible for me to give you the slightest idea of the enormous sensation she has created. The immense hall was full to suffocation, and the receipts I am told were over 10,000 francs. When Madame Goddard was led on the platform by the gentlemanly director of the Cursalon, a storm of applause greeted her. Her majestic appearance, and the beauty of her person, made quite a sensation; but when she performed, with that wonderful maestria, the grand fantasia from Maanniello the enthusiasm of the audience knew no bounds, and on that occasion, as also after the fantasia on airs from Der Freischütz, by Benedict, she was called on again and again until she favoured the public with Thalberg's transcription of "Home, sweet Home." Princess Metternich, Duchess of Mouchy, and other of the most fashionable ladies of Paris, who are now here, expressed their delight at the marvellous performance, and assured Madame Goddard that if she would come next winter to Paris, she would have such a recognition which has been accorded to no pianist since the time of Lisst, Thalberg, and Chopin. Can you now imagine what a excitement Madame Goddard would create if she would play, besides the pieces she has performed here, some of the concertos or sonatas of Beethoven, Mozart, or Mendelssohn, where no living pianist comes near to her. I cannot hide the immense pleasure I feel at Madame Goddard's triumphant success here, as I always prophesied it, that she would receive immense satisfaction if she would come to France.

PROVINCIAL.

BRIGHTON.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The Theatre has been nightly crowded during the past week to witness the excellent performances of Mr. Sothern. Lord Dundreary and David Garrick have been given, as well as A Regular Fix, likewise a new comedy by Madame Morton, entitled, A Threepenny Bit, of which all can be said is, that it succeeded in making the audience laugh. It is a pity that Mr. Sothern had not better assistance, as, with the exception of Mr. Shenton and Miss Roselle, the company was very indifferent. As an artiste, Mr. Shenton deserves more than a passing word of praise for the professional manner in which he played his parts. As the Gardener, he made quite a hit out of a mere stock character in the new comedy, and as Chivey in David Garrick he received a hearty recall on each night of its representation. Miss Roselle has talent which we shall hear of in London, no doubt. She has been nightly called before the curtain, in conjunction with Mr. Sothern."

SWANSEA.—The Cambrian informs us that:—

"A brilliant assemblage welcomed Miss Edmonds at her annual concert. The room in every part was densely crowded, many of the principal families of the town and neighbourhood being present. Upon making her first appearance upon the platform, our fair artist (Rhedodd Cymru) was received with deafening applause, a pleasing proof of the approval and esteem in which she is held by all who can thoroughly appreciate real merit and artistic taste. The programme, which had been drawn up with great care, was of a varied character. Miss Edmonds was exceedingly happy in all her vocal emanations, and she never appeared to better advantage than last evening. She displayed great taste and purity of execution in her rendering of the quaint old English air; but the attraction of the evening, so far as Miss Edmonds was concerned, was the Welsh song, 'Deryn Pûr,' which she gave in true Cellic style, and in the costume of the Cymry. The dress worn was the same as that in which she appeared at Lady Llanover's Welsh entertainment, when she sang before some of the members of the Royal family. Her complete transformation—her naïveté as the fascinating Welsh maiden—was the occasion of the loudest cheers from all parts of the house, and it was some minutes before she could proceed with her song. We need scarcely say that Miss Edmonds rendered the air in a manner worthy her high repute and acknowledged taste and expression. She received a most determined encore—again and again repeated, and the audience expressed their gratification at her singing by their heartiest marks of approval. The artists who were engaged to assist Miss Edmonds, were Mdlle. Drasdil; Miss Lizzie Moulding, (pianist); Mr. Arthur Byron (tenor); Mr. Henry Lazarus (clarionet), and Herr Sjoden (harpist). In every respect the concert was a most complete success, and all present seemed thoroughly to enjoy the rich musical treat which had been provided for them by Swansea's fair and talented cantatrice and her accomplished confrères."

FLORENCE.—A new ballet, Bianca di Nevers, by Sig. Pratesi, has made a hit at the Teatro Principe Umberto.

THE "APPRENTICESHIP" OF GREAT MEN.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Whether for or against their works, your constant criticisms of our great men in music has contributed to throw around each and all of them a halo of interest that cannot fail to enchain everyone. It matters not whether the criticism be adverse or favourable provided the work or the man who does the work be worth "powder and shot," the attention of the young musician is kept in pleasurable excitement; and he, in common with every lover of the art, delights to trace the infant footsteps of true greatness. If this idol come in for a fair share of just animadversion, he takes, in Emerson's words, the flattering unction to his soul, that "To be blamed is to be blessed."—his idol, if not his ideal, remains his idol still. Blame or praise only increases his interest and his adoration. This, of course, refers but to "representative men;" by no means to those who are not worth even blaming. Silence in such cases is better than any "tongue" known or unknown. Though, in a few isolated instances, great men have "waked some morning to find themselves immortal"—that is to say, they have appeared to reach the pinnacle of fame at a single bound—yet this is not the rule but the exception—the rarest exception; and even such examples will probably become further instructive by further scrutiny. Men, though divinely gifted, do not usually vault into high places in the esteem and love of their fellows without great labour, pains, and patience. Everything, as in nature, of whom Burns sang:—

> "Her 'prentice han' she tried on man,
> And then she made the lasses, O!"

is the result of a gradual and certain growth. Since to everything, even to nature herself, an "apprenticeship," an intermediate period betwixt seed-time and harvest, is imperative, it may be worth while to turn attention for a moment to the apprenticeship of the celebrated musicians. The gift of composition, even as the art of poetry, is regarded as being beyond the pale of an ordinary or extraordinary education to impart. Yet, given the genius, education can do so much towards shaping its ends and purposes, that without this necessary assistance the creations of genius could not be ushered into being, could not live; unless, indeed, the word "live" could with justice be applied to notes as transient as the nightingale's song. Without education in some sort there could be no tangible existence, no permanent endurance to the utterances of poet or musician. To reduce to written signs, as the means of communication between mind and mind, an education alone can supply the indispensable caligraphic art which alone gives vitality to the emanations of the imagination and fancy. But after the art of writing has been acquired with the additional aid of all the adjuncts of rhetorical science, there is yet a "something" more subtle than power, elegance, or fluency; a something which some few possess, though the many do not possess it; and, it is to the cultivation of this latent faculty; this hidden gift; the furnishing of the clever Aladdin's lamp, that might be termed the "apprenticeship" of the man of genius. Their very diligence is amazing; their earnestness appals one. The less real stand aghast, dismayed at the enormous quantity of work they do, and at the persistently untiring momentum of their daily lives:—

> "Never hasting, never resting; like a star."

Two modes appear to have been pursued by the musicians in perfecting their 'prentice han'—one, to re-write over and over again the same thing, as did Mendelssohn with his Elijah; the other to get his apprenticeship out of the public, by writing rapidly a succession of fresh works, as did Handel. It is noteworthy to remark the proportion of Handel's works that live after him. Of Handel's thirty or more operas, only a few (six, I believe) have been printed. Of his thirty oratorios, about a like number hold their ground; three of them transcendently so, though there is no reason why Bach's Passion should not be classed with either Judas, Israel, or Messiah. I want chiefly to call attention to the enormous practice in composition, the long apprenticeship this thirty years of ephemeral opera-writing gave to our greatest master. If informed that one-sixth part of his works would have been in after years preferred before the remaining five-sixths, he would, at the time of their production, be scarcely in a position to indicate with certainty which would be the favoured compositions. Shakspere, it would seem, destroyed the ladder by which he rose to Herculean capacity; yet, about a like proportion, six or eight out of forty great works, have been preferred uniformly to the others, by the popular vote. Such was the case with our chief metrical hymn writers; Watts and Wesley producing some five hundred each, only about a sixth part of them find now general acceptance and approval. Far from being any occasion of continuely on the labours of these good men, this is only a fair average proportion. Of Mozart's Masses, of Haydn's Masses, the proportion of popularity is about the same. Bach's "apprenticeship" is still more strongly marked. An exceptional man in every aspect, Bach, he would occasionally re-write, often polish and embellish; still the evidences abound that he obtained the larger amount of his unrivalled "manipulation" (I use the word in the sense of having a wide comprehension and minute disposal of material "to hand"), from those innumerable little fancies thrown off apparently without the slightest effort in some felicitous "idle" moment. These he by no means patched up; but wrote on, and on, and on, thus acquiring by slow and sure degrees, a giant's grasp. So in the bagatelles and simple variations of a still more exceptional man, Beethoven, we have some slight, but by no means unimportant "footprints" of greatness; he did not go back and write and re-write his trifles until, by accretion, they became symphonies. He let them go for what they were worth and "tried again." So likewise with Mozart and Haydn. The subject offers unbounded scope for thoughtful attention; more than space permits. Perhaps Haydn's symphonies and quartets might be thinned out much about in the same ratio. Of his quartets, eighty-four in number, about one-sixth are more popular than the rest; of his symphonies, numbering about a hundred, about the same proportion. The twelve he wrote for Salomon are all, perhaps, equally good; but then he had written fifty or sixty before that time, and thus got, during forty years of labour before he came to England, a very fair apprenticeship. In Weber, chiefly in his operas, the same gradual growth can be pleasantly traced; his "apprenticeship" must have extended over a quarter of a century (for he began young) before his genius culminated in Oberon. Rossini also evinces the various stages he passed in his "apprenticeship" in a most transparent degree. Out of his thirty operas about five take marked precedence of the others. So with Donizetti, Auber, Balfe, Bishop, and others, if there be any others who have written so extensively as these composers. Out of something like two hundred vocal works, about twenty of Bishop's are greatly preferred to all the others. Dibdin, who exceeded this large number of original songs, is now popularly represented by some half-a-dozen ballads; but these are models of the highest excellence of their kind. Better ballads were never written than a few Dibdin has left to perpetuate his name. Suppose the early efforts of these distinguished men—the operas of Handel, the lessons of Bach, the bagatelles of Beethoven, the juvenile sonatas of Mozart, the first quartets of Haydn, the operas of Weber, Rossini, Donizetti, Auber, Balfe, Bishop, or Dibdin, had been subjected to the scathing crucible of an exacting public criticism through the press, at the outset of their career, the composers must have possessed nerves of iron to have gone on, and on, through all the steps of their tedious apprenticeship to the production of such works as the Messiah, Passion-Music, Choral Symphony, Giovanni, Creation, Freischütz, Guillaume Tell, Lucrezia, Masaniello, Bohemian Girl, "Should he upbraid" or "Tom Bowling." The "moral" I would draw is this: that difficulties do not daunt genius. They were doubtless all well criticized in select circles, and the best abused amongst them was perhaps the best man of all. Again, they did not anticipate that every work would be received with equal favour. Further, they did not always know which would eventually prove their best work. They were possessed of unfailing patience, and a belief in themselves that sustained them ever. Would it not be well for our young aspirants to emulate the greatness of their patience; to work on not knowing which shall prosper—this or that." To work on, because only by actual and constant work can the indispensable qualities arising from a thorough apprenticeship become theirs. Mendelssohn, who is said to have been nine years polishing his Elijah; also Meyerbeer and some others, proceeded in their "apprenticeship" in another method; if not with more success, they are worthy of all honour for their conscientious devotion to their own principles. The sets of symphonies of Beethoven and Mozart are beyond the pale of a gossiping communication like this. To say they are perfection would be but to paint the lily," or "gild refined gold." There is, I believe, evidence to show that portions of these were re-written with most assiduous care; showing how essential, even to men of their colossal mould, unbounded experience, and long apprenticeship, was a constant and patient comparison of their own actual achievements with the ideal of perfection that was within them.—

Yours very truly,
IDEALIZER.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

DEAR MR. EDITOR.—Will you kindly insert the following notice in the Musical World.—Yours obediently, DR. FERD. RAHLES.
Aug. 23, 1870.

STEEL BARS INSTEAD OF CHURCH BELLS.

Information can be obtained through Dr. Ferdinand Rahles, who is entirely conversant with regard to the manufactory, price, and form of the Steel Bars. Letters may be addressed at the office of the Musical World.

WAIFS.

Mr. H. Jarrett accompanies Mdlle. Christine Nilsson to America. The steamer sails on the 3rd of September.

Mdlle. Carlotta Patti is singing with great success at Rio Janiero.

Signor Mario and family are staying at present at Eastbourne.

From Il Trovatore, we learn that Signor Ciampi is at Milan.

A son of Taglioni has been killed in one of the recent battles.

Meyerbeer's Africaine was given with great success at Buenos Ayres, on the occasion of the benefit of Madame Giulia Gasc.

The corner-stone of a new concert-hall at Sheffield will be laid on the 31st inst., by his Grace the Duke of Norfolk.

Philadelphia will have five theatres next season. A theatre is designed for Baltimore to accommodate 5,000 persons.

Mr. Charles Reade is in treaty for a play to be produced at the Holborn.

A new difficulty has arisen to perplex the managers of Parisian theatres: all the firemen have been taken for active service.

A new opera buffa, by Signor Usiglio (La Scommessa), the libretto by Signor B. Prado, has been successful at the Principe Umberto Theatre, Florence.

The Princess's Theatre will we understand, be opened under the direction of Mr. Boucicault. A new drama of Irish life (The Rapparee) is in rehearsal.

Letters from Paris say that the English, terrified by the "Marseillaise," have been practising the "Chant du Départ," and are coming home "in thousands."—U. or S.

As one of the results of the war La Revue et Gazette des Théâtres, a theatrical paper of more than forty years' standing, which was regularly published twice a week, has announced that for some time to come it will appear once a week only.

A son of Tamburini has committed suicide, having sustained heavy losses on the Bourse, where he held the responsible position of an agent de change. The whole of Tamburini's fortune is said to have been involved in the speculations which brought about this catastrophe.

The Empress has been putting the Crown Diamonds to rights in view of "eventualities." We are sorry for the distress of a beautiful woman; but if "eventualities" force her to reside at Sevenoaks, she will find Love in a Village more satisfactory than Les Diamans de la Couronne.—U. or S.

As Madame Patti (Marquise de Caux) was unable to go to Homburg on account of the war, the committee of the Birmingham Musical Festival offered her an engagement, but the terms asked for the prima donna being 200*l.* for each time of singing, which for eight performances would amount to 1,600*l.*, the negotiation came promptly to an end.

Che cosa è il Guglielmo Tell per chi non conosce la rivoluzione Elvetica, domanda l'eco dell' avvenire (come egli si batterzy). Che cosa sono gli Ugonotti per chi non conosce la strage di San Bartolomeo? —Glielo diremo noi: è musica così potente da far capire anche senza le parole che cosa sia la rivoluzione Elvetica o la strage di San Bartolomeo a coloro per i quali l'eco non vorrebbe fosse fatta la musica!

The Melbourne Argus of June 18 states that the principal event in theatrical circles for some time had been the début of Mrs. Charles Mathews. Mrs. Mathews appeared as Harriet Routh, in Black Sheep, and met with a very kindly reception. Subsequently Mrs. Mathews performed as Medea, in the burlesque of The Golden Fleece, and Mr. and Mrs. Mathews brought the season to a close on Friday, the 3rd of June with the performance of London Assurance. At the end of the entertainment Mr. Mathews made a speech.

We read the following in Watson's Art Journal (U. S.):—

"The world-renowned cantatrice and traveller of every clime, Madame Anna Bishop, visits Canada with a view of giving out-door concerts in the Horticultural Gardens, Toronto, as well as at Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa, and Halifax. The first performance was to take place at Toronto on the 26th ult. Madame Bishop is accompanied by some leading artists from New York."

We have been requested to State that the British Hospital for Diseases of the Skin, which for many years has maintained a crowded out-patient department at No. 56, Great Marlborough Street, Regent Street, and more recently another of equal extent at No. 13A, Finsbury Square, has lately been anonymously presented with a £1,000 Bank of England note. The committee of management have devoted this addition to their resources to the purchase of the lease of their premises in Great Marlborough Street and to the establishment of an in-patient department, which is much needed for the proper treatment of the severer cases of disease that are daily applying for relief. But the sum so generously placed at their disposal, large as it is, falls far below what is necessary for the maintenance of the in-patients whom they will shortly be ready to receive. They hope, however, by the aid of further contributions, to be enabled to utilise in the manner proposed the munificent gift that has been entrusted to them. For those who may desire to aid so meritorious a work we may state that contributions of one shilling and upwards in stamps, or by post-office order or cheques, forwarded to Mr. Alexander Rivington, the hon. sec., at No. 56, Great Marlborough Street, will be thankfully acknowledged by him.

In the patriotic demonstrations recently made in Paris by means of song, the "Marseillaise" has commonly been supplemented with the "Rhin Allemand" of Alfred de Musset. The poem was written as an answer to a German Rhenish song by Herr Becker, and its force cannot be appreciated without a knowledge of the previous effusion. We therefore give the words of Herr Becker, which originally appeared in the Rheinisches Jahrbuch for the year 1841:—

Sie sollen ihn nicht haben Den freien deutschen Rhein; Ob sie, wie gier'ge Raben, Sich heiser danach schrein.	So lang sich' hehe Dome In seinem Spiegel sehn! Sie sollen ihn nicht haben Den freien deutschen Rhein, So lang dort kühne Knaben Um schlanke Dirnen frein.
So lang' er ruhig wallend Sein grünes Kleid noch trägt, So lang'ein Ruder schallend In seinen Wogen schlägt!	So lang' die Flüsse hebet Ein Fisch in seinem Grund; So lang' ein Lied noch lebet In seiner Sänger Mund.
Sie sollen ihn nicht haben! Den freien deutschen Rhein, So lang' sich Herzen laben An seinem Feuerwein.	Sie sollen ihn nicht haben Den freien deut-schen Rhein, Bis seine Fluth begraben Den letzten Mann gethan.
So lang' in seinem Strome Noch fest die Felsen stehn,	So lang' in seinem Strome Noch fest die Felsen stehn,

This song has been made known to the French through a prose translation, in the Poésies Nouvelles (1836-52) of Alfred de Musset, and we may conclude that de Musset read the German original, from the fact that the six stanzas, in which he replies to Becker's seven, overlook the stanza omitted in the prose version. This is "Le Rhin Allemand," written in February, 1841:—

"Nous l'avons eu, votre Rhin Allemand,
Il a tenu dans notre verre
Un couplet qu'on a su va chantant,
Effacé-t-il le trace altière
Du pied de nos chevaux marqué dans votre sang?

Nous l'avons eu, votre Rhin Allemand,
Son sein porte une plaie ouverte,
Du jour où Condé triomphant
A déchiré sa robe verte.
Oh ! près s passé, passera bien l'enfant.

Nous l'avons eu, votre Rhin Allemand,
Que faisaient vos vertes germaines,
Quand notre César, tout puissant,
De son ombre couvrait vos plaines ?
Oh donc est-il tombé ce dernier ossement ?

Nous l'avons eu, votre Rhin Allemand,
Si vous oubliez votre histoire,
Vos jeunes filles, sûrement,
Ont mieux gardé notre mémoire ;
Elles nous ont versé votre petit vin blanc.

S'il est à vous, votre Rhin Allemand,
Laves-y donc votre lèvres ;
Mais parlez-en moins fièrement.
Combien, au jour de la curée,
Êtes-vous de corbeaux contre l'aigle expirant ?

Qu'il coule en paix, votre Rhin Allemand,
Que vos cathédrales gothiques
S'y reflètent modestement ;
Mais craignez que vos airs bachiques
Ne réveillent les morts de leur repos sanglant."

The song of the German, by no means celebrated in Germany, is better than that of the Frenchman, very celebrated in France. The bluffness of the one expresses a national sentiment more directly than the smartness of the other. Had an arbiter in the days of Theocritus pronounced sentence in the case of "Becker v. de Musset," he would have awarded a quart of the best beer to the Teuton, and a bottle of cheap champagne to the Gaul.

The sketch of Michael Kelly, who knew Mozart—nye Dwight's Journal of Music—strangely omits to mention that very interesting book of Reminiscences, published in his later days, and even reprinted in this country many years ago. Copies are rare, but it is well worth reading. [A reprint of this interesting book will shortly be commenced in the Musical World.—ED.]

The following is extracted from a private letter:—

"Mdlle. Emilie Tate's tour in Germany has been discontinued in consequence of the war. At Ems the young pianist was favourably received by the King. Thence she proceeded to Wiesbaden, but the war put a stop to absolutely, although the theatre was kept open by "command;" the receipts on one occasion amounting to three thalers! At a concert and performance given at the theatre on the 13th. Mdlle. Emilie Tate played Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso—a Spinnlied, by Liliell, a fantasia on I Lombardi, and 'Gott erhalte den König," with variations. She was recalled after each. Since then the fingers of the young pianist have been exclusively employed in manufacturing charpie (lint) for the wounded. Mdlle. Tate leaves shortly for Brussels."

The Paris American Register says:—

"Miss Minnie Hauck, the American artist of whom we have already spoken in our columns, has been gaining repeated and brilliant success before critical and appreciative audiences in Vienna. She made her first appearance on the 6th of May, in the rôle of Marguerite in Gounod's Faust. Her youth, her graceful acting, added to the extreme power and richness of her voice, at once enlisted the sympathies of the entire house, and confirmed the opinion we had already formed, that her artistic career is certain to be a series of successes. The clearness of her low notes surprises and captivates the hearers. The German press was unanimous in predicting for our fair countrywoman a high, if not higher, reputation than that obtained by Sontag. Miss Minnie Hauck's subsequent Zerlina in the opera of Don Juan, represented on the 20th of May, before an overflowing house, was most enthusiastically applauded. Rarely, if ever, were the musical lovers of Vienna favoured with such a thorough artistic impersonation of Zerlina. Miss Hauck's acting is full of originality and elegance. Her delineations show deep study; and yet, withal, she preserves intact that youthful freshness which appeals so strongly to the spectator. Her Marguerite had raised expectations that were fully, we may indeed say, more than realised, by the immense powers that she puts forth in Zerlina. As an operatic vocalist, Miss Minnie Hauck is evidently called on to fill a high position; and we are but too happy to be afforded an opportunity of congratulating her on her recent success in Vienna, thus according our meed of praise to American talent, as so well represented by this lady."

"This song has the rare merit of combining within itself a triple inducement for its selection, viz.: good poetry, a graceful melody, and an exceedingly well written accompaniment; success equally rewarding the poet and the composer; for while the numbers of the former are vitalized by the true spirit of the lyric muse, they are embodied by the latter in a tuneful melody, and clothed by him with an accompaniment full of grace and fancy well worthy of the favourable recognition of the true lovers of musical art."—Midland Counties Herald.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

HEREFORD, Aug. 26.

The fragments left by Mendelssohn of his third oratorio, Christus, the plan of which he had not only contemplated but actually sketched out, gave unusual interest to yesterday's performance in the Cathedral. The non-completion of Christus, among the losses occasioned by the early death of Mendelssohn, is unquestionably the greatest. What he had done as a composer of sacred music warrants implicit belief that Christus would have turned out a masterpiece—something beyond Elijah, just as Elijah was something beyond St. Paul. Mendelssohn was never content to stand still, but, like Beethoven, was always progressing; and no composer of whom the records of art make mention had a fairer right than he to claim "Excelsior" for his motto. His own conviction that in writing Christus he was engaged upon what would eventually become his very greatest work met with unanimous assent, not merely from those who knew him personally but from those who knew him only, or principally, through his works. What we have got of it, little as that may be, is, we may reasonably presume, all he left absolutely finished. We have more than enough, however, to justify the assent referred to. There exist, as musical readers need scarcely be told, two unfinished scenes of very considerable extent. The first was to be included in the opening, the second in the closing part of the oratorio. The first bears reference to the nativity of Christ, the second chiefly to His persecution by the Jews and arraignment before Pilate. The first fragment begins with a recitative for soprano voice, "What Jesus our Lord was born in Bethlehem," in which is announced the advent of the wise men to Bethlehem. The recitative leads to a trio, "Say, where is He born, the King of Judea?"—in which the wise men declare they come to worship Him whose star they have beheld. To the trio succeeds a chorus, "There shall a star from Jacob come forth," terminating with a chorale, "As bright the star of morning gleams," construeted upon one of the most beautiful of the Lutheran tunes, and harmonized in Mendelssohn's own individual and engaging manner. The last division of recitative and air is taken from Matthew, that of the chorus partly from Numbers and partly from the Psalms. The general character of the whole is that of gentle and devotional loveliness, only modified at the announcement that a sceptre of Israel will rise up, "and dash in pieces princes and nations." The resumption of the first theme, however, restores the original tone of peacefulness and hope; while the mission of Jesus to bring salvation is proclaimed in the chorale which terminates the whole. The trio of the wise men, with its accompaniment of viola and violoncello, is one of the most soothing and charming pieces of vocal music imaginable, and though much shorter, and entirely without pretension, is, in its way, quite equal to the chorus, than which Mendelssohn has written nothing more pure, nothing more finished and masterly.

The other fragment, relating exclusively to recitatives and choruses represents the trial of Jesus before Pilate, and His ultimate sacrifice, at the furious instigation of the Jews. The text is derived from the Gospels of Luke and John. To the solo voice (a tenor) is allotted, in recitative, the narration of the story as it progresses, as well as the connecting words of the unwilling Pilate. The choruses, five in number, are thus knit together, and as, until the last, they never come to a full cadence, the whole forms one uninterrupted scene. They are all brief and declamatory, and all express the feelings and desires of the turbulent and exasperated multitude. In the first the Saviour is arraigned for refusing tribute to Cæsar and for proclaiming himself King of Israel and "The Christ;" in the second he is accused of false teaching among the Jews; in the third the multitude insist that Barabbas shall be saved and Jesus be delivered up; in the fourth the fury of His calumniators having reached the highest pitch, they exclaim in wild and savage accents, "Crucify Him! Crucify Him;" in the fifth, Pilate consenting, they insist that having proclaimed himself "Son of God," he has violated the sacred law, and by that law must suffer. The admirable and forcible way in which the whole of this is musically expressed—and, doubtless, what we have here briefly described forms merely a portion of that which was intended as the great scene of the oratorio—more than anything else makes us feel what an irreparable loss the musical art has sustained. In addition to the foregoing there is a chorus, "Daughters of Zion, weep for yourselves and your children," which follows immediately upon Pilate's delivering up Jesus to be crucified, and descriptive of the feelings of a multitude of ladies who follow Him to Golgotha —one of the most plaintive and touching pieces of choral music that even Mendelssohn, who in this particular style had no superior, ever composed. There is lastly a chorale, "He leaves His heavenly portals," another Lutheran tune elaborately harmonized, but having no apparent connection with anything that has preceded it. These fragments were composed by Mendelssohn to the Lutheran translation of the Bible, and the task of preparing the English version was confided to Mr. W. Bartholomew, to whom we are also indebted for the English Elijah.

The performance of the music of Christus, under Mr. Townshend Smith's direction was far the most part very good—in some cases, as, for instance, the chorus, "There shall a star from Jacob," beyond reproach. The tenor solo recitatives were assigned to Mr. Montem Smith, who is an excellent musician, and therefore competent to do him justice.

The setting of the 42nd Psalm, "As the hart pants after the water brooks," perhaps the most perfect example which Mendelssohn has left of this form of sacred music, was by no means so uniformly well executed; although Mdlle. Tietjens, whose labours during the week have been incessant, gave the air, "My soul thirsteth for God" (oboe obbligato, Mr. Crosier), with genuine feeling; while the quintet, "The Lord hath commanded," in which the accomplished lady was well supported by Messrs. M. Smith, Herbert, Swire, and Everett, could scarcely have been better rendered. The chorus which afforded most unequivocal satisfaction was the opening one, "As the hart pants;" that which was least to be commended was the final one, "Trust thou in God"—the former among the loveliest, the latter among the most elaborate and ingenious Mendelssohn has written. Of Dr. Henry Holmes's sacred cantata, Praise the Lord, set to the poetry of Dr. Watts, we may speak on another occasion. Enough at present that, while a composition of little or no pretension, it is the work of a real musician, and exhibits more than one trait of merit. Easy to execute, it offered no trouble to the chorus; while the solos, being entrusted to Miss Edith Wynne, were, it need hardly be stated, as well sung as they could well be. A selection from Handel's English oratorios, commencing with the overture to Esther (in first), comprising "What though I trace" (Madame Patey), and the double chorus, "From the ocean," from Solomon (his 15th), "Farewell ye limpid streams" (Mdlle. Tietjens), "Deeper and deeper still" (Mr. Vernon Rigby), and the chorus, "When his loud voice," from Jephtha (his last), "Pious orgies" (Miss Edith Wynne), "Arm, arm, ye brave" (Mr. Santley), "From mighty kings" (Mdlle. Tietjens), "Sound an Alarm" (Mr. V. Rigby), "Wise men flattering" (Madame Sinico), together with the choruses, "O Father whose Almighty power," and "We never, never will bow down," from Judas Maccabæus (his 12th), and terminating with the Coronation Anthem "Zadok the Priest," brought this extremely long, however judiciously varied, selection to an end.

That the largest attendance during the Festival was attracted to the Cathedral this day by the Messiah, and which was given unmutilated in which all the principal singers took part, need hardly be said, nor will it be doubted that the largest donation accruing to the charity was due to the same never-failing source. But of this, of the second miscellaneous concerts, and of other matters connected with the success, financial and artistic, of the Festival we must defer speaking.

SATURDAY, Aug. 27.

What remains to be said about the 147th Meeting of the Three Choirs need not occupy much space. The second miscellaneous concert in the Shire Hall was far more numerously attended than the first. Nevertheless, the programme consisted almost exclusively of familiar pieces, to speak of which in order and detail would be superfluous. The most interesting feature was a selection from the Nozze di Figaro of Mozart, in which Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Sinico, Miss Edith Wynne, Messrs. Montem Smith, Lewis Thomas, and Santley took part. This included the quartet—of all comic orchestral dramatic pieces the raciest, most animated, and best; the duet, "Crudel perchè finora?" (Madame Sinico and Mr. Santley); the recitative and air, "Dove Sono" (Mdlle. Tietjens); Figaro's air, "Non più andrai" (Mr. Santley); the duet, "Sull' aria" (Madame Sinico and Mdlle. Tietjens); the cantuet of canzonets, "Voi che sapete" (Miss Edith Wynne); Susanna's last air "Deh vieni non tardar" (Madame Sinico); and the stirring and admirable finale, in which, thanks to the plot contrived by the Countess and Susanna, the intriguing Count is brought to his senses, and everything satisfactorily cleared up. The whole of this melodious and thoroughly dramatic music seemed to please; everything was applauded, and both "Crudel! perchè" and "Sull aria" were re-demanded—compliance with the latter only, by Madame Sinico and Mr. Santley, in the first instance, but politely refused, by the same lady and Mdlle. Tietjens, in the last. The orchestra also played the overtures to Oberon and Semiramide, the last especially with such spirit that the audience would willingly have listened to it again, had not the length of the programme made it incumbent on Mr. Townshend Smith to be deaf to such indulgences. Mdlle. Tietjens added the great scene from Oberon, "Ocean, thou mighty monster;" and this made up the sum total of the "classical" element of the programme.

The remainder calls for no particular notice, unless it be a word in recognition of Miss Edith Wynne's delivery of S. Lover's "Angel's whisper"—as perfect an example of unaffected ballad-singing as could well be heard, and amply meriting the unanimous encore it obtained. At the end of the concert, according to invariable custom, the National

Digitized by Google

Anthem was performed—Miss Edith Wynne again giving the first verse as a solo.

The Messiah, with Mozart's additional accompaniments, now happily inseparable from the masterpiece of sacred masterpieces, was, as of old, the last performance in the Cathedral, and also, as of old, by many degrees the best. The choral portions more particularly, the choruses of the Messiah being as familiar as household words to all our provincial choral societies were almost without exception worthy of praise. When it is added that the solo parts were undertaken by Mdlle. Tietjens and Miss Edith Wynne (sopranos), Madame Patey-Whytock and Miss Marion Severn (contraltos), Mr. Vernon Rigby (tenor), Messrs. Santley and Lewis Thomas (basses), Mr. Montem Smith being associated with Miss Severn in "O death where is thy sting?" and Mr. T. Harper accompanying Mr. Lewis Thomas in "The trumpet shall sound," all has been said that need be said to convince musical readers that the execution generally was no less good in this equally important department. The audience rose to their feet and remained standing in the accustomed places—a practice made respectable by tradition, when the overpowering "Hallelujah" is going on, but elsewhere, it may be suggested, "more honoured in the breach than in the observance."

The last musical performance of the Festival was the evening "Chamber Concert," which it has now for some time been the custom to hold at the College-hall, connected with the Cathedral. There was a fair attendance of genuine amateurs at this entertainment, and they were rewarded by a varied and excellent programme. The first piece was Spohr's too rarely heard Sestet in C major, for string instruments, assigned to Messrs. H. Blagrove and Clementi (violins), R. Blagrove and S. Webb (violas), Pettit and Aylward (violoncellos); the last was Mendelssohn's well-known Octet in E flat, allotted to the same artists, with the addition of Messrs. Ralph and Rendle, to fill up the necessary complement of violins. Between the Sestet and Octet came Mr. J. Lodge Ellerton's tenth string quartet (in F), played by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and Pettit. Both the music selected and the manner of its performance afforded unequivocal satisfaction. Songs from Spohr and Handel, respectively given by Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Montem Smith, who also sang together a duet, the accompanist in each instance being Mr. Townshend Smith, enriched the programme and at the same time gave relief to the instrumental music.

The customary full-dress ball, which occurred at the Shire Hall, after the Chamber Concert, did not seem to exercise the same attraction as on previous occasions, and was, indeed, scarcely half so well attended as that of 1867. Several explanations have been given of this falling off, but none of them of sufficient interest to cite or to discuss.

Notwithstanding the unceasing prevalence of fine weather, morning and evening, it will be seen by the subjoined table that the attendance at the meeting in 1867 was considerably in excess of that of the meeting just terminated:—

And this without taking into account the miscellaneous concert at the Shire Hall on the Tuesday of the Festival in 1867, which would increase the excess in its favour by some hundreds, but which, for reasons not immediately evident, is passed over in the above statement. The collections for the charity at the doors of the Cathedral were as below:—

To the foregoing have yet to be added the usual contributions from Worcester and Gloucester, together with other independent donations, which seldom fail to come in at the eleventh hour, and which, it is to be hoped, may be forthcoming on the present occasion, as otherwise the Fund for the Widows and Orphans will hardly be benefited to the extent that might reasonably be anticipated under the circumstances. In conclusion, it is only fair to say that everything which could possibly be done on behalf of the Festival in his department has been done, and thoroughly done, by Mr. Townshend Smith for the meeting just over; but that Mr. Smith has hardly met with the full encouragement and support from certain influential quarters he had a just right to expect.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Times.")

Birmingham, Aug. 30.

This greatest of Provincial Festivals was "inaugurated" to-day in the Town Hall with a very remarkable performance of Elijah. What Elijah has been to Birmingham, and what the Birmingham people think of Elijah, need not be insisted upon again. Enough that the glory shed over the Festival of 1846, for which the sacred masterpiece of Mendelssohn was expressly written, and at which, in the Town Hall, on the morning of August 26, under the composer's own direction, it was first performed, is still vividly remembered. Since that time Elijah has been produced at each successive triennial meeting—a proof, if any were required, of the ever-increasing estimation in which it is held. Mendelssohn only lived to conduct his great work at one Festival. From the Festival of 1849 to that of 1867 its performance has been directed by Sir Michael Costa, who, when Mr. Costa, in the first named year, was appointed to the long-forgotten triumph of 1855, at least, so far as chorus and orchestra were concerned, came as near to it as possible. Sir Michael Costa was in his happiest mood; the time of every piece, from beginning to end, was precisely what it ought to be, and scarcely a necessary example of that "light and shade," the nice observance of which adds to the charm of even the most favourite music, was overlooked. The overture, which gives illustrative expression to the feelings of the people under the terrible curse of drought, prophetically announced by Elijah, was played with extraordinary fire, and led into the first chorus, "Help, Lord!" in which the afflicted multitude supplicates for mercy, with grand effect. The chorus itself has never been more finely sung, nor the impressive climax more impressively attained. Equally deserving notice was the next great chorus, "Yet doth the Lord see it not;" with its solemn chorale, "For He, the Lord our God, harmonized in Mendelssohn's most individual manner, and its noble aspiring peroration, "His mercies on thousands fall." In a very different style, the melodious "Blessed are the men that fear Him," which demands much sentiment and delicacy from the singers as the others require vigorous force and emphasis, was just as fortunate in the result; and hearty acknowledgment is due to the orchestra for the manner in which the rich and elaborate accompaniments were played; nothing, indeed, could have been better. The superb scene, when at the instigation of Elijah, the idolatrous priests sacrifice to Baal, and, in presence of "the whole of Israel," at Mount Carmel, call upon him thrice successively and in vain, to heed and consume their offering, Elijah mocking them the while, with words of scornful irony, merited unqualified praise. Each of the three choruses, "Baal, we cry to thee," "Hear our cry, O Baal," and "Hear and answer, Baal," was singularly well delivered—the second part of the first ("Here mighty God!") where the many-voiced unison of the singers is contrasted with an orchestral accompaniment in itself a marvel of contrivance, perhaps best of all. The culminating point of this scene, when, after Elijah's invocation to the true God, "the fire descends from heaven," and to the abashment of the prophets who feast at Jezebel's table, consumes the offering, was worthy the event. But all that has been described must yield to the last scene of Part I., when, at the intercession of the thirsty and famished multitude, Elijah sends out a youth towards the sea, to look for any signs there may be of rain—once, twice, thrice to no purpose, till, at length, the innumerable faith of the prophet in God's mercifulness meets with its reward in the opening of the heavens and the flooding of the land. This, from first to last, was admirably done—the chorus, "Thanks be to God, He laveth the thirsty land," which is its magnificent climax, most admirably of all. Here, indeed, was a theme to inspire a composer, more especially a composer so sensitive, and, at the same time so imaginative, as Mendelssohn—a composer gifted to invent the heartfelt melody to which the people pray ("Open the Heavens and send us relief"), the wonderfully suggestive recitative, where the various instruments come in, one after the other, as the storm approaches nearer and nearer, with an effect so picturesque and at the same time, so thoroughly appropriate; and last, not least, the final chorus already named which, astonishing throughout, contains a passage of modulation, beginning upon the words, "But the Lord is above them and Almighty," in sublime grandeur and, let it be added, intense earnestness, never surpassed if ever equalled. And after this, to wind up the whole with a peroration waxing in power as it progresses, and leading step by step to a climax of almost unparalleled magnificence, betokened in him who was able to accomplish it a genius second to none. It is alone worthy a journey, from no matter how great a distance, to hear "Thanks be to God" at a Birmingham Festival. There is, in fact, nothing that we know of to compare with it.

The choruses in the second part of Elijah are not a whit less interesting than those in the first, though, of course, no chance was afforded the composer for precisely such another as "Thanks be to God." Only but for it, "Be not afraid," with its jubilant opening strains, and its well-contrasted minor episode, "Though thousands languish and fall beside thee," might be classed with any modern chorus and bear away the palm; while "Woe to him, he shall perish"—fitting period to the wonderfully dramatic scene in which Jezebel urges on the already exasperated multitude to destroy Elijah—would, as, of its order, it does, in fact, stand quite alone. In grandeur and exquisite tunefulness "He watching over Israel," peroration to the unaccompanied trio of angels, "Lift thine eyes to the mountains," may pair off with "Blessed are the men" (Part I.), and worthy to consort with either or both is "He that shall endure to the end shall be saved"—one of the chastest and most consummate examples of vocal part-writing in existence. Of "Behold! God the Lord passed by," with the mighty wind, the earthquake, the fire, and the "still small voice," in which last "Onward came the Lord," a poem of itself, with beginning, middle, and end, not one word need be added to what has been said over and over again—that it is one of the most striking, picturesque, and original among the choruses from the same pen to which those epithets most characteristically apply. The glorious "Sanctus" ("Holy, holy, holy is God the Lord—the Lord of Sabaoth"), in which the harmonies reaches, without apparent effort, the sublime, and the splendid choral description of Elijah's departure in a fiery chariot with fiery horses ("Then did Elijah the prophet break forth like a fire), complete the noble series of choruses which belong to the oratorio in its genuine character of a sacred biblical drama; all that follows, up to the concluding chorus, "And then shall your light break forth, though comparatively of equal value, is reflective and didactic. Many think that Elijah should have ended with the translation of the Prophet, just as Messiah should end with "Hallelujah;" but it is more than probable that Mendelssohn, like his illustrious predecessor, knew very well what he intended, and composed the last few pieces, solo and choral (including, by the way, the beautiful tenor air, "Then shall the righteous shine forth"), simply because he thought his oratorio would not be complete without them.

What has been said about the execution of the choruses in Part I. may with as strict justice apply to Part II. The Birmingham principal singers—not for the first time when engaged on the same task of love, for when they are dealing with Elijah it is nothing less—covered themselves with glory; and those who are in the habit of listening frequently to choral performances of the same kind in London and near about London are likely to be the very foremost in recognising this net to be disputed fact. With regard to the solo singers it will suffice to enumerate them by name. The chief soprano in Part I. was Madame Leumens-Sherrington, in Part II. it was Mdlle. Tietjens; the chief contralto in Part I. was Madame Patey-Whytock; in Part II., Mdlle. Drasdil; the chief tenor in Part I. was Mr. Vernon Rigby; in Part II. Mr. Sims Reeves; to Mr. Santley the whole of Elijah's music was, as on previous occasions, allotted. On the whole, the contralto music excepted, the second part of the oratorio must be allowed to have had considerably the best of it. What particular pieces were undertaken by each of those well-known artists, and in what manner they were respectively sung, may be easily guessed. Criticism is happily not called for. In paying a last tribute to the choral performance of Elijah we have merely recorded prominence to that feature of the Birmingham Festival which, while the Birmingham Festival endures, must ever invest it with a peculiar interest—an interest, indeed, apart. Elijah was composed for Birmingham; and Birmingham, justly proud of it, can in no way more honourably give expression to its pride than through the medium of performances of which the one of to-day may fairly be accepted as an example. The great singers, native and foreign, from London and elsewhere, doubtless contribute no little to the general effect; but on this particular occasion, which occurs but once in three years, and has only occurred nine times in 21 years, they may be reasonably counted as lookers on, not less edified by the display of local enthusiasm (and local efficiency) than any among the audience.

Previous to the oratorio the National Anthem was sung by the chorus, in a style at once effective and impressive.

As the programme of the Festival week has already been described, it is unnecessary to refer to it again here. It will suffice to say that on no previous occasion have the Festival Committee shown a more urgent desire to sustain the reputation of Birmingham, whether for the efficient execution of acknowledged masterpieces, or for the production of novelties of interest. At the first miscellaneous concert to-night a new cantata, called Paradise and the Peri, by Mr. John Francis Barnett, whose Ancient Mariner was so successful at the Festival of 1857, occupies the whole of Part I. The oratorio for to-morrow is Sir Michael Costa's Naaman.

The official statement subjoined shows that the audience to-day was larger and the consequent pecuniary results more considerable, and has been known for many Festivals on a first day:—

WEDNESDAY, Aug. 31.

The first of the advertised novelties was produced at the Miscellaneous Concert yesterday evening, when the Town Hall was again crowded in every part. The day, indeed, was one of the most brilliantly successful in the records of the Birmingham music meetings, more than £4,300 having been taken for the two performances. It is to be hoped, for the sake of the General Hospital, one of the most valuable institutions of its kind in the country, that the Festival may progress as it has begun.

The new cantata of Mr. John Francis Barnett occupied the entire first part of the programme. The clever young musician has treated Moore's Paradise and the Peri much in the same style as he has treated Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, which met with so highly favourable a reception at the meeting of 1867. His music is light, fluent, and pretty throughout, often graceful, not seldom ingenious, rather than clever, and, above all, unpretending. The melodies are, with rare exceptions, short and ad captandum, easy for the singers to sing and as easy for the hearers to catch as they are sung. The vocal part-writing is studiously plain and simple, with few attempts (if any, in fact) at what is understood by musicians as "strict counterpoint." This is especially noticeable in the choruses, which have all a certain character of their own, are all more or less effective, and all run on as smoothly and without impediment as though the singers were extemporizing them on the spot with the facility of practised improvisors—as fair examples of plain-sailing vocal harmony as could readily be cited. It is this straightforward easy-going which forms a prominent characteristic of Mr. Barnett's music, and will always make it popular among singers who like entertaining themselves and their friends at a comparatively small expenditure of pains. The young composer, doubtless, writes advisedly after this fashion; and as he seldom fails to hit the contemplated mark, his claim to be regarded as one thoroughly master of his means, admits of no question. If Mr. Barnett, weighing him by such works of his as are known, does not think very deeply, he, at any rate, thinks with healthy independence, for himself—which can hardly be said of some composers, who, aiming much higher, yet, like the Irish candidate at the election, "notwithstanding all they have promised, perform still less." That we find occasional unconscious reminiscences of other composers is true; but what is more immediately referred to is Mr. Barnett's general style and method of composing. In his handling of the orchestra Mr. Barnett, as has been more than once remarked, exhibits both a knowledge of the capacities of the various instruments and considerable facility in putting his experience to the test. Though not remarkable for great variety of colour, his instrumentation is always satisfactory to the ear, always "safe," it may be said, no haphazard experiments at any time imperilling its easy, natural course.

A detailed analysis of Paradise and the Peri, piece by piece—and in all there are no less than four-and-twenty numbers—would take up a much larger amount of space than can be devoted to the subject. Nor, happily, is it on any account imperatively called for. About the comparative merits of Paradise and the Peri and the Ancient Mariner, its predecessor, opinions seem to differ, some preferring one, some the other. Nevertheless, that Mr. Barnett has illustrated the fanciful poem of Moore with a success greater and more genuine than that which he was able to achieve when engaged upon the wild and imaginative metrical romance of Coleridge may, probably, in the end, be unanimously admitted. Robert Schumann, on the contrary, who also set Paradise and the Peri in the same form of cantata—or as he termed it, "secular oratorio"—would have been far more at home with the Ancient Mariner, to which his morbid temperament was peculiarly congenial. There are not a few by the way, who will be tolerably sure to maintain that the mere fact of Schumann's having already used the poem should have deterred our English composer from laying hold of it for similar purposes; but then the same objection would hold with reference to Professor Sterndale Bennett, whose "programme-overture" on the same theme is one of the most finished and beautiful of modern orchestral pieces. Mr. Barnett, however, may answer, with just pride, that there is nothing whatever in his Paradise and the Peri which owes its origin to one or to the other—to Schumann or to Bennett. He might also summon precedent in his defence. When Rossini composed the Barbiere di Siviglia the Italian libretto founded upon Beaumarchais had already been wedded to music by the famous Paesiello, whose Barbiere at the time was a recognised masterpiece; and this is by no means a solitary instance to the point.

If Mr. Barnett was not content with the performance of his new work, by orchestra, chorus, and "principals," and the manner in which it was received by an audience considerably more than 2,000 in number, it must be difficult to please. His solo singers were Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby and Signor Foli, who all did their very best, and whose zealous endeavours were rewarded with proportionate success. The applause was frequent and hearty. Three pieces were encored and repeated, a tenor air, "Oh! if there be on this earthly sphere" (Mr. Vernon Rigby), a bass air, "Blest tears of soul-felt penitence" (Signor Foli), and an unaccompanied quartet, "She wept; the sir grew pure" (by the four singers above named); while several others—among the rest an air for contralto, "Nymph of a fair but erring line" (Madame Patey), and a soprano air, "Joy, joy, for ever!" (Mdlle. Tietjens), with chorus, which brings the cantata to a termination, excited the liveliest impression. At the end the applause, in which the members of the band and chorus joined the audience, was loud and prolonged, and Mr. Barnett (who had himself directed the performance), after retiring from the platform, was unanimously called back to receive fresh tokens of general approbation.

The second part of the concert, which began with the overture to Der Freischütz and ended with the overture to Zampa, included Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto No. 1, played by Madame Arabella Goddard, and a selection of vocal pieces, contributed by Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, Mdlle. Drasdil, Signor Foli, Messrs. Cummings and Sims Reeves. The vocal selection, gathered from Mozart, Bishop, Donizetti, Costa, Ambroise Thomas, Sullivan' Benedict, Randegger, and Lemmens, though evidently to the taste of the audience, calls for no especial remark. It was nearly midnight before the concert ended.

How thoroughly successful it was may be gathered from the official statement of attendance and receipts.

About the remarkably fine execution to-day of Sir Michael Costa's second and best oratorio, Naaman, and the cordial enthusiasm which greeted the renowned conductor both before and after the performance, we must speak to-morrow. At present it is enough to add that the solo parts were allotted to Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Miss Edith Wynne (sopranos), Madame Patey and Mdlle. Drasdil (contraltos), Messrs. Cummings and Sims Reeves (tenors), and Mr. Santley (bass)—all of whom showed their sympathy and esteem for the renowned conductor by striving their utmost to give the best possible effect to the music. How their efforts were seconded and supported by the orchestra and chorus, with whom Sir Michael Costa is so justly popular, may readily be imagined.

Two novelties will be produced at the second miscellaneous concert to-night—an Ode to Shakspere, set to music by Professor R. P. Stewart, of Dublin, and an overture, entitled Ouverture di Ballo, by Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan. The second part of the concert is entirely devoted to music, vocal and instrumental, by Beethoven. The oratorio for to-morrow is the Messiah; that for Friday is to be Mr. Benedict's St. Peter, the first production of which is looked forward to as the crowning event of the present Festival, for which it was expressly composed.

Among the audience to-day were observed:—The President, the Earl of Bradford; the Mayor of Birmingham and party; Lady Every, Lady Theodosia Clinton, Lady Grey de Wilton, Lady Ward and party; the Marchioness of Bristol, Sir R. N. C. Hamilton and party; Sir C. B. Adderley, M.P., the Misses Adderley, the Hon. and Rev. J. O. Bridgman, Mr. A. W. Peel, M.P., and party; Colonel Leslie, Major Willington, Captain Hartopp, Miss Theodosia Hincks and party; the Rev. F. Gooch, Mr. C. F. C. Colmore and party; Mr. C. M. Caldicott and party; Mr. W. C. Alston and party; Mr. and Mrs. Mainwaring, Mrs. Pitt, Mr. Robert Heath, and party; Mrs. Gammell and party.

We have been requested to state that the name of the Countess of Bradford was inadvertently included in the list of those present at the Festival on Tuesday. Her ladyship is not at present attending public festivities.

THURSDAY, Sept. 1.

That the execution of Naaman yesterday should not in all respects have been equal to that of 1864, when the oratorio was first presented at Birmingham, is easy to understand. Enthusiasm counts for much in the first public production of a new and elaborate work, especially when that work is from the pen of one so popular, and deservedly popular, as Sir Michael Costa. Moreover, an interval of six years is enough, in a measure, to efface from the memory what at one time may have laid fast hold upon it. This, it should be stated, has reference only to the members of the chorus, who were exclusively answerable for the slight points open to question—peculiar, the orchestra, rare exceptions allowed for, being all that was desirable, while the principal singers might fairly have challenged reproach. The performance generally, indeed, was so fine, that to animadvert upon such slight discrepancies as characterized it here and there would be simply hypercritical. On this occasion the President departed from the rule he had laid down for himself on the day previous, when the oratorio was Elijah. The melodious and bustling trio, "Haste to Samaria, let us go," for Adah, Tirzna, and Naaman (Miss Edith Wynne, Mdlle. Drasdil, and Mr. Sims Reeves), in Part I., the charmingly impressive chorus, "God, who cannot be unjust," and the spirited and already famous quartet, "Honour and glory," for Adah, Tirzna, Naaman, and Elisha (Miss Edith Wynne, Mdlle. Drasdil, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Santley), were all three asked for again by Lord Bradford. In the first and second instances his Lordship's signal, from the Patron's Gallery, met with due recognition, which was not the case, however, with the third, immediately after which Mr. Sims Reeves, under the circumstances, discreetly went on with the recitative: "O, man of God." Had the audience been also permitted to exercise their judgment, a repetition of various other pieces would, doubtless, have been suggested. Among these, if we are not mistaken, would have been, "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked," a chorus built upon a theme as tuneful as any in the oratorio; the trio, "The grass doth wither and the flowers decay" (Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Messrs. Cummings and Santley); Adah's air, "They shall be turned back" (Miss Edith Wynne); Elisha's air, "Lament not thus" (Mr. Santley); and lastly, the dream of the child, so soothing in its tranquil beauty, "I dreamt I was in Heaven" (Madame Patey)—all gems, and all given in rare perfection. Mr. Santley, whose task in Naaman is one of no ordinary responsibility, has never sung the music of Elisha with greater power of voice or more admirable earnestness of expression; while in the tenor air descriptive of the battle ("Invoking death") Mr. Sims Reeves was more than ever impressive, delivering the slow movement at the end, "Yet though success has crowned the strife," when Naaman, in the midst of victory, bewails the slain, and calls upon death to relieve him, with a depth of pathos not to be surpassed. Finer singing than this, combined as it was with fervid dramatic expression, has seldom been heard. Sir Michael Costa could scarcely have been otherwise than content with such an interpretation of the most striking passages in his work. One thing is certain—Naaman wears well, and is likely to endure. It belongs to a class of oratorio which can show legitimate claims to popularity; and it is at the same time one of the best of its class.

That the second miscellaneous concert, last night, was again a financial success, may be gathered from the subjoined official statement:—

The programme was varied, interesting, and, of course, long. The first part both began with a novelty and ended with a novelty. The first novelty was an Ode to Shakspere, written by Mr. Henry Toole, and set to music by Professor R. P. Stewart, Mus. Doc., the reigning king of Irish musicians, and one thoroughly well practised in his art. An ode to the "Bard of Avon" was, one might have thought, scarcely more needed in the present day than a fresh ode to Mæcenas; but Mr. Toole was evidently of another mind, and Hinc illæ lachrymæ—hence these strophes and antistrophes. That Mr. Toole, while apostrophizing Shakspere, could find nothing very new to say, is not to be wondered at. Here, however, is an example of his way of looking at the subject:—

> "His was the song:—'Ah more than earth divine!'
> A god-like spell is wrought by every line.
> Great Nature spread her treasures to his view,
> And Knowledge tended as each scene he drew.
> The locked-up secrets of man's wily heart
> He opened with the magic key of art;
> Showed him in naked majesty sublime,
> Upheld by virtue or debased by crime."

Ex uno disce omnes. Mr. Toole writes in this strain throughout. The music of Dr. Stewart is easier to grasp at once. It comprises seven pieces—an orchestral prelude, leading into a quartet with chorus ("Twine a wreath of deathless song"); a tenor solo, set to the words above quoted; a chorus ("Mirth and Music"); a soprano solo ("Sovereign King, I hail thee now"); a chorus which may be considered its pendent ("Hail, hail, hail! Master-spirit, hail!"); and lastly, a soprano solo, with chorus ("Glory of the sky-born quire"). These are its divisions. Though not remarkable for originality of invention, or even for sustained equality of style—Handel and Mendelssohn each apparently possessing a certain charm for Professor Stewart—there is merit, more or less, in every one of the pieces enumerated. They are all written with fluency, all well voiced, and all effectively scored for the orchestra. The second which there is little or nothing to say of them. The performance of the "Ode," directed by the composer himself, was exceedingly good. The orchestra and chorus took commendable pains, and the leading singers—Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdlle. Drasdil, and Mr. Vernon Rigby (who created a strong impression by his vigorous delivery of that part of the tenor solo commencing with the words, "Great Nature spread her treasures," &c.), and Signor Foli—left nothing to wish. The "Ode" was liberally applauded. The other overture in E flat major—the Ouverture di Ballo—by Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, was thoroughly successful, and well merited success. As the title implies, it is an overture built upon themes in dance rhythm. The first part is modelled on what both French and German (witness Schubert) style have donné noble; this leads to a lengthened movement in waltz measure, and the whole ends with a peroration after the fashion of a galop. The plan looks simple enough, but Mr. Sullivan, in finding suitable and effective themes, has also known how to mould them into such shape as warrants the title of "overture" being applied to his work. Thus, the second movement, in waltz-measure, is developed in legitimate form, with subject, counter-subject, and episode, each a striking melody and easily followed through the progress of development. Slight in structure as it may seem, the Ouverture di Ballo will add to its composer's reputation. The instrumentation for the orchestra is bright, ingenious, and full of fancy. Nothing could be more spirited than the performance, directed by the composer himself, and nothing heartier or more unanimous than the applause that followed and was kept on until Mr. Sullivan was compelled to return to the platform and bow.

The Ode and the Overture were separated by some vocal pieces, comprising a duet from Don Pasquale (Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. V. Rigby, a duet from La Gazza Ladra (Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Patey), and the brilliant cavatina, "O luce di quest' anima," brilliantly executed by Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, who is winning as many admirers in Birmingham as she is accustomed to win wherever she happens to sing. The rest of the concert was devoted to a selection from the works of Beethoven, in honour of the centenary of the birth of the greatest of all musicians. The programme is subjoined:—

Overture (Egmont)...	Beethoven.
Quartet, "Il cor, o la mia fe" (Fidelio) ...	Beethoven.
Recit. and air, "Ah! perfido"	Beethoven.
Concerto, Pianoforte—in E flat	Beethoven.

Trio, "Fia grata al ciel" (Fidelio)	Beethoven.
Song, "Adelaide" (with pianoforte accompaniment) ...	Beethoven.
Trio, "Tremate, empi, tremate"	Beethoven.
Air, "In questa tomba oscura"	Beethoven.
Finale (Fidelio)	Beethoven.

A better selection could not well have been made; and credit is due to Sir Michael Costa, who made it, and under whose vigorous direction the splendid overture to Egmont was so splendidly executed by the orchestra that the whole audience insisted upon having it repeated. There was no declining in this instance, and repeated it was. The melodious quartet, in canon, from Fidelio, was sung by Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Cummings, and Signor Foli, as might have been expected from such artists. In this divine piece the rugged and uncompromising Beethoven appears guileless and innocent as a child. About the pianoforte concerto the Birmingham Daily Post of this morning says:—

> "Madame Arabella Goddard's performance of Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto in E flat—the 'Emperor'—was the instrumental feature of this concert, as her playing of Mendelssohn's Munich concerto had been of Tuesday's concert. The interest it awakened was even greater than that evinced in the previous evening's selection, many of the audiences rising in their places, the better to view the fair pianist and witness the extraordinary mechanical dexterity which supplements and subserves her highly cultivated musical faculty. A finer performance of this noble work we may safely say has not been heard in Birmingham. Alike in the opening allegro, with its splendid octave passages for the pianoforte, and its captivating phrases for the accompanying wind instruments in the sublime adagio un poco mosso, in the accompaniment to which the bow instruments find such effective employment, and the concluding rondo, with its delicious melody and ingenious cadenzas, Madame Goddard displayed the most perfect mastery of her subject, as well in its spiritual as in its mechanical aspects. We need scarcely add that she was enthusiastically applauded on the conclusion of her task, which, in a merely physical sense, was no light one, as every musician is aware."

The manner in which the elaborate accompaniments to this concerto were played by the orchestra was worthy all praise. How Mdlle. Tietjens declaims and sings Leonora's great scene in the first act of Fidelio need not be described; enough that she threw her whole soul into it. The trio from the second act of the same opera was assigned to Madame Leumens-Sherrington, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli; the earlier trio, composed in 1801, before Beethoven became the Beethoven we know, and interesting on that account as well as on account of its own merit—to the same accomplished lady, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley. Mdlle. Drasdil undertook the well-known Tuscan air, which, according to Carpani, was the last of sixty-three settings of the same words, published together in a volume in 1808). In the magnificent finale to Fidelio, a fitting effective climax to the Beethoven selection, the solos were sustained by Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Signor Foli, Messrs. Rigby, Cummings, Smythson, and Santley. Finis coronet opus might appropriately apply to this.

To-day the Messiah exercised its customary attraction; and on this occasion there were no unreserved seats. The subjoined official statement will show the result:—

Of the performance of the "sacred oratorio," par excellence, it would be wholly superfluous to speak in detail. That with such a chorus, such an orchestra, such solo singers, and such a conductor, a work so universally familiar and so universally loved would be given with all practicable excellence might have been taken for granted. The solo music was thus distributed:—Soprano, in first and second parts, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington; in part three, Madame Tietjens; contralto, in first part, Madame Drasdil; in parts two and three, Madame Patey; tenor, in parts one and three, Mr. Cummings; in part two (the "Passion") Mr. Sims Reeves; bass, in parts one and two, Signor Foli; in part three, Mr. Santley (accompanied, by the way, by Mr. T. Harper in "The trumpet shall sound"). How the choruses were sung—and especially "For unto us a child is born," "Hallelujah," and "Worthy is the Lamb" (to single out the noblest of them all)—need not be said.

The prominent feature of the third and last miscellaneous concert to-night is to be Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's new cantata, entitled Nala and Damayanti, composed expressly for this meeting. Dr. Hiller, the intimate friend of Mendelssohn, and, as musical readers are aware, himself one of the most eminent of living masters, is to conduct the performance himself. To-morrow Mr. Benedict's St. Peter in the morning, and Handel's Samson in the evening, will bring this almost unprecedented Festival to an end.

Among those who attended the performance of the Messiah to-day were observed:—

President, the Earl of Bradford and the Ladies Mabel and Florence Bridgeman, the Hon. and Rev. J. O. Bridgeman, Lady Grey de Wilton, the Mayor, of Birmingham and party, the High Sheriff of Warwickshire, Mrs. Dilke and Miss Diana, the High Sheriff of Staffordshire and party, the High Sheriff of Worcestershire and party, the Earl of Denbigh, Lord and Lady Lyttelton, Lord Leigh, and party, the Earl and Countess Beauchamp, Lord Hatherton, Lord Delamere, Lord and Lady Edward Clinton, Lord and Lady Wrottesley, and party, the Marchioness of Bristol, Lady Sandys and party, Lady Ward, Mrs. Ellicott and party, Dowager Lady Cave and party, Lady Amherst, Lord Eliott, the Bishop of Rochester, Mrs. Claughton and party, Sir J. S. Pakington, M. P., and party, Sir C. B. Adderley, M. P., and Lady Adderley, Sir T. W. Beddoijs, Sir Rainald Knightly, M. P., and Lady Knightly, Sir R. W. C. Brownrigg, Sir R. N. C. Hamilton, K. C. B., and party, Sir F. E Winnington, Bowager Lady Mordaunt and party, Lord Raglan and party, Sir H. and Lady Lambert, the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Gage, the Hon. Mrs. Gregory, Lady Manners, the Hon Parker Jervis and party, Mr. C. N. Newdegate, M. P., and Miss Bonchcrette and party, Mr. C. Forster, Mr. J. Lindly, M. P., Mr. J. B. M'Lean, M. SOMETHING ABOUT THE COMPOSER AND THE WRITER OF THE SONG "DIE WACHT AM RHEIN."*

Wilhelm, born on the 5th September, 1815, at Schmalkalden, in Thuringia, received his first musical instruction from his father, who was an organist. He continued his studies in the years 1834-36 at Cassel, under Herren Baldewein and Bott, Musicdirectoren, and also under the celebrated old master, L. Spohr, whose amiable readiness to assist him exercised a great influence on the progress of the industrious youth. His further studies he pursued under that admirable master of pianoforte playing, Aloys Schmidt, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and studied counterpoint under Herr A. André, at Offenbach. In 1841, he settled at Crefeld, and began as a music master. His musical value was appreciated in educated circles there, and he was soon elected director of the Singacademie for mixed chorus, as well as of the concert-tafel. The latter raised itself so much under his direction, that it equalled the best associations for male singing in Germany. During his twenty-four years' residence at Crefeld, Wilhelm composed about one hundred of his most beautiful male songs; quite as many for mixed chorus; and, more especially, a chorus of male voices. We will here mention only "Frühlingszeit," "Waldlust," "Auf der Wacht," "Madchen, wenn ich von Dir ziehe," &c. But he was most inspired as a composer by patriotic words. In the year 1854, the song "Wacht am Rhein" sprang into life. In 1865, on the occasion of the Singers' Festival at Dresden, Müller von der Werre said, somewhere in his writings, that this grand patriotic effusion had not only made the round of land and sea, but was regularly established as a national song. The German nation has, in 1870, confirmed the assertion. In consequence of long and frequent illness, Wilhelm was compelled, to the great regret of his many friends, when he was only about fifty-five, to retire from the direction of the vocal association—though the step cost him a great effort. In 1865, he was induced by still more severe sickness, and a yearning for his native hills, to give up his long disinterested efforts for the Liedertafel, and return to Schmalkalden, where he at present resides. Unfortunately, the feeling of oppression caused by the death of his mother, an old lady of eighty-three, which occurred three years since, and by the newly awakened longing to revisit Crefeld, for so many years his second home, has permitted him but too rarely to indulge in fresh musical creations. He produced, however, in 1868, a magnificent chorus for male voices—"Wache auf, Deutschland" (words by Emil Ritterhaus), with the burden, "Kein Fuss weit von dem Deutschen Lande soll je Franzosisch werden" (Not a foot's breadth of German soil shall ever become French"). It is no doubt included in a collection of twelve patriotic songs for chorus of male voices, of which an edition of ten thousand copies, under the title "1870," is published by M. Schloss, Cologne, for the benefit of the wounded soldiers, and of the relatives of those who have fallen.—At present, it has been established by documentary evidence that it was Max Schneckenburger who wrote the words of "Die Wacht am Rhein." His widow, who lives at Thalheim, near Tuttlingen, Wurtemberg, possesses a letter from Schneckenburger, to whom she was then engaged, in which he enclosed her the words of the song, written at the request of some friends. Max Schneckenburger was born on the 17th February, 1819, at Thalheim, where his father was a tradesman. As far back as his fifteenth year, he exhibited his turn for poetry by writing poems, which he had printed, a step that, according to the Schwäbischer Mercur, he afterwards regretted often enough. His was a well-educated and very well-read man, and made a select collection of books, which are still in the possession of his widow. He died, when thirty, in 1849, at Burgdorf, near Berne, where he was established in business, and where he founded some ironworks. His eldest son is a rifleman in the Wurtemberg division of the German army.

MARSTON ON TRAGIC ART.

In a paragraph previously published concerning the lecture on Tragic Art delivered by Dr. Westland Marston before the Society of Arts, we promised our readers some account of the views of the lecturer. This promise we are, fortunately, in a position to fulfil. We do not hesitate, accordingly, to give from the notes before us a statement of the opinions expressed. These cannot but have profound interest for our readers. The eminence of the lecturer—almost, if not quite, the solitary advocate and producer of the highest order of dramatic composition—lends to the lecture highest value, while grace of style and fervour of diction enhance it with all possible beauty. Dr. Marston commenced with an assertion which he thought would not be denied —that at no previous period of England has so much apathy, or even distaste, as we now witness prevailed towards a form of art once supposed to tax the highest powers of genius, and be the delight of the finest and most refined pleasures. At present pleasure and any kind of spiritual emotion appear to be incompatible terms. Those scenes of physical distress, those crises of bodily peril artificially contrived, and hair-breadth escapes miraculously provided, so far from being akin to tragedy, which paints the conflict of the passions of the soul, are absolutely opposed to it. When in a play an actor swings from a tree into a chasm to save a young lady from peril, the piece runs for months, and it may be years. Against this success Dr. Marston opposed the fact that the tragedy of Ion of Airlie, in which one of the finest plays of modern times, supremely acted by Mr. Vezin. This piece, rich as it was in beauty, story, and action, was withdrawn ere the lecturer had opportunity of paying it a second visit.

Some of the decline of interest in tragedy Dr. Marston found in the taste for realism;—the love for the photographic reproduction of the manners and appearances of human life at the expense of its essentials. A second he traced to the level and characterless manners of modern civilization, the monotonous and inexpressive tone of society. A diminution of fortitude, or by a natural but regretable process developed until the government of emotion which is a virtue, has degenerated into the suppression of emotion, which is an evil. Hardness, reticence, and indifference, such as are shown in manners act gradually upon the mind and heart, and the same cause accepted as the law of taste to display feeling, the result is not surprising that it is thought bad taste to feel. "Thus," continued the lecturer, "enthusiasm, imagination, faith in the ideals of beauty and goodness—the all, in a word, on which the poetry of art mainly subsists, fail to be appreciated: for men soon cease to believe in what they seldom experience, and the power of mental perception grows narrow with the narrowness of sympathy. If, by a process common in society, the practices of the higher classes are imitated by those beneath them, it may come to be generally considered our chief distinction to be free from everything that is elevating and our crowning proof of superiority that we have suppressed every quality that could make us superior."

That tragic art may be real, may be occupied with details of every-day life, Dr. Marston will concede, but he asserts that it is not the main business of tragic art that it should be real. It may be idealized, taken to some measure of external things, but it is not bounded by them. It uses them as exponents; it does not acknowledge them as limitations. These views were illustrated by a reference to Macbeth. In real life Macbeth would not have had the imaginative faculty to express his terror and remorse in the language which Shakspere has given him, and such power as he possessed would probably have failed him while under the influence of the passions by which he was swayed. Even though he saw the air-drawn dagger, its presence would most likely, in real life, be indicated by some brief ejaculation, or, more probably still, a shudder or a convulsive motion of the hand, to shut out the vision would be the only sign of his beholding it. A lover in real life, moreover, looking on the body, apparently dead, of his mistress, may feel the grief of Romeo, but will find his sorrow probably stifle his utterance, and will not vent his grief in the phrase of imaginative beauty. Shall we, then, the lecturer asks, say that the poet has failed in truth because he has endowed his characters with power of utterance which in actual life they could never have possessed? Shall we not rather say that by doing this he has shown his best title to our admiration? For it should be observed, that it is the imperfection, not the fulness, of our faculties which prevents the adequate and noble expression of our feelings in real life. Whether the hindrances to such expression arise from the want of imaginative power in most men or from the suspension of that power in the crisis of passion, the hindrances are in either case proofs of a want of inability. It is this want which the poet supplies, this inability which he overcomes. His makes men speak as they would if they had his own capacities. He draws the lightning from the charged cloud and shows us the fire with which the darkness is pregnant. He is the true Orpheus who appeals to the dumb petrifications of grief, and makes them living and vocal. And he compensates us a thousand times for overpassing the reality of visible life by disclosing to us the life which is invisible—the reality of the soul. It would not, Dr. Marston continues, be rash to affirm that wherever tragedy in its noblest form exists, it sounds not only the depths of our nature, but discloses directly or indirectly, its connection with the supernatural and touches it with the mystery of a life yet higher than its own. In the classical drama, where the gods are the direct dispensers of fate, this is, of course, conspicuous. In the sufferings of Prometheus or Orestes we have brought before us the enigma of our brief life—the self-sacrifice of Virtue and Genius, the futility of human wisdom, the moral deceptions even of conscience, and through the cloud of the mystery we hear the awful voices of the gods who decree but do not explain; and who, with larger vision than ours, work out the purification of our nature by processes that often baffle human reason, and controvert the very instincts of human justice. Then follows in the lecture a parallel between the period of the Greek drama and the youth of man which, though eminently beautiful, we are obliged to emit. Passing over all stages that intervene, the lecturer goes to the romantic drama, and shows that the scene of the supernatural and of the relation of man to a controlling power still prevail. Without pointing to tragedies in which supernatural agencies are so directly personified as in Macbeth, Dr. Marston traces the influence by its indirect workings as in Hamlet. In this play it seems that the problem of human life and its relation to an inviolable fate are throughout suggested.

After an analysis of the play, for which, as for many noble passages of the lecturer, we have no space, Dr. Marston continues: "The entire play, I think, reads in some respects like a remonstrance with destiny." Romeo and Juliet and Othello are then shown to exhibit similar lessons, and the lecturer passes on to protest against the idea of poetical justice or systematically squaring the rewards and penalties of man's condition with his deserts. This notion of illustrating the actions of Providence seems more melancholy than the mystery which hides Providence altogether. We are conscious all the time that pleasure and pain are not in real life so adjusted; that it is the spotless victim which fate calls to the altar, and that the blemished life often escapes all penalties, except those which it causes in itself. In some eloquent passages, which are the very moral and centre of the lecture, Dr. Marston shows how noble is the teaching which, dispensing with all idea of poetical justice, deepens the pathos of true tragedy, broadens our sympathies with humanity, and shows us something to admire and appreciate in the life most wasted or furthest diverted from the right track. In conclusion, Dr. Marston dwelt upon the moral element of self-sacrifice in tragedy. After alluding to Cordelia, Desdemona, Imogen, Viola, and Portia, Dr. Marston showed how nobly this lesson was taught in the fate of Thekla, in Schiller's tragedy of The Death of Wallenstein, referring with high praise to the reading recently given by Miss Nelson. Following this came an examination of Victor Hugo's tragedy of Marion Delorme, in which the same noble and pathetic teaching is not less eloquently expounded.

In conclusion, Dr. Marston said, "Very imperfectly, as I too well know, but still earnestly, I have tried in these scattered remarks to indicate something of the nature and use of tragedy, and to point out directly from the soul which ennobles all things that its very strife has beauty, its wail has music—poetry so connected with our deepest sympathies and hopes, so touched with high griefs which border upon delight that he who has no taste for its noble sorrow must also, I fear, be insensible to the best kind of human joy." With no added comment, we leave these eloquent words to sink into the minds of our readers. Could a knowledge of them be but generally diffused our hopes for an amendment in things dramatic would once more be sanguine. K.

HANOVER.—Herr von Bronsart, the Intendant of the Theatre Royal, has enlisted in the German army as a volunteer.

HOHENELBE.—Despite the feeling of general anxiety now prevalent, a Beethoven Festival was lately celebrated here. The whole place was gaily dressed out with flags and banners in honour of the event, and deputations were present from all the neighbouring towns.

BRUNSWICK.—Mad. Franzeska Cornet died here recently. She enjoyed a very high reputation in Germany, but more especially in Hamburgh, as a teacher of singing. She was the daughter of Herr Kiel, a member of the opera at Cassel, and was indebted to him for an unusually good musical education. At an early age, she married Herr Cornet, a tenor, who took her, in 1821, to Hamburgh, where she made her first appearance in the opera of Surgino. When her husband entered on the management of the Hamburgh Theatre, she became permanently attached to the company. In 1847, on her husband's giving up management, Mad. Cornet retired from the stage, and devoted herself exclusively to teaching singing. A great many now celebrated German vocal artists were her pupils. Mad. Cornet could not boast of a particularly fine or strong voice, but she turned her natural powers to the best possible account, and made up by consummate skill for what she wanted in power. Like her husband, she possessed more than ordinary histrionic talent.

SIMLA (INDIA).

(From the "Pioneer," July 11.)

On the 6th July the lovers of harmony were regaled at the Assembly Rooms with another concert—Mr. Cockburn's, given under the patronage of their Excellencies the Viceroy and Commander-in-Chief. This concert was previously announced for the 27th ultimo, but Herr Mack having applied to Mr. Cockburn (who is the lessee of the Assembly Rooms) for the rooms for his concert on that date, Mr. Cockburn very considerately yielded the point, and postponed his own till last night, which was quite as great a success as the preceding one. Mr. Cockburn was valuably assisted by several talented lady and gentleman amateurs. One of the gems of the evening was the duet, "Mira la bianca luna," sung (and encored) by Mrs. C——n and Major Burne. This gentleman's song, "My Queen," was equally effective. The concerted pieces from Maanniello and Perfida Clori were excellently well rendered by Colonel Campbell (violoncello), Mr. Beatty (flute), and Mr. Cockburn (piano). Mr. Beatty, his first appearance on the Simla boards, quite astonished and delighted the audience with the exquisite execution he displayed on the flute. "The Bine Bells of Scotland," with most elaborate and difficult variations, quite absorbed the audience, and at every pause the performer was greeted with a loud and appreciative applause. Mr. Cockburn's solo on the piano, Thalberg's "Last Rose of Summer," was excellently performed, and his very artiste and clever execution of the solo, "Home, sweet Home," transcribed for the left hand only, was considered another of the evening's gems. Mr. Cockburn, in our opinion, has considerably improved since his last visit to England, and there are very few professionals in India superior to him in execution. If Mr. Cockburn happened to be Herr Cockburn, or Monsieur Cobairne, or Signor Cockburni, or Mynheer Cockburnum, instead of plain Mister Cockburn, he would—for a ducat—be infinitely more appreciated. We must not omit Mr. McLeod's song, "The Stirrup Cup," which was very well sung. His Italian duet with Mr. Cockburn was equally good.

FUNERAL OF MR. ROBERT KANZOW BOWLEY.

The remains of this gentleman, late General Manager of the Crystal Palace, and Treasurer to the Sacred Harmonic Society, were interred on Wednesday last, 31st August, at the Norwood Cemetery, at 12 o'clock. Soon after 11 o'clock the cortège started from the residence of deceased, "Rockhills," Sydenham, and consisted of the hearse, drawn by four horses, and four mourning coaches and pairs of horses, each containing the following relations and friends:—

1st carriage: Masters R. and W. Bowley, sons; Messrs. J. Taylor, T. Brewer, and C. Dutton. 2nd carriage: Messrs. J. R. Dutton, C. Stewart, and Bicknell, also Dr. Read. 3rd carriage: Messrs. Price, Grove, Wilkinson, and Husk. 4th carriage: Messrs. Black, R. Taylor, Moore, and Jeffrey.

The outer coffin was of polished wood, and bore a shield, with the following engraved upon it:—

ROBERT KANZOW BOWLEY,
DIED, 25TH AUGUST, 1870, AGED 57 YEARS.

At the cemetery gates the cortège was joined by the Directors of the Crystal Palace Company, and the members of the Committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society, also a large number of the employés from the Palace, who wished to testify their respect for the departed. Sir Michael Costa, Mr. Mitchell, of Bond Street, Mr. E. T. Smith, and several of the Directors of the Crystal Palace, sent, as a mark of their respect, their carriages to follow.

A little incident we noticed was, Mr. Surmon,* the promoter of the original Sacred Harmonic Society, struggling through the assembly at the door of the chapel, to get near the remains of his old associate. The gentleman in charge of the funeral, observing his distressed state of mind, assisted him through the crowd, and kindly placed a chair for him at the head of the coffin.

Messrs. Garstin, of Welbeck Street, had the management of the Funeral.

* There existed a misunderstanding between Mr. Surmon and the late Mr. Bowley, resulting in the separation of the two societies, and Sir Michael Costa establishing the present very successful administration.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1870.

THE HEREFORD FESTIVAL.

NOTWITHSTANDING the covert opposition of many, the openly avowed dissent of others, and the lukewarmness of some from whom better things might have been expected, the one hundred and forty-seventh Festival of the Three Choirs was duly celebrated last week. We have given full reports in other columns of the various proceedings, and in this place are only concerned with the question whether it is desirable to keep up the meeting of the Three Choirs, a question much discussed, and upon which nothing approaching unanimity prevails. As to the aim and object of the Festival, there is happily no difference of sentiment. The riches of the Church may afford matter for the Liberation Society to prate about before ill-informed audiences, but this is the merest clap-trap. If the revenues of the Church were doled out equally the income of the clergy would fall short of £300 per annum. If equality were to become the order of the day the result would be a dead level of dull mediocrity. No profession in the world could do otherwise than stagnate under such a system; and we only advert to it to show how untenable is the position that the clergy may be left to take care of themselves, and make what provision they please for their families. We all know that a clergyman's paper income does not represent his real income; there are outgoings of all sorts, besides the innumerable claims upon his purse for subscriptions and charities. Considering the class of men, their educational and social status, the influence they exercise, the amount of work of all kinds required of them, and their charitable disbursements, it must be admitted that the Hereford, Worcester, and Gloucester Clerical Charity is deserving of liberal and general support. No doubt the clergy themselves ought to do more in this behalf. In his recent charge the Bishop of Hereford not only pleaded eloquently for the widows and orphans, but remarked upon the paucity of both clerical and lay support. This ought not so to be. Perhaps the clergy may feel diffident in bringing this question before their parishioners, but a duty ought not to be shirked because it is painful. The clergy can scarcely expect the laity to be enthusiastic, and forward to contribute, if they are backward and indifferent.

But when we come to consider the Festival question proper, there arises divergence and disunion. Let us see what common ground we can all take even here. We suppose no one would be rash enough to assert that a concert is an improper method by which to raise funds for the support of the widows and orphans of the clergy, when almost weekly such entertainments are specially given in aid of restoring churches, building schools, and other kindred objects. We can all of us, therefore, vote for the concerts. The ball again is a mere appendage, got up for the amusement of those who have attended the Festival, which is concluded before dancing commences. We do not know whether the ball itself is a profit or otherwise to the Festival Committee; if there be any profit so much the better, while nobody is any the worse. The Cathedral service is not now suspended, and the offertories are devoted to the Charity. Surely this is as it should be. We have now arrived at the question—Is it right to turn a Cathedral into a concert-room, with its orchestra, differently priced seats, paid performances, ticket collectors, &c.? Let us look steadily at the question. Cathedrals and parish churches are public buildings, built and maintained for public purposes. So are theatres and concert-halls. They have this characteristic therefore in common. But when we come to the purpose of the gathering together in a cathedral and a theatre the similarity ends. The sacred building is consecrated to edification, the secular to amusement. Is the performance of an oratorio edifying? We unhesitatingly answer in the affirmative. It is simply a highly developed musical service, bringing before the mind in a continuous and connected narrative the most stirring lives and scenes in Holy Writ. If music be the handmaid of religion, and if musical services are in themselves desirable, then the objectors to the performance of oratorios in our cathedrals are out of court so far. An orchestra is a necessary adjunct, and must stand or fall with choir stalls and organ lofts. But you must pay for admission, and the prices vary according to the position of the seats. It is not so long since pew rents were the rule in nearly all our town churches, and in more than one Hereford church the pew trade still prevails, the price varying according to the locale of the seat. Where is the difference? But let this pass. Holding the pew hiring system to be indefensible, we shall not attempt to maintain that two blacks make a white. The position we take up is this—that the sale of tickets partakes of the nature of a subscription towards the Festival expenses, each person thus contributing according to his means, and in return securing the privilege of certain accommodation in the Cathedral, to the exclusion of others who have not so contributed. Every parishioner is entitled to a seat at common law in his parish church. Suppose a church barely sufficient for the number of parishioners attending, the churchwardens must be bound to see all these seated, and to exclude all strangers that are non-parishioners. Because at common law every parishioner is supposed to contribute towards the church expenses, therefore the corresponding right. The Cathedral is the mother church of the whole diocese; all those who attend the celebration of the oratorios have contributed towards the expenses; therefore all these have a right to attend. The different priced tickets is a rough kind of assessment according to means, on the same principle as the old Church-rate assessment, by which each parishioner contributed according to the amount of property he had within the parochial limits. The paid performer-objection is the weakest that can be conceived, for the same may be said of bishops, deans, canons, the parochial clergy, organists, choirs, and clerks. We submit, therefore, that we have fairly met and fully disposed of the various objections urged. We know, indeed, that special objection has been taken to the evening performance of an oratorio. But, surely, what is right and proper at eleven o'clock in the morning cannot be wrong at eight o'clock in the evening, and we are bold to say that the bearing and demeanour of the audience on Tuesday will not suffer by comparison with that of the ordinary Sunday evening congregation, whilst the oratorio was more impressive and instructive than many of the sermons delivered from the Cathedral pulpit.

Warsaw.—Herr C. Carlberg, who was summoned, by telegraph, to take the post vacant by the death of Herr J. Strauss, has proved himself worthy of the confidence put in him by the members of the band, and become exceedingly popular.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

It must be a matter of satisfaction to the stewards and patrons of the Hereford meeting, and indeed the whole diocese of Hereford, that whilst a puritanical notion of the sanctity of Cathedral churches has of late years appeared to threaten an interference with the continuing of the Festivals at Gloucester and Worcester, there has not been at Hereford the faintest notion of interrupting a practice which antiquity has almost made an institution. To this circumstance—to the feeling of anxiety for success which pervades the whole diocese—more than to any other, it is probably attributable that in the essential element of amounts contributed to the charity which the Festivals instituted, and have always continued to feed, Hereford stands first. The cloud which has overhung the Gloucester Festivals on two recent occasions by the withholding of that support which is expected from the ecclesiastical heads of the diocese, is likely to cast a smaller shadow in the future than it has done in the past. The storm which at one time threatened the Worcester Festivals, brewed out of the eccentric notions of a nobleman whom no one would have charged with immoderate consideration for the sanctity of churches, has ended in the serenest calm. All seems to augur renewed life and vigour to the Three-Choir Festivals, and under these happy circumstances the meeting at Hereford took place.

We find that since the 1867 Festival in Hereford death has removed the reverend divine who then ruled over the diocese. Bishop Hampden, whose aid and countenance was always given to these meetings, died on the 23rd of April, 1868, and was succeeded by the present respected Diocesan. Canons Huntingford and Evans are also numbered with the departed, and their places have been filled by Archdeacon Waring and Dr. Jebb. Beyond this things are much as they were, except, perhaps, we ought to mention, as specially applicable at this moment, that the preliminary skirmishes in what at one time threatened to be a war between the two Cathedral Corporations as to the musical services in the mother church, took place a few months since, resulting, as battles generally do, in the all but ruin of some unoffending men. A truce which was arranged between the contending parties has not yet expired; when it has, it is to be hoped that a peace will be concluded and satisfactory arrangements made for the due performance of Divine service by men whose minds are not affected by any element of strife. Ninety-nine years ago there were only two Stewards of the Festival; this number has gone on gradually increasing until in 1867 there were as many as sixty-one gentlemen connected with the county, who divided between them the duties and responsibilities of their office. This year the number is sixty-two.

The 147th Festival of the Three Choirs of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, has taken its place in history; and the records of its leading features prove that the dignity of the institution has not been compromised. Musically, it has been uniformly successful, but the earlier days seemed to suggest grave apprehensions that the financial results would not show an improvement. In 1867 the first oratorio attracted an audience of 651; in 1870 the attendance was 847; the attendance in the evening in 1867 was 275; this year it was 923; and yet, whilst in 1867 the first day produced £188 2s. 7d. to the charity, in 1870 Tuesday gave to the same purpose only £153 13s. 4d. So that, as against £188 2s. 7d., contributed by 926 visitors in 1867, there was a subscription of £35 less in 1870 by a total number of 1,768. In other words, with an increase in number of nearly 80 per cent., there was a decrease in amount of 20 per cent. The returns of the second day are less startling; but they are in the same direction, considered from a purely financial point of view. In 1867 the Wednesday morning attendance was 1,564; the evening was 723. In 1870 the numbers were respectively 1,260 and 383. We have thus a decreased attendance on the second day, as compared with the last Festival; and we have also a decreased subscription, the respective amounts having been £153 13s. 4d. in 1867, and £151 10s. 7d. in 1870. The attendance at the Cathedral on Thursday was not so large as on the previous day, and the amount collected showed a still more lamentable falling off. The numbers present on the Thursday morning in 1867 were 1,812; in 1870 there were only 886. The amount collected was in the former year £278; in the latter it was £95 19s. 2d. Up to this point, it must be admitted, there has been abundant ground for discouragement. Some other aspects of the meeting have been of a most gratifying character. There has been a unanimity among the ecclesiastical authorities of the city, which we regard with great satisfaction. It is not unworthy of observation, moreover, that the local clergy attended in great numbers. On the whole, the deportment of the congregation assembled in the Cathedral was marked by exemplary decorum, and though the presence of Royalty naturally had the effect of creating a great deal of curiosity, we have no acts of rudeness to censure.

Going back a century, as nearly as the triennial distribution of time will allow—that is, to the year 1771, we find that three days of the Hereford Festival week were devoted to the objects of the charity. But Handel's "Coronation Anthem" was performed twice. The Messiah had already become the main attraction. There was a ball each evening which was so directly connected with the Festival that only those who had concert tickets were admitted to it. One fact may be cited as an indication that the musical attractions provided were not of a purely conventional, still less of a provincial character; the oratorio of Esther had a conspicuous place in the programme. Advertizers of that era were instructed to announce that "the performers were desired to be in town on Sunday evening, in order to rehearse on Monday, the 26th in the morning, and to dine with the Stewards at the Maidenhead Inn the day following." The stewards were then two in number; but even as at this day Lord Bateman was at the head of them. As part of the arrangements of the meeting, an "ordinary" was appointd for the Wednesday at the Green Dragon, and for Thursday at the Swan and Falcon. To one proof of the advancement of the public in matters of musical taste and general enlightenment we may point with some interest. The Hereford Journal in 1771 did not think it any part of its duty to publish so much as one line of musical criticism in its very brief record (extending to not more than half-a-dozen lines) of an event which even then was regarded as one of prime social and professional interest.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

(By Electric Telegraph.)

Birmingham, Friday, 3.30. p.m.

Mr. Benedict's Saint Peter just over. Immense success. Hall crowded; audience enthusiastic; magnificent performance of a magnificent work. Ovation for composer.

Bonn.—Herr Wagner (no connection with Herr R. Wagner) has just completed a zinc bust of Beethoven. It is about four German feet high, and will be bronzed over. It is intended as a present from the Bonn Association of Male Voices to the Beethoven Hall.—In consequence of the war, the Beethoven Festival is definitively postponed.

A Sra. Carlotta Patti.

(From the Rio Janeiro "Journal of Commerce.")

Qualquer, que ouvir da Patti o bello canto,
Ha de crer que nao mais está na terra,
Pois, muito acima da mais alta serra,
Sentir-se-ha cheio de prazer e espanto.

E tal ha de ser nelle o novo encanto
Que exclame: Ou muito em seus juizos erra
Minh'alma, ou já lá vai do mundo a guerra,
E um anjo eu ouço já do reino santo.

Nao é passaro em ramo, que suaves
Melodias no ar soltando esteja;
Nao, com trindos taes nao cantao aves.

A doce enlevo e admiraçao entregue,
Somente quem cantar e ouvir a veja
Póde crer que mulher a tanto chegue.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

BIRMINGHAM, Aug. 29.

There has never yet been wanting in this world a set of persons, duly qualified, in their own estimation, at least, to utter predictions on any and every subject, from the result of a horse race to the fate of a nation; and, during a somewhat lengthened experience of musical festivals, I have usually found an ample supply of prophets, who, according to their lights, have prognosticated favourably or the reverse as to the success of these meetings. It has not been uncommon for their vaticinations to prove false; hence I give but little heed to those who creak about the effects of the war, "singers who won't sing, and composers who decline to compose," but prefer to wait patiently until the end of the week, when the official figures will show clearly who is right and who wrong. When I came here for the Festival of 1867 I was told that it was certain to be (pecuniarily) one of the worst ever known; the depression of trade consequent upon the financial panic and crisis of the preceding year, the failures of local banks, the losses people had sustained through the sudden collapse of companies, &c., &c., all conspiring to give some sort of colouring to such dismal forebodings, which happily turned out to be unfounded, as the meeting in question was, without exception, the best on record, resulting in a neat amount of £6,541 handed over to the funds of the General Hospital —the largest sum ever realised since the first establishment of the Festivals in the year 1768. But, apart from generalities, a town like Birmingham, whose well-deserved motto is "Forward," should be the last to throw doubt upon the issue of the triennial gatherings, which have had such undying lustre conferred upon them by the honour of producing the greatest oratorio of modern, or indeed of any times, while the perfection of the performances ever since Sir Michael Costa became the conductor, has raised the character of these meetings from a mere local and provincial celebrity to a renown extending not only over the United Kingdom but throughout the Continent of Europe. Nor is it music alone that has made progress in this busy town; the sister-art of painting is diligently cultivated, and an admirable Exhibition, both of oils and water-colours, is held here twice annually, while the local school is largely attended by students who have the advantage of studying under Calvert, a master. David Cox was, if not a Birmingham man, at least born somewhere close in the neighbourhood, while other artists from the district are gradually making both fame and profit in the London market. One of the finest collections of painting by modern artists is in the possession of Joseph Gillott (of steel-pen celebrity), and one of the largest picture auctions ever held at Christie & Manson's was in May last, when more than £43,000 was realized by the sale of the collection of a gentleman who for 40 years had been amassing his art treasures within a few miles of this smoky place. Sir Francis Grant, President of our Royal Academy, is also President of the Local Society of Arts, and the late Charles Dickens was President of the Institute which has long flourished here.

The Press, too, is represented with considerable spirit; two daily papers, four weeklies (including an Illustrated News), and a presumable facetious monthly, called the Town Crier (whose jokes and allusions being mostly of a local and personal character would fall flat elsewhere), attest the literary activity of what has been called the toy-shop of Europe, on the "hens a nest builds" principle, as the company supplies the greater part of those delights of childhood. Nor are solid and substantial signs of advancing wealth and prosperity wanting, if one may judge by the improvements which have taken place within the last few years; handsome banks, imposing public buildings, shops to which would be a credit to the best of our London thoroughfares carriages and horses that might well pass muster in Hyde Park during the height of the season, and a general well-to-do look both about places and people which should augur favourably for the success of any undertaking to which Birmingham may give its mind.

Having re recently presented an outline of the Festival programme, it is needless now to recapitulate what is to be done this week, as it will be all faithfully recorded in proper order. There is, however, one source of congratulation which must not be passed over un-noticed, and that is, that although it was pretty confidently stated at the close of the last Festival that the name of Costa would no more appear as conductor, the fact is otherwise, while, at the same time, his latest and best work, Naaman, constitutes one of the morning performances. Her Majesty the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, with other members of the Royal Family, give the patronage of their names; the Earl of Bradford is president (and potentate of encores) with more than one hundred vice-presidents, comprising Dukes, Earls, Marquises, Lords, Honourables, and Baronets, in number sufficient to satisfy the cravings of the most radical and democratic of title worshippers. The principal vocalists are Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, and Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, sopranos; Madame Patey and Mdlle. Drasdil, contraltos; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Vernon Rigby, and W. H. Cummings, tenors; Mr. Santley and Signor Foli, basses; Madame Arabella Goddard is solo pianist; M. Sainton, solo violinist; Mr. Stimpson (as usual) presiding at the organ. The preponderance of native talent in this powerful array of artists will not fail to be noticed, while of those who bear foreign appellations we may almost claim one half, Mdlle. Tietjens and M. Sainton, having been long enough in this country to become naturalized subjects, and Signor Foli, an Italian in name only. The orchestra, numbering 138 Instrumentalists, comprises 28 first violins, headed by M. Sainton; 26 seconds, with Mr. Willy for principal; 18 violas, Mr. Doyle principal; 17 violoncellos, Mr. Edward Howell being in the first place, his father heading the double basses; of the 4 flutes, 4 oboes, 4 clarionets, and 4 bassoons, Messrs. Radcliff, Harvey Lazarus, and Hutchings, are the respective heads, while the brothers T. and C. Harper are (as of prescriptive right), first trumpet and horn. The chorus consists of 96 sopranos, 36 contraltos, 57 altos, 88 tenors, and 87 basses, making up, with the band, a total of little more than 500 executants, all thoroughly efficient. Since the last Festival death has carried off no less than five well-known performers, all more or less eminent and highly respected by the profession and the public. Poor Weiss (whose manly form and genial presence are much missed); George Collins, who succeeded Charles Lucas as first violoncello; Robert Pratten, so long first flute; Trust, equally useful as tenor or harp player; and the veteran Chipp, so many years associated with the big drums.

The novelties to be produced at this Festival should prove unanecessful, it certainly will not be the fault of band, chorus, or principals, who have been assiduously engaged at rehearsal from half-past nine o'clock this morning until nearly five, allowance being made for half an hour's interval. The works gone through have been Mr. Benedict's oratorio, St. Peter, Professor Bennett's Ode to Shakspere, and Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's cantata, Nala and Damayanti, each being conducted by its composer. This evening, Mr. J. F. Barnett's Paradise and the Peri, with sundry other matters, will be rehearsed, so that, altogether, the first day's work will have been none of the lightest for all concerned. Criticism on rehearsals is entirely out of place, but it is no breach of etiquette to say that, from the time occupied by the abovementioned productions, it is very clear that the performances will be of even more than the usual inordinate length, which is so constantly a recurring fault at most (if not at all) Festivals.

TUESDAY, Aug. 30.

To-day the Festival has begun in earnest, and the croakers are put to shame, as all question as to the result has been most effectually settled by the number of tickets disposed of. Birmingham has long been noted for entertaining what are called advanced views on many subjects. Her politics are liberal, or, perhaps, one should rather say radical, in the extreme, as is fully attested by the statue to Thomas Attwood, which first meets the gaze of the traveller arriving at the New Street Station, and the fact of Mr. John Bright, Mr. Munts, and Mr. Dixon, representing the town in Parliament. Birmingham has also a "currency" theory which has, at times, excited much debate among those interested in finance, and in many other ways will add to the fore. It is therefore not surprising that those who advocate the ballot for the representation of the people at large, should adopt the system for the distribution of tickets at their Festivals, and one would imagine that a plan at once so fair and equitable should be satisfactory to all those who agree to abide by it. Unfortunately, however, human nature is after all but fallible, and those who have paid their guineas for reserved seats and find that the glorious personal indifference of the ballot has relegated them to dark corners close under the orchestra, or to some obscure spot beneath the great gallery, where they can neither see nor be seen, and where the glories of costumes, marvels of the milliner's art, are completely hidden from mortal gaze, exercise the Briton's birthright privilege of grumbling in no measured terms, and roundly objurgating the innocent cause of their distress. But, inasmuch as to almost every grade of misery, however low, there may yet be discovered a lower, what is likely to be the state of feeling of those who find that even the inconvenient spots already alluded to are denied them? Well, such is the case with a large number whose anticipations of hearing the Messiah on Thursday are ruthlessly destroyed, the applications for places for that day being far in excess of the space at the disposal of the Committee, and as a natural consequence many will be woefully disappointed. The following notice which appeared in the programme might, to some extent, have prepared the minds of those who were looking for unsecured places:—

"SPECIAL NOTICE APPLICABLE TO THE THURSDAY MORNING PERFORMANCE.—Messiah.—In the event of applications for guinea tickets, at the time of the ballot, being of sufficient number to justify the Committee in appropriating the whole of the seats in the Hall at a guinea each, the Committee do not pledge themselves to issue any unsecured tickets at half a guinea each."

As it is the whole of the room which is calculated to "seat 2,000 persons of such form and dimensions as shall be agreed" (this, I am told, is the wording of the agreement to build the Town Hall) will be filled with guinea places, and if it could only have been constructed on the principle of somebody's expanding portmanteau, this number would doubtless be augmented by at least another 500, the popularity of the Messiah continuing to increase with each year of its existence. I have heard that some of those who are thus haplessly excluded hint at unfairness and partiality, but such ridiculous and unfounded charges are best answered by the simple circumstance (worth a world of argument) that the chairman of the balloting committee, together with a large party of his own personal friends, are amongst the many shut out from the Thursday morning's performance.

With his accustomed scrupulous punctuality Sir Michael Costa uplifted his bâton at half-past eleven o'clock this morning, and the National Anthem was led off by the whole body of sopranos, afterwards joined by the entire orchestra. Then, after a slight pause, Mr. Santley commenced the prophetic recitative, "As God, the Lord of Israel, liveth," which opens the oratorio of Elijah, in the grave and dignified manner so well suited to the subject. The custom which first obtained and continued for some little time after the work was originally produced—dividing the part of Elijah between two voices—is happily numbered with things of the past, and the same singer now always sustains the rôle of the Prophet throughout. Although at times lying almost too low for his voice, there is no artist before the public more thoroughly capable of doing justice to the music which Mendelssohn has put into the mouth of the Prophet than Mr. Santley, who has seldom if ever sung more finely than upon this occasion. The soprano part in the first division of the oratorio fell to Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, whose capability is as widely known as it is fully appreciated, her singing in the part of the widow and the youth being as effective as usual.

In the second part Mdlle. Tietjens' grand voice and no less grand method of using it exercised their accustomed sway in the superb admonition, "Hear ye, Israel," and the no less telling "Sanctus," in which Mrs. Sutton (a Birmingham soprano, whose local fame would seem to be well deserved), Madame Patey and Mdlle. Drasdil also joined their voices. The progress Madame Patey has made during the three years which have elapsed since the last festival was amply justified, that was then said of her, and further time and experience will yet ensure still greater advancement and more complete development of one of the most sympathetic and lovely contralto voices ever heard. A similar observation would also apply to Mdlle. Drasdil, who, as she gradually conquers the nervousness incidental to so trying an ordeal as a first appearance at a Birmingham Festival, shows powers of no mean order, her singing of the tender and touching air, "O rest in the Lord," being as remarkable for its unobtrusive simplicity as her fierce declamation in the part of Jezebel was commendable for its dramatic fire. That Madame Sainton-Dolby has finally retired from the profession of which she was so long a distinguished ornament, it is gratifying to find two contraltos of such great present excellence and still greater future promise springing up to fill the void. Of this is the fact that Mr. Vernon Rigby has sung at a Festival here, coupled with the fact that he is a native of Birmingham, having served his early noviciate in the Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Chad's, much interest in his success is naturally felt, and although audible expressions of approval are forbidden at the morning performances, it would appear that the expectations of his fellow-townsmen are fulfilled, so far as the first part of Elijah, in which the most striking opportunity is afforded by the air, "If with all your hearts," is concerned. At the evening concerts Mr. Rigby may still more distinguish himself, as the tenor part in two out of the three secular novelties falls to his share. Mr. Sims Reeves sang in the second part of Elijah in a manner which fully proved that he still stands alone and unrivalled as our greatest English tenor; the delivery of the little bit of recitative, "See, now he sleepeth," evidencing just as much care and study as the more important air, "Then shall the righteous." Anything finer than the band and chorus, under the potent spell of Sir Michael Costa's directing eye and guiding hand, could scarcely be imagined, and with a vivid remembrance of how Elijah was done here three years since, I do not hesitate to say that this was in all respects a no less fine performance; one which it would be difficult to equal and almost impossible to surpass, indeed, with all the prejudices of a true Brummagem native said to the manner born." I frankly own that if you want to hear oratorios done to the nearest point to perfection attainable, the Birmingham Festival is your only opportunity, and, despite superior numbers, Exeter Hall and even the Crystal Palace Handel Festivals must hide their diminished heads when compared with the triennial gatherings of this busy place. I am glad to say that the work was allowed to proceed from beginning to end without interruption from Presidential encores, the only matter to which exception could be taken being the unwelcome of those who in their hurry to get out marred the enjoyment of others who would not willingly lose one note of Mendelssohn's glorious music, but who were sadly interfered with during the whole of the last chorus. Contrary to what has usually been the custom for many years past, the audience remained seated during the "Holy, Holy." I do not know the precise number present, but the hall was excessively full; nor am I, as yet, aware of the amount collected at the doors, and shall, therefore, reserve all statistics till the close of the Festival, which at present has, among other advantages, glorious weather in its favour. To the list of those whom death has removed since the last meeting, must now be added Alfred Nicholson, the oboe player, who expired yesterday after a long and painful illness.

WEDNESDAY, Aug. 31.

At the concert last night the first of the five novelties promised for this Festival was produced before an audience completely filling every part of the noble Town Hall, which both externally and internally is at once an ornament and a credit to this busy seat of commerce. The favour with which Mr. John Francis Barnett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner, was received at the last Festival led to the commission for a second work, and the composer who has had the opportunity of twice presenting his musical ideas to the world through the medium of the most magnificent band and chorus ever heard, aided by principal singers worthy the occasion, is indeed a fortunate man. The limited time and still more limited space at one's disposal, to say nothing of the fact of having to attend no less than eight performances, all more or less lengthy, within four days, preclude anything like an attempt (at least for the present) to give a detailed analysis of the twenty-four numbers of which Paradise and the Peri is made up. Whether it be the fault of the subject, or the method of its treatment, I will not pretend to say, but the general impression produced on my own mind, as well as that of others whom I have heard discussing the question, was that Mr. Barnett's second work, although containing some clever writing, does not as a whole indicate any marked improvement upon his earlier effort, a certain flatness and absence of colouring being at times apparent, while many of the ideas, although agreeable enough in themselves, are hardly distinguished by any very profound originality of thought. The composer conducted his own work, the principal parts being in the competent hands of Mdlle. Tietjens (whose zealous co-operation is never more distinctly brought into play than when exercised on a new composition), Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli, all of whom exerted themselves to the utmost to ensure the success of the cantata. A tenor air, "Oh, if there be on this earthly sphere," and an unaccompanied quartet, "She wept—the air grew pure and clear," were encored by general desire, and an air for the bass "Blest tears of soul-felt penitence," was also repeated, but therefore seemed to puzzle not a few of the audience; for although it was in the first instance followed by some applause, the demonstration was by no means enthusiastic, and certainly insufficient to be construed into a demand for its repetition. In reading the invocation to liberty, which forms the subject of the tenor song, one cannot but reflect on the sham patriotism of Tom Moore—the early friend and associate of Robert Emmett—whose life paid the penalty of his devotion (right or wrong) to his country, while the little poet became a profe-sional diner-out, pet of the drawing-room, a hanger-on and toady of titled lords and ladies, a man whose "heart" was never likely to "bleed" much less "break" in the sacred cause—except on paper. Having honestly stated my own opinion as to Mr. Barnett's cantata, it is no less my duty to record the fact that at its close there was great applause, both from audience and orchestra, which was cordially acknowledged by the composer. As the new work occupied the whole of the first part of the concert, nearly two hours, it was late ere the second portion of the programme (appended below) was entered upon, and it was hard upon midnight ere it was concluded.

Overture (Freischütz)	...	Weber.
Song.—Mdlle. Drasdil, "Sleep dearest, sleep"		Randegger.
Carneval de Venice—Mdlle. Ilma di Murska		Benedict.
Trio—Mdme. L. Sherrington, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley
Duetto—Dunque il mio ben "(Flauto Magico)		Mozart.
Song.—Miss E. Wynne," Bid me discourse"		Sir H. Bishop.

How such an orchestra, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, would play the two overtures set down will be readily understood. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska made her first appearance before a Birmingham Festival audience, and created a highly favourable impression by her marvellous execution both of the "Carneval de Venice" and the Hungarian airs. To go into the particulars of what is for the most part so familiar to the London public, and indeed to all who take an interest in musical matters, is (happily) unnecessary; It would, however, have been well if the words of the song composed by Chevalier Lemmens (who played the organ obbligato accompaniment) and sung by his wife had been printed in the books. As it was, the hearers were completely ignorant of the fact that it is entitled "The Cradle," and that the words are by Tennyson. The following (of which I need hardly say I endorse every word) is from the Birmingham Daily Post:—

"The next feature, and musically the most important one of the concert, was Madame Arabella Goddard's performance of Mendelssohn's first (G minor) concerto, composed and first performed at Munich in 1832—the same prolific period which witnessed the production of the Italian symphony. It is some nine years, we believe, since this noble work has been heard at our Festivals, and on the last occasion, as on this, Madame Arabella Goddard was its principal interpreter. It is much to be regretted that, in the absence of a really first-class vocal orchestra, we are absolutely dependent on our Festival for the opportunity of hearing such performances, but the privation has its compensations in quickening our appreciation of a concerto when we get it, and especially when the executant is Madame Goddard. To judge by the eagerness with which Dr. Biller, Mr. Benedict, Signor Randegger, and other of the leading composers now congregated in Birmingham flocked into the hall as the fair pianist sat down to her instrument, the interest excited by the event was not confined to the local musical; and Madame Goddard had not, at all events, to complain of unappreciative hearers. Of the performance it were needless to speak, even if it were possible, at the late hour we write, to do justice to it. Suffice it that the three fine movements of which the work consists—the impetuous and fiery allegro, the tender and reposeful andante, and the sparkling, vivacious, we might almost say tumultuous rondo with which the work concludes—were each and all rendered with admirable skill and characteristic expression. The concluding movement—one of Liszt's grand effects —especially provoked the enthusiasm of the hearers, and on its conclusion loud and hearty cries of 'Bravo!' from various parts of the hall mingled with the more orthodox applause. The band, we need hardly say, acquitted itself to perfection."

To-day Sir Michael Costa's Naaman, composed for the Birmingham Festival of 1864 (September 7th), and not given here since that date, was performed with Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley in the principal parts. The tuneful and charming trio, "Haste! to Samaria let us go," and the remarkably effective chorus, "God, who cannot be unjust," were repeated at the desire of the President, who also held up his book as a signal that the, very telling and clever quartet, "Honour and glory," should be given again. Mr. Sims Reeves, however, had begun the following number, and, regarding the composer rather than the Earl, continued his task to the great satisfaction of all genuine lovers of music, to whom oratorios in oratories are repugnant to the last degree, whether proceeding from the unanimous voice of the public or the mandate of some local magnate "dressed in a little brief authority." While speaking of Mr. Reeves it would be unfair not to mention the magnificent manner in which he sang throughout the air, "Invoking death," calling for special remark. The grief and tenderness infused into the words, "It made me sad, it gave me pain," might well have brought tears into the eyes of many a strong man. The part of the captive Hebrew maid (in which it will be remembered Adelina Patti created such a sensation six years ago), fell to Miss Edith Wynne, for whose voice it might have been written, so exactly is it suited, and our clever English, or rather, Welsh singer, has added considerably to her already well-won laurels by the manner in which she has to-day acquitted herself, while the efforts of all the remaining principals are deserving of recognition as conducing materially to one of the best performances of the work ever heard, the only drawback to which was the extreme flatness and outrageously bad behaviour of the organ, which completely spoiled the masterly chorale, "When famine over Israel prevailed," and raised a general and ill-suppressed titter by the concluding pedal notes, which resembled rather the growls proceeding from Wombwell's Menagerie than the sounds one should expect from what is usually honoured by the designation of the King of Instruments—a title which might with some reason be called in question.

At the conclusion of the oratorio, enthusiastic applause and long-continued cheers burst from all parts of the hall, the orchestra, who best know and appreciate Sir Michael Costa's marvellous ability and indefatigable pains, being loudest of all in their tribute to the worth of their chief.

To-night's concert will bring the Festival half-way towards its termination, and vice-presidents, committees, and all concerned, are rejoicing at the certainty of a successful result, now placed beyond all manner of doubt.

THURSDAY, Sept. 1.

Last night's concert opened with the second novelty of the week, in the shape of a cantata containing an orchestral prelude and some half dozen numbers, entitled, Ode to Shakspere, the composer, who conducted his own work, being Professor it. P. Stewart, Mus. Doc., of Dublin. The compo-ition has one undeniable merit—it is very short; and, as brevity is said to be the soul of wit, so may brevity be considered the soul of Dr. Stewart's production, the execution of which by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Signor Foli, band and chorus, should have fully satisfied the Professor, who has had the singularly good fortune to present his Ode to the public through the medium of a Birmingham Festival. Time and opportunity are both very scarce just now, but did they exist in abundance, it would be no easy matter to criticize a work in which there is really nothing to criticize, so simple and inoffensive is it throughout. There is, however, one considerable profundity in connection with it, and that is the title, which is, indeed, a mystery, and hardly in accordance with the "eternal fitness of things." So far as any association with the immortal bard, whom our Vanity friend a speak of as the "divine William," is concerned, it might just as well have been designated, Ode to Brown, Jones, and Robinson, those companions of our early spelling-book stories.

The cantata was followed by the due, "E ben per mia memoria" (Gazza Ladra), sung by Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Patey, succeeded by another duet, "Tornami a dir" (Don Pasquale), Miss E. Wynne and Mr. Vernon Rigby; after which came Mdlle. Ilma di Murska with "O ines di quest' anima"—three pieces which have done such an amount of service in concert-rooms for so many years past, that it would be well to consider if they had not now arrived at that stage when they were fairly entitled to a little repose. Mr. A. S. Sullivan then took the bâton in hand to conduct his new composition, written expressly for the Festival, and named, Overture in Di Ballo. It has been objected that Mr. Sullivan, being an Englishman, and composing this work for an English Festival, should have given the title in Italian, rather than in his native tongue. Looking, however, at the programme of the evening concerts, and seeing the preponderance of Italian words (in no single instance accompanied by a translation), it may be assumed that the audiences who nightly grace the Town Hall with their presence, are all more or less intimately acquainted with the most sublenious of languages, in which case there is nothing more to be said. From the time when his exceedingly clever Tempest music brought Mr. Sullivan prominently before the public, he has done much, and shown abundant capacity for doing much more—his Prodigal Son, in particular, being a work of which any modern composer might well be proud. The overture produced last night fully carries out its title, the subjects being of a character at once light and tuneful, and, by their elegance and grace, reminding those who are old enough to remember the olden glories of Her Majesty's Theatre of the time when the ballet was, in its way, as charming and quite as much a feature as the opera;—the days when Taglioni, Cerito, Fanny Elesler, and Carlotta Grisi (most poetical of them all) delighted the eyes no less than the music of Giselle, Esmeralda, and many more such productions charmed the ear, and the Can-can would have been hooted from the stage. The orchestra is very ingenious, the effects are everywhere legitimate, and the large audience listened with pleased attention, applauding at the end with a warmth as spontaneous and hearty as it was well deserved. The following scheme shows how the second part of the concert was made up:—

PART II.

SELECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF BEETHOVEN.

Until reminded by the voice of the press that the year 1870 was the centenary anniversary of Beethoven, the Festival Committee seemed to ignore the fact, and it was only by a sort of half-reluctance that the half of one evening was conceded to the memory of the Shak-pere of music. To have such a magnificent band in front of one, and to know that they were not going to play so much as one symphony of the immortal nine, was, to say the least of it, provoking. However, there was no help for it, and one had to take consolation and feel grateful for even the instalment. The overture to Egmont was magnificently played, and warmly encored. It was the first time that Mdlle. Ilma di Muraka had ever sung "Ah perfido," and although unsuited to her voice, and having to contend against the drawback of a two days' sore throat, the intelligence which this clever artist brings to bear on everything she does carried her through wonderfully, and the long and trying scena and air met with well merited recognition at (or, rather, by) the hands of the public. How Mdlle. Tietjens sings the Fidelio air, and what genuine enjoyment is conferred by the association of two such artists as Mr. Sims Reeves and Madame Arabella Goddard in a song and accompaniment like "Adelaide," are too well known to require comment here, but a separate line of praise should be devoted to Mdlle. Drasdil, whose noble voice produced a great effect in the solemn air, "In questo tomba oscura."

To-day the Messiah has been given to the delight of an audience who not only filled every seat and every inch of standing room, but thronged passages, corridors, and out-of-the-way places, where, although they might hear Handel's imperishable work, certainly no more saw the executants than the individual in the Critic could see the British fleet, and for the same reason. Beyond stating that all the principal artists, except Mr. Vernon Rigby, whose name was not included, sang, and sang their best, and that the whole work was admirably performed and reverently heard by more than 2,000 people it will be sufficient for the occasion. To-night Dr. Hiller's new cantata, Nala and Damayanti will be produced, and everyone is on the qui vive for to-morrow, when Mr. Benedict's oratorio, St. Peter, will be given for the first time and is looked forward to as the crowning triumph of a triumphant Festival.

DERWENTWATER HARD.

WEIMAR.—Her von Loën, the Intendant-General of the Grand Ducal Theatre, has joined the German army as a Knight of St. John.

HAMBURGH.—The patriotic opera, Zieten'sche Husaren, is in rehearsal at the Stadttheater.—An Italian operatic company lately concluded a series of performances at Schultz's Theatre, but gave only six, and then pursued their way to Sweden where they are engaged for a considerable period.

AUGSBURG.—The combined Associations for Male Choral Singing lately gave a concert for the benefit of the wounded German soldiers, and the relatives of those who have fallen. The programme included songs of a patriotic nature which were all loudly applauded by an enthusiastic and most numerous audience.

VIENNA.—Herr Campe, a member of the company at the Imperial Operahouse, died lately at Reichenhall. His loss will be severely felt, because, though his talent was not of the highest order, he was a diligent and painstaking artist, whose services were most valuable in a great number of parts, not considerable enough for a leading singer, and yet too important to be entrusted to a bad one.—Herr Wilhelm Westmeyer has composed a new operetta, which he has sent in to the Carl Theatre.—Mr. Adams has left the Imperial Opera. There is a probability that Sig. Cerwa, an Italian, will be engaged in his place. The Signor is at present sedulously engaged in the study of German. —The management of the Imperial Opera are busy getting up Robert Le Diable, Lohengrin, La Juive, Mignon, Der Fliegende Holländer, and a new opera, Judith, the last being by Herr Franz Doppler.—Herr Gustav Lewy, the music-publisher, has joined Herr Ullmann in a project for giving a series of monster concerts next season.—Herr Ellinger, the Hungarian tenor, has proposed to bring the whole of the operatic company from the National Theatre, Pesth, to the Theater an der Wien, in 1871, and let them give performances of some celebrated Hungarian operas, such as Bank-Ban, Hunyadi, Ilka, and others. There is a probability that Herr Steiner, the manager of the Theater an der Wien, will carry out the idea.—Herr Wachtel will sing in a round of operas at the Carltheater next month.

Hereford Festival.

The Daily Telegraph thus criticises Mr. Holmes's cantata, Praise ye the Lord:—

"The third morning performance must not be dismissed in the necessarily brief terms of yesterday's letter, if only for the sake of the new novelty at this Festival—Mr. Henry Holmes's cantata, Praise ye the Lord. Mr. Holmes cannot fairly be congratulated upon his choice of words, remembering the abundance of excellent matter on the same subject in the Bible and elsewhere. Dr. Isaac Watts is undoubtedly a well-known poet, and his fame is likely to endure as long as that of Milton, though for different reasons. But, to put the case mildly, the worthy author of 'Let dogs delight to bark and bite' did not always rise to the highest level—a fact proved by, among other things, his hymn, 'Praise ye the Lord: 'tis good to raise.' This, unhappily, is the effusion selected by Mr. Holmes, who has tried hard to invest with dignity such lines as—

'What is the creature's skill or force—
The sprightly man, or warlike horse?'

That he has failed may be assumed. That there was any necessity for incurring the liability may be denied. The cantata is short, consisting only of five numbers, and is written throughout with great simplicity both of style and treatment. In point of fact, it makes very little more pretence than Dr. Madan's "Denmark"—a hymn-setting that still exists in remote places. On other points no comparison between the two works can be drawn, Mr. Holmes having written throughout like a musician capable of the better things he should occasionally have attempted ere now on occasion as this. There is small encouragement to go into details, but it may be well to mention that the hymn contains a chorus, 'Praise ye the Lord,' of the plainest character; a soprano solo, 'Sing to the Lord,' which is decidedly agreeable; a second and partly unaccompanied chorus, 'But saints are lowly,' written almost literally 'note against note;' and a finale consisting of the repeated opening with a coda. In dismissing the cantata thus briefly, it may pertinently be asked whether the Festival of the Three Choirs is tending when works so insignificant are accepted. A little farther advance in the same direction may place it at the mercy of the unknown Handels and Mendelssohns of these provincial regions; at any rate, few beside would care to be mixed up with an institution taking so low a view of what it has to accomplish."

The same paper gave the following account of the third and most interesting morning performance:—

"Beautiful weather and the presence of Royalty have favoured the third day of the Festival even more than the second, the sun shining in a nearly cloudless sky, and the Prince and Princess Christian reaching the Cathedral early enough for the National Anthem to introduce instead of interrupting the performance. But not even these auspicious circumstances could command success, and the audience showed a sad falling-off in numbers. It may be that the public are reserving themselves for the Messiah to-morrow—every place is already taken by the lovers of Handel's masterpiece—but I prefer to see in the slack attendance an emphatic condemnation of the miscellaneous programmes to which reference has already been made. That these gatherings should as a matter of principle, honour the greatest works of art, amounts to a truism, as it is now clear that the path of duty is also the path of profit. Had some famous oratorio been presented this morning instead of "odds and ends," the Cathedral, it is safe to assert, would have worn a different appearance. However, says nothing against the merits of the compositions selected—merit easily estimated when we mention that the Reformation Symphony, Christus, "As the hart pants" (Mendelssohn), and excerpts from Esther, Solomon, Judas Maccabæus, and Jephtha had a place in the programme. The Festival now in progress will be remarkable for bold innovations, made in the very teeth of a powerful party, who would either abolish the institution altogether or reform it out of knowledge. The evening concert of Tuesday was on these defiant steps, and the performance of Mendelssohn's symphony was another, and, perhaps, not the least objectionable to many worthy folks. Never before has a purely orchestral composition, unconnected with a sacred subject, been heard in an English cathedral; and the event may possibly initiate important changes in the direction of these Festivals. At any rate, not a few persons were quite ready to admit symphonies—those excepted which have an avowedly secular character—to the Cathedral programmes believing that the noblest example of a noble art cannot possibly degrade the temple of religion. It would be difficult, however, to find one more suitable than that with which Mendelssohn celebrated a great event in religious history. Its lofty dignity, artistic illustration and free use of themes long consecrated to purposes of worship, place it entirely apart from other things of the kind; and might well conciliate even the sternest objector to its use. The impression made by a performance, generally creditable, in some respects admirable, was all that could be desired; and it is hard to conceive the existence of a sense of incongruity in the mind of anybody present. Mendelssohn's fragmentary oratorio, Christus, upon which the illustrious master was engaged when he paid the inevitable penalty of overwork, followed the symphony; both it and the performance deserving a more extended notice than can now be given. To dwell upon these interesting evidences of a noble purpose in course of being nobly developed; to show how almost divine was the simple grandeur of style dictated to Mendelssohn by his exquisite sense of propriety; and to speculate what the oratorio would have been had he completed it, is a labour of love to all who appreciate the highest genius. But the pleasant task cannot be entered upon here; and it must suffice to record that no music yet given at this Festival has made a greater impression, while those who knew it before are still further convinced that the Christus of Mendelssohn would have ranked in public esteem with the Messiah of Handel. Apart from the solos which were well given by Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Montem Smith; apart, also, from the charming trio, 'Say, where is He?' capitally sung by Messrs. Smith, Sims, and Everett, the performance left a good deal to desire. Few, however, will be disposed to visit shortcomings heavily, choosing rather to be thankful for the privilege of hearing music so beautiful and so seldom produced. 'As the hart pants' suffered from insufficient preparation yet more than Christus, not even the conductor (who is also, by an objectionable arrangement, secretary of the Festival) having found time to master its details. The solos were sung by Mdlle. Tietjens, who brought to them less than her usual confidence. Mr. Henry Holmes's new cantata, Praise ye the Lord, must be set aside till a more convenient opportunity for discussing its merits; and there only remains the Handelian selection, which, happily, can be noticed in the few minutes yet remaining before this letter is despatched. From Solomon were taken, 'What though I trace' (Madame Patey), and 'From the censer.' Jephtha contributed 'Farewell, ye limpid springs' (Mdlle. Tietjens), 'Deeper and deeper still' (Mr. Bigby), and the chorus, 'When Ilia lond voice. Out of Judas, 'Pious orgies' (Miss Wynne), 'O Father, whose Almighty power,' 'Arm, arm, ye brave' (Mr. Santley), 'From mighty kings' (Mdlle. Tietjens), and 'Sound an alarm' (Mr. Bigby), were the principal selections; the whole concluding with the Coronation Anthem. Almost without exception these familiar things were well rendered—a fact which might easily have been anticipated."

THE HEREFORD FESTIVAL SERMON.

By the Rev Dr Jeans, Canon Residentiary.

"He is a father of the fatherless and defendeth the cause of the widows: even God in His holy habitation."—Psalm lxviii. 5.

In the opening clauses of this jubilant and triumphant psalm, the abounding love of God is associated with His Majesty and honour as things inseparable, as both alike calling for our praise and adoration. You will remember, my brethren, the words which immediately precede: "O sing unto God and sing praises unto His name: magnify Him that rideth upon the heavens; praise Him in his name Jah and rejoice before Him." And thus, throughout Holy Scripture are the things in heaven and the things in earth connected by a bond which shall never be broken; those creatures of His whom by an unfailing charity, displayed alike within the kingdom of nature and the kingdom of grace, he perpetually nourishes and sustains, and that eternal glory of His boundless and incomprehensible nature which was His before all worlds and shall be world without end. Such were the thoughts of the Psalmist, dictated by an infallible inspiration, when he specially called to mind, in the psalm before us, the wonders of the deliverance from Egypt, of the Red Sea, of the wilderness of Mount Sinai, of the wars of God, of the supernatural settlement of his chosen people within the borders of their promised inheritance. His glory was seen and the power of His mighty hand and stretched-out arm was displayed, but His mercy was no less exhibited by more than one loving sign—by the deliverance from the waters of the Red Sea, by the manna rained down from heaven, by the waters which gushed out from the rocks in the dry places and which became during their sojourn perennial rivers; by all the tenderness of that care which preserved his people alive for so many years, which forgave their repeated sins by that pity so much exceeding that of a human parent for his children. But if these were the thoughts of David, if themes like these prompted his inspired song, what ought not to be the reflections of Christian worshippers—the free will offering of our sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, when we think upon the mercies and the glories of God as manifested in Christ Jesus our Lord! If, then, amidst the severe enactments of the older law the cause of the fatherless and widow occupied a place so prominent, how thankful ought we to be that the great law of love, enunciated in that first and great commandment, and in that second, which is like unto it, has been so confirmed and illustrated and expanded by the revelation of Christ our Lord as actually to be called in Scripture a new commandment, known indeed in ancient times, and yet when but partially revealed; the clouds have passed away, and we behold the Sun of Righteousness in the fulness of His glory. And when with the Psalmist we sing praises unto God we know to the very joy of our heart what is implied by the aspiration, "Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost"—and when we regard him as the Father of the fatherless and the defender of the cause of the widows we know how it is that we are to seek to be partakers of the Divine nature, and by what kind and effectual encouragements, by what preventing and assisting grace we are led to imitate the example of our God—how to practise that pure and undefiled religion, which is "To visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world." It is with great thankfulness, my brethren, that I have been led to reflect how often these two great topics, the celebration of God's glory and the imitation of His mercy, have formed the subject of addresses from this place on the occasion of our Triennial Festival—how earnestly and how tenderly within our own recollection the objects of a very charitable institution have been brought before the congregations assembled here—how frequently that passage of St. James just referred to has formed the text of the several discourses here uttered. But, on the other hand, I am anxious to remind you how frequently also the vindication of these gatherings, considered as choral festivals, has been also urged—a topic which in this very place has called forth the eloquence and pious learning of one of the very best men whom this favoured Church of England was known, when he set forth in words which bid fair to be coeval with our language and common wealth the beauty of holiness, in the Book of Common Prayer, which, after the Holy Scriptures themselves, is our best inheritance. Now I am for more sessions, my brethren, on the present occasion to bring into connection these two topics—praise to God and active charity towards men, because of late years especially it is to be feared there has been a misapprehension as to the real and fundamental object of this Festival. It is the common error of human nature to take but a one-sided view of a matter which cannot properly be considered but under more than one aspect. Thus it is that in many a question involving various particulars men may be led by their peculiar tastes or notions to disparage one of them, and perhaps to unduly exalt another, forgetting that in those elements of the natural world, which are apparently the most simple as the air and water, there is a perfect combination of more than one ingredient. And so, perhaps, with respect to the present Festival, which if fairly considered, consists of two ingredients, which are each capable of being separated not only with advantage to them, but even I do not hesitate to say—and some of those great and holy men who have preceded me in my present office have not hesitated to say—may be of benefit to our inmost nature; may tend to the health of our souls. Of the charity itself, its scheme is so simple, its claims are so obvious, the want it designs to relieve are, unhappily, so open to our observation that upon its specific character I shall think it hardly necessary to speak. But as to the Choral Festival upon which the charity was engrafted, let it be remembered, as an afterthought (for such is its true history), I would wish to offer a few remarks—though time requires they should be cursory and suggestive rather than argumentative—in words which in order to be consistent with honesty and sincere conviction, must be partly those of commendation—partly, if you will so far bear with one who really wishes you well, of censure, though I venture to hope that my expressions of misgiving will hardly deserve such a harsh term. First, then, as to the assumption above alluded to. This Festival, or properly and strictly speaking, this Meeting of the Three Choirs, reinforced by the ability, and I may now thankfully say by religion and piety of many of our first musicians, has been censured by some people as having a mere device and engine of gain, and a very expensive and very cumbrous machine for the raising of funds for a charitable object. They complain that there is somewhat of pretence in this, that people congregate together and go to some expense under the plea of charity, but really for the object of amusing themselves, of gratifying their ears, and that, in a manner inadequately called, deceiving themselves by false pretences! Now, my brethren, I am not, nor have ever been an unqualified advocate of these Festivals as they have been for several years conducted. But sure I am that great justice has been done by many to the real intention of a Festival expected at this one period, on the one hand, and to the feelings and principles of many good and pious and active Christians on the other. As already observed, the idea of a contribution for a specific eleemosynary purpose was not that which originated these meetings in the early part of the last century. There were merely similar to those which had been held for some thirty years before. The primary motion was the assembling in the churches of the choirs of the three neighbouring Cathedrals for the purpose of celebrating the glory of God with a choral magnificence, and in a manner which from its very nature could be but occasional and exceptional. For many obvious reasons, into which I cannot attempt to enter, it must necessarily be but exceptional and for one I should not desire it to be otherwise. But it cannot be doubted that the feeling was a religious one—or that if it was an amusement it was so in a far higher sense than the word is usually understood to imply. It is a recreation, like those mentioned in the Psalm, to religion to derive from the contemplation of the works of God—a sober and intelligent and thankful enjoyment of one of God's great gifts, perfectly consistent with a recognition of God's worship to be not only a duty but a pleasure, which acknowledges music to be a Divine gift, nay, even a matter of Divine ordinance as it was in time, as you, my brethren know, or ought to know, in the Temple. The charitable collection at the doors was an after suggestion of that very man of whom mention has been made—the Rev. Dr. Bisse, Chancellor of this Cathedral, and the author, as you know of "The Beauty of Holiness," in the Book of Common Prayer—one of the most earnest and worthy sons of the Church, and an earnest supporter of this Festival. And surely it is not pretended that by the many sincere servants of God who have rejoiced to congregate here at the rare interval of three years that they come solely to contribute to the charity. Can I do them the injustice to suppose that they do not also come for the glory of God, or at least for the soothing and edification and enlargement of their devotional feelings and their religious taste, for the rational cultivation of that art which, when properly exercised, is as much a healing and medicinal gift of God, as the most potent herbs, or purest waters of comfort. Mention, I have said, is made of expense. Some foolish people there may be who may make such meetings the occasion of some miserable extravagance in dress, or of some other vanity. We must remember, however, that that is the case in all human assemblies whatever the occasion; nor, so long as man remains a gregarious or social animal will this be prevented. But I very sincerely doubt, I more than doubt whether these exceptional and by no means necessary evils outweigh or at all equal the advantages. Amidst the cares of a miserable world, amidst the pursuits of human nature which have commonly so lowering and mean a tendency, in a nation so absorbed as we are either with the objects of commerce or the unhealthy pursuit of what is called politics (the bad amusement of some and the torment of others with whom this is necessary, though sad and weary occupation)—amidst, I say, all these things, is it nothing that we have such occasions of healthy recreation,—that for a purpose so innocent in itself (for I am speaking not of its abuse but of its use), our provincial towns are delivered for a few days by kindly hospitality and neighbourly cordiality? This, to be sure, is not taking the highest ground, and yet the latter consideration deserves attention. But further as to the expense. If there be experienced here the proper influence of high and holy music such as some of our living composers, animated by a spirit evidently religious, are seeking to invoke, who can find fault with the moderate expenditure involved. It is not for me here to speak particularly of amusements properly so called; I would only entreat those who employ such an argument to ask—How much money is spent without reproach by some of those very persons who condemn our Musical Festivals as wrong, sacrilegious, or wasteful, upon some favourite amusement of perpetual recurrence, involving great waste of time, much idleness, some expenditure of dress? I would ask them to think of this, and then to examine candidly how far the results of the latter are to be compared for excellence or permanence with those of the other? Let me add this expense has been incurred from time to time by many who, in the ordinary tenor of their lives, are charitable, self-denying, and religious, and given to bless good works such as this Festival promotes, being themselves the habitual friends of the poor, the fatherless, and the widow. And can we be so ungrateful as to forget that among the gifted performers on these occasions there have been many who have shown in the very exercise of their difficult and laborious profession a largeness of heart and a charity which their God will assuredly not forget and will abundantly reward. I speak of both the living and the dead. But the time warns me that I must hasten on, though I find it difficult to compress the thoughts which arise upon a subject so interesting. Let me, then, somewhat abruptly pass on to the subject of the several oratorios which have been performed within past weeks at this Festival. With the fullest admission that their performance at cathedrals does not date back further than the middle of last century, it is at the same time with the most real and heartfelt gratitude to God that I recognise an increased religious feeling in the composition of those works, which, indeed, never has been altogether wanting, but which, to judge by what will be heard during the present Festival, has been on the increase. It is notorious, too, that on the part of the hearers sobriety of feeling, decorum, and religious attention, has been manifestly on the increase also, so much so that on the last occasion of the holding of the Festival in this place, the reflection might have naturally suggested itself to my mind was that those present constituted not so much an audience as a congregation. May not such considerations mitigate at least the criticism of those who regard all concerted sacred music as mere exhibitions, who choose to look upon an oratorio as something pert and secular? We believe that there can be no religious music in which rough and undisciplined voices, guided by a rejection of all taste and knowledge, or by utterly incorrigible ears do not join; and who would, in short, convert the music of the Church into noise? May it not be conceded that a man may praise God as truly and as cordially while listening with his ears as when audibly joining in the song? May he not effectually praise God with his heart while following with devotion and feeling the vocalisation of others who, so far (that is externally, not internally or spiritually), are his representatives? But, my dear brethren, arises the deep question of religious edification. Upon such a topic I can only barely touch. When the lawfulness or edification of some oratorios or scientific Church music and instrumentation are in question I would venture to remind you of the answer given by the eminent French divine, Bandeau, when he who asked him as to the moral lawfulness of certain amusements "Madame," he replied, "I ought to ask that question of you." Your own conscience, my brethren, must bear you witness in this respect. If you come here merely for that indulgence in music which is sensual, which is abstracted from religious feeling, which regards this holy fabric as a mere concert-room, which fails to regard these performances as auxiliary to the more direct worship of God. I would counsel you either to stay away or to pray to God to give you a better mind. And yet I must be bold to say that that man's heart must be strangely constituted who may not receive edification, and therefore salutary impressions from those illustrations of the Divine narratives and prophecies or those holy aspirations of inspired men which will form the subject matter of our present Festival—which speak of the glorious life of the Prophets of the Lord or celebrate the wonders of the newly-created world, which sing of the innocence and piety of Isaac and Rebekah, the examplars of holy matrimony, which recall to us the great doctrines of repentance and forgiveness (in the history of the Prodigal Son), or which place before us the Judgment seat of God, the life and sufferings of Christ; the parting of the Soul for the living God, or direct praise of him for the works of his hands, or lastly that most sublime of all musical epics which celebrate the sufferings and glory of the Messiah—I say that they must have a strangely constituted and perverted heart who could derive no spiritual benefit from such performances as these. But here, my brethren, I must interpose as briefly as may be a few words of misgiving. Without the slightest intention of disparagement to those whose pious labours—for such they are—to which I have alluded. I must express nevertheless a regret in which I am by no means singular, that there should have been so large a departure of late years from the original system in these Festivals: of having the regular service of the Church, with its unequalled supplications and thanksgivings, thrown into the background, or divested of its choral accompaniments of instruments and for the music which formerly adorned it. Doubtless we have much to be thankful for of late years, and most grateful do I for one acknowledge the returning sense of piety which by a bad and lawless innovation had been suspended; but let me remind you that for many years after the institution of this and earlier Festivals of the same kind (dating to the time of the Restoration) there was a full choral service celebrated on both of the days to which the festival was originally limited. On one of those days that almost inspired composition of Handel's, the "Dettingen" Te Deum was introduced in its proper place, and on the next day that of Purcell, the precursor of Handel's and, though it be a bold thing to say, in some respects its superior; and the rest of the choral performance was confined to some of the noblest anthems which have ever been rendered in the Church of God. In the course of time, however an innovation was made which, though an innovation, yet was so exceptional in its character, so intrinsically excellent as to become before long part of the devotions of the people—I mean the introduction of the oratorio of the Messiah into our cathedrals on one of the days of the Festival when their number was enlarged to three. That glorious musical epic stands alone. It struck upon a chord and nerve of the English people which had never been so excited before. It told in musical language, and with a devotional feeling never yet equalled, the life of Christ in the words of Revelation, selected with a skill fully harmonising with its sentiments and strains. It was the deliberate creation of the great Alexander Knox that this noble composition was, under God, one of the means by which the religion of England was preserved in a low and degenerate age from utter corruption; and I must confess to a strong feeling of repugnance too having a subject so very sacred, and which it is known by its author was under the most fervent religious impressions, performed elsewhere than in a consecrated house of God. It harmonizes with every association of architecture, ritual, and all the appliances of religion which characterize our great minsters. And yet is that all? Is that the end? Is that the intention the shadow of the Cathedral for the purpose of maintaining its daily services. These things, my brethren, ought not to be. They are among the scandals of our generation. I and others of my brethren have stood here ministering day by day, and have witnessed this neglect with sorrow of heart, so that one is almost tempted to say, "The ways of Sion do mourn because none come to her solemn peace," and yet among those who stay away are some who mercilessly find fault with our Cathedrals, never having taken pains to understand our great difficulties, our real constitution, who stay away, and yet who talk of the thinness of our week-day congregations? Truly they take an ingenious method to remedy this last defect. Will not the at least present awful times warn you? Do you not feel that our very recreations at such a time are almost unseasonable; and ought it not to be our endeavour to render these Festivals not only more religious than before, but also to introduce in our daily life more attention to God's worship, more faithful homage to the King of all the earth? Who can tell how long these buildings may remain to us as the sanctuaries of God—whether this Cathedral will be continued as such three years hence. when, in the ordinary course of things, this Festival should recur. The judgments of God are broad. God give us all repentance ere it be too late!

PROVINCIAL.

HERNE BAY.—A correspondent informs us that a concert was given on Thursday, the 25th ult., in the New Town Hall, in aid of the Christ Church Enlargement Fund, when a large audience assembled, and were evidently pleased with the programme provided for them. Among the amateurs who lent their kind aid were Mrs. Francis Talfourd (always ready to assist a good work) and Mr. Croft. The artists who gave their aid were Miss E. Howell, Mrs. H. Geary; Messrs. V. Nicholson, Lambert, E. Howell, Lawrence Alport, and Aguilar. Many of the pieces were re-demanded, including Weber's "L'Invitation à la Valse," pianoforte, Mr. Aguilar, who, instead of playing the same piece again, gave his transcription of "The Blue Bells of Scotland;" Smart's "Good-night, farewell," Mr. Croft; "La Donna e Mobile," substituted); and a song by Mr. Edward Terry, entitled "Complaints," sung by Mr. Lawrence Alport, who answered the demand for repetition by giving one having a military subject for its burthen. Several other compositions were received with favour, including a trio by Mayseder, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Miss Fanny Howell, Mr. V. Nicholson, and Mr. G. Howell); a violoncello solo by Piatti, capitally played by Mr. Howell, who was deservedly re-called; a transcription, for pianoforte, of "Ch' ni frena," well played by the composer (Mr. Aguilar); and Professor Bennett's chorus from the May Queen, "With a laugh as we go round," arranged as a trio, excellently sung by Mrs. Francis Talfourd, Mrs. H. Geary, and Miss F. Howell. Two duets, a "Souvenir," by Signor Pinsuti, and "Greeting," by Mendelssohn, were well rendered, the former by Mrs. Francis Talfourd and Mr. Croft, and the latter by Mrs. Geary and Mr. Howell, pleased greatly. Mr. Croft's singing of Herr Blumenthal's "May Queen" must not be passed over without a word of praise. The conductor was Mr. Longhurst, who executed his duties in musicianly style.

WAIFS.

Herr Maurice Strakosch is in London, en route for the United States.

M. Jacobi, the well-known chef d'orchestre of the Théâtre des Bouffes Parisiens, has arrived in London.

The two carved oak chairs placed in Hereford Cathedral for their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess Christian were sent from Stoke Edith Park for the occasion by the Lady Emily Foley.

Among the most efficient members of the chorus at the recent Hereford Festival were thirty-two singers from the famous Bradford Choral Society (under the direction of Mr. Leach).

Mr. Mapleson, with his Italian opera troop, head-d by Mdlle. Tietjens, will give operas in Dublin, Liverpool, Manchester, &c., during this and the ensuing month. In November he has leased Covent Garden for a short winter season.

Mdlle. Nilsson passed through London during the week en route to Liverpool, to embark for the United States in the Cunard line mail ship Cuba, which leaves the Mersey this day. Mr. Jarrett, her agent, accompanies her.

The editor of the Tomahawk writes as subjoined:—"Owing to the inability of the liquidator of the estate of Sir William Russell, Bart., to comply with an order of the Court of Bankruptcy in reference to the Tomahawk, I am forced to stop the publication of that periodical at the height of its popularity."

The Baron von Rabe, husband of Madame Pauline Lucca, died a few days ago from the effects of the wounds he received at one of the recent battles between the German and French troops. Herr Bock, son of the eminent music publisher of Berlin, has, we hear, met with the same fate.

Mr. Townshend Smith, who had been previously thanked by his Royal Highness Prince Christian, was after Thursday morning's proceedings in Hereford Cathedral sent for by the Princess, to whom he was introduced by Lord Bateman. Her Royal Highness said she had been very delighted with the performances, and that they had been a great treat to her, a compliment which by general assent Mr. Smith well merited.

DEAR LORD BATEMAN,—I am desired by Prince and Princess Christian to offer to you, and all others concerned, their Royal Highnesses best thanks for the manner in which the arrangements for their visits on Wednesday and Thursday last to the Musical Festival were carried out, and to assure you of the great pleasure which their Royal Highnesses derived from their attendance on those occasions, and how sensible they are of the cordial welcome they received in Hereford.—I remain, yours very truly,

Stoke Edith Park, Ledbury. CHARLES ELIOTT.

Miss Faithfull is about to give a series of lectures on purely literary subjects on the 19th September, before the Popular Science Institute at York; in October at the City of London College, and the Hartley Institution at Southampton, &c. During November Miss Faithfull will lecture in Devonshire and Cornwall, and in December at the Philosophical Institution, Newcastle, and throughout Scotland. We understand she has offered to lecture elsewhere in aid of the funds being collected for the relief of the wounded French and German soldiers.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Times.")

BIRMINGHAM, Sept. 2.

Novelties crowd one upon another at this extraordinarily busy Festival, the success of which seems now to be placed beyond the shadow of a doubt. The enterprise of the Committee of Management assuredly merited such a result; but, at the same time, everything has been in their favour, not the least important phenomenon of the week being the unchangeable fine weather. A programme more varied in its attractions than that which Sir Michael Costa had prepared for the occasion could hardly be imagined. Upon the works which stood in no need of further recognition—such as Elijah, the Messiah, his own Naaman, and Handel's Samson, with which the Festival comes to an end to-night—he might have reckoned as a matter of course; but, in addition to these, all the new things produced have more or less justified his choice, while the miscellaneous evening programmes, intended chiefly for the exhibition of solo vocalists, have without exception been happily made out. One thing is certain—everybody appeared content; and "What a splendid Festival, even for Birmingham!" is the general exclamation.

Since yesterday two more novelties have been tried, and both have passed triumphantly through the ordeal. The first of these was Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's new dramatic cantata, entitled Nala and Damayanti, the libretto by Sophie Hasenclever Schadow (the English version made expres-ly for the occasion being by Madame Natalia Macfarren). This new work took up the whole of the first part of the concert yesterday evening; and that, combined with other conspicuous features in the programme, it proved a genuine attraction the official statement subjoined will suffice to prove:—

	Number attending.	Receipts.
President and Vice-Presidents' seats (15s. each)	35 ...	£26 5 0
Secured seats (10s. each)	810 ...	607 10 0
Unsecured seats (8s. each)	769 ...	307 12 0
Total	1,614	£941 7 0

The composer himself directed the performance, and on appearing in the orchestra was welcomed with the hearty enthusiasm which English amateurs have always in reserve for foreigners, especially distinguished in the musical art, among whom Ferdinand Hiller stands deservedly high, although not so many of his important compositions are generally known in this country as might be desirable. In writing Nala and Damayanti for the Birmingham Festival Dr. Hiller has enriched its by no means limited repertory of original compositions by the addition of a new masterpiece. Without entering for the moment into a critical analysis of the admirably characteristic music to which the poem of Nala and Damayanti is set we may submit the argument, in order to afford our readers some notion of the peculiar kind of task which Dr. Hiller has undertaken:—

"Nala and Damayanti is founded on a Hindu poem of great antiquity—'The Nala' one of the episodes of the 'Mahabharata.' The two great epic poems of Ancient India, the 'Mahabharata' and 'Ramayana,' bear something like the same relation to Hindu literature, with respect to national importance as the 'Iliad' and the 'Odyssey' to that of Ancient Greece. The 'Mahabharata' is an aggregate of epics, founded on popular legends of antiquity. The compiler is said to have been Vyasas, who lived about 500 years before Homer. The episode of 'Nala' occurs in the 'Mahabharata as an incidental narrative. A holy Brahmin, in order to restore hope and courage to a fallen prince, ruined by gambling, relates to him the history of the Rajah Nala, who, in old times, had, like him, lost everything at two fatal games of dice, and nevertheless had not sunk into dispair. This episode is the subject of the third of the eighteen 'cantos' or 'parvas' of the 'Mahabharata.' King Bhima has a daughter, Damayanti. Nala hears entrancing praises of her, and she the like of Nala. Though at a distance they fall desperately in love, and miraculous swans convey letters between them. The King desiring to marry his daughter, there is a competition of princes for her hand, but Damayanti will not accept anyone but Nala. Nala appears at last with a sad message from the gods, who have bound him to declare that Damayanti must choose one of the immortals. But she will accept no one but Nala, and the gods do not insist. The marriage takes place, and Nala conducts his wife to his kingdom of Nishadha. Days of misfortune come. The god Kali, jealous of Nala, induces him to play at dice with his brother, and he looses all—wealth, chariots, robes, kingdom, and wife. Nala flies to a forest; his wife will not forsake him, but, unwilling to allow her to share his misfortune, he flies from her. Damayanti wanders in search of him; each encounters dangers and sufferings, racked by the thought of the possible fate of the other. The constant lovers at last succeed in meeting, and by a fortunate occurrence, Nala, winning back his treasures and kingdom, lives happily with his beloved Damayanti. The dramatic cantata, by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, is built upon the earlier part of the story. It comprises the desolation of the Princess, dreaming of her lover; the ceremony, ordained by King Bhima, of disposing of her hand; the communication of the gods to Nala; his despair; his appearance at the climax of Damayanti's anxiety, only to give his message; Damayanti's choice; the appearance of the gods offering her immortality, and their retirement before the resolve of the Princess; and the union of Nala and Damayanti."

At present it must suffice to add that the performance, although there had been only one general rehearsal, although the music is as difficult as it is original, and although Dr. Hiller's manner of beating time with the conductor's stick is strange to the members of our orchestra, was really excellent; that Miss Edith Wynne (Damyanti), Mr. Cummings (Nala), and Mr. Santley (King Bhima), were the solo singers; and that the cantata was received with every mark of favour. It may be remarked, in passing, that on more than one occasion when the applause was most general, hearty, and prolonged, Dr. Hiller would by no means consent to appropriate it all to himself, but, gallantly taking Miss Edith Wynne by the hand, in this manner publicly showed his sense of the services rendered to his music by the accomplished young Welshwoman, an act which did honour alike to himself and to the artist whose exertions had been evidently so much to his satisfaction. That the freedom of Birmingham has been conferred upon Nala and Damayanti and its composer admits of no doubt. We may, perhaps, have an oratorio from Dr. Hiller (he has written two) one of these days—who can say?

The cantata was followed by Beethoven's sonata for pianoforte and violin, played by Madame Arabella Goddard and M. Sainton, who were both called back at the conclusion. To this succeeded the following miscellaneous programme:—

Overture (William Tell)		Rossini.
Duo—"Son geloso," Mdlle. Ilma di Murska and Mr. Vernon Rigby (Sonnambula)		Bellini.
Song—"Requital," Mr. Sims Reeves		Blumenthal.
Air—Madame L. Sherrington, "Invano il fato" (Robert il Diavolo)		Meyerbeer.
Trio—Mdlle. Tietjens, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Vernon Rigby, "Vanne a colei"		Sir M. Costa.
Song—Signor Foli, "Fireside Dreams"		Reyloff.
Song—Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, "Roberto o tu che adoro" (Roberto il Diavolo)		Meyerbeer.
Trio—Madame Sherrington, Mr. Cummings, and Signor Foli, "Il vento tace" (I Naviganti)		Randegger.
Duo—Miss E. Wynne and Mdlle. Drasdil, "Dolce comforto" (Giuramento)		Mercadante.
Serenade—Mr. Vernon Rigby, "The joy of truly loving" (The Dream)		Sir M. Costa.
Trio—Miss E. Wynne, Mdlle. Drasdil, and Mr. Cummings "Ti prego, O Madre pia"		Carschmann.
Hungarian Song—Mdlle. Ilma di Murska.
Quartet—Mdme. Sherrington, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Cummings, and Signor Foli, "Over the dark blue Waters"		Weber.

The overture was superbly played, and encored so unanimously that Sir Michael Costa was compelled to give the last movement again. A word of unqualified praise is due to Mr. Edward Howell for the admirably pure tone and expression with which he gave the melody allotted to the first violoncello, the beautiful introduction to this most picturesque of dramatic preludes.

There is barely time to add that Mr. Benedict's oratorio, St. Peter, was performed to-day with a success that was never for an instant doubtful, and, what is still better, a success no less amply merited than it was brilliant. As it will be necessary to speak of the music of this oratorio somewhat in detail, its importance as a work of art being unquestionable, it is advisable at once to give Mr. Benedict's own account of the manner in which he has found it expedient to accommodate the subject to his ends. Here, then, is his argument:—

"The subject of St. Peter might be treated in various ways for the purposes of oratorio. Within no ordinary limits, however, could all the important events of the Apostle's life and all the significance of his character and position be illustrated. The aim of the present work is very simple. It affects neither to show, exclusively as such, Peter the Disciple nor Peter the Apostle; its object, moreover, is not to treat the chief personage concerned in any symbolical or representative capacity. What has been attempted is merely the illustration of a few of those occurrences in St. Peter's life which most invite musical treatment, and, at the same time, exhibit the Galilean fisherman as an object of the Divine regard which so pre-eminently distinguished him.

"PART I.

"The Divine Call.—Galilean fishermen are preparing to rest from the labours of the day, when John the Baptist appears, urging them to 'Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand.' After the forerunner comes the Master.—He commands Peter to leave all and follow him. Peter obeys, expressing his firm confidence in the goodness of the Lord, and departs amid the benedictions of his friends and neighbours.

"Trial of Faith.—The Saviour, having sent his disciples to 'the other side,' retires to a mountain apart to pray. While thus engaged the storm rises and the little ship is in distress. Jesus appears walking on the waters, to the terror of His disciples, whom he speedily reassures, bidding them not to fear. Peter obtains permission to leave the ship and go to Jesus, but his faith fails him, and 'beginning to sink,' he is sustained by the hand of his Lord. They reach the ship, and immediately the storm ceases. A chorus of praise and thanksgiving then brings the first part to an end.

"PART II.

"Denial.—Peter declares his resolve to follow the Master at all hazards; but when Jesus is taken before the High Priest the disciple is found 'afar off.' He enters the servants' hall of the High Priest's Palace, where a crowd of attendants are expressing their hatred of the 'Nazarene,' and Peter is three times charged with being a follower of Jesus. Three times he denies the accusation.

"Repentance.—The procession escorting Jesus to the Roman Governor passes through the hall where Peter is, and the Lord turns and looks upon His erring disciple. Touched to the heart, Peter repents, 'with strong crying and tears,' the anguish of his soul being heightened by each successive scene of the great drama which then passes before him. He hears the lamentations of fellow-disciples and the mournful song of his Lord's mother; he watches the procession to Calvary, and listens to the taunts of the Jews as they mingle with the wailings of the 'daughters of Jerusalem.' Weeping for 'all these things' and for himself, the hope of the Christian comes to his aid, and he is assured that death will be swallowed up in victory.

"Deliverance.—Peter, lying in the dungeon where Herod had thrown him, is visited by angels, who assure him of Divine help, and release him from captivity. He acknowledges the goodness of God, fully relying upon which he expresses confidence as to his ultimate entrance into the everlasting kingdom of his Lord and Saviour. Rejoicing his fellow-believers in is received with gladness, and a song of hope and joy forms the conclusion of the work."

Of the very striking performance of the new work, under its composer's own direction, and of its truly enthusiastic reception, we must defer speaking. How great was the curiosity to hear St. Peter may be gathered from the subjoined official statement of attendance and receipts:—

	Number attending.	Receipts.

St. Peter was followed by the Requiem of Mozart—a more than ordinarily long morning performance. The solo singers in the oratorio were Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Patey, Mrs. Sutton, Messrs. Cummings, Santley, and Sims Reeves; in the Requiem, Mdlles. Ilma di Murska and Drasdil, Mr. V. Rigby and Signor Foli.

Among the company to-day were observed the following:—

President, the Right Hon. Earl of Bradford and party, the Mayor of Birmingham and party, Maria Marchioness of Ailesbury, Lord and Lady Newport, Lord and Lady Edward Clinton, the Dowager Lady Willoughby de Broke, Lord Elliott, Lord and Lady Wrottesley, the High Sheriff of Staffordshire and party, the High Sheriff of Worcestershire and party, Lord Charles Bertie Percy and party, Lady Ward and party, Lady Wilmot Horton, the Right Hon. Sir C. B. Adderley, M. P., and party; the Hon. Mr. Lyttelton and party, the Hon. E. S. Parker and party, the Hon. Mrs. Newdigate, Sir. Baldwin Leighton and Miss Leighton, the Hon. Mrs. Charles Bootlby and party, the Hon. and Rev. James Leigh, the Hon. Mrs. Godsal, Sir Charles Oakley, Mrs. Pole Shaw Mr. G. Phillips and party, Miss Theodosia Hinckes and party, the Dowager Lady Mordaunt, Mrs. Claughton and party, Mr. W. Otto Goldsmidt, Mr. J. R. M'Lean, M. P., and party, Mr. S. Beale and party, Mrs. Dyott and party, Mrs. Walker and party, Mr. Robert Heath and party, Mr. W. C. Alston and party, Captain Traill, R.A., Mrs. Pitt, Mr. L. P. Hoppie and party, Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Chance and party, Mr. T. C. S. Kynnersley and party, the Rev. G. D. Boyle and Mrs. Boyle, &c.

Samson, to-night, brings the Festival to an end.

SATURDAY, Sept. 3.

Reserving critical remarks upon Mr. Benedict's St. Peter, which proved to be, in accordance with anticipation, the great event of the Festival, we may add a few words about the performance, the satisfactory character of which, all circumstances allowed for, can hardly be over estimated. It did not require the enthusiastic applause, and simultaneous waving of hats and handkerchiefs, with which, at the conclusion of the new oratorio, the members of the chorus greeted the composer—fortunate alike in the interpretation of his work and the manner in which it was appreciated—to persuade everybody that a genuine pleasure in their task had been felt by the multitude of singers. This was convincingly demonstrated in the spirit and general accuracy of their execution almost throughout—the result, unquestionably, of much arduous preliminary study under Mr. Stockley, conductor of the Festival Choral Society, and Mr. A. Sutton, conductor of the Amateur Harmonic Society, in this very musically-given town. For a first performance better choral singing has rarely been listened to. Equally happy was Mr. Benedict in his orchestra, which took as much pains with St. Peter as though it had been the work of their own respected conductor, Sir Michael Costa, Generalissimo of the forces, vocal and instrumental, at though, in fact, Sir Michael himself, instead of the composer of St. Peter, had been conducting. Last, not least, the solo singers were quite as anxious to do justice to Mr. Benedict, and succeeded fully as well. To Mdlle. Tietjens three important solos were assigned, one of which, perhaps the most beautiful of the (" I mourn as a dove"), she gave with exquisite feeling, and repeated, in obedience to the President's despotic signal. In a charming air for contralto, "O thou afflicted," one section of a phrase of which recalls the sotto-voce of Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, Madame Patey was eminently successful. Mr. Santley, to whom was allotted the recital of the music of St. Peter, sung it from first to last like the genuine musician whom we all know, making a deep and strong impression in an air, "O that my head were water" (Peter's contrite acknowledgment of his sin), his delivery of which was as perfect as air itself. Mr. Sims Reeves gave the music allotted to John the Baptist in Part I, and the two airs in Part II., in his most chaste and finished manner. Anything more purely devotional than his reading of the touchingly beautiful song, "The Lord is very pitiful," in which it is foreshadowed a sort of pardon for the repentent Peter, could scarcely be imagined. What fell to the share of Mr. Cummings was accomplished by that excellent artist and thorough musician in such a way as to cause regret that his share in the oratorio had been so circumscribed. The little, too, assigned to Mr. Sutton was carefully done. In short, Mr. Benedict had as good reason to be satisfied with his executants as with his audience. How the oratorio was received has been already stated; and it only remains to add that two other encores were enforced by the President—a quartet, "O come let us sing unto the Lord" (Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Patey, Messrs. Cummings and Santley), for the most part unaccompanied, and a chorus, "The Lord be a lamp unto thy feet" (Part I.), one of the finest pieces in the entire work. In St. Peter Mr. Benedict has for the present forfeited the detail—and with confidence that Mr. Benedict has gifted Birmingham with a new masterpiece of sacred music, one that deserves and is likely to be heard again and again. It is long, very long, since such an oratorio has been written.

The evening performance of Handel's Samson brought an enormous audience and large receipts, as may be seen by the subjoined official statement:—

Fatigued—tired out, in short—as chorus, orchestra, and leading singers must have been by their almost unexampled exertions at this Festival, the execution generally of the oratorio which Handel is said almost to have preferred to his Messiah was one of more than average excellence, for Sir Michael Costa abated none of his vigour, and those who obeyed the indications of his unwavering bâton seconded him with the utmost spirit and goodwill. The solo singers were Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Patey, Signor Foli, Messrs. Cummings, Santley, and Sims Reeves, of whose respective performances in this well-known oratorio it is unnecessary to speak. Enough that the entire performance gave satisfaction to the audience, who, after honouring Sir Michael Costa with an "ovation" justly due to his almost unparalleled exertions, successively called for Mr. Benedict, Mr. Barnett, Mr. Sullivan, Dr. Hiller, and Dr. Stewart—the composers who had furnished new works for the meeting. These amotig them who happened to be present acknowledged the compliment in due form.

The proceeds from other sources in 1867 were as below:—

Tickets at £5 5s. each (63)	£331	5	0

Which swelled the sum total to £14,048 12s. 8d. What they may be by this time is not yet verified, but, as the Birmingham Daily Post remarks, "should they reach as high a figure as at last Festival, the total proceeds this year will be greater than on any former occasion." From the same authority we learn that "the highest amount taken at any Festival previous to 1867 was in 1834, when the Town Hall was opened for the first time, and the receipts amounted to £18,527."

Notwithstanding all that, in certain quarters, was prognosticated to the contrary, the Birmingham Festival of 1870 has proved a brilliant success. On no former occasion, indeed, has it been supported more liberally, and on no previous occasion have the exertions of the Festival Committee more amply merited the substantial results that have accrued. Even some of the local papers, for reasons superfluous to discuss, were apprehensive at the outset; but they soon changed their tone, and now it is one sustained and unanimous chorus of exultation.

We have to acknowledge the obliging courtesy of the Festival Committee, and especially of the Orchestral Steward, Mr. Peyton, a worthy successor of the zealous and active Mr. Oliver Mason, to whom the admirable organization of these meetings was so long and so greatly indebted.

LUCERNE.—On the 25th ult. Herr R. Wagner was married, in the Protestant church, to Madame Cosima, née Liszt.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Carl Riedel, the director of Riedel's Association, intends giving a performance, next season, of Hector Berlioz's Requiem.

PESTH.—The Abbate Franz Liszt lately paid this town a visit. The vocal associations serenaded him. He came to a window of his rooms and listened to this mark of respect, applauding vigorously from time to time. He then went down and invited the singers to come up and continue their serenade in his rooms.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

On Saturday a meeting of the General Committee was held at the Secretary's office, Midland Institute. The Earl of Bradford, President, took the chair, the Mayor of Birmingham and a large number of gentlemen of the committee were present. The minutes having been signed, Mr. Hickman, superintendent of the ticket office laid the following before the meeting:—

This, said Mr. Hickman, was the largest amount ever realized at a Birmingham Festival. From 1829 to 1834 no Festival was held, the performances having ceased at St. Philip's Church, and the Town Hall not being ready. The first Festival in the Town Hall was in 1834, when the receipts were the largest till 1867, and the amount was £18,998. There was one item for the present Festival still uncertain, namely, donations after the Festival. It might appear a little ungracious to say anything about further amounts being received, but the expenses had increased, and to pay over an amount to the hospital equal, proportionately, to former years, the committee would have to rely on the patrons of the hospital.

The Chairman was glad to find the receipts greater than had been announced, and proposed: "That this meeting dutifully acknowledges with gratitude her Majesty's gracious patronage. That the thanks of this meeting are due to their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and other members of the Royal Family," &c.

The Mayor proposed "That the thanks of this meeting be given to the Earl of Bradford, President of the Festival.

The Chairman congratulated the Mayor, on the success of the meeting, and hoped, not only that the success of these Festivals might go on but that on the present occasion a large sum might be handed over to the General Hospital.

A vote of thanks from the chair being passed to the Vice-Presidents, nobility, and gentry, who had honoured the meeting with their support, the Chairman then proposed "the warmest thanks of the Committee to Sir Michael Costa, for the great energy and ability with which he had conducted the music on this, the eighth occasion of his appearance in Birmingham as conductor of the Festivals."

Mr. R. Peyton said it was not generally known how much Sir M. Costa did before he went into the orchestra. He supposed there never was a conductor who equalled Sir Michael, and probably never would be. He had rendered great service in advising upon the musical arrangements, and he kept an eye upon the instrumentalists in London, which the committee, of course, could not do. They are indebted to Sir Michael for assisting throughout.

The Chairman before putting the resolution, said that though he and the public could not appreciate all Sir Michael Costa had done, they could appreciate the results, see the wonderful power which he exercised over those under his guidance, and the great superiority with which he wielded his magical baton. He hoped Sir Michael might live long to carry on the profession of which he was the distinguished leader and ornament. The resolution was carried. Resolutions were then proposed from the chair, congratulating Mr. Benedict, Dr. Hiller, Mr. J. F. Barnett, Mr. A. Sullivan, and Professor Stewart. Thanks were also passed to the Watch Committee, Town Hall Committee, Mr. G. Whateley, and the Strangers Committee.

The Chairman proposed:—"That the best thanks of this meeting be presented to Mr. Richard Peyton, chairman of the Orchestral Committee, and orchestral steward, for the great ability and judgment with which he has arranged the orchestral department, and for the untiring attention which he has given to the general interests of the Festival, to which its success is greatly to be attributed. To none more than to Mr. Peyton, were the committee indebted; and for the ability with which he had carried out what he had undertaken, the thanks of the committee were most justly his due.

Mr. W. J. Beale said that he himself had been congratulated upon the success of the Festival, but that the congratulations were due to Mr. Peyton. Such judgment as he had he had willingly brought to Mr. Peyton's assistance; but the consummation of their hopes was Mr. Peyton's work. The resolution was carried.

Mr. Peyton bore testimony to the services rendered by Mr. Beale, He (Mr. Peyton) was not anxious to take upon himself the office he filled, but when Mr. Mason left, he saw that somebody must take it and it came to him naturally. Without the help of Mr. Beale and Mr Chas. Harding he should not have got through as he had done; he was indebted, also, to the Orchestral Committee. He was glad the Festival had gone off well, for the general public something had been said about the engagement of artists. In regard to this matter the committee thought that the Festival ought to carry with it the sympathy of the musical world, and that they ought not to engage artists at sums which would not be returned. Guided by this principle, they did the best in the selection of their principals. The hospital would receive the benefit of the policy.

Thanks were next passed to the Ticket and Book Committee, especially Messrs. Henry and Charles Richards; to Mr. Charles Harding, in connection with the orchestral arrangements; to Mr. Hickman and Mr. Thomas Simpson, for the ticket office; to the sub-committees; to the stewards; to the orchestra, instrumental and choral; to the Birmingham Amateur Harmonic Association, and other amateurs, for gratuitous service; to the Sacred Harmonic Society, for loan of music; to Mr. Stimpson, organist; to Mr. C. Stockley and Mr. A. J. Sutton, chorus masters; to the committee of the Blue Coat School and Midland Institute, for use of rooms; to the General Committee, to Mr. W. J. Beale, chairman, and Mr. Howard S. Smith, secretary.

The Earl of Bradford having vacated the chair, it was taken by Mr. Beale, who proposed a vote of thanks to his lordship. The resolution was carried. His Lordship regretted he had been prevented from attending two meetings of the committee. But he was prevented accidently. However, all was well that ended well, and he hoped they might say that the Festival had ended well. He was glad to have been of any service in the cause. This concluded the proceedings.

Mr. Benedict's "St. Peter."

During thirty-five years of rather busy life as a journalist, and attempting original composition, I have, on principle, avoided obtruding my own personality on the public. It is with no common reluctance, then, that, at the eleventh hour of my career, I feel myself obliged to state a case, which concerns every literary man who writes for Music.

I have always held that, in an oratorio, no intermixture of secular words with those from Holy Writ was in accordance with reverence or good taste. The two greatest works of the kind existing—the Messiah and Israel in Egypt—were constructed on this principle. I have never been able to comprehend how any one could venture to dilute or eke out the text of the Bible, or to acquiesce in the introduction of verses from the Psalter or Hymn Book into Scriptural stories, such as occurs in the oratorios of Sebastian Bach,—unless, indeed, these be performed according to their author's intention, that is, with the audience joining in, congregationally. The admirers of Mendelssohn, who admit no fault in his judgment, will be displeased at my saying that the objection applies in yet fuller force to his St. Paul,—because there no such assistance on the part of "the people" was contemplated. Be these wire-drawn scruples, or convictions worthy of consideration—I have acted on them whenever I have attempted to arrange a Biblical subject for music; as in the book of my friend Mr. H. Leslie's Judith, and with greater care and pains, because on a more extended scale, when I treated the story of St. Peter.

This was the work to have been performed at the late Birmingham Festival; and my completed book, having been submitted to, and accepted by, the Committee, was handed over to Mr. Benedict, who had been selected to compose the new oratorio for the year 1870, early in the last year. Mr. Benedict, both personally and in writing, expressed himself (to speak moderately) entirely satisfied with what was set before him; and thus not only to myself, but to other persons. It was, further, expressly agreed on, in terms of the most perfect amity, that no alterations or modifications of the text were to be made save by myself. It was subsequently suggested by me that, should time fall short, only the first two parts of the oratorio should be performed at this year's Festival.

The past year went on, and I heard not a word of the oratorio; which was to be delivered for rehearsal at Birmingham on the 1st of March, 1870. I returned to London permanently, after occasional absences (always within reach of recall), on the 15th of October, 1869. Becoming curious, not to say anxious, with regard to a work of extent and pretension suggested by myself, and in which I had expended some research and contrivance, I wrote to Mr. Benedict, on the 15th of November, to enquire how matters were proceeding. —announcing that I intended to be absent from England for two months of the early spring of this year; and that I was anxious to leave nothing incomplete or requiring reconsideration. On the 10th of last January I learned, for the first time, that Mr. Benedict (who had answered my note) had shown portions of the music of St. Peter to more than one person, and that he had disposed of the oratorio to a publisher. In reply to my request for an explanation of conduct so strangely savouring of contempt to myself, I was favoured, on the 15th of January, with direct information from Mr. Benedict, that he had thought fit to make changes, omissions, and additions in my book; which had been accepted by him unconditionally,—and with regard to which he had not up to that time uttered a syllable of objection, suggestion, or remonstrance. He informed me that he had made these alterations by aid of a concordance. While I distinctly refused, by the slightest connivance, to sanction so amazing a transaction, the full impertinence of which was, even then, unknown to me, my intention was to keep silence with regard to it. I felt that every possible deference was due to the committee of the Birmingham Festival, in recognition of their known services to art, and in gratitude for their private and liberal hospitality. But seeing that I received after-communications on the subject from Mr. Benedict, not so much explanatory as aggressive, I have decided that it behoves me to lay the matter before the public,—the more so, since I have only very recently learnt that Mr. Benedict, had absolutely, before the oratorio was sold, thought proper to call in, not merely a "concordance," but the assistance of a gentleman, who consented to accept the strange task of remodelling another man's production. I have purposely forborne speaking out till the present moment, not wishing to damage a new work by the statement of such a case of flagrant injustice and discourtesy, —this however, out of no consideration to the composer. To myself the affront is one of small consequence: I have written enough for musical purposes to give the public a fair impression of such power, greater or less, as I may possess. But the cause is the cause of all younger (and I hope better) men who may come after me;—and to whom it may be of immediate importance that they should not be first enjoled and flattered, and subsequently ignored and insulted, by persons pretending to hold a place in the rank of artists.

Henry F. Chorley.

Augsburg.—Herr Böckel, formerly manager of the Theatre here, is at present an attendant on the wounded in the Bavarian army.

Dresden.—A considerable number of concerts have been given for the benefit of the Wounded. At one of them Handel's Messiah was performed, the solos being entrusted to Mdmes. Otto-Alvsleben, Nanitz, Herr Degele and Dr. Gunz.

Schmalkalden.—Her Majesty the Queen of Prussia lately ordered two gold medals to be struck, one for the composer, and one for the writer, of "Die Wacht am Rhein." The composer, Herr Carl Wilhelm, who resides here, has already received his. The writer of the words, Herr Max Schneckenburger, however, having died many years ago, her Majesty has commanded inquiries to be set on foot with the object of seeing whether the medal can not be presented to some child or relative of his.

Vienna.—The opera selected by Herr Theodor Wachtel wherewith to inaugurate his engagement at the Carl Theater is Le Postillon de Longjumeau.—Mdme. Minnie Hauck was announced to appear on the 1st inst., at the Imperial Opershouse, as Zerlina in Don Juan.—Herr Brahms has declined to accept the post as conductor of the Conservatory Concerts.—The following modest advertisement appeared lately in one of the local papers: "A young artist, who, from the very moment of his first appearance, has met with great favour and encouragement, wishes to enter into communication with a lady of distinction and influence, whose patronage might open for him a sphere worthy of his talents. He has been induced to take this step neither by a secondary position nor by want, but by a desire to be enabled, by means of such patronage, to break through, with the least possible delay, the obstacles wherewith the partisans of mediocrity and materialism endeavour to close against him the career on which he has so triumphantly entered! He cherishes, also, the hope of meeting a sensitive heart, that can sympathize with his ideal aspirations!"—The "young artist" above may or may not possess talent; he may or may not be in temporary want of "the"—he most probably is—but there can be no doubt about his possessing a plentiful amount of brass.

Mr. Robert F. Bowley.

Those who for some thirty years past, have been among the figures most familiar to musical London are rapidly disappearing from the scene. The Sacred Harmonic Society has lost two of its oldest, most valuable, and energetic members: its venerable President, Mr. Harrison, who died the other day, at a very advanced age, and Mr. Robert Bowley, to whose shrewdness, energy of persistence, and thorough habits of business is largely due its present high—we might say unparalleled—position among the Musical societies of Europe. Napoleon the first contumeliously called England, "a nation of shopkeepers." Ours, in more than one notable instance, have done for Music that which the aristocratic and opulent, at home and abroad, with all their superiority of wealth, refinement, and intellectual training, have failed to accomplish. The Antient Concerts, though to the last upheld by our Prince Consort, our Wellington, relative to Lord Mornington, and like him keenly alive to the pleasures of music, Lord Howe, Lord Darnley, Lord Dartmouth, and other amateurs no less distinguished and liberal, were virtually, swept from the face of musical London by the Exeter Hall Oratorios.

These began quaerly enough; though with a certain earnestness of purpose, excellent to note in men, otherwise so practically occupied; whereas the dilettanti who ruled the Antient Concerts, had only rank, leisure, taste, and money on their side. The indigenous voices of London called out to make a chorus were anything but rich and tuneable thirty-five years ago. The "Antients" drew their supplies from Lancashire; and those were days when the journey from Lancashire to London was an affair of some eight-and twenty hours. But a few tradesmen in the west end of London were resolved to have music of their own, and to Mr. Harrison, in St. James's Street, and Mr. Bowley, at Charing Cross, was mainly due the establishment of the Sacred Harmonic Society. For a time this body may have been said to exist rather than to flourish. Nevertheless, by its appeal to popular favour, and its courage as superseding the old intolerable playhouse oratorios which were no longer to be endured by persons of any artistic culture the Sacred Harmonic Society began to excite curiosity, attention, and respect; and its promoters were wise enough to profit by the strictures which the imperfection of their performances excited, to strengthen their orchestra, and to weed their chorus. A hampering influence, however, existed in the person of the original conductor, who, however well-intentioned, was, in no respect, equal to the situation. After a time, Mr. Sarmun, and the Society separated and the latter was placed in the hands of Sir Michael Costa. The result was at once immediate and progressive. Before many years were over, the Sacred Harmonic Society was strong enough to lend a well-drilled squadron of musicians to provincial performances, to gather a library, to establish a benevolent fund, and, lastly, to lead up to those stupendous gatherings at the Crystal Palace, which, when all in their disfavour regarding the vastness of their locality is said, remain, and will remain, in musical history, as among the most magnificent displays of art ever seen in Europe. The greatest share in this progress and prosperity is, beyond question due to the shrewd foresight, energy, and administrative power of Mr. Bowley. Without such an organization, the Sydenham Oratorios would have been so many chaotic failures.

It is not to be wondered at that the directors of that preposterous building (for preposterous it is with all its magnificence) should be naturally attracted by the skill in generalship to which allusion has been made. In a lucky hour, the management of the Crystal Palace was, fourteen years ago, placed in the hands of Mr. Bowley. The right man was in the right place. He was firm, indefatigable, ingenious, of unimpeachable probity. Never was there an officer at once more re olute in carrying out his plans, yet more willing to receive suggestions, always at his post, always with a resource at hand in case of difficulty. Hence, he was habitually called in and consulted whenever any great celebration was to be organized. In brief he was an excellent and remarkable example of administrative powers such as are given to few, and which entitle his name to a permanent record in the history of English exhibitions of art.

Such a life, however, as his is not to be led with impunity. The incessant strain on every nerve and every faculty, the honest resolution to fulfil every duty of a most onerous stewardship, could not but have told on one of greater physical power and a healthier habit of body than himself. It had been obvious, for some short time past, that Mr. Bowley's health was beginning to give way, but the end was hastened by the decease of his friend and comrade of many years standing, Mr. Harrison. The mind finally lost its balance, and a few days ago his life was sadly closed by a catastrophe, the details of which have been too largely laid before the public to be dwelt on here. It is enough for the present to insist that in the position he occupied, and for the duties he undertook, Mr. Bowley was emphatically a rare man, whose place will not be soon, if it be ever, filled.

PATRIOTIC SONGS OF FRANCE.

The lasting popularity of the "Marseillaise," now nearly eighty years old, becomes more remarkable when we consider that, although the first song of the Revolution, it was immediately followed by a host of Republican effusions, which competed with it for public favour. There were the "Chant de la Victoire," the "Chant du Retour," and the "Chanson de Roland," by Méhul; the "Chant du Juillet," the "Chant Martial," the "Hymne à l'Etre Suprême," the "Hymne à la Liberté," and "Peuple, reveille-toi," by Gossec. All these, the fruits of a general ferment, have died away, and tha only lyrical work that, besides the "Marseillaise," has continued to live in the memory of the French is the "Chant du Depart," by Méhul. This was recently sung at one of the Parisian theatres; but as it is a sort of cantata with solos and choruses arranged for different voices it can rarely become a popular song in the ordinary sense of the word.

One forgotten melody of the old Revolution was revived shortly before the affair of Febrnary, when the Histoire des Girondins, by M. de Lamartine was the book of the day. Grisy-Dupré, a journalist attached to the Girondists, and condemned to share their fate, composed, a few hours before his execution, a hymn, which long afterwards responded to the state of feeling in 1847, and which, with a slight modification, became the "Chant des Girondins," better perhaps known as "Mourir pour la Patrie." M. Alexandre Dumas' Chevalier de la Maison Rouge, then a new piece, terminated with the supper of tha Girondists, at which this song was appropriately introduced.

The lays of the First Empire were generally of a warlike kind, or, to speak more correctly, the words were warlike, though often set to the most pacific music. Nothing, for instance, could be less martial than the air extracted from an opera by Grétry, which was made to fit "Veillons au salut de l'Empire." However the First Empire was by no means badly represented in the world of song by the "Partant pour la Syrie," which in the days of the Crimean war became the most popular tune in England and France, and by the "Sentinelle" of Choron and the "Vaillant Troubadour," of Sanvan, both of which are to be found in the most common music books.

The Restoration brought with it the revival of the old royalist melodies, "Vive Henri IV.," and "Charmante Gabrielle." A pacific air by Grétry was now made to do duty in honour of the restored régime; but this time the music was not diverted from its proper purpose. The words in which it was fitted, "Oh peut-on être mieux qu'au sein de sa famille?" rather celebrated the blessings of peace than the triumph of a dynasty.

The Revolutions of 1830 had a song of its own, with which great name were connected, but which after a short popularity sank to utter oblivion. Casimir Delavigne, the poet of the restored "Messeniennes," was looked upon as the proper person to celebrate the deeds of July. As he had not even that uncultivated power of music which belonged to Rouget de l'Isle, he fitted his words to a Hungarian air, which he had retained in his memory, and which was duly noted down and scored by Auber. Thus arose the "Parisienne," and to its non-national origin is attributed the short duration of its popularity.

Of late the patriotic songs of France have been the "Marseillaise" and the "Ithin Allemand," which M. Alfred de Musset produced during the consumption of a single cigar, and to which music has been set by MM. Félicien David and Voucorbeil. A greater novelty, however, is "A la frontiere," with music by M. Gounod, sung at the opera by M. Dereyod in the uniform of a Zouave.

M. Eugène Manuel, whose piece, Les Ouvriers, although only in one act, was one of the greatest successes at the Théâtre Français in the beginning of the year, has manifested his patriotic feelings in a dramatic form, having written for the same theatre a scene, entitled "Pour les Blessés." The decoration represents a rustic house used as an ambulance, and the speakers are only two in number—namely, a wounded French officer and a woman who attends him, and to whom he tells the history of his service. The performers are M. Coquelin and Mdlle. Favart.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1870.

MR. CHORLEY AND ST. PETER.

MR. H. F. CHORLEY has thrown a bomb from his old mortar, the Athenæum, into the Benedictine camp, and, as yet, nobody seems any the worse for it. Let us explain the signification of this warlike movement.

Gossip like the following has long been current in the musical world:—A. "Benedict is working hard at St. Peter, I hear."—B. "So much the better. The words are Chorley's, are they not?"—A. "They were to have been."—B. "Explain."—A. "Benedict, I am told, rejected Chorley's libretto as impossible."—B. "Won't there be a row?"—A. "Rather."—The "row" has come, for on Saturday last, within twenty-four hours after the performance of St. Peter at Birmingham, the author of the rejected libretto fired his first ready-charged gun; in other words, he came forward, with a lengthy "card," personal to himself, and remarkably so to Mr. Benedict. Remembering that we have to do with an ex parte statement, we will look at the said "card" awhile.

Let us promptly give Mr. Chorley the credit he claims. The veteran journalist has made a name and fame which, "at the eleventh hour of his career," no affront can injure. He, therefore, looks upon the rejection of his libretto with philosophic calm, being especially consoled by the thought that he has written enough to show the world his abilities. So far Mr. Chorley is right. We all know exactly what he can do; and feel tolerably sure that his character as a librettist cannot be lowered by any contumacious behaviour on the part of mere musicians. "Why, then," some may ask, "has he so eagerly rushed into print?" Mr. Chorley himself explains with customary emphasis. He comes forward burning with desire to save his younger brethren from the snares of "persons pretending to hold a place in the rank of artists." The vivid fancy of the author of The Prodigy sees multitudinous spiders, like Mr. Benedict, waiting for multitudinous flies, like himself, in the hope of repeating the "Walk into my parlour" business, and so compassing their ultimate humiliation. "Hence these tears." Hence, rather, the warning note in the columns of the Athenæum. "Look at me," says Mr. Chorley, to his yet unscathed fellows, "I make an exhibition of myself for your sakes, that you may not be 'first cajoled and flattered, and subsequently ignored and insulted.'" The sacrifice is as great as the object of it is noble; and, assuredly, in this respect, no hour of Mr. Chorley's career better becomes him than the "eleventh."

Having paid the above just acknowledgment on demand, we arrive at the marrow of Mr. Chorley's complaint—stay, though, what is all this about the "intermixture of secular words with those of Holy Writ?" Has Mr. Benedict been guilty of intermixture in the actual St. Peter? No. Has anybody, relative to St. Peter, urged the intermixing theory? No. Then why the emphatic delivery of opinions which Mr. Chorley, himself, hesitates whether to call "wire-drawn scruples," or "convictions worthy of consideration?" We confess ourselves unable to answer the question; but as regards the point afflicting Mr. Chorley with uncertainty, we have no doubt at all. The "wire-drawn scruples" are obvious. This, however, is apart from the main issue, to which we now come.

Pending a statement from the "other side," we are not in a position to judge between Messrs. Chorley and Benedict on matters of fact. The former gentleman tells a straightforward story, very precise in regard to dates, and not less definite in its charges; but Humanum est errare, and it is clearly within the range of possibility that Mr. Benedict may be able to disprove some, at least, of Mr. Chorley's assertions, and upset his position. At the same time, he may not have it in his power to do this; and speculation thereupon would, of necessity, be dangerous. Certain qualifying observations, however, suggest themselves, even accepting Mr. Chorley's statements as true. To these we will give brief utterance.

1. Mr. Chorley says: "Mr. Benedict, both personally and in writing, expressed himself (to speak moderately) entirely satisfied with what was set before him, and this not only to myself but to other persons. "Is it impossible, we ask, for Mr. Benedict to have done so and yet to have found, on closer examination of the libretto, that it required serious alteration in order to meet his views? The composition of an oratorio cannot be set about as one would begin the manufacture of a table or a coat; it being essential, for instance, that the worker should feel perfect sympathy with his materials. We can understand, therefore, how a musician may be satisfied with the result of a cursory glance at a libretto; and yet be profoundly dissatisfied when addressing himself to the task of composition. We are inclined to believe in this, as Mr. Benedict's case; especially while there is an entire absence of motive for the strange behaviour with which he, an honourable gentleman, is charged.

2. Mr. Chorley says: "It was, further, expressly agreed on in terms of the most perfect amity, that no alterations or modifications of the text were to be made save by myself." This is, probably, the truth; but is it the whole truth? We are tempted to ask whether Mr. Benedict may not, over and over again, have suggested improvements in the libretto, which Mr. Chorley may have absolutely refused to sanction, treating his work as a perfect thing. The hypothesis is not unreasonable, and, if it hit the truth, we see at once how the affair of the oratorio came to a dead lock. A composer who could not set his librettist's words, and a librettist who would not meet his composer's views, are a "house divided against itself," which cannot possibly stand. What wonder if, in these circumstances, Mr. Benedict acted upon the first law of nature," self-preservation, and took the book of St. Peter into his own hands.

On another matter, Mr. Chorley has hardly been as explicit as could be wished. He talks about the "remodelling" of his St. Peter; but without telling us in what degree the actual libretto is new. If Mr. Benedict's book differ entirely in plan from that of Mr. Chorley, the latter gentleman has only to complain of rejection. If, on the other hand, it be the original libretto, with alterations, his grievance is of a character every literary man will keenly estimate. On this matter particulars will doubtless be forthcoming; and we can only wonder why, presuming they strengthen his case, Mr. Chorley left us to speculate upon the actual facts.

Here we leave the matter for the present; our only motive for taking it up just now being anxiety lest too much weight should be given to statements purely one-sided. When Mr. Benedict speaks, if he think it worth while to speak at all, we may have more to say.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE War has called forth our sympathies in a new and unexpected direction—unexpected, because a few weeks ago we could have no idea that the Paris musical journals would cease to appear. So it is, however. Le Ménestrel, L'Art Musicale, La France Musicale, and their lesser brethren, have put up the shutters, locked the office doors, and sent all hands to the drill ground. We condole with them, while taking the event as a matter of course. Bellona has things her own way just now, and Minerva must hide in some congenial corner, till the terrible war-goddess is satisfied. May the latter result be speedy, and may our French contemporaries soon reappear with all their wonted happy mixture of fact and fiction.

A REPORT of the meeting of the General Committee of the Birmingham Festival appears in another part of this impression, and is chiefly noticeable for some remarks of the Orchestral Steward, Mr. Peyton. Referring to the engagement of artists, that gentleman said, "In regard to this matter, the Committee thought that the Festival ought to carry with it the sympathy of the musical world, and that they ought not to engage artists at sums which would not be returned. Guided by this principle, they did their best in the selection." It would appear, therefore, that the Committee resisted the demands of singers who put a higher price upon their services than could be paid with hope of profit. As the whole transaction is governed by laws of demand and supply, we shall be content to applaud the committee, without censuring the singers. Both were within their rights; but it is to be expected that public sympathy will go with those who exercised the privilege of refusing ruinous demands.

GIVEN a fresh subject of study involving both theory and practice, to be introduced into a great national seat of education; what better introduction could it receive than at the hands of a professor who is preceded by a reputation, and a deserved reputation, such as to bring together to his first lectures crowds from all quarters, men and women, young and old—crowds probably the most eager that have ever attended a University course since the Middle Ages; whose words, whether true or false, have it in them to stir and brace the fibre of the hearers, and to set them thinking and working; who fights with a generous ardour for the ascendancy of moral over material influences and ambitions; who is able to drive home all that he has to say or to suggest with the weight of a single-minded conviction, and the charm of an impressive, an engaging, an admirable personality; who has spent the best years of his life in the pursuit as well as in the encouragement of the arts which he is appointed to profess; who unites to the gifts of a brilliant verbal expositor the gifts of an accomplished and faithful manual student, who believes in his mission, and is manifestly determined to devote all his powers and all his enthusiasm to the task he has undertaken? Such, we all know, is Mr. Ruskin.

PROVINCIAL.

BRIGHTON.—A correspondent informs us that:—

"Mr. H. Corri's English opera troupe began a fortnight's engagement at the Theatre on Monday. The company consists of Madame Ida Gilliles-Corri, Misses Harrison, Rosire, Collins, Messrs. F. Gaynar, Corri, Manley, Wade, and Henry Corri. Il Trovatore was selected for the first night's performance.—Signor Mario's farewell concert is announced for the 22nd inst. Mdlle. Liebhart and Mdlle. Enriques are to be the lady vocalists, and Signor Sivori, the violinist, and Chevalier de Kontski, pianist.—A concert has been given by M. D'Alarene, at the West Street Concert Hall, assisted by several French vocalists, and Mdlle. Secretain as pianist."

COLOGNE.—The Theatre-Committee have adopted the plans and estimate for a new theatre. The house is to contain one thousand eight hundred spectators, and the expense, including the cost of the stage, scenery, &c., not to exceed one hundred and fifty-five thousand thalers.

MUNICH.—The Theatre Royal re-opened on the 25th ult.—the day of Herr R. Wagner's wedding with Liszt's daughter. Nothing by the Musician of the Future, however, figured in the bills, which included Weber's "Jubel-Ouverture;" a spirited prologue by Hermann Schmidt; and Grétry's Richard Cœur de Lion.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

BIRMINGHAM, Sept. 3.

I sent you yesterday a brief telegram announcing the success of Mr. Benedict's oratorio, of which I shall have further occasion to speak after treating of the previous night's concert, in accordance with the somewhat worn quotation (so often impressed on irregular mortals), that tells us "Order is Heaven's first law." Thursday evening, then, opened with the fourth novelty of the Festival, in the shape of a cantata, entitled Nala and Damayanti, the words of which are by Madame Sophie Hasenclever (daughter of the well-known German painter, Schadow), translated by our clever countrywoman, Madame Natalie Macfarren, the music being by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, the friend and intimate of Mendelssohn—a musician who has long stood in the foremost rank of the professors of the divine art, and of whom the following memoir will doubtless be read with interest:—

Ferdinand Hiller, pianist and composer, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, on the 24th October, 1811, and is, consequently, in his 59th year. While still a child, the great talent he exhibited for music already determined his vocation, and no pains were spared to perfect his musical education under Hoffmann, the imaginative composer of music, A. Schmidt, the great contrapuntist, Vollweiler, and subsequently Hummel, Mozart's favourite pupil, with whom young Hiller spent two years in Weimar. He was not ten years old when he made his first public appearance as a pianist, and in his 17th year he published, at Vienna, his first composition—a quar-et for piano and strings. The subsequent fertility of the young composer is shown by the fact that the opus number of his new cantata, produced at the Birmingham Festival on Thursday evening is 150. After the completion of his musical apprenticeship Ferdinand Hiller spent no less than seven years in Paris, where he devoted himself chiefly to classical music, and especially to the study of Bach and Beethoven. In the winter of 1836-37 returning to his native town, he was appointed director of the Orchestra of the Frankfort Cecilien Verein. His next move was to Milan, where his unsuccessful opera of Romilde was produced. The winter of 1839-40 found him at Leipsic, where he produced his oratorio, The Destruction of Jerusalem, which deservedly ranks as one of his best and most successful works. Returning to Italy, he married there in the summer of 1841, since which time he has lived in turn at Dresden, Frankfort, and Leipsic, in which latter town he directed the famous Gewandhaus Concerts, in the winter of 1843-11. Dr. Hiller afterwards spent four years in Dresden, where he brought out his two operas, Der Traum in der Christnacht (The Dream in the Night of the Nativity), in 1844, and Conradin der letzten Hohenstaufen (Conradin, the last Rose of the Hohenstaufen), in 1847. In the same year he accepted the office of music director at Düsseldorf, where he remained three years, removing thence, in 1850, to Cologne, where he was invited to undertake the office of Capelmeister. Here, the already existing Concert Institute flourished greatly under his vigorous management, where, also, he founded the Rhenish Music School. In the winter of 1851-52 he went to Paris, where he directed the Italian Opera. He passed the following spring in London, and returned in November of the same year to Cologne, where he has since constantly resided, with the exception of occasional journeys, of which the last was to Russia.

Of his numerous compositions, the most notable, besides those incidentally mentioned above, are his various collections of songs—especially the drei Dichter neue Gesänge—some pianoforte sonatas, two concertos for the same instrument, several excellent studies for the violin and piano, impromptus, rythmical studies, an operetta without words, à quatre mains, and of vocal pieces for solo, chorus, and orchestra, the "Gesang der Geister uber dem Wasser" ("Song of the spirits above the water"), and "O weint uns sie" ("Oh weep for her"), later hymn; The Night of the Nativity," "Heloise," the Lorelay," "Night," "The morning of Palm Sunday," the "93rd Psalm," and "Whit-suntide," may be cited as the most important. His great choral works are The Destruction of Jerusalem, already mentioned, the oratorios, Die sucrum and Saul, and the opera, Die Katakomben, (The Catacombs). Among his instrumental compositions his Symphony in E flat is especially good.

The outline of the cantata has already been given at length in the columns of the Musical World, and therefore need not be now recapitulated; suffice it to say that the subject, being of very remote Hindoo origin, i.e., some 3,000 years since its author (or compiler), Vigasa, having lived some five centuries before Homer, can hardly be expected to create any very profound interest at the present day. Nevertheless, the story has in itself a certain poetic grace, of which Dr. Hiller has not failed to avail himself, and the result is a work teeming at once with elegant fancy and rich in ingenious devices, abounding in beauties which are certain to develop themselves more and more at each successive hearing, and showing everywhere the hand of a master, the oriental colouring being above all things conspicuous throughout; while the entire work is no less remarkable for its originality than the thorough command which Dr. Hiller possesses of the varied resources of voices and instruments. The conditions to which I have already more than once had occasion to allude, prevent my going fully into each separate number of the new cantata, in which Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley sustained the principal parts with credit to themselves and advantage to the work, while the band and chorus alike exerted themselves to do justice to the production of the eminent musician, who conducted his own composition, and who was at the first received with such warmth and at the conclusion cheered with such hearty enthusiasm as must have clearly proved we are no strangers to his well earned reputation, and that the estimation in which he is held here will be considerably enhanced by the manner in which he has executed his first commission for a Birmingham Festival. A few minutes having allowed the excitement time to cool, Madame Arabella Goddard and M. Sainton came forward to perform Beethoven's sonata in F, for pianoforte and violin, a task of which it is almost superfluous to say that they both acquitted themselves to perfection. With regard to our Queen of Pianists I have heard it more than once remarked that her playing this week has been if anything more magnificent than ever. The following formed the second part of this interesting, if far too lengthy evening programme (see page 605).

That the overture to Guillaume Tell (a stock piece at all Festivals) should be given in such a manner as might be expected with such a body of instruments and such a conductor, need hardly be said; but a separate and strong line of praise must be awarded to Mr. Edward Howell (whose early studies were directed by that admirable musician, the late Lovell Phillips), for his playing the violoncello introduction with a breadth and purity of tone which not only electrified the audience but at the same time delighted the older connoisseurs, who remember every first violoncellist who has taken the part for the last quarter of a century. The remainder of the programme calls for no particular remark—artists and pieces being alike more or less familiar.

For the first time during the week rain fell after the termination of Thursday evening's concert, just a mere sprinkle to commence with and then a steady downpour which lasted all through the night, and lent a very gloomy opening to the day which was to witness the most important novelty of the Festival. Fortunately, however, as the morning advanced the heavy clouds receded, and some time before the gaily dressed multitude began to flock towards the Town Hall, glorious sunshine burst forth and gave happy augury of the treat that was in store for those who were about to assist at the production of a work that soon to confer enduring lustre on the composer and the place that has had the honour of first presenting it to the public. Precisely at half-past eleven o'clock Mr. Benedict took his place at the conductor's desk amidst the applause of welcome spontaneously accorded to himself and orchestra. The overture, descriptive of evening by the Sea of Galilee, at once gave evidence of the skill of a practised master, and prepared the mind to expect still greater things to follow; nor were such expectations disappointed, for from the first note to the last the work was listened to with increased interest, and pronounced on all hands to be in, every respect worthy the genius of Weber's most accomplished pupil—a musician whose sterling qualities have now been proved in every form of composition. The oratorio of Saint Peter is divided into two parts, the first embracing the Divine Call and Trial of Faith, the second comprising the Denial and Repentance, each subject being treated in an appropriate and fitting manner. As it is intended shortly to give to the readers of the Musical World a detailed analysis of this work, illustrated in music type, it would be but anticipating were I to attempt to particularize each individual number of an oratorio which, if there be any appreciation of all that is best and noblest in music is certain to be heard very many times and to take its place as an acknowledged masterpiece of art. It would be scarcely possible to improve upon the four vocalists to whom the principal parts were assigned, and as Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley, one and all, sang their very best, it will be quite understood that, so far as their new concerned, there was literally nothing to be desired, while both chorus and band did their utmost to ensure the success of a work whose composer is no less remarkable for his amiability of manner than for his unquestionable ability. Three pieces were repeated at the desire of the President—the chorus of Benediction, "The Lord be a lamp;" the unaccompanied quartet, "O come let us sing;" and the soprano air, "I mourn as a dove." So far as effect is concerned, the last air, for Mdlle. Tietjens, "Gird up thy loins," might well have been asked for again, but that it would have been a little too much to have expected a singer, even with the great German prima donna's exceptional powers, twice to have attacked such a succession of high passages, ascending to D flat, although her country men had that day achieved the greatest victory of modern times. At the conclusion of the work a perfect hurricane of applause arose from every side, which was renewed again and again until Mr. Benedict had once more presented himself and acknowledged the enthusiastic greetings of the vast audience, whose demonstration was of that genuine and unmistakable sort which can never by any possibility be confounded with that mild and artificial form of approval which goes to make up a mere succès d'estime.

It was a mistake on the part of those who arranged the Festival programme to supplement a complete and lengthy oratorio like St. Peter with the Requiem, in which Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli were set down for the principal parts. How these artists acquitted themselves, and how the work went generally, I am unable to say, at least from my own observation, and therefore prefer to maintain a silence, which may be considered discreet or the reverse. It is, however, no breach of confidence to mention that, long as was the morning's performance, i.e., nearly five hours, it would have been considerably longer had not the idea originally entertained of commencing with Spohr's "God, Thou art great," been abandoned by the Committee.

In accordance with the custom which has for some time obtained here, the last evening instead of being of the same miscellaneous character as its three predecessors is devoted to oratorio, so as to suit the requirements of those to whom a morning performance may be inconvenient. Upon this occasion the work chosen was Handel's seventh in order of Handel's oratorios, begun eight days after the completion of the Messiah, finished in five weeks, produced at one of the Lenten performances at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, 18th March, 1743, and said to be preferred by its composer even before its immediate forerunner, a judgment at the present day hardly likely to be endorsed; despite the many and striking beauties with which it abounds. The soloists on Friday were Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Sims Reeves. The intense pathos which the last named singer throws into that most touching air, "Total eclipse," has never been equalled, much less excelled by any vocalist, and those who were present will not readily forget how Mr. Reeves, who has sung at every performance, morning and evening, all through the week, distinguished himself on the last night of the Festival, his share in the duet, "Go, baffled coward," with Signor Foli, being as remarkable for its defiant vigour as the air above named was conspicuous for its depth and tenderness of feeling. Mdme. Patey again added largely to the general success by the manner in which she sang throughout, her greatest triumph being in "Return, O God of Hosts." Although considerably past 11 o'clock when Mdlle. Tietjens sang "Let the bright Seraphim" (the obbligato trumpet accompaniment being played by Mr. Thomas Harper with his wonted skill), so spirited was her delivery of the well-known air that the audience with one voice asked for its repetition, a demand which the artist would have been quite justified in declining considering the amount of work that had fallen to her share during the last four days. Mr. Santley's splendid rendering of "How willing my paternal love" was in every way worthy his well-earned reputation, and what Mr. Cummings and Signor Foli had to do was done well, while the band and chorus, despite their prodigious labours, played and sang with unflagging energy up to the last note, the same arrangements of "God save the Queen" which had opened the Festival bringing it to a close. Ringing cheers then followed for some minutes, Sir Michael Costa being applauded again and again, the band and chorus, who best knew the indefatigable labours and immeasurable worth of their chief, being loudest of all in their demonstrations. Calls were got up for Benedict, Sullivan, Hiller, and Barnett, and those present of the gentlemen named responded to the compliment. A strong and well-deserved word of praise is especially due to Mr. Stockley and Mr. Sutton, upon whom all the weight of training the choruses devolves, and whose labours extend over many months preceding the Festival. The result of these labours has been a series of choral performances of the highest mark, and the unqualified approval of a body of singers who do the highest credit to the careful manner in which they have been prepared for their task. To Mr. Peyton, by his courtesy and business-like manner shows himself a worthy successor to Mr. Oliver Mason, my especial thanks are due, while the duties of those gentlemen who take upon themselves the office of Stewards have been discharged with a quiet unobtrusiveness deserving of all praise, and particularly commended to the imitation of the Stewards of the Three Choir Festivals.

THE LATE ALFRED NICHOLSON.

The following letter has been addressed to the Editor of the Leicester Advertiser:—

"DEAR SIR,—Your obituary columns will contain this week the name of one of our townsmen, which, as a musical amateur, I should not willingly see passed over without a few lines of respect and affectionate remembrance. I allude to the removal by death of Alfred Nicholson from amongst us, who, by his talent as an oboeist, was known throughout the whole of the three kingdoms, and universally esteemed facile princeps amongst English oboe players. His modesty which almost always accompanies true talent of every kind was a very conspicuous component of his character, and his readiness to oblige and delight his friends by his wonderful power of musical expression were well known and appreciated. His services for public charitable occasions were equally prompt and kind. The estimation in which he was held by the musical profession was well shown by the eager offer of gratuitous services from all the leading instrumentalists in the London orchestra, on the occasion of his being first stricken down with paralysis; and the result of this will be long remembered by the performance for his benefit of the Ancient Mariner, conducted by the composer, Mr. Barnett, in which all the instrumental orchestra were gratuitous professional players, and the performance unrivalled in beauty and delicacy by any ever heard here during the memory of man.

"Alfred Nicholson was born June 30th, 1822. His father, Henry Nicholson, was master of the Duke of Rutland's private band, and will be remembered by the older inhabitants as a skilful musician. Alfred began to study at six years old, and was afterwards placed under Mr. Alsopp (a sterling musician of His Majesty's Theatre orchestra), and Mr. Tolbecque for violin, but preferring to make the oboe his chief instrument, he was put in charge of M. Barret (of whom he continued the favourite pupil), by whose side he played in the opera orchestra until disabled by the fatal attack which prostrated him.

"He was a distinguished member of all the Festival orchestras for many years, and attended especially all the Birmingham Festivals since 1834 (and died the day of the commencement of the latter this week). He was a member of the Philharmonic orchestra, the Royal Italian orchestra, Sacred Harmonic Society, and every important society in existence in London, since he went there, and his example, I know, has been an encouragement to his brothers, who are worthily sustaining the family reputation for musicianship, and whose reputation is great, and increasing in the provinces as well as London.

"As a friend who has known him from boyhood, I can bear testimony to his power of commanding the esteem and affection of all who knew him, and have recollection of many pleasant musical meetings with him, when his kind consideration for the deficiencies of those less gifted than himself, was as conspicuous as his own able conquest of all the difficulties which presented themselves in the performance of the music before him.

"It is pleasant to be able to refer, which I do very briefly (because I do not wish to raise the veil of private life), to the willing and kindly manner in which his afflictions have been lightened, and his failing strength upheld by the unwearied sympathy and assistance of his nearest friends. Suffice it to say they have done what they could, and I trust in doing so they will find their affliction for his loss lightened, and their own kindness returned in that form to themselves.

"Poor Alfred was proud of the old town, and loved the old friends in it, and though he has passed away after a long and distressing calamity, he will not be forgotten hastily by many here, amongst whom I am proud to include, dear Sir, yours respectfully, "WILLIAM ROWLETT.

"39, Princess Street."

NEW MUSIC.

Angel of Peace. Song. Written by the Rev. J. B. DALTON, M.A. Music by ANNE FRICKER. [London: R. Cocks & Co.]

A SIMPLE and expressive song, which will command acceptance everywhere. The words are above the average of religious verses, and Miss Fricker has set them with much feeling. It is long since we met with a song at once so unambitious and so good.

Watch by the Rhine (Die Wacht am Rhein). Transcribed for the Pianoforte by W. S. ROCKSTRO. [London: R. Cocks & Co.]

IT was to be expected that the popular German song of the Rhine would fall into the transcribers' hands; and here we have one of many versions. Mr. Rockstro has treated his theme in a manner so ornate that we doubt if Wilhelm would at once recognize his own composition. This, however, will be no drawback to those who love works of the kind, and to such we recommend the piece before us.

The New Prussian March. Composed for the Piano by TH. OESTEN. [London: R. Cocks & Co.]

THIS is not the least interesting of the many musical effusions springing out of the present miserable war. If any pianists wish to celebrate the Prussian victories they can now do it, without much trouble, in strains both vigorous and pleasing.

ENGLISH ACTORS OF OUR TIME.

In nothing is the difficulty of contemporary criticism more apparent than in acting. The natural bias of the human mind to hold the men with whom it acquires familiarity late in life inferior in all respects to those it knew in youth, to believe the past greater than the present is never so obvious as in judgments passed on actors. In other cases the assertions of the laudator temporis acti can be disproved. Those who maintain that modern Englishmen are smaller in size and feebler in constitution and in strength than their sires are answered by the fact that Englishmen of the present day can wear the armour of their ancestor, and that from the monuments upon tombs we can gather that Englishmen of half-a-dozen centuries ago were much the same in shape and build that they now are. In degeneracy in valour or in pluck maintained? We answer it in a score of ways. Never was better riding to hounds or manlier cricket exhibited. For deeds of heroism the behaviour of our soldiers during the Indian Mutiny, and in the battles of Balaclava and Inkerman may stand beside that of the troops of Cressy or of Flodden, while the manly action of those noble fellows who perished in the Birkenhead shows that the poorest soldier can by circumstances be rendered a Philip Sidney. Had such a deed as they performed been done in any country but England a monument would have commemorated the fact, and blazoned to future generations their worth.* In literature, lastly, and in art, the comparison between the present and the past can be readily established. We know that in spite of the cry of degeneracy echoed by every writer since Homer, human intellect attained its supreme development in the comparatively modern days of Elizabeth. We know that in writers like Montaigne, Milton, Locke, Voltaire, Goethe, Wordsworth, Shelley, Victor Hugo, Tennyson, Ruskin, Swinburne, and Rossetti, the glories of the literature are worthily transmitted and maintained, placing their works together we defy the warmest supporter of old times to show us any sign of decadence.

In art we can speak less boldly, but we know that in this there is revival, and that though the glories of the remote past may not be reached, those of the past nearer at hand are equalled and even eclipsed. But in acting the case is diff-rent. A clamour of testimony from all who have attained middle age, tells us that actors now-a-days are not fit to be mentioned side by side with those who went before, and the evidence of preceding writers and playgoers supports the assertion that the process of degradation now going on with accelerating speed has been in existence since the infancy of histrionic art in England. In the greatest as in the least the falling off is equally perceptible. We can thus establish that Kean was less than Garrick, and Garrick less than Betterton. Could we go back further we should find doubtless, that Betterton himself was inferior, according to public report, to Burbage, who in turn came behind some now forgotten exponent of miracle play or religious pageantry. There statements cannot be confuted. In the case of the actor we cannot compare the living with the dead. No vestige of their work except in the case of it as is preserved in tradition, which probably caricatures it, is left behind. Of the tens of thousands down whose cheeks they brought tears of sorrow or joy, not one probably has left behind him a written word upon their merits. Concerning the actors we know nothing; concerning all we know nothing which will enable us to form a thorough judgment upon their merits. Cibber has rendered the greatest service to modern playgoers of any writer of past times. He has left us a gallery of dramatic portraits, each face in which seems recognizable. In consequence we know the stage in the time when Betterton and Mountford, Kynaston, Wilks, Sandford, Mrs. Betterton, Mrs. Oldfield, Mrs. Mountford, and Mrs. Bracegirdle were its ornaments better than we know it in the time of our own infancy and adolescence. But even with this aid, the best we have received or are likely to receive from contemporary living actors is with dread. We cannot tell whether Mountford or Charles Mathews was the greater comedian. The fact that the actor's art dies with him and that no trace of it can survive, is what first strikes one in connection with it. This fact has of course been often dwelt upon. It confers upon the profession itself a measure of the pathos of human life. Where all is fugitive feelings of sadness must intrude. We see an actress enchanting an audience. Delighted thousands bask in her smile and hang upon her lips. Yet while we know that her talent, the godlike gift she possesses, the power almost unequalled of stirring man's breast and thrilling his pulse with pleasure or with pain, is as ephemeral as the beauty of face and limb; that her art "expires before the flowers in her cheeks." That the memory of those who have delighted us in our youth lingers in our hearts, and that no modern siren can breathe melodies that make us forget the old seems almost a sort of attempt on the part of nature to compensate for the fate which inevitably attends the actress. Brief as is the triumph she knows it is the most complete a woman can obtain. No crown of empire ministers half the gratification given by that of dramatic art. "A month or two wain to live on honeycomb," then to fade and leave behind recollections that make, to those who have obtained them, all subsequent performances pale and colourless such is the fate of the queen of comedy, perhaps on the whole, when the general scope of nature's work is taken into account no unsatisfactory fate after all.

"Et rose elle a vécu ce que vivent les roses, L'espace d'un matin."

* There is such a monument, though "K" does not know of it, in Chelsea Hospital. —Ed. M. W.

The considerations upon which we have dwelt surround with difficulty the task of him who essays to write upon modern actors and acting. He can hope to please or satisfy but a small proportion of his audience. Very naturally those on whom he writes with the school of believers each one of them carries with him will consider whatever commendation he can bestow inadequate, whatever censure he implies undeserved. Those, on the other hand, who have the keenest appreciation of the subject and are most likely to read his notes and observations will be sure to judge all praise excessive. As the traveller in Switzerland when he finds you know most spots he has explored tries again and again until he brings forward one spot you have not visited, then gleefully assures you your visits have been wasted while that spot remained unknown, so the reader of theatrical criticisms will maintain that all merit is usurped by those actors whom you have not seen. Undaunted, however, by all considerations of this or any other kind, we purpose to give a few sketches of living actors. That we know the difficulties of the task we undertake is shown by what we have said. We endeavour, however in the present introductory portion to explain our motives in commencing the task before us, and to solicit indulgence in its execution. To speak by name of contemporaries is a thankless office from which by choice most men would gladly retire. Unfortunately, the necessity that some should so speak of them exists, or, what is practically the same thing, is thought to exist.

The list of actors who attain absolute excellence is great. Whether or not we have any actor of very highest mark is what we can scarcely tell. We do not profess to have a tragedian who can maintain the glories transmitted in an unbroken chain by Betterton to Macready. But in other departments of art we regard the stage as wealthy. We need but let our memories run over a few of the leading names with no hope that we shall be able to dwell at length upon half of them, to see that our stage is not poor so far as regards actors of comedy and of realistic drama. Some few actors even we have who are capable of incursions into the regions of high and poetical art. In general strength our companies are greatly behind those of a generation past, and immeasurably behind those of a century ago. In the merits of individual actors the present generation may compete with any that has preceded it. We conclude this introductory portion of our criticisms with an appeal to those whose merits we shall have to discuss, and the public we shall have to address. Actors must see in their lifetimes an estimate of their merits, or else their merits are likely in the future to receive very inadequate recognition. Hence, a measure of the delicacy of contemporaneous criticism is removed. The contemporary must, in the very condition of things, give to posterity the only verdict it can have. There is no actor alive, moreover, of whom we can speak in terms of unmitigated eulogy, though there are many for whose talents we entertain a profound admiration. Actors, thus can scarcely find the mention of their names entirely to their liking. We ask them, accordingly, to look at the spirit of the whole, rather than that of particular passages, and we ask both them and the public to believe that, however much fault-finding may force its way into these columns, the writing emanates from one whose sincere conviction is that criticism is truest to itself and to the art it illustrates when it most strives to be appreciative. K.

BEETHOVEN AS A VIENNA VOLUNTEER.*

The date was 1796. The French under Bonaparte were advancing victoriously in Italy. At this juncture, two noblemen, as patriotic as brave, were inspired by a happy idea. Count Franz Hugo von Salen-Keilferscheid and Count Wenzel Paar drew up, with the assistance of Captain Friedrich Wilhelm von Mayern, of the Imperial Austrian army, a genial plan for the voluntary arming of the people. It was instantly approved of by the Emperor Francis. In an incredibly short space of time about seventy thousand recruits had assembled, who equipped themselves at their own expense, and asked the Government only for arms. There was soon a corps of 14,000 men, a light fusilier battalion, complete in every particular. It enjoyed the privilege of playing the "Grenadiers' March," and the public functionaries and students serving in it retained their stipends. It bore the name of the Wiener Freiwilliger (Vienna Volunteers). The Command-r was Major Kowosdy, of the Imperial Austrian service, and the conscription of the colours took place on the glacis, before the Burg-gate, in presence of the Emperor and the Empress. The latter had given the regiment a handsomely embroidered belt for the ensign to support the colours in. Amid vociferous cheers the regiment marched off, by the way of Klagenfurt and Brixen, to join Field Marshal Alvinczy at Trent.

Let us transplant ourselves to the Neuer-Markt. Opposite the "Mehlgrube," as it was called (now the Hotel Munsch), was a recruiting-tent, so surrounded by people that it was hardly possible for any one to get inside. Opposite the tent the band of the new corps had stationed itself on the balcony of the Mehlgrube. It was conducted by a young man of about twenty-five, whose intellectual, quick eye was continually shooting forth glances over the scene beneath. Near the recruiting-tent, in the market place, stood a man, somewhere about thirty, of robust build, with broad athletic shoulders. He was gazing with a longing eye on the young volunteers who had just been enlisted. This man was one of the best known individuals among the people. He was called "Hupfauf-and-Schnappriieder." * He earned his living as a coffin-bearer, and his name was Joseph Hupfauf. By a strange caprice of nature, while he was shaped like a giant in the upper part of his body, his lower extremities were altogether out of keeping with his head and shoulders. He had awfully bowed legs, and could make but very slow progress, his legs giving way so frequently that the above nick-name, which has survived even to the present day, was universally bestowed upon him.

Hupfauf was as ardent a patriot as thousands of others, better built than himself, and all he thought of was how to get enlisted as a volunteer. He had already been to several recruiting tents, and endeavoured to carry out his wish, but, in every case, the officials had regretfully refused the portly individual, as soon as their glances caught sight of the unsatisfactory extremities, which threatened, at every step, to leave the seeming Hercules in the lurch. The Mehlmarkt was his last hope. If he did not succeed in getting accepted there, he would have to return to his old calling of coffin-bearer. Unfortunately, he was not more successful in the Mehlmarkt than in other places, and, with despair in his heart, he sneaked away.

Twilight had set in; the band in the balcony of the Mehlgrube had ceased playing, and the bandmaster, arm-in-arm with one of the recruiting officers, who, like himself, resided in the Alser suburb, was strolling quietly home. In the Wipplingerstrasse, their attention was directed to a portly individual whose hat did not display the well-known tuft, though, to all appearance, the wearer would have made a splendid volunteer. He must have been drinking a little more than was good for him, for he staggered about in every direction, and his legs sometimes gave way so that he could not walk straight a single step.

"What an acquisition he would be to the Volunteer Corps," said the bandmaster, directing the officer's attention to the athlete.—" He must be a capital shot," replied the officer, Lieutenant Krall, "for it is scarcely credible that a man of such a build can, at a moment like this, shirk military duty. But stop—perhaps we are wrong; he is going down into the wine-cellar, and there are usually recruiting officers there. Let us follow him and try our luck; perhaps we may supply the Committee with a finer bird than any one else has done."

There is still in the Wipplingerstrasse at No. 25 (originally No. 352) a wine-cellar, called from the Färbergasse, which is close at hand, the "Färberkeller." At that time such subterranean drinking-places were the rendezvous of crowds of high-spirited young fellows, and, consequently, greatly frequented by recruiting officers. Hupfauf was aware of this, and in his despair had hit upon a little plan for realizing his patriotic wishes. He descended into the cellar, sat down at a table, and, sticking his unshapely legs under the bench, waited with a glass of wine before him, to see how near he was towards attaining his object. He pretended to be the worse for liquor, and felt certain of attracting attention. Scarcely had he taken his place before the bandmaster and the recruiting officer entered, and immediately seated themselves near him.

"Here's luck to you, my worthy friend!" exclaimed the officer, merrily. "I feel convinced you have only been waiting for me, to join the ranks of the Volunteers against Bonaparte."—"Not a bit—I should lie, if I said so," replied Hupfauf, anxiously. "Supposing I wanted to do so, it wouldn't be any good, for nature has neglected me shamefully. First of all, I haven't got a bit of courage."—" And you are not ashamed to say so, sir, you?" observed the bandmaster, indignantly. "Look you. I am not an Austrian, though I hope soon to be one, and yet I have voluntarily joined—if only in my own line, namely, music—the brave soldiers. My notes shall inspire the volunteer host, and no bullet shall make me break down in my tempo. Come, drink with us in the feast long live the Emperor Franz; long live the gallant army!"—" No, my dear bandmaster, no. I am very greeable to drink the—the health o' the Emp'ror and his gallant sojers, but I'm hang'd if I'm a-going along with 'em. I han't got any pluck."—" You're sure to have pluck—you cannot help it—if you are only once in the midst of the fighting," answered the officer.—" No—besides, as I have told you, I ain't bodily qualified. I'm so weak and shaky on my legs, that I am near falling every step I take."—" What are you talking about? When the charge has once sounded; when you once hear the roll of the drums, and when once the smell of the powder tickles your nostrils, there will be no more falling."—" It's all very well to talk about charging. How can I, with my wretched body, run fast enough to charge?"—" You will have no need to run yourself. Those about you will carry you with them."—" But I waddle like a duck."—" That will be splendid for swimming over the rivers."—" No—say what you like, you will not persuade me."

The more the coffin-bearer insisted upon his bodily unfitness, the less did his companions believe him, and the more did they strive to enlist so fine a man. Wine was ordered, and the glasses so often emptied, that the timid giant appeared to become tipsy, and gradually began to pluck up courage. At last, he allowed himself to be persuaded, and consented to enlist. The officer joyfully counted the bounty out on the table for him, and settled the bargain with the formal shake of the hand.

"So, now I am irrevocably a Vienna Volunteer, eh?" said the recruit in a drunken accent, and sticking the bounty in his pocket.—"Certainly," replied the bandmaster, "you shook hands and accepted the bounty. You must now have your name entered. Come along—the enlisting tent on the Freiung is, no doubt, still open."—"All right; the sooner the better," replied the other, suddenly growing sober, he stood up and advanced.—"What the deuce does this mean!" exclaimed the officer, scrutinizing him from top to toe. "I fancy I know those low legs."—"I dare say you do; unfortunately I have no others."—Confound it! why that's Hupfauf, whom we refused to-day in the Mechhurkt."—"Yes; that's correct. I'm Hupfauf-und-Schnappnieder."—"Who can make anything out of you? You waddle with your feet like a duck."—"A splendid qualification for swimming over rivers."—"Your legs collapse every minute."—"What do you mean by collapse? When once the signal is given to charge; when once I hear the roll of the drums; when once the smell of the powder tickles my nose, there'll be an end to anything like collapse."—"You talk about charging, do you? What! with those crooked legs? With your wretched figure, how could you ever run fast enough to charge?"—"It is not necessary that I should be able to do so. In close column, my comrades will carry me along with them."—"Confound it all, he is turning my own words against me. Just listen, like a good fellow. Be reasonable, and retire of your own accord. It should be always taunted with enrolling you. I make you a present of the bounty; leave the Vienna Volunteers alone."—"I will add ten florins, if you will withdraw," said the bandmaster.—"Gentlemen, all your talking is no good. I am a volunteer, and I mean to remain a volunteer. I am now going to the Freiung to get my name entered."

His two companions followed him with a heavy heart. The officials in the tent laughed heartily at the trick Hupfauf had played, but he was refused and sent off. The ceremonial consecration of the colours took place afterwards upon the glacis, and the bandmaster was stationed on the right wing of the Corps, someone tapped him on the shoulder. It was bow-legged Hupfauf.

"I beg your pardon, bandmaster, don't you really think I could march with you?"—"I do not; but there is one thing I can tell you: I respect your patriotic sentiments, and only wish that every man in Austria capable of bearing arms were like you. I shall often think of you, and I will preserve the memory of noble-minded 'Bow-Legs' among the Vienna Volunteers."—Aye, do, bandmaster. I, too, will often think of you. By the way, what is your name?"

"My name is Ludwig van Beethoven."

"Very good; now, Herr van Beethoven, if, you return safe and sound to Vienna, come and see me at the Neulaus, in the Wandelstadt; that's where I live. My warmest good wishes accompany the Vienna Volunteers."

Endless cheers disturbed the conversation; the words of command re-echoed along the ranks, and the music struck up—the Emperor Franz was approaching to be present at the consecration of the colours. Then, amid the vociferous plaudits of the immense crowd, the Volunteer Corps marched out from Vienna.

Beethoven wielded, as a volunteer, the bandmaster's conducting-stick in 1796, and the first part of 1797. He was present at Aughiari, Rivoli, Bevilaque, Minerbe, and San Giorgio, and—as he had predicted —no bullet made him break down in his tempo. He composed several marches, which have probably been lost, or which he afterwards considered too insignificant to be included in the list of his works. The only composition of his that has survived from this period is "Oesterreich's Kriegslied," words by Friedelberg; but Carl Gross-Athanasius, the painter and writer on musical subjects, possesses a portrait, which, dating from about 1796, is a vivid likeness of the young Volunteer Bandmaster.

We are a week nearer to the coming of Nilsson, so that we can count seven days of anxiety as past and at rest. But this fact only intensifies the public interest to hear one of the world's few great vocal and dramatic artists. In less than two weeks Nilsson will leave the shores of England en route for New York. The date of her leaving is fixed for the 3rd of September, so that she will reach New York early enough to afford her a few days' rest, before she throws the glamour of her beautiful voice and her art refinements over the people of this city. From present appearances, every seat for the first half dozen concerts will be bought up in advance, and the price of tickets will be quoted by speculators at fabulous amounts. But the wary will eschew the speculators and seek the legitimate sources of sale.—Watson's Art Journal.

HAYDN'S SEASONS.

We can only construe neglect of the Seasons as one of those freaks for which nobody can account. Certainly there is nothing in the subject and nothing in the music capable of affording an explanation. Rather are both subject and music attractive in the highest degree; the only way of accounting for the fact, therefore, is to suppose that the Creation absorbs all the notice that can be spared to Haydn's oratorios, by virtue of its more decidedly religious and scriptural character. This, to large numbers of English people, would appear a sufficient explanation. It is hardly such, however, looked at from a musical point of view.

Among the noticeable features in Haydn's life is a vigorous attempt to make his mark upon oratorio when far advanced in years. It may have been that during his long residence with the Esterhazy family—a period of thirty years—he was not encouraged to work in that department of the art, especially as his one Italian oratorio, Il Ritorno di Tobia, did not make a great success. We are inclined, however, to believe that both the Creation and the Seasons were prompted, in the first instance, by Haydn's English experience. In 1795, the master visited this country, and, probably for the first time in his life, was brought close to the genius and success of Handel. Here he heard the noble works of his predecessor, and, not only felt their power himself, but noted the hold they had obtained upon the people generally. He was then fifty-nine years of age, and had all his life been a hard worker. But Handel wrote oratorios in more advanced years; and why should not Haydn. Two idea doubtless occurred to him, and stayed by him; so that when, in 1797, the Baron von Swieten, librarian to the Emperor of Austria, suggested the Creation, as a subject for musical treatment he took up the matter with ardour.

In 1798 the work was ready and was received with rapture. That Haydn delighted in it and loved it, all his biographers tell. "I was never so pious," said the master, "as when engaged on the Creation; I fell on my knees daily and prayed God would vouchsafe me strength to carry out the work." The result must have seemed to him a providential blessing on the spirit in which he laboured. With what humility he gave his oratorio to the world may be gathered from some remarks in a letter to his publishers, Breitkopf and Härtel:—"As for myself," wrote Haydn, "now an old man, I only wish and hope that the critics may not handle my Creation with too great severity, and be too hard on it. They may possibly find the musical orthography faulty in various passages, and, perhaps, other things also which I have for so many years been accustomed to consider as main points; but the genuine connoisseur will see the real cause as readily as I do, and willingly cast aside such stumbling-blocks. This, however, is entirely inter nos; or I might be accused of conceit and arrogance, from which, however, my heavenly Father has preserved me all my life long." As we have said, the Creation was a success; and when, after a first performance in Paris, the artists engaged sent the master a gold medal, inscribed "Hommage à Haydn," the old man must have felt stimulated to a fresh effort in his new field of labour.

Baron von Swieten was, happily, ready with another subject, and Haydn again set to work. The baron had been reading Thompson's Seasons, and, naturally enough after the success of Haydn's descriptive writing in the Creation, the idea occurred to him of making it the theme of an oratorio. We can fancy with what readiness the aged musician entered upon his task. He had a thoroughly congenial subject; the encouragement of success; a strong conviction that much could yet be done ("O God," said he in one of his letters, "how much remains to be done in this splendid art, even by a man like myself"), and he must have felt that to him the night was fast coming in which no man can work. So, in his seventieth year, Haydn buckled on his armour for a last great effort. THADDEUS EGG.

PESTH.—Herr Ellinger, the "heroic tenor" (Heldentenor) at the National Theatre will celebrate next month the twenty-fifth anniversary of his heroic-tenoric career.

HERR R. WAGNER ON HERR R. WAGNER AND HIS WORKS.*

It was a deliciously painful state of mind in which I then was; it bore for me the Fliegender Holländer, long previously conceived. All irony, all bitter or humorous sarcasm, which, in such cases, is all that remains as sole plastic impetus to our literary authors, had been provisionally so far let loose and cast forth by me, in the literary efforts already named, and those succeeding them; that, after this deliverance, I was placed in a position to satisfy my inward impulse only by genuine artistic plastic creations. It is probable that after what I had experienced, and from the standpoint upon which my knowledge of life had placed me, I should not have gained this power, had I from my youth upwards acquired only literary accomplishments; I might, perhaps, have followed the path pursued by our modern literati and writers of stage-pieces, who, under the petty influences exerted by the formal relations of life, take the field, with every stroke of their pencils or rhyming pens, against equally formal expressions of those relations, and thus carry on pretty much the same kind of warfare that, in our own days, General Willisen and his faithful followers waged against the Danes; I should very probably—to employ the popular phraseology—have thus acted like the driver who beats the sack instead of beating the ass,† had I not been fitted by something for higher efforts, and that something was Music.

It was but lately that I expressed, at length, my opinions concerning music; I will merely refer to it here as the good angel, who presented me as an artist, nay, really made me one, from the time that my outraged feeling revolted, more and more decidedly, against the state of our art. That my revolt did not take place beyond the pale of art, from the standpoint either of the criticizing man of letters, or of the art-denying, socialistically calculating, political mathematician of the present day, but that my revolutionary feeling awakened in me the impulse and the capability for artistic efforts, this, as I have said, I owe entirely to music. I just now named music my good angel. This angel was not sent down to me from heaven; he came to me out of the sweat of centuries of human genius; he did not merely touch, with an inspirable sunny hand, as it were, the crown of my head; in the blood-warm night of my violently-desiring heart, he was nourished until he had strength to produce something for the world of day—I cannot conceive the spirit of music otherwise than in love. Filled with love's holy power, I beheld before me, as the visual strength of my human life-glance increased, not formalism to be criticized; no, looking through that, I recognized, at the bottom of the phenomena, by sympathetic power of conception, the want of love under the oppression of loveless formalism. He only who experiences the want of love, recognizes the same want in others. My artistic faculty of perception, filled with music, rendered me capable of recognizing this want in the world of art, too, everywhere that, by the repulsive contact with its external formalism, I felt my own powers of love wounded, and from this very fact my own need of love actively awakened. Thus, I revolted through love, and not through envy or anger, and thus, therefore, I became an artist, and not a critical literary man.

The influence exerted by my power of musical conception upon the fashioning of my artistic efforts, and especially on the choice and treatment of my poetic subjects, I will describe according to its nature, when, by the narration of the origin and character of the productions brought to light by me under this influence, I shall have rendered such a description more easy for the understanding. At present, I give the narrative.

The course I took in the conception of the Fliegender Holländer was followed by me in the dramatic poems, which, in the order they sprang into existence, I present, in this book, to my friends; they are, in addition to the Fliegender Holländer above named, Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. I have been reproached with having, by these works, gone back to the track of "romantic opera," a track passed by and closed—people say—by Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, and already deserted by me in my Rienzi. Those who reproach me with this, think naturally rather of romantic Opera, than of those operas which, in conformity with a conventionally classifying assumption, may be called romantic. It will be seen whether I proceeded from an artistically formal purpose to the construction of "romantic' operas, when I describe the manner in which the three works sprang into existence.

I have described generally the frame of mind in which I conceived the Fliegender Holländer. The conception was just as old as the frame of mind, which at first was only being prepared in me, but, struggling against ensnaring impressions, at length obtained the power of utterance, so that it could express itself in a work of art peculiar to it.—The figure of the Flying Dutchman is the mythic poem of the people; a primæval trait of human nature is expressed in it with heart-moving force. This trait, in its most general significance, is the yearning for repose after the storms of life. In the bright Hellenic world, we meet it in the wanderings of Ulysses, and in his longing for home, house, hearth, and—wife, something mutually attainable and ultimately united by the jog-trot son of old Hellas. Christianity, without an earthly home, fashioned this trait into the figure of the "Wandering Jew;" for this wanderer condemned for ever, without an object, and without a joy, to a life long lived out, there was no redemption on earth; the only desire left him was the yearning for death; the only hope, the prospect of annihilation. At the end of the Middle Ages, a new and vigorous impulse directed nations to Life; the history of the world shows this most successfully expressed in the form of a desire for discovery. The sea now became the ground of life; no longer, however, the small inland sea of the Hellenic world, but the globe-encircling ocean. Men now broke with the old world; the longing felt by Ulysses to return to his home, hearth, and wife, had, after having nourished on the sufferings of the "Wandering Jew" into a yearning for death, risen into the ardent desire for something new, unknown, and not visibly present, but yet felt beforehand. This immensely-extended trait we find in the myth of the Flying Dutchman, this poem of a sea-faring people in the historical epoch of voyages of discovery. We bit upon a remarkable mixture, effected by the spirit of the people, of the character of the Wandering Jew and that of Ulysses. The Dutch mariner is condemned by the Devil—here evidently by the element of the deluge and the abyss—to sail about restlessly for all eternity upon the ocean. Exactly like Ahasveros he longs for death as a termination to his sufferings; this redemption, denied the Wandering Jew, may, however, be obtained by the Dutchman through the instrumentality of a woman, who shall sacrifice herself out of love for him; the yearning for death impels him, therefore, to seek out this woman; she is no longer, however, the Penelope of Ulysses, attending to her home duties, and wedded years before; she is woman generally, but woman not present, woman we long for, of whom we have a presentiment, the endlessly womanly woman—or, to express it in a word: the Woman of the Future.

MUSIC IN NAPLES.

A correspondent writes from Naples thus:—

"Our great theatre remains closed, and up to the present moment there is no indication of its being re-opened this season. What probability, indeed, would there be of its being able to pay its expenses with half Europe in a state of agitation? Few stronger facts could be adduced to prove the universal paralysis with which war has struck the Peninsula than that San Carlo shows no sign of returning animation. It has always been considered a necessity of existence for our Neapolitans. Let any disaster befall the people, but let the great theatre open wide its doors! Something, however, may be done later; hopes have been expressed that a foreign Appaltatore may come forward to risk his reputation, and what would be considered of more value, his purse, to revive the ancient glory of this City of the Muses. To tell the truth, however, the pulses of the country best too strongly now to allow of much expenditure of thought on Art. There has been an event at the Fondo which has excited much attention, and it is the production of Giannina e Bernardone by Cimarosa. For some time the false taste which has encouraged mere noise, or what the Patrie well styles 'tempeste obbligate' and 'migliatrici applicata all'orchestra,' has ignored the purity of an older school, but, thanks to Signor Florimo, the Maestro Signorini and the Giannina e Bernardone of Cimarosa have been disinterred from the dust of the archives of the College of Music, and have been received with delight by large audiences who never before had heard them. It is hoped that this may inaugurate a period of better taste, and that young writers who, deficient in study and inspiration, now fill works of a day with polkas and mazurkas,' may hereafter give more attention to a 'Master' whom Rossini studied diligently. The performers, who were well received, were La Pasletti, La Valerani, La Bolis, Pasletti, Brignoli, Borelli, and Palmieri, of whom La Pasletti, and Brignoli especially were applauded. Il Conte d'Ory will, it is expected, be shortly put upon the stage, and with this the season at the Fondo will close. And what then? Are we to have an exhibition on a large scale in Rome? Time has yet to show it."

ENGLISH ACTORS OF OUR TIME.

No. 2.—WEBSTER.

The most popular style of acting in England, and that in which during late years the most frequent triumphs have been obtained, is the sotto-comic Tragedy, in its highest developments, seems to have accompanied Mr. Macready into retirement, while comedy finds but few representatives, and those chiefly lingerers from a previous generation. In parts, however, in which the pathos is domestic, and in which tragedy is shown through a veil of comedy, modern acting leaves little to desire. In which class of characters we have seen the marvellous impersonations of the late Mr. Robson, besides those of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Craven, Mr. Dominick Murray, Mr. Belmore, and many other actors of equal merit and reputation. Mr. Webster's fame has been derived from parts of this class. Unlike Mr. Robson or Mr. Jefferson, in whom the comic and tragic seem nicely balanced, Mr. Webster is much more successful in presenting the serious than the humorous side of the character he assumes. It may be doubted, indeed, whether his acting can justly be said to have a comic side. Those semi-humorous or semi-ludicrous traits occasionally introduced into some of his more popular representations seem scarcely more than the touches of light in a picture, which are necessary to indicate the profundity of the gloom. Mr. Webster's career is one that should be studied by those aspirants to the stage who believe that success can be achieved by a coup de-main. At the present moment Mr. Webster is one of the most intelligent, conscientious, and, in the fullest sense of the word, artistic actors our stage possesses. Each performance of his bears marks of dramatic appreciation and intelligent study. Yet few long it took to ripen the powers he possesses, to give the familiarity with stage device, the insight into character, and the executive ability he displays, may be seen from his early career. Year after year, in patient obscurity, were the foundations of his reputation laid.

Almost 1825, if we mistake not, he first appeared in London and played at Drury Lane. Two years subsequently the first mention of him we have traced in stage records occurs, and we find him playing a subordinate part in a version of The Lady of the Lake. The same year he obtained the praise of Judge Talford for the manner in which he presented a fat man on the stage in a worthless and forgotten melodrama entitled The Boy of Santillane; or, Gil Blas and the Bandits. Half a dozen years later we hear of him unfavourably, this time as giving at the Haymarket an incompetent rendering of Figaro, in The Barber of Seville. Silence again follows until an Hibernian, Harley gives the young actor an opportunity of displaying the existence of unsuspected power. In 1837 he became the manager of the Haymarket, which theatre he subsequently left, as is well known, for the Adelphi and other houses connected with his name. Since that period when his management began, all the best remembered impersonations have been given, Lavater, Belphegor, Triplet, Pennholder, Pierre Leroux, Joseph Chavigny, Richard Pride, Robert Landry, and Luke Fielding contributing to increase his reputation, and to show the limits as well as the reality of his abilities. Mr. Webster's range is not great. He is most successful in depicting characters in which the pathos is drawn from surroundings than those in which it is inherent. Of purely comic representations, or, indeed, of representations into which any considerable spirit of comedy enters, he has during late years given us little. Calvinistic sternness of heart, an unpardoning affliction coupled with an intense sense of the agony by domestic trials and shame as in Luke Fielding, in The Willow Copse, is the kind of character he most easily presents. He would be admirable, we cannot help thinking, in a whole range of characters, from the novels of Scott, beginning with dour Davie Deans and ending with Balfour of Burley. Next to characters of this class come those in which poverty and want are exhibited as breaking the spirit of a man of talent and even of genius, representations of struggle between starvation and dishonour in the mind of the scholar. The third range of character in which Mr. Webster has attained a mark which, though inferior to that he attains in parts to which previous reference has been made, is still high, is in heroes of pure melodrama. His performance of Robert Landry, in The Dead Heart, of Watts Phillips, is one of the most popular of his representations. Though full of vigour and colour, however, it is decidedly inferior to many impersonations Mr. Webster has given us. For this, however, the actor is not wholly responsible. The motives of the character have been but imperfectly revealed by the dramatist. We see the unconquerable devotion, the zeal and the readiness for self-sacrifice of the hero, but the key to much of his conduct and to his relations to those with him is not supplied. The part is played by Mr. Webster with great care, but the qualities depicted are those which afford least difficulty to the actor. In one respect does the representation approach greatness. We see in Landry a character formed by the Revolution. Just as Figaro sprang of the convulsions of the Regency, as Andrew Fairservice developed from Scotch "canniness" worked upon by Calvinistic teaching, as Old Mortality issued from the Covenanters, as Lovelace sprang from the riotous courts of the Stuarts, as Pendennis was a direct emanation from the commonplace life of yesterday, was Robert Landry beggotten by the French Revolution. He was cradled in its principles of revenge, and baptised in its water, or, shall we say, its blood of heroism and self sacrifice? This individuality of Landry is, moreover, due principally to the actor. Something of the kind is indicated in the play. Its perfect realization is attributable to the artist.

What displays to fullest advantage Mr. Webster's gifts of expression and gesture is the character of Triplet in Masks and Faces. Attired in all the panoply of Grub Street, the poor author, bankrupt in purse and in spirit, displays the purposeless and gloomy despondency his situation is calculated to arouse. Flashes of hope irradiate for a moment his mind, but its general atmosphere is gloom; its constant attitude one of hopeless wretchedness. As a picture the representation was perfect. Each detail of costume had received minute attention. Hogarth could scarcely have drawn with brush, or Pope described with pen, a more truthful portrait of the poor scribbler, whose high aspirations had sunk in the long-sustained conflict with the world, until what had once been a battle for glory and on behalf of principle had ended as a struggle almost despairing for bread. The rapture of the man as new prospects arose before him is not less touching than his demeanour in defeat. At first the tears can scarcely be credited. As slowly its truth becomes apparent the tears seems to thaw into tears of joy. His old sorrows seem almost visibly to drop from him, and joy and delight suffuse his whole being. While resembling in some respects the character of Triplet, that of Pennholder differs from it in being more pathetic. Few scenes on the modern stage are more touching than that in which the father endeavours by attitude and inflection to make his daughter love and understand the voice of nature, and being her to realise the fact that no persuasion of a father but the father himself solicits her preservation and pines for her caress. Very noteworthy in this is the manner in which helplessness and timidity are conveyed. The love for the newly found child while it has raised the feelings of the father to a state of supreme exaltation has taken from him no slight measure of his power and his dignity mankind. So afraid is he of a refusal to acknowledge him that he draws back again and again from the critical experiment he is yet resolved to try. In the contrast between eagerness and mistrust and in the manner in which the profound yearning of a father's heart is depicted this representation is unsurpassed upon the English stage.

Mr. Webster's Belphegor stands out his inferiority in melodramatic parts to his illustrious compeer, Frederic Lemaitre. The pathos of the situation is evoked by Mr. Webster with the heart of a master, but the delicacy, subtlety, and refinement of Lemaitre were not reached. In Richard Pride the gloom of the representation deepens almost beyond tragedy. In this, as in Mr. Webster's acting in the part, and it succeeds in indicating rather than depicting its cruelty, it cannot altogether soften its repulsiveness. Drunkenness, while accomplishes one murder and is on the point of accomplishing a second, is not very pleasant to look at or easy to prevent. The alternations of maudlin penitence and desperate resolve in the earlier scenes are finely indicated. Among characters which are less kind, but which have merit equal to those described, may be mentioned Joseph Chavigny, in a play of the same name, which, for a short time, held possession of the Adelphi, and the Jesuit in Leave and a Life. Advisable in all respects was the manner in which in the latter the presence of better feeling behind the stern cold exterior was indicated.

The quietude of Mr. Webster's manner, and his power of manifesting emotion with the employment of the common medium of sense and rant, are two of his remarkable characteristics. A slight movement and the mere inflection of a voice are adequate with him to a world of revelation Fine, however, as is the actor's method, and complete as is his mastery of the passions he essays to depict, his range is, as we have said, not wide. No comic humour can be stirred in the mind, although many comic parts, such as Wildrake, in The Love Chase, and others have been played by him. Sadness and pathos constitute his forte, and the confines of his empire are distinctly marked. Ferocity hidden behind emotions, subservience and a slimy self-satisfaction in Tartuffe, puritanical rapidity and inveterate and unflinching honesty in Luke Fielding, timid and disconsolate and rather maundering regret and despair in Triplet, and exquisite tenderness and pathos in Pennholder represent the bounds of his kingdom and shut in a small but scarcely inconsiderable domain.

Manners for Music.

Rataplan, friends, sing
In a minor key,
War is no slight thing
Even fools may see.
While the thinking man
Must their folly rue
Rataplan, plan, plan?
Ratapooh, pooh, pooh!

Tra la la, tric-trac!
Sing ye small o'er night,
In the bivouac,
Upon eve of fight.
If indeed you can
Hold your nonsense, do.
Rataplan, plan, plan?
Ratapooh, pooh, pooh!

Silly chorus such
To insane war-song
We have heard too much—
We have heard too long.
The results now scan
To vain-glory due.
Rataplan, plan, plan?
Ratapooh, pooh, pooh!

Promenade, advance
On invaded land,
Is unlike a dance—
Do you understand?
It is no con-cou,
For your foes or you.
Rataplan, plan, plan?
Ratapooh, pooh, pooh!

Punch.

RICHARD WAGNER.

(From "Dwight's Journal of Music.")

Our friend of the London Musical World wonders that we waste our time in the translation of some passages from "that miserable piece of egotistical coxcombry and absolute nonsense, the pamphlet called Ueber das Dirigiren," and asks: "What, in the name of Music, does any sensible American care about such stuff?" Pray do not be alarmed; we never dreamed of undertaking to translate the whole work, or even his larger part of it; that would, indeed, be a thankless and a dreary task. But we have given a few of the opening chapters by way of specimens to gratify the curiosity of our readers, and because, with all their egotism, they do contain some good hints about the matter of conducting an orchestra. With the same view, we make a few more extracts, referring meanwhile to Ferdinand Hiller's pungent criticism, which we have copied at the same time, for an apercu of the general drift and spirit of the whole.

While we see by no means convinced by Wagner's theories nor partial to his music, we have endeavored, so far as possible, to do him justice. So, when we can conveeiently, we let him speak for himself. Often enough before—perhaps too early for our present audience—we have expressed our distrust of his principles, our distrust for his practice, and have given our reasons. Lately, during the year past, we have allowed his admirers to speak pretty freely and fully in our columns; giving place, for instance, to the long and glowing article about him from the Revue de deux Mondes, as well as to the letters of a young friend whose face is set towards "the Future." Soon we propose to translate some of what we consider the sounder criticisms of the best German writers upon music, such as the talented Otto Jahn. Meanwhile, we go back to our own first honest endeavours to get at the truth, and hereby resume the thread.

We attempt years ago to give our readers an outline of Wagner's theory of Operatic composition as developed in the three volumes of his book, entitled Opera and Drama. We stated his fundamental criticism upon the Opera as hitherto existing; to wit, that the mistake has lain in the endeavour to construct it on the basis of absolute music, making music the end instead of the means; whereas the only true lyric drama, hitherto never realized, can spring only from the marriage of poetry and music. In his own operas, his Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, he thinks to have emancipated the poet from that completely menial relation in which he has stood to the musician, merely furnishing the latter with some slight word-text for the forms in which he chooses to compose, as recitative, arias, ensembles, chorus, ballet, &c.—and thus producing texts or libretti of the most empty, trivial character. Here is a double slavery; the composer cuts his music to the fashionable patterns required by the singers for the display of their voices and tours de force; while the poet writes to order for the composer. In the drama according to Wagner, the music is nothing but the art of expressing the thoughts furnished by the poem.

His whole thinking on the subject seems to have fallen under the control of an ingenious simile. He makes Poetry the masculine and Music the feminine element of expression. He denies to Music any power of independent production; and considers all the efforts of absolute, or purely instrumental music as doomed to everlasting impotence, as so much barren yearning for delivery. This he thinks to be the characteristic of all our modern instrumental music in symphony and overture, and chamber music. Instrumental music exhausts itself in a vain struggle after definite expression. In confirmation of which criticism, he points to the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the last word of instrumental music, from its genius par excellence. After striving in vain for utterance through the orchestra, until the instruments themselves do all but speak in human recitative, he suddenly bursts the bonds and calls in words the "Hymn to Joy" of Schiller. And that bold act, thinks Wagner, marks the transition from the music of the past to the music of the future, from music pure, and barren, to music in its true and fruitful function as coadjutor with Poetry in the living and perfect Drama. Music, according to him, can only bear, it cannot generate; the generating power is extraneous to it and resides only in the poet.

We perhaps wrong his thought in this bald statement, divesting it of all that wealth of ingenious and happy illustration with which he develops it. But we believe we give the kernel of the thought. Richard Wagner is himself both poet and musician, alike an adept at both arts; he has carefully prepared his own libretto; and it must be a satisfaction for once to have libretto which, when only read, amount to real poems. His practice, too, in this double character of poet-composer, may be better than his theory. Lohengrin and Tannhäuser may be works of genius;—genius enough to save them from the consequences of the worst preconceived theory of composition. But we must say, that theory hardly chimes with musical experience. We do not think that any true musiclover, who has had personal experience of the power with which Beethoven's symphonies address the deeper instincts of the soul, would willingly exchange them for any amount of the best poetry skilfully set to recitative. We do not think it will be owned, by true music lovers, that instruments have failed in those instances, to convey some meaning; that those Adagio's and Scherzos are not bad fide live creations, real deliveries of divine brain-children, or that they convey to you no adequate expression of the tone artist's inmost life and purpose. Nor is it at all true to history that instrumental or pure music exhausts itself in a vain effort and is on the decline. On the contrary, the age runs into instrumental music; no music has such power over a community at all musically cultivated, as that in the grand orchestral forms; and it is matter of almost universal experience, that as we grow more musical the love for instrumental music gains upon, sometimes outlives, the love for vocal. Music may correspond to the feminine principle:—so far we do not quarrel with Wagner's analogy. But what is the feminine principle in the soul? It is feeling. Sentiment, as contrasted with the colder masculine principle of Intellect or Reason. Words are the language of the intellect, tones are the language of the heart. Love and Wisdom (no one disputes the axiom of the Swedish seer in this) are the feminine and masculine principle in the universe. But love is first, before and deeper than Wisdom. And so the poet says:

> "Thought is deeper than all speech
> Feeling deeper than all thought," &c.

It is this Feeling, this something deeper in us than words can utter, or than can ever take the definite forms of thought, that seeks its utterance in music as the only natural language. It is this that necessitates the art of music in the life of man. The symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven never had existed but for these experiences in human souls of something deeper, finer, more essential than words were ever framed to utter. Vague are they? But the very definiteness of words perverts their sense and puts their fervency influence to flight. Why do our deeper moods love silence? Music is but the audible breath of such full silence. Hence there may be, there should be profound moral and spiritual culture in listening sympathetically to great instrumental music. You want an end; you do not seek a literal meaning; you enter into the spirit of it, which is somehow wondrously in harmony with deeper depths than you were perhaps aware of in your spirit. No, Herr Wagner! the great tone-poet does not need the word-poet to impregnate his creative genius, or to furnish him the wherewithal to express himself. Pure music is a very subtle, perfect medium for the inmost Beethoven. Dumb otherwise, as he was deaf, almost, yet what great soul has succeeded better in making himself understood? And should the Choral Symphony become universally recognized as the greatest, will that be at the expense of the other symphonies? Shall we love the Fifth and the Seventh less? Shall we love Fidelio less, that we love the last one more? Did the orchestra in that one outburst into human speech yield up its soul for ever, and pronounce pure instrumental music henceforth absolute? The musical genius of mankind says no: it mingles more and more deeply into the mysteries of instrumental music, because it has more to utter than words and voices can convey. It remains to see whether the next of symphonies and overtures and quartets will sicken under the new charm of the interminable Wagner recitative, shaped to the model of cunningly contrived alliterative verses, borrowing from them its only melody or rhythm, and for modulation knowing no key-note, but swimming ambiguously in all keys at once.

But we anticipate. We must see how Wagner theoretically arrives at and justifies these peculiarities of style, or rather of musical structure. The generative power of the poet, he says, manifests itself chiefly in the formation of melodies. Not that he supplies the melodies ready made to the musician's hand. He says repeatedly, to be sure, that the melody is already implied in the versification of the poem; but then he explains this to mean that the poet in his verse gives the musician the fructifying seeds; "the fruit is matured and moulded by the musician according to his own individual means." The risings and fallings of the melody must conform to the risings and fallings of the verse; the musical time or measure is governed by the expression designed by the poet; and the musical modulation brings out as clearly as possible the bond of relationship between the single tones or keys of feeling, which the poet could only indicate to a limited extent by means of allite:ation." As an instance of a melody thus springing immediately out of the word-verse, he cites the manner in which Beethoven in his Ninth Symphony has set the words: "Seid umschlungen, Millionen, &c. (" Mingle in embrace, ye millions"). In Lohengrin all the melodies are made upon this principle.

Wagner proclaims a sort of revolution in the sphere of Modulation. Hitherto it has been supposed essential to any unity in a piece of music that all its harmonies should pivot, as it were, upon one prevailing key; that the deviations therefrom should keep as much as possible within the next related keys, as those of the dominant and subdominant, relative major and minor, and so forth; and that however exclusive or centrifugal the movement, everything in it should still gravitate back to the central key-note and starting-point. A certain family affinity of keys, with only exceptional intermarriages of now and then a branch into a remoter race, has been an essential law of all good music. Wagner throws down the barriers of this patriarchal system of modulation, as he calls it. He wants the whole range of keys: these are to the musician what the vowels and consonants are to the poet, who intimates affinities and contrasts of feeling by alliteration; and the musician has to show the ground——

A BACK VIEW OF THE FESTIVALS.

We now enter upon the third, and last stage of our Festival notices. Events prospective and events current have occupied attention in turn, bringing us to that point where looking back becomes a duty. Taking the Hereford Festival first, as being first in point of time, we come upon what seems a failure. But is it really so? Everybody may answer "yes" without giving a satisfactory proof, because everybody is a pessimist at heart, and apt to be easily convinced in the direction of his inclinations. Let us look a little into the matter. Success at the Festival of the Three Choirs is of two sorts—artistic and pecuniary; the one by no means dependent on the other; though, perhaps, the latter is of greater importance than the former as far as concerns the stability of the institution. What was the result at Hereford in respect of each? Here it may be well to premise that the average artistic success of these Festivals is not high, for reasons we have set forth again and again,—reasons which must exist while a cathedral organist, unused to the work, is placed in the conductor's seat. Bearing this low average in mind, we fail to discover any falling off at Hereford. Band and chorus were excellent; the principal singers were among the best obtainable; and the performances, as a rule, could claim credit for a fair degree of precision. In these respects the Festival was up to the standard; but in others it went beyond. That was a genuine change for the better which abolished one of the unmeaning secular concerts in favour of an oratorio in the Cathedral. Moreover, it may have established a precedent which, eventually, will do away with the hodge-podge programmes of the Shire Hall, and devote the entire scheme to nobler work. Should this prove the case, the late Hereford gathering, far from being looked upon as a failure, will have to be regarded as a great success. Should no such a result follow, the well-directed energies of Mr. Townshend Smith and his fellow managers will still deserve approving recognition. In one respect a course was adopted which, we hope, may never meet with favour again. Many of the works chosen for performance were too insignificant for the occasion, and took up the place of others more important and more likely to be remembered for their proper place we have nothing to say against the compositions to which we refer They have all more or less merit, and all make a claim upon our notice it would be unjust to disregard. But such Festivals as that of Hereford should concern themselves only with the greatest productions of genius; the exhibition of which is their special duty, and constitutes almost wholly their raison d'être. A few more schemes drawn up in defiance of this consideration will go further to ruin the gathering of the Three Choirs than all the assaults of Ritualist or Puritan, or both combined. But, putting this aside, there was nothing to prove any artistic regression in the doings at Hereford. The pecuniary result was not re-assuring, we must confess. Smaller audiences and smaller collections for the charity than those of 1867, which, in turn, were smaller than those of 1864, suggest unpleasant reflections as to the future of a time-honoured and useful institution. We will not, however, consent to believe, without further proof, that indifference to the Festival has become chronic. As regards the present year, at least, good reasons for indifferent success are not far to seek. A war is raging which affects a wider area than the two nations actually engaged; commerce lives, so to speak, from hand to mouth; and drought has done mischief which dwellers in pastoral Herefordshire can well appreciate These things conspired against the Festival, and rendered it if they have not killed it. On the other hand, it would be folly to shut our eyes to the fact that the ease with which distances can now be traversed, and the mobile habits springing out of it, have sorely injured provincial music meetings everywhere. The best artist and the finest choral effects are familiar to the thousands of amateurs who often "run up to town," and who are the main supporters of local gatherings. That these thousands should grow less anxious about Festival matters in consequence, is a perfectly natural result, however. It may be regrettable. On the whole, the prospects of the Three Choir Meetings, as shown by late experience, are not hopeful. Their well-wishers, however, have the alternative of hoping against hope.

Coming now to the Birmingham Festival, let us, at the outset, dismiss a matter personal to ourselves. The letter with which a special correspondent was able to supply us from amid the distractions of a busy and exciting week could only deal lightly with topics which demand an exhaustive notice. Their demand shall eventually be satisfied, and we hope in subsequent numbers of the Musical World to discuss at fitting length the novelties with which the Birmingham programme was crowded For the present, however, our business is merely to touch the salient points of the Festival, with a view to bringing them more closely under the reader's eye than is possible in a detailed report. The first is an eminently satisfactory point. Although the number present on Wednesday morning fell woefully below the average, the gross attendance reached a higher figure than ever. So with the gross receipts, which, for the only time in the history of the Festival, exceeded £24,000. This result seems to dispose of the reasons given above why the Hereford Festival should have fallen off. In reality, it does no such thing. Birmingham flourishes when war is raging; and the Festival exerts an attraction over so wide an area that little short of universal distress could give it a damaging blow. The two cases stand apart, therefore, and in respect of them the homely proverb, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander," does not apply. But leaving Hereford for good, we must congratulate Birmingham upon the splendid result above stated—a result certain to establish the Festival upon a firmer basis than ever, and to urge on the managers to renewed enterprise. In the matter of enterprise, however, there has of late been small reason to complain. Take, as proof, the five new works of which our correspondent had to speak last week. Whatever the ultimate fate of those compositions, Paradise and the Peri, Naïa and Damayanti, the Ouverture di Ballo, Ode to Shakspere, and St. Peter, form a monumental group by which the memory of the Festival of 1870 will be kept green. Nothing like the spirit which called them forth has been known of recent years, while equally admirable was the discretion shown in the choice of their composers. Wherever else it may be forgotten, Birmingham remembers that a man's best duty is to his native country; and, hence, out of the five musicians honoured with invitations to write for the Festival only one can strictly be called a foreigner. Messrs Barnett and Sullivan are Englishmen, Dr. Stewart brings his Scottish name from Dublin; and Mr. Benedict years ago adopted this country as his own. Here we have what should be; and, moreover, what should be imitated by all who are able to patronize art. Once establish this as a rule, and the languishing musical genius of England would, we venture to say, assert itself as never before. With reference to the value of the new works performed, it would serve little purpose if an unimportant opinion were given. That each has a value, and that one, at least,—need Mr. Benedict St. Peter be named?—will take very high rank, cannot for a moment be doubted. In other respects the Festival demands scarcely qualified praise. The executive forces were as complete as ever; Sir Michael Costa was again an unequalled general-in-chief; and in every department of the working, complete organization was attained. Briefly, the Festival, with all its load of responsibility, was a triumph of easy management, and a model thing of its kind. Birmingham, is, of course, elated with the success attained, and an exultant tone marked the tone of all the speeches made at the last meeting of the general committee; not a little of the gratification, it may be hoped, arising from the fact that a noble hospital will be largely benefited, and that a beneficent art has again shown herself, to some purpose, the handmaid of charity.

THUMPERS EGG.

SALZBURG.—The celebration of the Beethoven Festival at the Mozarteum has been postponed to quieter times.

VIENNA.—Herr Theodor Wachtel has appeared, at the Carl Theater, as George Brown, in Le Pauvre Blanche, but his rendering of the character could not bear comparison with that of Herr Walter or Herr Sonthichm.—The season at the Imperial Operahouse was inaugurated by Der Freischütz. Madame Dustmann was good as Agathe; Mdlle. Tellheim, ditto, as Aennchen; and Herr Labitt, unsatisfactory as Max. The mise-en-scène, especially of the celebrated "Wolf's Glen," was very mean, and more befitting a third-rate provincial theatre than the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna. Among the works in preparation are, Mignon, Robert le Diable, and Lohengrin. The new tenor, Sig. Cesena, will make his first appearance in October. The character he has chosen is Elenzar in Halévy's Juive.—The receipts of the grand concert given the other day for "humane purposes" (a neutral expression for "the wounded Germans"), amounted to 1,200 florins.

PESTH.—The Abbate Franz Liszt lately related, to a circle of friends here, the following anecdote:—"The Vocal Association in a Belgian town, where I was stopping for a day or so, had been split up into two opposite factions. After I had given my concert one evening, each faction serenaded me separately. I had duly returned thanks for both these tributes of respect, and both the factions had long since left. I was about to retire to rest. Suddenly, I heard a powerful bass voice close under my window. I threw up the latter, and listened, while the singer gave the whole of Bertram's address to the nuns in Robert the Devil, without the slightest accompaniment, but with an amount of vigour which caused the notes to re-echo far and wide through the fresh night air. Highly pleased with the powers and skill of the unseen vocalist, and anxious to know the reason of this somewhat strange manifestation, I said, looking out into the dark, 'May I inquire to what I am indebted for this honour?'—'Delgn,' replied the invisible warbler, 'to accept this tribute of a solitary admirer. I was the solo bass of our Vocal Association for Male Voices; since, however, the Association split up stupidly into two parties I have stood alone, for I could not agree with either party. I have, therefore, been obliged to testify, in the only way left me, my great admiration for your talent.'"

MILLIET ON THE EARLY FRENCH STAGE.*

This elegant little volume, consisting as it does of less than 120 small pages, is a wonderful satire on the fraternity of bookmakers. M. Milliet begins with the earliest French mysteries of the twelfth century, descants on the dramas that, immediately preceding the golden age, first marked out the theatre as an institution independent of the Church, and ultimately lands us in safety at the death-bed of Molière, wondering how we have accomplished so long a journey in so short a time. What a contrast have we here to those gentlemen who, by dint of useless particulars, empty twaddle, and insignificant epithets, contrive to build bulky tomes on the smallest of foundations! It is a characteristic of our author's talent for compression that he even finds room for the introduction of documentary evidence. Nor is his work a mere flesbless skeleton. His description of the decline and fall of the "confrères de la Passion," to whom belongs the honour of establishing the first permanent theatre in Paris, his comparisons between the poverty of the dramatic entertainments of France and the public pageants, his critical review of the poets who preceded Corneille, are as full as most readers would desire, while for those who court more detailed information, his work will serve as an excellent text-book on which any amount of erudition may be based. That nothing may be wanting, he adds a chronological table which shows that his researches have extended over a period of nearly 500 years, and a list of public decrees, &c., connected with the history of the theatre.

It might be supposed that on undertaking to treat so large a subject within so small a compass, M. Milliet rigidly bound himself to abstain from anecdote or any trivial matter of the kind. So far is this from the truth, that he is evidently pleased when he can find an opportunity for telling a good story. A conflict which ensued between Jean Alais, a celebrated "droll" of the sixteenth century (something like our Tarlton), and the curé of Saint Eustache, which is recorded with much gusto by M. Milliet, nicely symbolizes the never-ending contest between the Church and the stage. Alais, it seems, was beating a drum near the Saint Eustache in order to bring together the patrons of the dramatic art. The curé, who was preaching, found that he could not make himself heard, and consequently elevated his voice, whereupon Jean increased the noise of his drum. At last the rev. gentleman, unable to support the infliction any longer, rushed out of the church, and bowled to the actor "Qui t'a permis de tambouriner si fort quand je prêche?" Jean, nothing daunted, retorted the question, "Qui t'a permis de prêcher si fort quand je tambourine?" The enraged priest broke the drum, but Jean was victorious in the end, for, performing a well-known clown's trick, he "bonneted" the priest with the broken instrument, and thrust him back into the church amid the laughter of the multitude. When we reflect that Saint Eustache is one of the most important parishes in the French capital it is hard to reconcile this story with the supposed power of the clergy in the sixteenth century. We may remark, en passant, that it has received a little extra colour from the liberal brush of tradition.

The English have of late been made so familiar with the sacred dramas of Spain and Bavaria that we may venture to quote some verses by Roldé, comprising a brief narrative of the irreverence with which the actor of the principal part in a passion play was treated in the course of the performance:—

> "Il advint que chez Caïphe un drôle,
> Qui haïssait l'acteur du premier rôle,
> D'un fier soufflet appliqué rudement
> Calaphisa, le Rédempteur flagrant,
> Qui de respect manquait chez le grand prêtre.
> A ce coup là dit-il, 'Ah, maudit traître!
> Je ne dis mot, mais de par l'ecrévisse
> Tu n'auras pas toujours affaire à Dieu.'"

Notwithstanding the profanity of their tone, these trivial verses furnish an argument in favour of their exposition to sacred plays which the very reverential performance at Ober-Ammergau tended to weaken. A theatrical representation of the New Testament will more efficiently convey scriptural knowledge to an illiterate multitude than a gallery of cartoons on the same series of subjects. We assume that we may represent the most sacred personages by the manipulation of the pencil. Why, then, is it profane for an actor so to attire himself that an analogous representation may be effected? Roldé unknowingly gives to this question a very plausible answer. He virtually declares that the stage is an unfit place for the representation of sacred subjects inasmuch as theatrical art is more than any other subject to ridiculous, mischances which tend to promote irreverence.

As a specimen of typography, M. Milliet's little book is in every way worthy of the choice "Librairie des Bibliophiles."

Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

It would seem superfluous at the time present to say a word concerning Mendelssohn's Elijah were it not a fact that there is "everything new under the sun,"—as those professing to write history make us remember ever and anon.

In an illustration, it was startling to read the other day in the columns of a contemporary, a "full, true, and particular" account of the production of Elijah at Birmingham, which took place scarcely a quarter of a century ago: and to be told that Grisi, Signor Mario, and Miss Dolby were among the original artists who (as the French have it) "created" the Oratorio. Grisi and Signor Mario sang one or two Italian pieces after the close of Elijah from which it would seem as if the Directors fancied that the greatest work of modern times might want "backing up." The principal soprano on the occasion referred to was the late Madame Caradori-Allan; who troubled the composer greatly, by requesting him to transpose to a tone lower the air "Hear ye, Israel," which passes into the chorus, "Be not afraid," in order to suit her convenience. This, of course, could not be done. "It was not," she said, "a lady's song." He was much annoyed, too, by her genteel and mannered delivery of the recitative, "Arise now; get thee without," which preceded the Chorus of the Vision. The principal tenors were Mr. Lockey and Mr. Hobbs. Owing to the limited compass of the latter gentleman's voice, the song, "If with all your hearts" had to be transferred to the younger singer, who may be said to have begun his career of popularity by the effect he produced in that lovely and tender sacred melody. The contralto was Miss Maria B. Hawes; Miss Anne and Miss Martha Williams were the assistant soprano and contralto singers. Miss Rosanne, too, sang in some of the concerted music. Staudigl was the original Elijah.

At the pianoforte, I heard the solo parts of the oratorio, as they arrived in fragments, gone through, at the house of Mendelssohn's friend Moscheles, in the presence of the composer. He had been so much hurried that year by other concerts and commissions as again and again to express fear that he could not be ready in time, and declared that he would never tie himself so closely again. How undecided he was on the eve of presenting his masterpiece, and how little he considered it complete, are proved by the fact, among others, that he was then in doubt whether he should not suppress the song, "O rest in the Lord," "It was too sweet," he said. His friends urged him at least to try its effect. The lady who was to sing it was anxious, in the fine old English fashion, to conclude it by a long shake on the closing notes. "No," said the composer, "I have kept that for my orchestra," and accordingly played that shake in the accompaniment for the flute; the effect of which is so delicious. The lady, I fear, was not altogether satisfied.

The amount of changes made by Mendelssohn after the first performance of the Oratorio, in which only eight pieces were encored, is very large. The scene of the widow and her son was re-written. So, too, was the scene for Jezebel, which even in its amended state was avoided by contralti till Madame Viardot had produced in it one of the sublimest dramatic effects ever heard in an orchestra. The vocal trio for angels was an afterthought, having been originally a duet for the second soprano and contralto, with a triplet accompaniment. This weakened the effect of the subsequent lovely chorus, "He watching over Israel," and was removed accordingly in favour of the movement as it stands. The recitative introducing the superb scene of the Vision, was re-written again and again, and only at last, I believe, was allowed to retain its original form. Mendelssohn intended, I know, to re-model the final chorus. I am not aware that this was done.

It seems like only yesterday that before our going into the hall, he said to me, "Now stick your claws into my book. Don't tell me what you like—but tell me what you don't like." When all was over, we came together again, and he said in his merriest humour, "Come, and I will show you the prettiest walk in Birmingham." He took me to the banks of a canal, bordered by coke and cinder heaps. We walked and talked there between two hedges for more than an hour; and the patience with which he considered the remarks which, —in obedience to what, with me, was equivalent to a royal command,—I had ventured to note, lives in my mind as one of the most precious proofs of that fairness, modesty, and candour—so to the suggestions of his inferiors, of which any one story of his life most contains so many instances. It may be as well, seeing that so many mis-statements are abroad, to put the above facts and corrections on record, for the use of biographers to come.

SCHMALKALDEN.—On the 27th ult., the gold medal sent by Queen Augusta to the composer of "Die Wacht am Rhein," together with a letter from the Governor-General of the district, Herr Herwarth von Bittenfeld, was presented, at the Town Hall, by the Landrath, to Herr Karl Wilhelm. At the same time, the Corporation conferred on him the freedom of the town. In the evening, the various vocal associations got up a serenade and a torchlight procession in his honour.

DARMSTADT.—The want of good, spacious, and convenient concert-rooms, something on the model of the Concerthaus, Berlin, has long been an urgent want here. That want has at length been supplied, and the new establishment was opened on the 3rd inst. by a concert for the wounded German soldiers.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1870.

PERHAPS, after one or other of the late Festival performances at Birmingham, some of the audience may have walked across Ratcliff Place to the Corporation Art Gallery. The trouble is not much, and it was worth taking, for in the gallery, in the place of honour—as it deserves to be—hangs the portrait of the man who set the good work on foot more than a hundred years ago. When a general wins a great victory, we give him a peerage and a pension, and set up his effigy in public places, and render honour to him through generations, in all imaginable ways. When a man gives his mind to saving instead of taking life, we do not quite make so much of him; and sometimes he is forgotten, or lives only in a sort of dim tradition, or in a casual portrait, which the public has no chance of seeing.

Now this is much the case with Dr. John Ash, the physician who set on foot the Birmingham General Hospital, and helped to begin the great series of music meetings known throughout Europe as the Birmingham Festival. Outside the town which he benefited so much, the history of Dr. Ash is not known at all, and in it very little; indeed, but for the portrait kept in the Board Room of the Hospital, he would be a name, and nothing more. But this picture really helps to keep before us the man as he lived. Happily, it was painted by a great artist—Sir Joshua Reynolds, who put his best work into it, and made it one of his masterpieces. Until now the picture has remained in the Board Room of the Hospital, carefully tended, but little seen—many Birmingham men, even, knowing nothing of it. At the request of the Free Libraries Committee, however, the Board of the Hospital lent the picture to the Corporation Art Gallery; and there it is now, freely open to view.

But it may be asked—Why all this fuss about Dr. Ash, a Birmingham doctor who lived a hundred years ago, and happened to be painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds? Just this. Dr. Ash was the founder of the Hospital, and from his day to ours, the Hospital has received and treated 750,000 patients, of whom thousands upon thousands have had cause to bless the benevolence which prompted and the brain which devised such a noble means of relieving human misery. The population of Birmingham is now about 370,000; and since the General Hospital was established, nearly twice that number has passed through its wards.

It is only proper that the well-to-do classes who throng to the magnificent performances at the Birmingham Festival should be thus reminded of the chief object which brings them together, and of the man to whom the beginning of the great work was due. Dr. Ash not only founded the Hospital but the Festivals as well. The two have gone on growing together. Dr. Ash had a prophetic instinct that it would be so. The Hospital was only a small institution when opened, but as back-ground to the portrait of the founder there is a view of the charity, which those who look at will allow to be an imposing feature. So with the Festivals. The first, held in 1768, yielded the modest amount of £299. The one, held in 1867, produced a net sum of £5,541. The whole series (not including the Festival just over) has realized for the Hospital more than £90,000, and provided, in addition, for the purchase of a great organ and a musical library, worth together £6,000, or £7,000 more. So that, looking both at the progress of the Hospital and the growth of the Festival, we recognize the vast importance of the work begun by a Birmingham physician a century ago. The result is worth commemorating, as a victory over suffering and disease; and the man who planned and gave the first impulse to an undertaking so noble and unselfish in its aims, and so admirable in its organization, deserves honourable recognition quite as much as if he had been a successful general with a peerage and a pension.

On such an occasion as the celebration of its great music meeting Birmingham has a right to put itself en fête, proud of what it has done, and proud of what it is going to do. For a large number of people the week is one of pleasure, with this difference from ordinary pleasure, that the ultimate object is charity. We do not say that all who attend the Festival attend because they are thus helping the sick and suffering, or that they would be so liberal if the impulse to benevolence were not supplemented by the attractions of art. But even with those who think least about it the consciousness that a great charity derives benefit from their expenditure must essentially operate as a healthy influence. If this feeling tells nowhere else, it is revealed in the collections after each performance. When the claims of the Hospital are thus preferred, people do not like to go back to their homes, after much refined enjoyment, without having made some direct contribution to the funds of the charity. In this particular year of 1870 the Hospital happened to be very much in want of aid. The reconstruction and enlargement of the building has been recently completed, augmenting to 235 the number of in-patients receivable at one time, and awarding to each nearly twice the breathing space which the limited capacity of former wards could furnish. New rooms have also been erected for out-patients; a separate building has been put up for fever patients; the nurses and resident officers have been decently cared for; and altogether the Hospital is a different place compared with what it was a few years ago. These improvements, it need scarcely be said, have cost money—no less than £22,000. And though many friends of the charity have come forward, and the public has behaved liberally, a large sum still remains to be provided. In fact, to pay for the new buildings and improvements, the Hospital Board stood in want of about £8,000, and looked to the Festival to help them very materially.

£8,000 is a large sum; but was it quite beyond the region of probability? The Festival Committee, in providing an admirable series of performances, sacred and secular, including several interesting novelties, and in keeping the expenditure, at the same time, within reasonable limits, did all that was expected of them, the hearty acknowledgment of which forms the best reward they can hope for or desire. The result has, we believe, surpassed anticipation. There was no reason why this should not have been so. Birmingham is growing in wealth and prosperity year by year.

SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES.—Messrs. Lyster & Smith have introduced an entertainment at the Masonic Hall new to the Sydney public. The opera di camera, or chamber opera, is often given in continental circles, and no doubt it will become popular in Sydney, judging from the patronage bestowed upon it last evening. The hall was filled with the élite of Sydney. The operas performed were Lucretia Borgia and Maritana. The performers were all in evening costume, and although there was no acting, the audience enjoyed a great treat with the vocalization. All the principals, English and Italian, appeared for the last time previously to their departure for Melbourne. One and all received rapturous applause at the conclusion of their performances. The only encore that was taken was by Miss Lucy Chambers, in "Alas, those chimes," from Maritana; the others simply bowed their acknowledgments.—Sydney Paper.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

IRELAND, if report may be credited, is subscribing impartially to the fund for the French and German wounded. The exclusive French committee only obtains small sums from a poorer class of donors. Mdlle. Tietjens, it is stated, was requested to sing at a concert for the general fund, at the close of her operatic engagement in Dublin, and would seem to have greatly displeased the Germans by declining without giving a reason. Her compatriots are the more annoyed as the request was made to her by one of the Prussian ministers.

In a sketch of theatrical matters in Italy, contributed by Signor Valentino Carrera to the Rivista Europea, the writer, himself an author of merit, expatiates on the difficulty which managers and authors have in finding good supernumeraries. In Italy managers of theatres are often at a loss for persons who can act, with some degree of intelligence, the subordinate (and generally mute) parts of peasants, guards, courtiers, &c. Out of six thousand who undertake them scarcely one hundred have any aptitude for the task. The pay of a supernumerary averages from fifty centimes to one lira a night; and at Turin there are workmen who for twenty-five centimes are willing to remain the whole night muffled up as Romans. At Florence the best supernumeraries are furnished by the Societa Tramagnini; but the assistance of this society of twenty is not to be had for less than fifty lire a night. If, however, the supernumeraries are generally at sea, they have some excuse, as they are frequently not called previous to the last rehearsal.

THE New York True Democrat, after an account of an organ-grinder's being struck by lightning near that place, says:—

"On examination of the body of the deceased at the inquest it was found that one of the limbs of the tree under which he was sitting at the time of the electric stroke, had been photographed by the lightning upon his left bosom. This is both curious and remarkable, and may lead to developments in science not heretofore known. The deceased was eating an apple at the time the bolt fell, and his knife was found lying alongside of him at the time of his death."

Photographs of the apple and the knife are said also to have been discovered upon the abdomen of the unlucky organ-grinder.—A. S. S.

Votes of thanks were given to Bishop, Dean, and Chapter, for the effective aid and countenance afforded to the Festival, and for their hospitality.

Resolved unanimously, that the thanks of the Stewards be given to the conductor and honorary secretary for his indefatigable exertions in making arrangements for the Festival, and bringing it to its successful issue.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Gustav Schmidt, Capellmeister, has lost his only son, who fell before Metz on the 18th inst.—At Michaelmas, Herr Reinecke will cease to be a member of the professional staff at the Conservatory.

PROVINCIAL.

WEYMOUTH.—The Southern Times, alluding to the last of the Promenade Concerts given by Herr van Heddeghem, writes as follows:—

It is with considerable regret that we announce this as the last of, perhaps, the most pleasant series of entertainments the inhabitants and visitors of Weymouth have enjoyed for some time; but shortening days and uncertain weather both point to the necessity of discontinuing the amusement. We must not dismiss the matter without mentioning the debt we owe to Herr van Heddeghem for having originated so attractive a means of public recreation. We trust that in the coming season Weymouth may still have the benefit of his residence here, and again enjoy another series of promenade concerts. In reviewing the eight entertainments that have been held, we call to mind that the principal features have been original compositions of Herr van Heddeghem, and we have no doubt that the numerous audiences who have shared in the pleasure of the concerts have, like ourselves, retained agreeable reminiscences of these pieces, in all of which are manifested musical scholarship of the highest order and worthy of the cherished pupil of De Beriot."

LEEDS.—In the Leeds Mercury we read the following account of Dr. Spark's "organ recitals:"—

"Since returning from a tour in Germany this summer, Dr. Spark has introduced to the lovers of music in Leeds many high-class foreign works secured by him during his temporary absence from England. Some of the compositions that we have heard have evidently been selected with special regard to the orchestral richness and power of the noble instrument over which the borough organist so ably presides, and rarely has the grand organ been heard to better advantage than on the occasion of some recent recitals. Dr. Spark seldom fails to place before the large audiences that attend the popular concerts on Saturday evenings high-class works which, played with a delicate appreciation of their merits, command the admiration of those present, but the hour devoted exclusively to an afternoon recital is unquestionably the time to hear the instrument at its best, in all the beauty and breadth of musical expression. Visitors to the Victoria Hall on Tuesday afternoon had abundant evidence of this. The new and the old were carefully blended in the programme, and yet each piece was so distinctive in its character that the contrast was well marked, while the general result was highly gratifying. As showing the organist's desire to bring new works before a Leeds audience it may be mentioned that the place of honour was occupied by a selection from the new cantata, Nala and Damayanti, composed by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, for the recent Musical Festival at Birmingham. Its first performance in Yorkshire made a favourable impression, and Dr. Spark would do well to reproduce it at some future recital."

OUTSIDE THE HALL ON ELIJAH DAY.*

From an early hour the whole aspect of the centre of the town gave evidence of something unusual. Shopkeepers were astir at unaccustomed hours arranging, polishing, and brightening up their shops and goods; by a judicious stroke of forethought on the part of some one, the fences were well watered in the approaches to the Town Hall long before anyone in the vicinity knew anything about it; the cab-stands—owing to the greater portion of the horses being required elsewhere—were tenantless; and, altogether, what with the efforts made to render New Street and Paradise Street, and the other principal thoroughfares converging on the Hall, as picturesque as possible, the appearance of the immediate neighbourhood of the scene of the Festival of 1870 was quite satisfactory. According to the arrangements the doors were to have been thrown open at half-past ten, and, punctual to the moment, access to the morning performance was obtained at that hour. A strong detachment of the borough police—whose appearance was quite in keeping with the universal furbishing mania which seems to have spread on all sides, publicly and privately—was disposed about the Hall and the approaches, and they had a busy time of it. Soon after the doors were opened the company began to arrive, and it was found that the arrangements worked admirably. By eleven fully one-half the brilliant assembly had found seats, and shortly before the lapse of another half hour the Hall, from the floor to the orchestra to the limit of the great gallery, was filled to overflowing. During the performance of Elijah a large crowd, happy in the possession of standing-places in Congreve Street and Ratcliff Place, and blessed with what it is familiarly known as "outside tickets," clustered about the barriers, and were rewarded by stray snatches of harmony, which, welling out from the windows high up among the Corinthian columns, made themselves heard all round the neighbourhood. For three hours a compact mass lined Congreve Street, spread out at the back of the Hall, and filled Ratcliff Place. If ordinary traffic had been forbidden, absolute silence would have reigned outside the walls temporarily devoted to St.

Cecilia, although thousands were congregated round about; but all were charmed into quiet by the occasional strains of Mendelssohn's sublime oratorio which reached them. To many, however, the chief attraction was the arrival and departure of the company; and, at the close of the performance some difficulty was experienced in preserving free egress. An over-zealous Corporation underling had—with the best intentions no doubt—flooded the carriageways with water a quarter of an hour or so before the company began to disperse; and as at the least two thirds were obliged to walk from the Hall or wait an unreasonable time for carriages, the consequences to many of the ladies were anything but agreeable. The break up, as has been mentioned, was witnessed by an immense concourse, and at half-past two, as the full stream of the assemblage poured down New Street and along Paradise Street, a spectacle well worth seeing was presented.

BUTTON OF BIRMINGHAM.

THE DRAMATIST'S DIFFICULTIES.

In one respect dramatic criticism in the present day is quite in harmony with the tastes of audiences. It is thoroughly intolerant of long speeches or long scenes in a drama. This fact is curious and significant. In most respects dramatic criticism, whatever its defects, is immeasurably ahead of the public taste. Those who take, as the critic must, an intelligent interest in the drama, cannot but deplore the wrong counsel the public gives the actor, and the wrong passion it exercises upon the manner. Everything, or almost everything, the public urge those connected with theatrical affairs to do is wrong. The majority of the public—the vast majority—even cheers when it ought to hiss, and laughs when it ought to frown. Hence, those who endeavour to direct public taste must, if they have any fitness for the task they undertake, be perpetually at issue with those for whom they write. But in the matter of length the unanimity is complete. "When they do agree their unanimity is wonderful." It does not follow, however, that because those who are at other times at issue are in the present instance at one that the judgment so generally held is correct. We doubt, indeed, whether many proofs of the erudity of our knowledge of dramatic affairs could be advanced much stronger than the evidence afforded by unanimity. The limitations English-bmen would impose upon stage representations in this one respect of length of scene and speech are fatal to drama of the highest order. It is impossible for a dramatist to exhibit his most refined analysis, to construct the strongest emotion, or to evoke his most powerful effects, if you tie him down to sharp stage speeches and crisp dialogue. For the display of great emotion and passion the soliloquy is necessary, and the soliloquy must needs be long under certain circumstances. Effective stage plays have been written by those who have looked to public taste and have clipped and pruned their dialogues and monologues. But a really great drama can never be composed under such conditions.

In England there is now little taste for the drama. There is a great and growing taste for theatrical entertainments, but that and a taste for the drama are quite distinct. People in England like to go to theatres and to be amused. They are fond of the gaiety and splendour of the scene, and they take a close and friendly interest in the actors. Some report in London, accordingly, has published upon two more theatres of one class and another. Our shop windows, wherein photographs of our celebrities are exposed, contain more actors, probably, than all other professions put together. When, moreover, an actor like Mr. Mathews is about to leave us for a distant country we give him such an ovation as no other country possibly can afford. Here is abundant proof of our fondness for the stage, but not of our fondness for the drama. We doubt whether any great nation shows less regard for the drama as such than ourselves. To an Italian the theatre is his house, his club, his café, and his friends' house in one. You would as soon think of asking an English merchant whether he was going to his counting-house on any given day as an Italian whether he was going to a theatre. You know, as a matter of course, he will be there unless ill-health or some exceptional cause prevents him. The performances to which he listens are most frequently musical rather than dramatic, but he is a connoisseur in the drama also, and tolerates and finds charms in pieces which would sink an English-man into the depths of weariness. The tragedies of Niccolini are among the hugest dramatic works that ever have been produced, and modern dramatic writings which are acceptable to the Italian, requires strong compression before they become fitted for the English stage. Germans and Spaniards are tolerant of pieces that would drive Englishmen to destruction. Every German piece prepared for the English stage needs to have its dimensions reduced by a third before it is capable of undergoing the ordeal of an English audience.

France, however, is more pre-eminently the land of the dramatist. It has at once the best actors, the best dramatists, and the public the most thoroughly appreciative and critical. When a new piece is produced in Paris it is, if good, a thing of national importance. A successful writer obtains a greeting such as in England we give only to a statesman or a soldier. The country showers honours upon the successful dramatist, the people delight to do him honour. It is hard to say where the marks of appreciation stop. M. Sardou's Patrie, which is not a work of genius, but only a production of high talent and admirable powers of adaptation, has secured for its author a larger share of distinction than the English people have ever awarded any writer, and will yet be productive of future honours. From the latest reports we see that M. Sardou is candidate for a vacant seat in the Académie. We are inclined to wager upon his obtaining it. Such minor distinctions as the various grades of the Legion of Honour are too common in France to call for notice. The French people, so ready to recognize merit that it makes the appearance of a dramatist in the private box of a theatre an occasion for tumultuous applause, does not limit the dramatist's art of the means by which he shall produce his effects as we in England limit them. So long as the result is dramatic and satisfactory it does not insist that each scene shall have its pungency, that no dialogue shall be introduced but such as is short, crisp, and rapid. It tolerates soliloquies as long as any in Shakspere. Take the best known pieces of Victor Hugo for instance: Hernani, the Roi S'Amuse, Lucrèce Borgia, Marion Delorme, or Ruy Blas. There is not one of these that has not long—often very long—soliloquies to which the Parisian public listens with interest and with a keen delight in tracking the thought and intention of the author. Every piece of this author is cut, clipped, and pruned before it can be played with a chance of success in England, and few of them, even when cut and clipped to their smallest proportions, are held fitted for our pure and virtuous public. So soon as any piece is produced in England we hear the cry on all sides it must be cut. If it is in five acts, it should have been in four, if in two, it ought to have been in one. The principle on which people judge, carried a very short way, would reduce all pieces to the simple incident on which they rest, and take away from the dramatists every one of his means of impressing his audiences, except, perhaps, surprise. We are ourselves not guiltless of joining in the cry. It is difficult to resist always the influence of the epoch in which we dwell, and there are, moreover, many pieces produced concerning which the criticism that they are too long is as just and true as it can be. But the fault with modern English plays is, after all, rather in the other direction. Dramatists do not allow themselves scope enough fully to illustrate the passions they depict and the characters they design. There can scarcely be a greater difficulty than to let us see thoroughly, and recognize a rich and noble nature without the employment of soliloquy. Seldom, indeed, do events or incidents draw from us such speech or gesture as will enable spectators to know much about it. But soliloquy is on the stage what thought is in real life, and in it man can di-close his whole nature. What should we know of Hamlet if we took from him his soliloquies? How completely incomprehensible would be his slowness to action, his apparent lack of energy in form and character would appear but for the view it was taken. If ever, then, we are to have a great acted drama, we plead with audiences to be more tolerant of long speeches. It is not in the interest of long-winded writers nor mouthing actors that we thus plead, but in the sacred interest of the drama and pas-

BEETHOVEN, GOETHE, AND MICHAEL ANGELO.*

I recollect once seeing in the Pitti Palace at Florence a picture by Rubens, a magnificent, first-class painting: an "Allegory of War." Enflamed with rage, Mars is rushing out through the gates, flung wide apart, of the Temple of Janus; a wild Fury, waving a torch, is dragging him forward; Harpies are fluttering before him, and Europe (represented as Cybele with the mural crown) follows writhing her hands. It is in vain that the Goddess of Love, with flattering embraces, endeavours to hold him back. In his furious career, as God of War, he has thrown over several male figures, with the emblems of art and science by their hands, among them being a man with a lute. In the background there are all kinds of desolation and wretchedness. It is evident that Rubens painted the picture under the impression of the Thirty Years' War, then ravaging Germany with fire and sword. Late events brought this painting to my mind, and I thought to myself that the Beethoven Festival Committee, at Bonn, might very well borrow it from the Italian Government, and hang it up as a public excuse before the Festival Hall (just as theatrical managers in Germany have red bills posted at the street corners, when there is any sudden and unexpected change of performance); the man thrown down with the lute, and Mars rushing past him would render any further explanation superfluous. But war and the tumult of war shall not prevent us from reminding our readers that in December a century will have elapsed since one of the greatest German masters of the art of music was born—the master whom we are fond of naming with Mozart, just as we are fond of saying "Raphael and Michael Angelo," or "Schiller and Goethe," when we would allude, by two names, to the highest efforts in other branches of art. If, however, matters proceed as they are now progressing at the seat of war, we may yet be able to leave Rubens' picture in Florence, and perform the Ninth Symphony with the "Te Deum" for victory and peace. God grant it may be so.

Of the bearers of the brilliant names just mentioned, the two great German poets, and the two great German composers, were contemporaries. Mozart and Schiller died at an early age, but fate permitted Beethoven to behold the countenance of his great predecessor, Mozart, who is said to have made on the occasion, the oft repeated remark: "Take care of him there; some day he, too, will have something to say." Goethe survived them all. He was, moreover, brought into personal communication with Beethoven, but, with regard to Mozart, we should scarcely be aware whether he ever knew of the existence of Schiller or of Goethe, if he had not set to music Goethe's "Veilchen;" Heaven knows in what chance walk of his he found the lovely modest little flower, whose aromatic perfume delights us even at the present day. Don Carlos and Don Juan both belong to the same year (1787—Mozart and Vienna, know and appreciate about the former? It was not till a long time afterwards, when Mozart had long been in the realms of eternal harmonies, that the Vienna censure at length admitted Schiller's tragic muse into the imperial hereditary dominions. This appears rather strange to us, who have been nourished on Schiller's dramas, as on a sort of intellectual mother's milk, but let the reader put himself mentally in the place of a Vienna Censor of the Year One, and answer the question whether, when the worthy individual in question perused the Räuber, Kabale und Liebe, Fiesko, Don Carlos, Wallenstein, and Tell, his hair must not have stood on end, even supposing him to have worn a wig. When people spoke in Vienna at that period of German literature, they meant Klopstock and Wieland, who, like Alpha and Omega, like the two opposite poles, represented the "Elevated" and the "Graceful." That so joyous a mortal as Mozart should not be particularly impressed by Klopstock's elevated bombast is something very intelligible, and he made a most furious resistance when called upon to set to music the ode, "Calpe, dir donnert's am Fluss," by a Viennese local Klopstock, Denis or Sned. The words were beautiful, lofty, anything you liked, but as for being fitted for music, such a thing was totally out of the question, he said. He was as little pleased with the pretty frivolities of Wieland: the latter, never dug the grave of his fame more deeply, at the time possessed a French à la Grecque, had given the world Greek à la Française. Mozart was just as little edified by Wieland personally, as we learn from his Mannheim letters.

Beethoven at first allowed himself to be talked into an admiration for Klopstock. What people in Vienna then thought of Klopstock is very amusingly shown by a picture of Abel's, to be found (if I am not mistaken) in the "new school" of the Belvedere, a copy by the artist himself being in the Picture Gallery at Prague: Klopstock's Arrival in Elysium." Klopstock is introduced by Siona, clad in Vestal-like costume, and bearing in her hand a palm branch half a fathom long. He is welcomed by a group of Greek poets, with Homer at their head. "I regret," Homer appears to be saying, "that I am acquainted with your admirable Messiade only through the medium of a translation, as I do not understand German." Dante stands some distance off, under laurel bushes, but he is perfectly penetrated with a sentiment of his own nothingness, and feels ashamed of his Divina Commedia, which must certainly have struck the wits of the Year One as a piece of barbarism. Near at hand sits Petrarch with his Laura.—The whole resembles a parody on Raphael's Parnassus, from which, indeed, the one Muse has been rather unceremoniously taken.

Beethoven, as he afterwards told Rochlitz, when the latter called upon him, was incessantly reading Klopstock's Odes. Who knows that he was not first excited to the Pastoral Symphony by the "Frühlingsfeier," which is really powerful and moving. When he became acquainted with Goethe's poems, he spoke no more about Klopstock. "He always began in D flat major—always from upwards downwards." What he thought of Schiller is proved by the words with which, according to his first plan, he meant to introduce the final movement of the Ninth Symphony. "Let us sing the song of the immortal Schiller: 'Freude schöne Götterfunken.'"

But Goethe probably was more highly prized by him. The highest and crowning task of his life struck him as being the composition of music to Faust; he wanted with this to conclude his artistic labours. His chorus, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," was dedicated by him to the author. Though this composition cannot, perhaps, be called one of his best, his melodies to some of Goethe's lyrical poems are so much the more magnificent: "Kennst du das Land?"—"Herz, mein Herz, was soll das gehen?"—"Trocknet nicht, Thränen der ewigen Liebe"—"Was zieht mir das Herz so"—no man ever composed finer songs, not even Franz Schubert. The words and the tune are so blended that it is impossible to imagine them apart; it seems to us as though something is wanting if we accidentally come across the verses alone when turning over an edition of Goethe's works. And, lastly, the music to Egmont? Kayser of Zürich (Goethe's composer-in-ordinary before Zelter came) composed, in Rome, where the poet had sent him the piece, some music for Egmont, which was just completed. In one of his letters, Goethe praises it as "very appropriate." This may have been the case, for we must confess that Beethoven's music to Egmont is "very inappropriate;" it appears to subordinate itself so much to the poetry; it appears to give in a more ideality form the situations that are musically rendered (let the reader compare with this Meyerbeer's intrusive show-music to his brother's Struensee); and yet—yet—with all respect for Egmont and the great poet, we must say that the music outshines the drama; the frame is, in this instance, finer than the picture, fine though the latter be.

Goethe appears to have been as deaf to all these beauties, intellectually, as the composer was physically. He made Beethoven's acquaintance at Teplitz, but appears to have been terribly little impressed by Beethoven's intellectual grandeur. We may say: without even having a suspicion of Beethoven's greatness, he beheld in the composer scarcely aught else than a man with whom it was difficult to keep up a communication, in consequence of his deafness, and who, with his bristling roughness and unsparing pining, was slightly sympathetic. To Bettina's enthusiastic epistle Goethe answered, "cool to his inmost heart;"—with a gracious nod, and half depreciatingly he admits, "Beethoven's talent, which will show him the right way, like young Mendelssohn played him the first piece of the C minor Symphony upon the piano, the old gentleman evidently did not feel at all comfortable. "That is music which would cause the roof to fall in if performed by the whole orchestra at once," he muttered.

Though taking the purest and deepest interest in plastic art and in music, nay, more, though perfectly capable of appreciating both most thoroughly, Goethe unfortunately had as advisers by his side mediocrities like Heinrich Meyer and Zelter. To what a degree his immeasurably larger mind believingly submitted to the guidance is strikingly proved, for instance, by his allowing Zelter graciously to accord him Sebastian Bach's music. He would certainly have been able to comprehend Beethoven's music ten times better! The "Sonate Pathétique" was, at any rate, something which could penetrate ten times more confidentially to his heart than the Chromatic Fantasia. After Goethe had become acquainted in Upper Italy with Palladio, and in Venice with all sorts of specimens of the Antique, he solemnly renounced the Gothic principle, and himself threw down the monument that he had erected, "dis manibus Erwini a Steinbach." But the Gothic, or rather that Christian, and, at the same time, profoundly and significantly mysterious principle of art, organically connected with the sharpest sense the principle which crossed the "frozen music" of the Gothic style of architecture, melted and was dissolved in the "thawed architecture" of Bach's Preludes, Toccatas, Fugues, and Fantasias, while the "heathen" Goethe knelt believingly before these revelations, or rather, "he went to bed, and let the organist, von Berks, play him Sebastian." Zelter praised this highly: "So he is; he must be overheard, as it were, by an eavesdropper!" According to this rule, when "Sebastian" are for the future announced in the programme, the public will do well to run directly out of the room and listen at the key-hole, not to hear (according to the proverb) their own shame, but Sebastian's glory.

In the correspondence between Goethe and Zelter frequent mention is made of Beethoven. Zelter speaks of him in pretty much the same way that a blind man, hearing a peal of bells, would calculate the height of the steeple in which they hang. On one occasion, he even says: "We might, perhaps, compare Beethoven, at a distance, to Michael Angelo." That was a great thing to say to Goethe. For Goethe wrote from Rome after seeing the frescoes of the Sixtine Chapel: "I am at this moment so captivated by Michael Angelo, that not even Natnre pleases me after him, for I cannot see with such great eyes as he does." (Parenthetically remarked) It is a strange fact that Goethe never says available anywhere of the Moses or the Medici Digger, &c., &c.) Zelter hazarded the comparison, but only timidly; he places Beethoven at his proper "distance," that is, considerably under the great Florentine. We, having clearly before our eyes all Beethoven did, and knowing all his importance, shall not think Michael Angelo's truly Titanic mind less, but we consider what he created as analogous to only one side of Beethoven's labours. When parallels have been drawn between Mozart and Raphael—Rochlitz began it, and was followed by von Bentel, Hirt, and Allgeri—there is a great temptation to play the Plutarch between Michael Angelo and Beethoven, and, placing them back to back, as we sometimes place Jack and Gill, to see which is the taller of the two. Such comparisons are, in reality, not worth much, they are guesses at it rather than aught else, with which superficiality plays itself court. For instance, Rochlitz, who had certainly seen nothing of Raphael beyond the Dresden Madonna, could not possibly possess a correct standard by which to judge the master. When, therefore, he saw such paints soldered to each child young; each left his last an i not highly prized work unfinished, and it had to be completed by the hands of novices, &c., &c., such silly nonsense having nothing to do with the essential attributes of the master—we look about to see whether we are not also informed that it was "Both were exceedingly fond of such and such a dish." With regard, however, to Beethoven and Michael Angelo, the idea of employing the one to explain the other, recurs in the writings of exceedingly able critics, such as Lülke and Hermann Grimm, and we may as well have a glance at it.

MAURICE DE SAXE.

The circumstances accompanying the production of the play called Maurice de Saxe, a drama in five acts and in verse, are remarkable. It is the last piece of importance brought out at the Théâtre Français, where it was played early in June. Had it remained on the shelves a few weeks longer, it would never have seen lamplight. The hero of Fontenoy, when he wants to make himself especially popular, boasts that he is a German, and thus defies the taunts of the French nobles, who sneer at his illegitimate birth. Otherwise the authors of the drama, MM. Jules Amigues and Marcellin Desboutier, do not represent Marshal Saxe in a favourable light. If on the one hand he appears as the self-made man, asserting his dignity against advocates who rely on the sole merit of high blood, he is conspicuous on the other as an unscrupulous aristocrat of the lowest class, without scruple, employing dishonourable means to render the comic singer, Justine Chantilly, unfaithful to her husband, Favart. Herein he is the very opposite of the Maurice in early life, depicted by Scribe as the lover of Adrienne Lacourreur. He does not intrigue, he openly oppresses; and far from attempting to conceal his passion from Favart, exults in it, and dares the poor player to interfere. Favart, represented by Got is the character of the piece—a sort of Figaro, who, tortured by jealousy, retains a comic vein, contrasting the privileges of the great with his own unprotected condition, and predicting the Revolution as a judgment on lordly oppressors. The action consists in a series of attempts by the Marshal to secure Justine, and as many contrivances on the part of the husband to frustrate his assertions. Although the plot hinges on conjugal infidelity, there is not a situation by which propriety is offended. The characters are drawn with discrimination. Favart is elaborately coloured: Justine derives individuality from the circumstance that, while attached to her husband and her duty, she feels flattered by the homage of a prince of the and even Maurice has some excuse for his conduct in the fact that he is not a mere libertine, desirous of conquest, but the victim of a passion, the power of which he himself laments when there is none to overhear him. The dialogue abounds in forcible passages, though the piece is not strong. The drama resembles the romantic drama of the old English stage than one of the French classical school, the elevation of its style distinguishing it from such historical plays as the Patrie of M. Victorien Sardou. It begins with the battle of Fancoux, and ends with Maurice being killed in a duel by the Prince De Conti. In his early days the Marshal has had an intrigue with that Prince's mother, which has come to the knowledge of Favart, who, finding other means ineffectual, acquaints De Conti with the scandal, and thus indirectly produces the result. Though the story of the duel is without historical foundation, it is not the invention of MM. Amigues and Desboutier, but an old tale long believed in the French army.

IMPEDIMENTS TO TRAGIC ART IN ENGLAND.

In the essay on "Tragic Art," by Dr. Westland Marston, delivered before the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts, of which we were fortunate enough to give lately a resumé, the speaker pronounced authoritatively opinions concluding to a great extent with those now and again enunciated in these columns. We have frequently pointed to the repression on the part of middle-class and educated England of all demonstrations of feeling and emotion as an unpleasant feature in English society, and one that sadly impedes the efforts of dramatists. When social distinctions are rapidly becoming abrogated, as they are in large towns, when men at dinner-table are dressed as much alike as if they were uniform, and are only distinguishable from the servants by whom they are waited upon by whatever appearance of dignity or cultivation they are able to impart to their faces and actions, there is indeed a poor field for the writer of comedies. It is necessary for him to paint broad and easily decipherable figures, to produce types which can by no chance be confounded each with other. But how is this to be done with becoming truth to nature when the chief aim of all men is to be as alike in their actions and manners as they are in their dress. Dr. Marston has shown what is in fact to be expected, that the same cause which operates so banefully upon comedy influences tragedy also. The tragedian, according to his views, finds in men thus constituted no types suitable for his purposes and no audiences capable at appreciating his ideal creations.

Our purpose to-day is less to add our unnecessary confirmation to views which while they do not need our sanction have already received it, than to point out other causes co-existent with those to which the lecturer pointed and co-operative with them in producing the result we deplore. We have never known an age more sordid than this, or one in which the outside re-embodiment of these ideas were more characteristic of a like uniformity of business. Money getting or moneygrubbing is the only employment of the immense majority of English-known. With elaborate care and conspicuous success we have succeeded in converting the profession of money-making of the poetry that was once associated with it. When we think of a London merchant of the olden times or of a Flemish burgher, we call up ideas of a character full of dignity and not devoid of romance. The man whose ships were sailing over the ocean whose word on Change was good for whatever he might say, and whose pride was in the honesty and dignity of his occupation, was a figure worthy of admiration and capable of employment in art. He who held up the London merchant now as symbolising anything but dishonesty, greed, rapacity, and the eagerness to obtain by any means a discreditable triumph, would be laughed at by all, and by none so roundly as by the merchant himself. The declension of which we complain has extended through all classes. Noblemen are chairmen of companies whose deliberate and systematic purpose is fraud; artists, with a few noble exceptions, are reduced to the level of mere shopkeepers. What, also! is tragedy or any form of highest art to do in the midst of a world like this? Characters such as these she can neither please nor present. Who will care to see a play in which the principal personages are drawn from the life of the day and consist of fraudulent trustees, dishonest directors, and youths with their fingers, to pay Derby losses, in their masters' till? For such society the realistic drama is specially provided. To celebrate these deeds it is fitting province to set before the age its repulsive portrait in its highest effort.

Of the school of realistic dramatists Mr. Boucicault is the chief and satisfactory representative. We must not be understood as sinking Mr. Boucicault to the level of the materials in which he works. He continues to throw upon the life and characters he depicts as much sentiment and illusion as they are capable of retaining, and he lends the features of the present age something almost like beauty and tenderness. But a dramatist who purposes to portray noble characters and noble sufferings is driven perforce from the world around him into another world remote in space or time. This difficulty he might overcome were it not met by another which is to follow it. Those men whom he cannot paint he cannot please. If he would obtain an audience he must be content to give his hearers what will please them. Most surely is the beauty of art a secret to those whose lives are ignoble. Those secrets and mysteries with which the beginnings of all religion were shrouded belong, in fact, to art. Cup, and pet proud of her beauty, she will not reveal herself to the unloving and unsympathetic. Hence all highest work of this age is confined to few readers. That an audience "fit though few" can be found for some highest forms of art we admit. There is a heaven of cultivation in England and heaven of nobility also. Were it otherwise we should not see poured forth a series of works in highest branches of art, such as has recently been given to the world. Take the one branch of poetry and we unhesitatingly say that the poems which have been the light during the past year or two are sufficient to shed on any age renown. A time that has seen Swinburne's Poems and Ballads, Morris's Earthly Paradise, The Ring and the Book of Browning, the Laureate's continuation of The Idylls of the King, and the recently published work of Mr. Rossetti, has exhibited proof of poetic possession such as may enable it to challenge competition with the most illustrious in our annals. A public can be found, moreover, to support such works, and it is a fact creditable to the public that this work of Mr. Rossetti's, though it saw the light last month or that preceding, has already gone through five editions. But those who purchase and patronize works of this description are not patrons of the theatres. Rarely, on some special occasion, you may see them at a house like the Prince of Wales's, at which it is sought to give a superior class of representations, or at another house upon an occasion of excessive interest. But the realistic drama and the style of acting it has brought with it, drives the intelligent from the theatres. Those patrons to whom managers appeal are wholly insensible to the beauty and dignity of tragedy, and will none of it. Its lessons, could they take them home, would be only a rebuke to the practice of their daily lives. But, as a rule, they are insensible to its teaching, for their minds are pachydermatous. Intellectually, they sink to the level of the savage, and find the sight in a glass of their own features is more agreeable to them than any picture how beautiful soever.

Under existing conditions, then, we despair of seeing a revival of tragic or poetic drama. Daily, alas! the difficulties in the way of its revival grow greater and more numerous. Use, which is second habit, renders more and more familiar the class of productions now common on the stage. And increasingly distasteful works of a higher order until what would once have appeared a mere return to olden form will assume a semblance of revolution. Men again grow hardened in their pursuits. The widespreading canker of lust of unholy gain spreads itself wider and wider till it threatens to absorb the whole body.

That the poetic drama should be wholly banished from our stage we regard we need not say, as a distinct and great misfortune to art. What, then, is the remedy for the existing state of affairs? Again and again does the question arise before us; it is the close of the argument or enquiry concerning dramatic art in England. To it there is but one answer. The theatres want a government subvention. That they will not get it in modern years is no reason why the question should not be brought forward that men's minds may be prepared to receive it. To expect it from the most pronounced of all governments in matters of art which now holds the reins, would be madness. But we regret to say it is none the more expected from a Conservative government. Conservatives dare not give us a subvention and Liberals cannot elevate their minds to the level of such a thing. If, however by means of state aid one theatre in London were kept open in which works of the highest order could be played; if to this house were attached those actors who in different branches had distinguished themselves by superior excellence, and if occasionally performances in which these took part were given irrespective of the question of their proving remunerative, a reign of better things might be expected. A nursery for art would be provided. Actors would learn that their highest meed was not the approval of a deplorably ignorant public, authors would obtain a certain recompense for labours which attained a requisite measure of competency, and the public would have a chance of seeing high class performances. It is no time for us to declare with what kindred institutions we would link a subvention theatre. Our sole concern at present is with the need for the subvention. Its advantages can scarcely be doubted by those who believe in the purifying and elevating influences of art. Is it too much to hope that if occasionally to a noble and worthy performance of tragedy some members of that public to which tragedy is now sealed were attracted, a few among them might find the teaching of art and the contemplation of beauty a means of information, and might try to set their minds in tune with the moral beauty they had been led to contemplate and admire?

WAIFS.

Madame Arabella Goddard returned to Boulogne-sur-Mer after the Birmingham Festival.

Signor Bottesini, the eminent contre-basi, has arrived in London.

Mr. James M. Wehli is about to visit the United States this "fall."

Mr. Alexandre Billet, the well-known pianist, has arrived in London.

At Salvador, in Central America, the Theatre of the Union is being constructed by the Government.

The receipts at the Parisian theatres and other spectacles during the past month amounted to the exceptionally low sum of 680,000 francs.

The Journal de Toulouse announces the death, in his twenty-ninth year, of the celebrated gymnast Léotard.

The youthful Signor Ettore Mariotti has finished an opera, entitled Fedra, which is shortly to be brought out in Venice.

Mr. C. H. Ross has, we understand, become the lessee of the Charing Cross Theatre.

Sadler's Wells opens to-night under the management of Mr. Pennington, who begins with Hamlet.

Mdlle. Nilsson sailed from Liverpool, for America, accompanied by her agent, Mr. H. Jarrett, on Saturday, the 3rd inst.

The Dean and Chapter of Worcester Cathedral have adopted the resolution of adding another minor canon to their clerical staff.

Remember the Grotto!
My custom is not to.
Punch.

The copyright for England of the last successful opera of M. de Flotow, L'Ombre, has been purchased by Mr. Jefferys, of Berners Street.

The Parisian musical papers are temporarily suppressed. Were this not the case little items of immediate interest to musicians would be likely to come from that beleaguered city.

Two dramas by Mr. Watts Phillips are in the hands of the management of the Queen's Theatre. His Marlborough will not be played this season.

The Lyceum opens to-night with a new Irish drama called Innisfallen, from the pen of Mr. E. Falconer, again lessee of the theatre where Peep o' Day made so great a hit.

London musicians seeking recreation in the country, are getting up concerts in aid of the sick and wounded. Among them in the North, is Mr. Goss, organist of our metropolitan cathedral.

A short essay on Palestrina, entitled Elogio di Giovanni Pierluigi Palestrina, principe della Musica Sacra, has been published at Rome by Agostino Bartolini.

Signor Mabellini's new opera, Fiammetta, recently performed in Milan, has been received with much favour by the public and musical critics of Italy.

All lovers of the dance will be pleased to learn that a new floor has been laid down in the Great Hall at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square.

A drama, entitled Clelia, la Perla del Trasteverе, founded on Garibaldi's novel, Clelia, and written by Signor Alessandro Sabbadini, has been published by Barbini at Milan.

Booth's theatre at New York has re-opened with Mr. Jefferson as Rip van Winkle. Wallack's theatre is occupied with the drama, Our Fritz, in which Mr. Emmet sustains the principal character,—a German who speaks imperfect English.

Playgoers will remember the favourable impression created by a young French actor, M. Marius, in M. Herté's Chiperic at the Lyceum Theatre. We hear that M. Marius has fallen before the walls of Metz, while serving in the French army.

At the termination of the Birmingham Festival, Mr. Peyton, secretary, on behalf of the committee, presented Mr. W. H. Cummings with a testimonial in the shape of a gold chain and appendages, for his kind and ready help in several cases of emergency during the Festival.

Mr. Howard Paul is preparing to take Napoleon III. in his entertainment. A few evenings since the audience at Bradford took exception to this; the consequence was a division of opinion winding up with a riot in which French and Germans were moderately represented.

The Beethoven Festival which was to have been held at Bonn this week under the direction of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, is, under existing circumstances, inevitably postponed. The new Beethoven Hall is used as a hospital.

Amongst the curiosities at the Exhibition of Antiquities and objects of Art belonging to the Sienese province, held at Siena on the 15th of August, under the direction of Prof. Carlo Livi, was the autograph will and testament of Boccaccio.

The Rivista Europea states that at the Balbo Theatre, in Turin, Señor Arteta's comic operetta, Il Mozzo, has been performed for the first time, but was not very successful. The composer is the Director of the Musical Conservatoire of Madrid.

In November an opera, by Johann Strauss, the prince of waltz-writers, entitled Ali Baba, is to be brought out at Vienna; the libretto by Herr F. Berg. The Vienna public anxiously await the first performance. The same subject was treated by Cherubini in an opera of the same name.

The new opera, Aida, by Signor Verdi, will be performed for the first time at the Cairo Theatre. The composer is said to have already received 150,000 francs from the Khedive of Egypt, for whom it is being written. The libretto is by Signor Ghislanzoni, and the subject was proposed by the distinguished Egyptian scholar, Mariette.

Mdlle. Nilsson's visit to the United States is, we understand, the occasion of considerable speculation, some agents having bought up tickets for the first half-dozen performances, to sell again at extravagant prices when the demand can no longer be supplied from ordinary sources.—Choir.

At the recent election of a parochial council in South London, one of the seatholders who was subsequently chosen for senatorial honours announced his intention of advocating the re-introduction of lady choristers and double chants. At present, he is in a minority, and the boys of the choir retain their position.

The correspondents of the daily papers give some accounts of the manner in which the Prussians spend their Sundays on French territory. The celebration of the Holy Communion has been the rule even on the battle-field, and the by-standers are struck with the heartiness with which the soldiers join in chorales accompanied by military band.

The Amateur Musical Society of Brixton (founded in 1857) has issued its prospectus for the season 1870-71. Mr. H. Weist Hill is again the conductor, a guarantee that the concerts, of which six are to be given, will be satisfactory both in selection and performance. The orchestra is fifty in number. The first concert is announced for November 2nd.

The Chapel Royal, St James's, is temporarily closed. As the fabric is thus cared for by the Court, we would suggest some improvements, at the same time, in the services. For Sundays past the arrangements have been utterly unworthy the chapel of the English Queen and even at the best of times it is only the professional lay clerks who redeem the music from discredit.—Choir.

Charles Sloman, "the only English Improvisatore," who was for many years known in theatrical circles and "about town," has just died. The Improvisatore's talents were not very remarkable, and his efforts were often not a little dull, but as the original of one of Thackeray's most graphic sketches he will be long remembered. Every one who knows—and who does not?—the wonderfully humorous description of the Cave of Harmony, in The Newcomes, knows all about the only English Improvisatore.—George Dolby's Musical Circular.

The directors of the Opéra Comique called a meeting of their artists and employés the other day, and informed them what a deplorable effect present events had upon theatres. Two days before the meeting Zampa was performed, and the amount received at the box-office was ten francs; three days previously the box-office keeper had just eight francs in his till. The Minister, informed of the fact, gave permission to the Lyrique and the Odéon to defer the opening of their season, and to the Opéra Comique to continue its decay.

The accounts of the income and expenditure connected with the Festival of the Three Choirs recently held at Hereford, have been made up. All the bills are paid, and although receipts fall short of expenditure, the deficiency to be made up by the sixty stewards is trifling. The charity, however, benefits to the full extent. Donations have been sent in since the meeting, and the dividends from money funded by the Worcester and Gloucester Festival Committees, amounting to over £100, have been received, bringing the total receipts for the charity up to £1,053, 14s.

Should the war unhappily continue another month, there will scarcely be a literary or scientific journal published. In addition to a previous long list, we have received two fresh notices to-day, announcing the suspension of the Moniteur des Architects and the Chronique des Arts. Considering the drafts upon the editorial and working staff, it is not surprising that so many journals are dying at a time, but that any of them of this nature appear. To a certain extent it is the same in Germany. A French correspondent engaged in conversation with a private soldier of the Landwehr, attached to the army of the Crown Prince, and found that he was a Professor of Philosophy at the University of Tubingen.

Charles Dibdin's ballad opera, The Quaker, has been produced at the Gaiety. So many additions have been made to its music that little opportunity of judging of the original is afforded. When we state that "Cherry Ripe," "Why are you wandering here, I pray," and "Here's a health to all good lasses," are sung, the fact is apparent that no special regard for the composer and no wish to exhibit the music and verse of a particular epoch dictated the revival. The whole is dull. Miss Tremaine, as Cicely, gives "Why are you wandering here, I pray" exactly as it ought not to be sung, crowding it with unmeaning roulades. Miss E. Farren was lively as Lubin, Mr. Aynsley Cook quiet as Steady, Mr. Stoyle exaggerated as Solomon, and Miss Annie Goodall spiritless as Gillian.

Toujours perdrix was an aristocratic complaint; but the French soldiers are just as great gourmets, and just as fickle as princes and young ladies. The Mobile got tired of the everlasting Marseillaise; they had been roaring it for full a fortnight, when they cried out "Toujours Marseillaise!" and substituted the following elegant effusion—

Bon, ça commence!
Ca va fort bien,
Nous allons faire bombance,
A ce festin
Il ne manquera rien,
Car j'aperçois un jambon de Mayence.

Change one to two in the last line, and you have the second verse, and so on ad infinitum; or, as they say here, "Un + n + 1 jambon."

We take the following from the Chicago Post (of August —):—

"An important international wedding is to come off on the 29th instant, the bridegroom being a no less distinguished person than Ole Bull, the violinist. The bride appointed for the occasion is Miss Thorpe, daughter of the Hon. J. G. Thorpe, of Maddison, Wis., a very brilliant and accomplished maiden of eighteen years. Miss Thorpe and her mother are now visiting various parts of Europe, including the home of Mr. Bull in Norway, where the nuptials are to occur."

Among some general observations upon the recent Festival, the Birmingham Daily Gazette has the following:—

"It need to be said of one of the orchestral stewards—and probably the same may be said of Mr. R. Peyton, the present holder of that important office—that before one Festival was over he was obliged to be thinking of the next. Why, it must be nearly twelve months since the members of the chorus were engaged, and all the present year they have been laboriously practising the choral music under the able guidance of Mr. W. C. Stockley and Mr. A. J. Sutton. How long it is since the band and principals were engaged, and how long since the composers who have composed new works for the Festival received their commissions we don't know, but it must be a considerable period, seeing the importance and proportions of many of the new pieces. Then there are no end of local committees, who, under the general direction of Mr. R. Peyton and Mr. W. J. Beale, with Mr. Howard Smith as secretary, divide and subdivide all sorts of work connected with those business arrangements, which require to be so well done to ensure the success of the Festival."

There are many other details connected with these great meetings upon which our contemporary might have dwelt with equal justice. It is to be hoped, by the way, that there may be no real foundation for a rumour which lately obtained that Mr. Peyton contemplated resigning his position. A greater loss could hardly be.

NEW MUSIC.

The Message from the Battlefield. Song. Written by H. B. Farnie. Composed by John Hullah. [London: Metzler & Co.]

The "argument" of this song tells how a German warrior went forth to battle with his name-label sewn to his coat by loving hands; and how the label alone came back. A touching story, but one which Mr. Farnie has handled tenderly, and to which Mr. Hullah has set appropriate and expressive music. The composition appeals strongly to every one with a heart in his breast; and we shall be surprised if it do not meet with wide popularity.

Metzler & Co's Standard Edition of the celebrated War Songs of France and Germany. [London: Metzler & Co.]

In this convenient shilling volume we have eight of the most prominent songs of the war, the words being given both in the original and in a spirited translation by Mr. Henry Farnie. The editor has well preserved the impartiality of a neutral by devoting half his pages to the German and half to the French, but as regards the selection made he had no choice, for the respective nationalities having indicated their preference with unmistakable clearness. Hence the German portion of the volume contains "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland?" ("Where is the German's Fatherland?"), "Die Wacht am Rhein" ("The Watch by the Rhine"), "Lützower Lied" ("The Blucher Song"), and "Sie sollen ihn nicht haben" ("Thou shalt not have it, the German Rhine"). These titles are now as familiar as household words, and so should the songs themselves be, at least to all who can appreciate stirring, vigorous melodies, which seem as though they had been struck from the burning national heart, as sparks from heated iron. The French selections are "The Marseillaise," that model of a people's anthem; "Mourir pour la Patrie," "Le Chant du Départ," and "La Parisienne." These are better known than the songs of the opposite camp, and we need only add, therefore, that the volume before us is a collection of war music, the interest of which will outlive the war itself.

The Watch by the Rhine, the great national German Song, now being sung by the Army of the Rhine. Music by C. Wilhelm. [London: Metzler & Co.]

This is a separate issue of one of the songs comprised in the volume noticed above; the honour being due to the amazing popularity Wilhelm's composition enjoys all over the so-called "Fatherland. How the song sprang into notice when the time came for its use; and how honours are now being heaped upon the hitherto obscure composer, is too well known for description here. We may say, however, that the result can surprise nobody; for in "Die Wacht am Rhein" are all the elements of a true people's lied. Vigorous words and a bold rhythmical diatonic melody have made the song what it is, and what it deserves to be. The present edition is well got up, and ornamented with an appropriate title-page.

In his admirable Biography of Michael Angelo (at first so violently attacked by the herd of commonplace critics), Hermann Grimm says that the statue of "Dawn," as it is called (in the Medici mortuary chapel) reminds him of a symphony by Beethoven—the reader, he observes, must excuse him for remarking that Goethe, also, was as pleased with the Ludovist Juno as with a "song by Homer." In his History of Art (fourth edition, p. 540) Lübke remarks: "The proper appreciation, the genuine enjoyment of his" [Michael Angelo's] "works, is, as a rule, a difficult task; hence it is generally a lie, whenever any one not profoundly acquainted with art breaks out into commonplace ecstasies over this artist's demoniacal creations, just as the raptures for Beethoven's later 'Titanic efforts' are simply empty babble." This observation is justified by truth. I myself (the reader will excuse me, I trust, for introducing my own sensations), when I first became acquainted with Michael Angelo, on my first Italian journey to Florence and Rome, experienced a kind of seared astonishment; I admired with my whole soul, but I could not love. On my second journey, it seemed as though the scales had suddenly fallen from my eyes, and the effect then produced was simply overwhelming; the first impression had had time to mature in my soul, just as sour fruit becomes, if kept, ripe and sweet. What the common, trivial intellect (mere art mechanics and critics thought at one time of Beethoven may be gathered from the old notices and correspondence of the Leipziger Musikzeitung; Spazier's Zeitung für die elegante Welt; the Morgenblatt, &c., notices and correspondence of which Lenz has reprinted in portion. But really the acme is attained when, for instance, the critic who first notices the Eroica in the Morgenblatt most urgently recommends as a model to Herr von Beethoven "the royal magnificence of the A major Symphony, by ——— Eberl, a Viennese fifth-rate composer (now forgotten)! With regard to Michael Angelo, we occasionally, being amused when we read in Kotzebue's Journey to Rome and Naples, that the author found nothing "great but the size" ("nichts grosz als die Grösze")—the long marble beard being especially insupportable in his opinion; that, furthermore, the drawing of the "Last Judgment" swarms with coarse faults; here there is a leg too long; there, an arm too short," &c. Fancy Kotzebue correcting Michael Angelo's drawing—this beats by far Mrs. Leanox pointing out Shakspere's faults!

If we consider Michael Angelo's artistic moral grandeur; the solitude into which, when old, he bashfully withdrew; his ideal friendship for Vittoria Colonna; and his touching love for his brothers, so greatly inferior to him intellectually, the analogous traits in Beethoven's life are very striking indeed. (A second Michael Angelo will probably, go on to remark that Michael Angelo at last became blind, and Beethoven, deaf; Michael Angelo enjoyed the Torso by touching it with the tips of his fingers; Beethoven read Handel's music with his eyes from the score). The positions, too, occupied by both these great men in the history of art somewhat resemble one analogy. Michael Angelo (I am again employing Lübke's words), "was the first who recklessly broke with the schools, and it was in consequence of this that modern art commenced the dominion of subjectivity." The very same thing applies to Beethoven.

Michael Angelo pursued a short course of study (not quite three years) under Domenico Ghirlandajo; Beethoven's course of study, also, was short and irregular. The immense genius of both compelled them to create; their masters could not keep up with them: "He can do more than I can," exclaimed Ghirlandajo, on seeing a drawing by his pupil, and Haydn, with anxious solicitude, tried to dissuade Beethoven from printing the C minor Trio, because it left behind it everything to which the public had been accustomed. Michael Angelo created evergnme of his figures out of his own inward life, the struggle with every one of his motives, and exclaimed, as Job once exclaimed when struggling with the angel: "I will not leave thee unless thou blessest me." In the same way does Beethoven struggle with his musical motives; his "Themenkehr of Ideen" is something very different from that of his predecessors, which is essentially only contrapuntal, outward, and technical; he obtains from his motives, by continually fresh developments, their whole significant purport, their entire power of expression. But here there is a great difference. Burkhardt (in the Cicerone) justly directs attention to the fact that, with Michael Angelo, the motive is always to be felt as such, and not as the most appropriate expression for a given purport. (The reader has only to remember the two Medici tombs, in order to see the great force of this observation.) With Beethoven the motive possesses of itself only a relative value; the principal point is that it shall say what it has to say. While Michael Angelo "is never pretty or pleasing" (Burkhardt) and has a partiality for the Colossal (the lovely angel on the Dominican tomb at Bologna, a youthful work, being the only instance which can be looked upon as an exception), Beethoven can smile and joke musically, and lay the prettiest trifles close to the feet of his Colossi.

A principal element in Beethoven—namely, humour, is altogether wanting in Michael Angelo (I do not regard as a stroke of humour the fact of the poor master-of-the-ceremonies, Biagio, being put in Hell, —if, mind, there is any truth in the whole story). The great Florentine, is, too, deficient in Beethoven's tender warmth, and noble, elevated sentiment (for, after all, Michael Angelo's gentlest and most lovable effort, the Delphisc Sybil, is a giantess). Beethoven can frequently become good-humoured and absolutely jolly (the last comes under the category of humour); it is scarcely more than on one occasion that Michael Angelo makes an attempt at a mild smile—in the picture of the mothers brought by their coaxing and loving children into the most fearful throng (among the ancestors of Christ in the Sixtine). In approaching the very furthermost limits of the Possible the two masters are true brothers. The unrivalled master of anatomy sometimes presents us with what is impossible anatomically, and the unrivalled master of harmony with what is impossible harmonically. (By this I do not allude so much to the notorious chord in the finale of the "Ninth," or the horn in the Eroica, which nearly robbed poor Ries a box on the ear, as, for instance, to an irreconcilable opposition between strings and wind, such as occurs in the 126th bar of the "Scene at the Brook," or the much-discussed passage in the "Lebewohl Sonata," where the tonic harmony and the dominant harmony assert themselves simultaneously. Finally, Michael Angelo, like Beethoven, exercised great influence over subsequent art; the traditions of the schools still existed in Mozart, as they existed in Raphael and Leonardo da Vinci. Beethoven escaped from them, and created his own mighty Individuality—precisely like Michael Angelo. At present the individual is emancipated. The old, true tradition, from Cimabue down to Raphael, from Dufay down to Mozart, is now merely a fetter binding the pinions of genius. The types of the great and ideal model are in consequence the more borrowed and copied. But, because those who take them have not produced them from their own inward life, have not gained them from out a struggle with themselves, as their creators did, these types possess the unbearable characteristics of a lie, of what is in itself untrue. Anyone desirous of seeing what mischief Michael Angelo did, has only to look at Salviati's "Resurrection" (in the Belvedere, 1st floor, Cabinet Eight, number of picture, 37, opposite Andrea del Sarto's fine "Pietà").

And although beautiful is one of the Matter, who, without rhyme or reason, apes the motive of one of the gigantic saints (to the left and close to the Almighty Judge) in the "Last Judgment." This picture bears a remarkable analogy with the Ninth Symphony. Touches, such as the high A of the soprano sustained for thirteen bars, and the angel who allows the shaft of the scourge to be clapped on his stomach, are of the same kidney; they are equally unmeaning, and—equally the work of genius. After the "Last Judgment," just as artists were unable to paint anything smaller than battles of the Titans, Overtheows of Nations, &c.; just as the "Last Judgment," with its motives, peeps out everywhere (see Brangin's "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence," in St. Lorenzo; Bugiardini's St. Catherine, in Maria Novello, at Florence &c.), so, for a long time, no composer ever got his music-paper ready for an Adagio without the "Ninth" standing like a bugbear behind him. "Who can still write symphonies like Mozart and Haydn?" is the general cry. I take you at your word, gentlemen; who can still write symphonies like Mozart and Beethoven? Would that you could.

What first came after Raphael and Michael Angelo, and what after Mozart and Beethoven, looks more or less like an aftergrowth—musically we are Epigoni; Wagner strikes me as being a purifying, though anything but a fertilizing storm. But for plastic art new paths were opened up and new triumphal garlands created (Beethoven, &c.), while lastly came the legitimate successors of the great old masters, such men as Karstens, Schick, Wächter, Cornelius, Overbeck, our magnificent Schwind; our virile splendid Führich, whose only fault consisted in his being too Christian for people; and Kaulbach, whose Battle of the Huns always strikes me as an alliance between Raphael and Michael Angelo, but who, unfortunately afterwards mistook the right road—and we see where he is. Shall not music blossom in a similar manner at some future time?

In one thing, however, Michael Angelo was more fortunate than Beethoven. No annotators have chosen him as a means of showing how awfully clever they are. As a matter of course, everyone must be able to gather from Beethoven's works (or interpolate in them) whatever pleases him. For instance, in perfect innocence of heart, we looked upon the C minor symphony as a picture of the struggle going on in the recesses of our soul, and of the victory achieved by that soul's Creator; but we were recently informed that Beethoven here intended to present us with an epitome of his political opinions. As, however, every reading is allowable, I beg leave to advance the following: In my opinion, Beethoven did not want to portray

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

Digitized by Google

his political opinions in a lump, but rather his dissatisfaction at the Continental blockade, then just introduced by the first Napoleon. Look at the first allegro with the double-knock motive,—— | —, is not that Beethoven at the coffee-house, rapping in vain for some coffee? In the A flat andante, flowing like sweet honey, the waiter brings him, instead of coffee, a bavaroise; in the defiant C major Beethoven bellows out for his coffee; the waiter looks anxiously round, and, after a time, again brings the bavaroise, but this time milled with "Obers." The succeeding allegro depicts Beethoven's resignation at having in future to drink chicory-coffee; it is true that it disagrees with him (the fugued theme of the basset, but what can he do? He already thinks of soup made of roasted butter (the conclusion with the weird-like kettle-drum), when—yes—yes—the Continental Blockade is suddenly raised; great stores of coffee arrive from Hamburgh; jubilation-finale! I give this interpretation for our Beethoven commentators to think over; they will perceive from it with what respectful admiration I have read and studied their clever essays.

When anything did not suit him, Beethoven was in the habit of heartily laughing at it. His owl-like sapient Interpreters would probably have afforded him a fine opportunity for indulging in this propensity. Perhaps his intellectual relative, Michael Angelo, would have helped him!

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

There is no doubt that Mr. Tom Taylor, by means of his historical drama 'Twixt Axe and Crown, has done an essential service to the dramatic art of this country. The great success of that piece proves that there is still a public capable of appreciating a poetical work, which does not pretend to reproduce the trivial details of the work-a-day world. We seem to be getting into a condition so thoroughly "realistic" that we should end by paying the cab that took us to the door of a theatre for the purpose of seeing another cab on the stage. The fact that Mr. Taylor's play is derived from the German is wholly immaterial. It is a "history" in the Shaksperian sense of the word, and the knowledge that the Londoners can now be pleased with a "history" is an unexpected addition to our long theatrical experience. Moreover, it has apparently fixed the position of the large handsome theatre in Long-acre, which previously floated about like the Isle of Delos before it was made stationary by divine interference. The dramatic history of the Princess Elizabeth having been at last withdrawn, its place has been supplied by the Midsummer Night's Dream of Shakspere. The ideal having been introduced the ideal remains. The Midsummer Night's Dream is not a play to be easily put upon the stage. It is veritably a dream—dreamy. The characters who carry on the main action are such as no aspiring artist could accept. Allied, they are associated with dialogue which has become proverbial in our language. A work of fancy, in which the human personages bristling with anachronisms, are scarcely more real than the fairies by whom they are surrounded, is to be presented to the public with a certain amount of reverence. It must be treated as a "spectacle," but to treat so charming a poem as a mere "spectacle" would be profanation.

The play, according to the bills, is produced under the direction of Mr. Ryder, and to Mr. Ryder may fairly be assigned the merit of hitting the just medium between the mere spectacular and the thorough absence of show. The scenery by Messrs. G. Gordon and W. Harford is most beautiful; but it is not forced upon the vision. During those portions of the piece that take place in fairyland the stage is half-darkened, and a dreamy sensation is the result. In the eyes of some managers this fanciful play would seem a vehicle for the introduction of infinite ballets. So is it not at the Queen's. The bill proclaims the employment of 150 children trained by Madame Collier, but these do not interrupt the action. The poem is liberally but severely put upon the stage, and when no much is done to gratify the eye we may wonder at the tasteful abstinence from meretricious accessories.

In the days of theatrical monopoly and strong companies, there were doubtless artists who could make every one of the personages in A Midsummer Night's Dream a distinct character. This is not the case now, but one personage must remain as conspicuous—namely, Bottom the weaver, and the appearance of Mr. Phelps in this part is one of the "facts" of the revival. When he played the character at Sadler's Wells all playgoers were struck by the originality of his conception, and the renewed acquaintance with his reading at the Queen's does not correct former judgments. His soliloquy after he has been relieved of the ass's head seems to embody the whole spirit of the play. His dream is "Bottom's dream because it hath no bottom." A stupid, conceited dolt before he began to dream, his stupidity has now reached a point which would claim the admiration of a Mussulman. He has not been figuratively but actually a donkey; yet his reminiscence of the disagreeable fact is not clear. As a bat is something between beast and bird, he has a vague suspicion that he is something between beast and man. He feels for his long ears, he feels for his snout, both lost, and yet he is not certain whether they ever belonged to him. Admirable, too, is the humour of Mr. Phelps when the play is actually played before the "Duke of Athens." A vulgar actor would find here a license for rant, but Mr. Phelps, knowing that he is representing a man who is not a professional actor, rolls out his words without expression or emphasis, just as a charity boy utters his responses in the Catechism.

CRYSTAL PALACE SATURDAY CONCERTS.

The fifteenth series, to commence on Saturday, the first of October, will comprise twenty-six concerts—twelve before and fourteen after Christmas—the first concert of the second portion to take place on the 21st of January, and the last on the 22nd of April. The performances will be conducted by Mr. Manns, whose benefit concert will be held on the 29th April. The land and chorus will be the same as during last season, and the programmes selected on the same principles. That the standard works of the great masters will be performed with all possible care, new works of importance brought forward when practicable, and every endeavour made to maintain the reputation of the Crystal Palace Concerts, may be taken for granted.

The present year being the hundredth year of the anniversary of the birth of Beethoven (born at Bonn on the 17th December, 1770), a more than usual prominence is to be given to his works in the first twelve concerts of the series. It is intended to perform the nine symphonies, with such overtures, concertos, and other compositions, vocal and orchestral, as can be conveniently introduced; and that all which intimate acquaintance, affectionate study, and careful rehearsal can do will be done to put these immortal works before the subscribers in a fuller and finer light even than hitherto, and thus to do honour to the memory of the great master, nay safely be counted on in advance. On one of the Saturdays the performance is to consist of Fidelio, in English, produced in the new theatre.

L. I. P.

Here Lies,
Politically speaking,
The Body of
Louis Napoleon Buonaparte,
Born 1808, at the Tuileries,
Died 1870, at Sedan,
Crushed
By the fall of an Edifice, to the edification of which He has devoted
His life,
His abilities,
And the reputation of his Race.

Creator of the Liberty of Italy,
Dictator of the Freedom of France,
The Steadfast Ally of England
Opponent of Bismarck—not of Germany,
Author of Les Idées Napoléoniennes,
Lived to behold
Italy refuse him,
France reject him,
England abhor him,
Germany subject him;
And to die
Amidst the howls of the goodly pack
That had licked his boots,
Yelped at the heels of his enemies,
And fed on the fragments from his table.

He fell a victim to Centralization,
Of which he had been the Mahomet,
And to the pride of a nation
Whose prosperity he had increased,
Whose property he had secured,
Whose commerce he had fostered,
Whose homes he had beautified,
But Whose Vanity
His negligence had stricken to the heart.

The Parisian
Erects this monument over him,
As over one who,
Whatever his faults,
Has left such marks upon the Present,
That his traces will be distinctly seen upon the Future;
And
Who has lived a life,
Which deserved a far more glorious death.

ART AND PARIS BOMBARDED.

Paris may be immediately invested. The fair city will be surrounded by 300,000 men flushed with victory, and it is defended by a motley crowd, as numerous as, but in every other respect vastly inferior to, the investing force. We do not propose here to discuss the probabilities of the success either of the attack or the defence. Still less do we intend to say, anything as to the right of the German to take every advantage of their unparalleled victories in the field. Nor shall we enlarge on what we may happen to think would be the best policy of Prussia as things stand. All that we are concerned with in these observations is the frightful prospect for civilisation, and for all the highest interests of humanity, which the siege of Paris presents. Rome has been taken once and again, and we know what came of Alaric and the Constable of the Bourbon in triumph; we know what came of Titus in possession of Jarusalem; we know how Constantinople fared under the triumph of the Crescent. But these things happened in those here old barbarous days. Rome and Constantinople were in a sense richer in priceless treasures than even Paris, but the value even of Rome and Byzantium to the world which then was is as nothing to the value of Paris to the world which now is. Certainly the sack of Paris may not be so destructive as the sack of Rome; relatively to the conditions of society it would be ten times more fatal. And this is a matter which concerns humanity in general, and the best interests of all mankind. The guilt, so whomsoever it must be assigned, is greater in this case than in those cases; because the assailants know the true character of the loss should Paris and what Paris contains be destroyed, or irretrievably or even seriously damaged. Alaric knew not what he was doing. If the worst comes to the worst—that is, if Paris should fall, and it is by no means certain that it will not hold out—the open city, the streets and squares and public buildings will be bombarded. Now just let us think what bombarding means; its object is that briefly announced in the commissions given to naval warfare, to burn, sink, and destroy. This is war, and war of course cannot be conducted with bottles of rose-water. But what war means is, in the matter of a siege, the greatest possible destruction of life and property, precisely at those points where the resistance and defence is supposed to be the weakest. The object is to bring the most overwhelming destruction to bear where defence is impossible, or the most difficult. And given a siege as a necessity, nobody can object to this. It is of no use to interpose sentimental or moral objections to this cruel and barbarous necessity. There it is. Paris is besieged, and it must take all the consequences of a siege. Nobody can say that the Germans are not perfectly justified in undertaking the siege of Paris; and everybody must allow that the French are perfectly justified in defending Paris. So resolutely are they bent at present on defending the capital, that street barricades are already contemplated. And it is probable that mines and all sorts of combustible defences are prepared, or will on an extremity be resorted to. And should it come to this or even should it stop just short of this—that is, should the siege be protracted for six weeks or two months—who can say within what limit the destruction would be confined.

Yes; but we are constantly told, it will not come to this. The hopelessness of the defence of Paris, when France has no army in the field, will be made very plain before the end of six weeks or two months. The neutral Powers will make themselves heard. Something will intervene. Things will not come to these extremes. We may believe that they will not; but keeping in view the events of the last two months, theories and hopes and calculations about any future had better be dispensed with. The siege of Paris is the most improbable of all events; yet it has come to pass. And perhaps the defence of Paris may turn out to be equally opposed to all example, experience, and precedent. Why it is so impossible to conjecture the future, is because there was never a siege or defence since the world began which ran under the same or similar conditions. The nearest parallel is that perhaps of Titus before Jerusalem, when, as now in Paris, a vast swarm of country folk was swept into the city on the very eve of its investment; and though for the moment all is order, patriotism, and a stern resolve for defence in the inhabitants of Paris, there is as much fierce, wild emotional fanaticism among the Parisians as there was among the Jews; and, unless Paris shall belie all its historical precedents, there are enemies enough within its walls to reproduce a John and a Simon. If the Zealots can re-appear this is the time and place for them. When we speak of Paris, we speak of Paris with all its monuments and all its treasures. Within these fortifications are centered, and are at this moment exposed to the most imminent danger of destruction, collections and treasures the loss of which would annul all civilisation. We are not called upon to imitate or repeat all M. Hugo's shrieking eloquence, but the very thought of the Louvre, the Imperial Library, and the Picture Galleries exposed to a bombardment, makes one's blood creep. We are so accustomed to think of Paris as the capital of luxury and pleasure that we are apt to forget that it is the metropolis of letters and art—the very cynosure of civilization. In Paris is heaped up not only history, but the materials of history; not only the records of past science, but those registered and bequeathed results on which the science of the future depends; not only the choicest treasures of art, but the conditions on which art is founded; not only the results of past civilization, but the possibilities of progress and future enlightenment. To destroy the contents of Paris would be to tear out of the great book of humanity half of its noblest pages.

Yes—again it will be said—but it will not come to this. The siege will be conducted on the most humane principles; the great Emathian conqueror bid his followers spare the house of Pindarus, and the pious King Wilhelm, who has been very particular about Strasburg Cathedral, will be equally careful about Notre Dame and the Sainte Chapelle, and above all about the Library and the Louvre, and its galleries of Arts and Antiquities. Possibly he will; and yet at Strasburg the Library has been destroyed, and an art-loving King cannot control the range of every projectile. We much doubt whether Prussian artillerists when they lay a gun will think much of Raffaelles or the Venus of Melos. Nor does the safety of the monuments and art treasures of Paris depend alone upon the forbearance or vindictiveness of the besiegers. It will be said that the Parisian mob is a very civilized and artistic mob. They are not likely to sack the Louvre, and to burn the contents of the Library, as the Christians not: though they did burn the Archbishop's Library once. But the Louvre is safe now because works of art were not destroyed in the Reign of Terror; and because in the Revolution of July, and during subsequent revolts of the Paris mob, public monuments and public property were safe. But these hopeful considerations all proceed on the supposition that what has been will be again. We venture to suggest that the past offers no guarantee for the future. Nobody can even guess what the condition of Paris will be three weeks hence. Just now, as we predicted, it presents a most sublime spectacle of order, courage, and patriotism. All factions are hushed in the presence of the one great necessity. But the thunderstorm overtakes very suddenly as well as very violently in Paris. We are incredulous as to all sudden conversions, and most suspicious of the permanence of all such social virtues. Two months ago the Parisians, who are now caricaturing and reviling the Emperor were kissing his stirrup. The Parisians are even now, when we are asked to be so very confident about them, at the height of confidence and in the wildest tumults of despair twice within eight-and-forty hours. And the courage and resolution and great-heartedness which is said now to prevail may take a very different turn when the first Prussian gun is fired. To rely for the safety of Paris and the contents of Paris on the continuance of Parisian patriotism is but to lean on a broken reed. Admitting that the garrison can be trusted for prowess, that the rural Mobiles can be turned into decent soldiers, and that General Trochu and the Provisional Government will do their best to preserve order—and we do not despair even of M. Rochefort for this purpose—there remain the dangerous classes, which even after the expulsion of the useless mouths, must reach a terrible cipher. Here is the worst danger of Paris. Nobody can say how large, after a week or two's misery, terror, and scarcity, if not starvation, the dangerous class may not become. Even quiet tradesmen become dangerous, revengeful, vindictive, and sanguinary under the influence of mortal terror. The population of Paris is already lashed into a frenzy; but frenzy may take all sorts of shapes. The Parisians have been reminded of the burning of Moscow; and though Paris will not burn if Moscow burned, or as the London of 1666 burned, we cannot think without horror of a patriotic immolation of Paris. No doubt General Trochu and the Government would not lend themselves to any such absurd fanaticism; but we are thinking of Paris in a state of anarchy, and a million and a half of people mad with every evil passion, and wholly or half starving, may hardly know themselves. They will have been familiarized with burnings; for all the woods and forests around Paris—St. Germains, St. Cloud, and, we suppose, Versailles—are to be, or are already, fired. The trenches are to be filled, so it is said, not with water, but with living fire. Paris with its gas cut off, and its stores of petroleum and nitro-glycerine and other military combustibles, may be at the mercy of any land of fanatic who may think it a patriotic duty not to let Paris and the Louvre become a booty to the German barbarians. That this contingency of a fanatical destruction of Paris by the Parisians themselves is not so violently improbable the recent incident at Laon shows. We believe and hope that the destruction of the citadel of Laon was accident, and there is no ground whatever for attributing it to the Commandant. But it is just possible that the crime may have been perpetrated by some flaming fanatic, and, what is even more serious, the Parisians are disposed to accept this view, and treat the event as an act of patriotic heroism. This deed may have its emulators; and the spirit which instigated it, or to which it is attributed, is of no good omen for the safety of Paris. The Germans are a very civilized and cultivated and æsthetic race, but we have not much confidence in the reverence shown for art or letters or monuments in a sack. The Duke of Fitzjames, and he is a respectable authority, announces horrible deeds perpetrated by the Prussians at Bazeilles. Both sides are getting savage, and if things go on will become more savage. England and France are very conservative of works of art, but the wanton destruction which they perpetrated in China is not forgotten. We remember the sack of Delhi, and the devastation which we committed on that occasion. The dangers which at this moment threaten Paris are dangers to the whole world, and to all those interests and acquirements which make our modern civilization what it is. We have not that excuse of ignorance and barbarism which Goths and Turks had. Nay, we may, and Prussians may, deplore the ruin of which they may say they are the unwilling instruments. But as far as art, letters, and civilization are concerned—to say nothing now of other interests—we cannot think of the situation in Paris without a shiver of horror and fear.

ENGLISH ACTORS OF OUR TIME.

No. 3.—Hermann Vezin.

Mr. Hermann Vezin is what is known as a character actor. He differs, however, from the majority of those belonging to the same class in the quality no less than in the range of his powers. Pathos and melodramatic intensity represent the ordinary limits of the character actor on the more serious side of his art. Mr. Vezin goes beyond these. His pathos deepens and darkens into tragedy, and his more serious performances have a large supply of inspiration and a certain measure of creative force. Not less remarkable than any energy of the actor and the breadth of his conception is the extreme delicacy of his method. Fine effects are produced by slightest movements, and the finesse and subtlety in which our stage is deplorably deficient, are displayed in all he does. In all that constitutes the highest form of dramatic exposition Mr. Vezin has no superior on the modern stage. His career has been impeded, doubtless, by circumstances for which he cannot be held wholly responsible. There are, however, in Mr. Vezin's idiosyncrasy qualities which have hitherto offered a barrier to his progress in his art. The most pronounced of these—and that which will require on the part of the actor strongest and most sustained energy in combat—is self-consciousness. Mr. Vezin's later impersonations display less of this defect by which his earlier representations were so greatly marred. So afraid was Mr. Vezin of over-acting he under-acted. In his inflexible determination to be moderate and artistic, to keep within legitimate bounds and by no sacrifice to the taste of an ignorant pit to gain a dearly bought applause, the actor sacrificed a measure of his inspiration. He preserved or appeared to preserve a habit of calm scrutiny and self-investigation which the strongest dramatic impulse was unable to conquer. This is, of course, contrary to all dictates of histrionic art. In the whirlwind of passion the actor may well, as Hamlet says, "acquire and beget a temperance that shall give it smoothness." But this must be the result of mental training previously acquired, and must depend upon no exercise of volition at the time. When acting a part of the highest importance an actor must forget or ignore the very existence of his art. If true to himself, his art, and his inspiration, he may be altogether indifferent to the opinions of the groundlings. This defect—the only drawback we know from Mr. Vezin's acting—has interfered with the power though not with the subtlety of certain of his impersonations. It is gradually disappearing, however, as the actor gets more frequent opportunities of appearing before the public in parts worthy of his talent

The number of characters in which Mr. Vezin has been seen in London is singularly few. We have, indeed, nowadays the curious spectacle on the stage from which according to the complaint of managers and public, almost all talent has disappeared, and on which one of the finest, most original, and most conscientious actors of the day is not allowed to appear. Signs, however are not wanting that this state of things is near an end, and the amateurs of fine acting may hope in future to see Mr. Vezin in parts worthy of his abilities. In the country Mr. Vezin, since his first appearance a score years ago, has played an entire range of characters, tragic, comic, and even farcical. The ordinary teaching, inseparable as we believe from lasting success, has been gone through, and the apprenticeship to art, without which success can scarcely be hoped, has been served. In London, however, about a dozen parts —rather more than half of which are of unimportance—represent all upon which a judgment can be found. Mr. Vezin's first appearance revealed an actor of highest promise. Mr. Falconer's drama of Peep o' Day—a crude and ill-digested production, with a large number of parts, all of value pretty nearly equal—afforded no opportunity to any actor to exhibit qualities much higher than those of the walking gentleman. In Mr. Harden, however, Mr. Vezin acted with a power and self-confidence that augured well for his future, and succeeded in conveying a belief in his capacity for playing parts of a very different order. Since that time—now almost ten years ago—Mr. Vezin has been seen as Bucklaw, in The Master of Ravenswood; David Garrick in Mr. Albery's Doctor Davy; Markham, in The Sister's Penance; Sir Grey de Malpas, in Lord Lytton's The Rightful Heir; Murdoch Mackane, in Dr. Westland Marston's Life for Life; James Harebell, in Mr. Willis's Man o' Airlie; Montignac, in Seraphine; Iago, and Laertes. Between the representations of parts so various great difference of course exists. In all, however, the faculty of forming at once a distinct conception of the character and painting a picture, which, however remote it might be in outline from that imagined by author or spectator, had at least the merits of clearness, comprehensibility, and justness of proportion was evident. Perhaps the part which more than any other contributed to secure for Mr. Vezin the approval of the more critical among playgoers was Sir Grey de Malpas in Lord Lytton's drama, Sir Grey de Malpas is a bold bad and unscrupulous man, a little after the fashion of Sir Giles Overreach. Nearly allied to the noble family of Montreville, he is separated by two lives only from the splendid estates which appertain to the Lords de Montreville. To obtain this coveted title and to exchange for ease and splendour the comfortless and humiliating dependence under which he has long winced, he will shrink from few paths however tortuous, from few deeds however desperate. Fortune seems to favour him, and he sees, or thinks he sees, one of the two men who bar his way slain by the other whose life, after the crime is committed, is sapped away by pestilence rapidly developing into heart-break. The outline of this character conceived by Mr. Vezin was fine, and some points of the filling up were admirable. A well-worn air of deference and subservience half concealed the consciousness of power unemployed as yet but fierce and dangerous. The face behind the mask was indicated until the moment came when the mask was quitted. Very few modern representations have exhibited anything finer than the burst of triumph when the schemer rose triumphant and bade those to whom he had hitherto bowed make way for his new-found dignity and bow in turn.

In Murdoch Mackane, the sombre chieftain of a Highland clan was presented with scarcely less power. A sense of unutterable wrong, a morose brooding over schemes of terrible revenge and a passionate yearning for opportunity for retaliation, filled the mind of the man, rendering him callous to all suffering that his progress along the path mapped out might bring with it. The light in his eye was cruel and treacherous. It was that of the man who had meditated on schemes of murder, until the face reflected no humanising trait, no expression into which any light of gentleness or forbearance could enter. In the scene in which Murdoch learned that his foe had at last been delivered upon one of the accursed race that had rendered him childless, the sullen embers of wrath broke for once into a flame, and the roused fury reached the verge of madness. This was finely depicted, as was the subsidence of passion and overflooding of soft thoughts when the child so long mourned for as murdered was restored to his arms and the life-long schema for vengeance was foregone. As David Garrick, in Doctor Davy, Mr. Vezin shows that his powers in comedy are analogous to those in tragedy. There is the same beauty of form, the same delicate and highly finished workmanship. A part like this lends itself easily to exaggeration. Mr. Vezin, however, does not yield to any temptation, and is as quiet and artistic when he depicts the garrulous old doctor, who undertakes to minister to a mind diseased, as when he counterfeits drunkenness, or when he draws tears from the puritanical old shopkeeper by his method of narruting the danger and escape of a child. Mr. Vezin's logic is a clever and adequate performance, wanting a little in colour, but full of suggestion. It was marred at first by a little haste of delivery, but it was striking and full of character. Very much the same praise may be accorded his Laertes. Such a character as these he has played in dramas like The Master of Ravenswood, The Sister's Penance, Seraphine, and the like, only show those qualities of intelligence which are but the groundwork of the intellectual superstructure. As James Harebell, in Mr. Wills's fine play, The Man o' Airlie, pathos and feeling were very finely developed, and the scene in which the mad old poet, standing beneath the monument erected to himself recognises the words and air of one of his own poems, and continues in quavering notes the melody is surpassingly moving and artistic. Mr. Vezin's powers is not fully yet revealed. When sufficient opportunity is afforded him he will take a place in the foremost ranks of his profession. Absence of electricity and, perhaps, of complete spontaneity may remain a defect, but grace of outline and sense of proportion such as he possesses cannot fail to win their way when backed by such gifts as he owns of keen perception and psychological appreciation and analysis. MUSIC AT FLORENCE.

(From a Correspondent.)

The autumn season is close at hand, and the various theatres are busy preparing novelties. But these will excite very little interest as long as the war crisis lasts. The public mind is too unsettled to care much about art. In consequence of the great success achieved last season by Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, and Giannina e Bernadone, several once famous old operas, long unjustly forgotten, will be revived. The Teatro Niccolini will open with an opera by Fioravanti, and this will be followed by other works of a similar description.—The presence of that indefatigable composer, Signor Petrella, has given rise to a report that he is about to produce a new opera.—Considerable sensation has been excited in musical circles by a new instrument, the "Melopiano," an invention of Signor Caldera, engineer, of Turin. The Melopiano is a simple stringed-instrument, but to the sounds of the piano it unites those of the organ. This result is obtained by a system of double and rapid percussion. Competent judges pronounce the Melopiano a great success.

CHURCH MUSIC AND CHOIRMASTERS.

To the Editor of the "Church Review"

Allow me through the medium of your paper to call the attention of those interested in the present Catholic revival to what, I think, is one of the most important elements connected therewith—viz., Church music; but more especially to an evil which seems to be a rapidly increasing one. I allude to the assumption by some of the clergy—mostly young priests—of the duties of choirmaster, and that with little or no knowledge of the necessary requirements of that office.

As to the first point named—Church music—I have found a strong desire on the part of many of the clergy to use almost wholly in their services the ancient hymn tune. Now, I have no doubt that what follows will be deemed rank heresy by those of strong antiquarian tastes, who only seek to find something sufficiently old to offer thereto all the reverence and devotion they are capable of, without any regard to its practical use; but I speak as a musician and from experience, and, whilst feeling the greatest respect for such tunes as to their age and general excellency, I very humbly submit that, as a rule, they are utterly impracticable for congregations, and, to a great extent, for choirs. As one amongst many proofs of this take the example of St. Alban's, Holborn, where, I suppose, the congregation have been used to the "Hymnal Noted" for years, and I think that even the most enthusiastic devotee of that hymnal would scarcely venture to say that the singing by the congregation of such tunes is satisfactory. The reason is obvious to all who give the matter a moment's consideration, for the mere the rule of "one note to a syllable" is deviated from, the greater the difficulty to sing. Having due regard to the musical excellency of a tune, surely the best test of its adaptability to congregational purposes is that whereby it is seen how soon such tune can be learned and heartily sung by a congregation. The compilers of "Hymns Ancient and Modern" have shown their wisdom in this respect by introducing comparatively so few of the ancient tunes (those being of the most practical character) into their collection; and if such tunes were used in the same proportion as the modern tunes, no one, I think, could object—e. g., let the anthem, as a rule, be sung to one of the ancient tunes; of course I mean by this in churches where the more elaborate composition under that name is not used. But let such, or other, tunes be taught the choir by an efficient choirmaster, not necessarily by the priest because he is a priest, unless he is duly qualified by study and experience for that office. To find such among the clergy is very rare, for it is well known that hitherto the study of music received little or no attention from the great majority of them; indeed it is only since the commencement of the present "revival" that their attention has been drawn a more generally in this direction.

I fear that is too frequently occurs that a priest who happens to possess "a good voice," and, perhaps, "a good ear," considers such qualifications all that is necessary to fit him for the post of choirmaster. Such an one as learnt his own portion of the service "is able to intone;" and perhaps can show the organist that he can by much struggling play through a hymn tune; therefore he at once sets up for precentor and choirmaster—and what is the result? The choir are made into so many "dummies" through his inability to teach the tunes he drags into the services, most likely not on account of their general excellency, but because he has heard them at this or that "correct" church. And a word as to the kind of tune such a choirmaster affects. It will generally be seen that they are either from "ancient" sources, or else they are painfully "modern," and, therefore, in the former case the choir get through at best they can, or in the latter they get through (for plenty of time in which such a choirmaster aims at) such tunes as the popular waltz-setting of "O Paradise," or Mébul's melody, "Ere infancy's bud," to the same words, or the churchy rendering of "We won't go home till morning" to "For thee, O dear, dear country;" not to mention "The Mill Wheel" (C.M.), the andante from Haydn's Overture in D, or "Brightly gleams our banner," and a host of other "adaptations" both sacred and profane.

Without going into the question of the desirability or otherwise of having church choirs trained by clerics or laymen (though much might be said on both sides) let us as Catholics, who feel in our worship that we must honour God by offering the best of everything, and as we, therefore, dedicate to His service our highest talents in architecture and painting—let us, I say, not forget the equally important sister art, Music, and at all times endeavour to promote what is best in music for congregational purposes, and have such music taught by one who is most competent, whether cleric or laic; and we may be sure that by this means our Church music will occupy a far higher position than it has hitherto held, and thus be a greater means of teaching all within and attracting all without the Church.

A CHURCH MUSICIAN.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The Russian operatic company was inaugurated by Moniuszko's opera, Halka. Mdlle. Lewinsky, who appeared this season as Drury Lane, is engaged to sing in M. Gounod's Faust.

LUCERNE.—Herr R. Wagner has just completed the first act of the third part of Die Nibelungen. He hopes to finish the entire work in two years. He is at present engaged on a book about Beethoven, which will, probably, appear before the beginning of next year.

SONGS OF THE WAR.

LA MARSEILLAISE.

Be off now, infants of the country!
The day of glory proves a bore,
What boots your Boulevard effron'try,
When on you Prussian armies pour?
And where's the use of shouting "Alsoa"?
More need to murmur "Sauvons-nous?"
For things look precious Prussian-like
Since Moltke showed their backs to Châlons.
Ta heels, then, citizens! Prepare the bill to pay,
Marchands, marchands, bourgeois, there dawns a pretty settling day.

"SIR ROLLEN HER NIGHT HAREN."

O let 'em bag it wholly,
The free, the German Rhine,
So long as they will solely
Leave me in peace to dine.
So long as through the Grenze
Good Gasthäuser endure;
So long as from Coblenz a
Road leads to Ems's Kur;
O they may sack and sit on
The free, the German Rhine,
But leave the travelling Briton
To eat his usual shine.

O they may take, and welcome,
The free, the Germa Rhine;
But let the tourist swell some,
And quaff his Mosel wein,
So long as ruins (Katzen
And Maine) standing are;
So long as one small Banzen
Will buy a mild cigar;
O let 'em cease their slaughters,
And seize the German Rhine;
But leave to me the waters
That suit my feeble spine.

"NOUS L'AVONS EU VOTRE RHIN ALLEMAND."

We would not have it, your free German Rhine:
It isn't worth the bowl and bother.
An ass was Condé, we opine;
De Musset was a flippant author.
We quite appreciate the laws of "mine" and "thine."
We would not have it, your free German Rhine.

We don't desire it, your free German Rhine:
Our Gravelotte is sufficient—shakes!
Sedan we looked on as a sign
How barren is the lonely-panky
Of fighting for la gloire; so please march back your line.
We don't desire it, your free German Rhine.

"WAS IST DES DEUTSCHEN VATERLAND."

What is the German's Fatherland?	What is the German's Fatherland?
I'm fleet if I can understand,	Baptist is, parsons tremendous,
Is't where the china pipe-bowl burns?	Is't where the stately camels press,
Is't where the cabbage acid turns?	Excited from inner consciousness?
Oh no, oh no; and Arndt says No;	"Ach nein!" or despite Oh no:
The Fatherland is more. "Ja so!"	Not even Kant contents him so.
What is the German's Fatherland?	What is the German's Fatherland?
Do foreign landmarks bound the strand?	Give it a name, and have stand.
Is't Cincinnati? Is it where	'Tis where the guttarals spilt the ear,
We did streets last east of Leicester Square?	And hereby mind's quenched in beer.
Oh no, oh no, proud Cockneys, no;	"Auch ne!" "Leb hoch!" Bismarck & Co.
The Fatherland is not Sobo.	Hass Breitmann answers "Eben so!"

One Hundred Pounds Reward.

One hundred pounds of the realm will be immediately handed over to the cumini sector who will explain the exact meaning of the following:—

"Schumann, who dares to mount with thee must dare
Of pain and peril all a man may know,
Battle, and the cry to them that will not spare
Their chuckling—misery, and blood, and woe;
And inarticulate passion moaning low,
Mixed with mute calms and holy quiet gings,
That one might say, "fire and the flight of wings
Thro' heaven beside his feet are slack and slow;"
Hope, with an utter sadness creeping through,
Joy, that for ever coming comes not quiet,
And seething of black clouds more black than night,
And heights of blessedness more pure than snow,
Where one plunge downwards bringeth to the brink
Of passionless despair—but who would shrink?"

The foregoing is an extract from a volume of poems by James Rhodes, recently published by Macmillan & Co. "Battle, and the cry to them that will not spare their chuckling" sounds marvellous fine. But what does it mean? What, indeed, does the whole mean? Will "G. G." explain.

One Hundred Pounds Reward.

A SOUTH LONDON correspondent calls attention to the so-called harmonies to the Gregorian tones, played by the organist at a well-known Ritualistic church, forming a combination of sounds so hideous as to call for the interference of the Precentor of Canterbury, the proper authority to appeal to. Our suburban critic would find some difficulty in inducing his Lordship to interfere; but, from experience, we can sympathize with his indignation at the burlesque organ-playing now heard in London churches where the severe ecclesiastical style is followed by the choir, while the most unchurch-like gymnastics are indulged in upon the keyboard.—Choir.

Mdlle. Christine Nilsson has arrived safely, after a very rough passage. Her first concert has already come off (Sept. 19th—at Steinway Hall).—An enormous success!—Receipts—four thousand eight hundred dollars.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Fag-Gallia.—A people which could listen, without stoning the orator, to such miserable and inflated bombast as that which M. Victor Hugo has recently addressed to Frenchmen, or, rather, to Parisians (not exactly the same thing), deserves no matter what may be the "bitter end." If the Parisians are idiots, they must be content to take the ordinary way of idiots. Of what significance is their pompous bluster now.

Shaven Silver.—True. One scarcely ever takes up a serial without seeing a review of a new novel by "Percy Fitzgerald;" and one unconsciously asks—who the deuce (devil) is "Percy Fitzgerald?"

Ubee.—M. Jules De Glimes is at Brussels, where for many years he has occupied the position of maitre des maitres. He has "cut" England altogether.

Farmer Tough.—We never heard mention of such a dance. "Bourré," yes—but not the other. Is not Farmer Tough thinking of a Yorkshire dance, somewhat approximating to the Scotch "Jig"?—the dance to which Admiral Wink, Cornet Causer, Ancient Lucy, and Corporal Silent Ward of the North are so affected?

Jules.—Yes—but with a difference. When Alboni first appeared in England (April 6th, 1847) she was scarcely twenty-two.

Dilettante.—Mdlle. Amalia Corbari was recently married to a Russian gentleman, well to do and highly esteemed.

Tecaldo.—No. It was Mozart who wished to take Pasciello in "the coach." The composer upon whose melody Mozart improvized variations, was Sarti—the master of Cherubini.

A HOLIDAY LEADER.

I, whose name is subscribed, am recreating at Dolgelly—a place chosen for various reasons, but principally for the natural beauties which lovingly encircle it, as the arms of Titania encircled the neck of Bully Bottom. I would do no wrong to Dolgelly; and when I compare it to the Athenian mechanic, beloved of the fairy queen, no wrong is done. The town is a queer little stone wart on the face of a charming country; and, looking at it, one marvels how it got there, or why, being there, it is not "improved" off with speed. This will suffice for Dolgelly; but its "ancient mountains" and its "lovely vales" (to quote from our newest national anthem), how many words would be requisite for justice to them!—Mr. Tupper, who welcomed Princess Alexandra with—

> A hundred thousand welcomes
> And twenty thousand more—

and who is, therefore, numerically minded, might be able to tell, but I cannot. Enough that in contemplating the mountains—climbing them I leave to people who are "better-breathed"—and wandering through the valleys, one gets exalted in spirit above the work-a-day world, and remains there till mine host of the wayside inn has to be settled with for refreshments. Than this, however, a much greater downfall was mine the other day. I had sauntered about the base of Cader Idris, and enjoyed the rare treat (in September) of seeing that respectable mountain take off its night-cap of cloud—in short I was prepared to follow Coleridge, and indite a hymn to its bald peak, when my editor spoke through the post thus:—"I shall expect a leader from you this week, let it be ever so short." Now, I appeal to all reasonable men, if these were not "hard lines." Saying nothing about the loss of that contemplated Hymn, how was I, abunted on a distant siding, with fires out and boiler empty—under repair, in point of fact—suddenly to get up steam and run over the old road, according to the time-table? The idea was monstrous; but editors, as a rule, are monsters; what is more to the purpose, they are despots, and must be obeyed. But there is obedience, and obedience; the one according to the letter, the other such as was Lord Nelson's—when he would have retreated but for inability to see the signal of recall with a blind eye. I resolved to give my editor a taste of the latter. "He shall have a leader,"—I said with grim satisfaction—but, it shall lead nowhere, and be àpropos of nothing." This is the prologue of it; and if, having read thus far, he refuses to print it, I don't care.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Observe these stars, for they have a signification. They mean that ten minutes ago I began to search out a path leading nowhere, and have not found it yet. The task is much easier in the Dolgelly country. I did it, for example, with the promptitude of instinct, only yesterday. There was a desirable point, and, here, an eligible track, leading straight towards the desirable point. But the eligible track dipped into a hollow, described a right angle, and stopped at a wall. It was a sheep track, and Welsh sheep take a deal of saltatory exercise; but I don't, and, therefore, the path led me nowhere. Now, if it were as easy to get on some mental course equally disappointing, I should enjoy a sweet revenge. Alas! it is not. Pen in hand, I gravitate at once towards musical topics, and begin where I may, the old familiar road is reached by the shortest cut. Dear old Uncle Toby, and pleasant old Corporal Trim (adjectives used because my editor hates Sterne and all his works), could not read the newspaper in their quiet garden without making ravelins and counterscarps—whatever they may be—among the cabbages. Such force hath the second nature we term use; and I, for one, don't believe in the talk sometimes heard about flinging off the harness of life, and grazing peacefully, like a superannuated hunter in some secluded field. The thing may be very nice as a bit of sentimentalism; but it can no more be reduced to practice than the "love-in-a-cottage" idea which haunts young ladies to whom existence without diamonds is a blank. Poor old Cowper sighed for—

> "—— a lodge in some vast wilderness,
> Some boundless contiguity of shade."

Yet, who credits the possibility of his happiness, with pen and ink out of reach, and no Mrs. Unwin to hear his poems read o'nights? Stepping from Cowper to Jones, the retired grocer, have we not seen, when Jones made his fortune and won the Elysium, in view of which sand was often mistaken for sugar, how—

> "Melancholy marked him for its own."

Jones moped about the "snug little box" which was to be his haven of rest; waxed gouty of habit and cross of temper, and, at last, fretted himself into the grave, longing for the clang of his scales upon the counter. So it is, more or less, with us all, and that even when we assume to be at large for a little while. Mr. Gladstone may pick up sea-weed at Walmer; Mr. Disraeli may design porches for his labourers' cottages at Beaconsfield; and men less illustrious may disport themselves according to their several fancies; but whether statecraft or handicraft be the work of each, the mind can no more be kept from it than the superannuated hunter aforesaid can refrain from pricking his ears at sound of the bugle-horn. But, stop!—how did this moralising begin?—and whither does it lead? Looking back to answer the first question, I catch the "let it be ever so short" of the editorial order. Moreover, I see that by concluding here, and reserving music for next week, I shall have written "a leader which leads nowhere, and is à propos of nothing." Au revoir, M. le Rédacteur-en-chef; another time, I fancy, you will not disturb my holiday.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

IT is good news for those who love Art that the treasures of the Louvre have been removed from Paris to a place of safety, the whereabouts of which has been kept secret. There can be no impropriety in wishing that the English Government, or, say, the ever-energetic Mr. Henry Cole, had borrowed for the time as many of the precious pictures in question as could be accommodated at South Kensington.

IN continuation of what has been said on former occasions of the excellent music at Scarborough, a passing mention should be made of the reproduction of some secular marches, minuets, gavottes, and curtain-tunes of Handel, the stately and sublime. The freshness, vigour, and variety of this music is, of course, known to all who have studied the works of the master; but that they have fallen, like a pleasant surprise, on those who only know Handel by a few of his oratorios, is evidenced by the attention and applause with which the selection is received whenever it takes its turn among the lighter works of the modern school. Q. F. C.

AT the annual meeting of the Board of Governors of the Birmingham General Hospital, on Wednesday, a letter was received from Mr. Richard Peyton, Chairman of the Orchestral Committee of the Birmingham Festival, enclosing a cheque for £5,000, on account of the proceeds of the recent music meeting. It was stated that when the accounts are made up nearly another sum of £1,000 will accrue to the hospital, as the result of the festival of 1870—the most productive on record.

THE Restoration of Gloucester Cathedral is being carried out, under the supervision of Mr. Gilbert Scott, on as large a scale as the funds will permit. The south porch is nearly completed; the rich front of tabernacle work has been faithfully reproduced; and niches for statues, with beautifully carved canopies, have taken the place of the modern dial. Mr. Redfern, of London, is carving the fourteen statues for the porch. The aisles of the choir have been carefully cleaned and repaired; St. Andrew's Chapel has been finished for some time; St. Paul's Chapel is being completed; and the renovation of some of the other chapels is in a forward state. The estimated cost of the whole work is £45,000, whereas the total amount paid and promised up to the present time, even including £5,000 given by the Dean and Chapter, is only £14,157.

FOR the first time in Paris since theatres were permanently established, there has been a complete cessation of dramatic performances. Whilst the Revolution was progressing, the tragedies of Marie Joseph Chénier and Arnault père were performed; and while the Reign of Terror deluged the streets of Paris with blood, pastoral dramas, recording the lives and quarrels of Croydon and Amoret, divided the public favour with republican idylls celebrating the triumph of the new régime, the marriage of priests, and other novelties. Napoléon went to the campaign which ended at Waterloo while the Triomphe de Trajin was being performed; and the entry for the second time of the Allies into Paris was celebrated by the production of Le Roi et la Ligue. Subsequently, neither defeat nor revolution was able to check the voyage of dramatic performances. Not the least curious feature of the present struggle is the fact that theatrical entertainments have been stopped by authority, and that even before the interference of the law, public opinion had brought about their cessation. With the end of theatrical performances comes, of course, a stoppage of the journals wholly, or in a great measure, devoted to the drama.

PROVINCIAL.

PLYMOUTH.—The farewell visit of Signor Mario, at the "Three Towns Philharmonic and Oratorio Concerts," attracted a crowded and fashionable audience. The Western Morning News writes as follows:—

"Mario, the hero of the night, had a hearty reception, and sang with exquisite taste. Those who had forgotten that he had been for a generation one of the musical idols of the public were, perhaps, somewhat disappointed; but the great artist was quite himself in 'Spirito Gentil,' and rapturous was the applause which succeeded. According to an enthusiastic encore, he substituted 'Good-bye, sweetheart.' It is difficult to decide to which of his duets the preference should be given, especially as in the one he was seconded by Mdlle. Liebhart, and in the other by Mdlle. Enriques. In response to an encore for 'Little bird, so sweetly singing,' Mdlle. Liebhart, sang 'Oh, dear, what can the matter be?'—quietly substituting 'bonny fair hair' for 'bonny brown,' to make the song suit her own personal individuality. She also threw true pathos into the 'Blind girl's dream.'"

BOW.—(From a Correspondent)—On Monday, the 19th September, the winter course of entertainments and lectures, in connection with the Bow and Bromley Institute, was opened by a concert which equalled any entertainment of a similar kind at the East end of London. The concert-room is well adapted for sound, and accommodates about 800 persons. Miss Amy Weddle played two pianoforte solos by the Chevalier de Kontski ("Souvenir de Faust," and "L'Echo de la Guerre"). She was encored in both, and well deserved the compliment. Miss Jessie Royd and Miss Augusta Darvell were received with marked favour, the former being encored in "Ah fors'è lui," "Diamond Eyes," and "Why are you wandering;" the latter in "Happy be thy dreams" and "Home, sweet Home." Mr. Edward Lloyd sang "Alice, where art thou?" and "Let me like a soldier fall;" and, in company with Miss Darvell, the duet, "The Sailor sighs." Mr. Farquharson, who acted as accompanist, also gave a descriptive scena, "The Desert," and a buffo scena, "Blue-Beard,"—of happy memory (remember John Parry!) The committee of the Bow and Bromley Institute deserve success in their undertaking to supply what has long been wanting to the East end of the Metropolis.

NEWS FROM VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

On the retirement of M. Herbeck from the Society of the Friends of Music, the post of conductor was, as our readers are aware, offered to Herr Hellmesberger, who, however, felt bound to decline it, on account of his duties in connection with the Singverein. Negotiations were then commenced with Herr Dessoff—a plan being started of a fusion with the Philharmonic Concerts—and, also, with Herr Brahms, but failed in both instances. Another and more pressing application was now made to Herr Hellmesberger, who ended by acceding to it, on the understanding that he is to be assisted at the Singverein by Herr Frank.—On the 8th inst., Herr Theodor Wachtel received, at the Carl Theater, the highest sum probably ever received by any German singer for one night's performance. After the nightly expenses, 400 florins, have been deducted, Herr Wachtel, by the terms of his agreement, has a clear half of the receipts. The receipts on the night in question were 2,850 florins. Herr Wachtel's share amounted, therefore, to 1,225 florins.

"Oh! dear me! who wouldn't then be,
A tenor thus blest with a jolly high C!"

—The Beethoven Festival, which was to have been celebrated this month, has, in consequence of the war, been postponed. It will now take place on the composer's birthday, in December. Z. Z.

A MEMBER of the orchestra at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, was lately, so at least says the Morgenpost, summoned to Salzburg, to fill the position of leader at the Mozarteum. He arrived in due course, and gave a touch of his quality as a violinist in a select and critical few, among whom was no less a personage than Herr Joachim, facile princeps of all the violinists in existence. The performer was highly praised, and, in his own mind, already looked upon his appointment as a settled thing. Next morning, however, he received a letter from the director of the Mozarteum, Dr. Otto Bach, stating that he could not be appointed to the vacant office because—he was a Jew. So, at least, again says the Morgenpost.

PROVINCIAL CRITICISM.

If some of our miserably arrogant and intolerably conceited London musical critics want to know what musical criticism really is (or at any rate ought to be), let them peruse the subjoined, from the Western Daily Mercury (Plymouth), of the 15th inst. A perusal will repay their trouble, and in all probability give them a "wrinkle" or so:—

"Rarely, if ever, has the success of any concert given in the Three Towns excelled that given at St. James's Hall, Plymouth, last evening, and the scene that its spacious and brilliant interior presented for three or four hours was one that will long live in the memory of those fortunate enough to witness it. The concert was the first of Mr. Winterbottom's Philharmonic and Oratorio venture, and he is to be warmly congratulated upon the éclat which favoured the inauguration. Success, however, was anticipated, and it was difficult to see how other than success could be experienced. A programme bearing the names of Signor Mario, of world-wide renown; of Mdlles. Liebhart and Enriques, operatic singers of note; of a violinist so incomparable as Signor Sivori; and of a pianist so renowned as the Chevalier de Kontski, commands success by the incontestible character of its attractions, and to these were added those of a splendidly efficient orchestra, and of perfect arrangements. The result was a crowded house, and the auditory had all that variety which is naturally to be expected when the prices of admission conveniently range from one shilling to seven and sixpence. The Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, the Dowager Countess of Mount Edgcumbe, Lady Ernestine, the Hon. Mr. Edgcumbe and Admiral Sir W. Codrington were among those present. The audience were very appreciative and the artists obliging; and the consequence not unnaturally was that Mr. Winterbottom, in intimating that carriages might be ordered for half-past ten, causing them to be waiting just an hour before the concert closed.

"The concert opened full of promise with a very charming performance of Auber's light and fanciful overture to the Crown Diamonde, by an intelligent and powerful orchestra, made up of members of the Royal Marine Band, and of several leading amateurs of Plymouth, aided by a few members of Sir Michael Costa's Royal Italian Opera Band. Never have the piquant and typical characteristics of the melodies of the piece been so exquisitely rendered as they were last evening, and the passages for the stringed-instruments alone were played with a force that made it quite a feature of the performance. Mdlle. Liebhart placed herself at once on good terms with the auditory by singing in a high clear voice the Figaro recit., 'Ginnae allin,' and the following air, 'Deh vieni,' most tastefully. With stage accessories its excellencies would, however, have been more apparent. Mdlle. Enriques next sang Virginia Gabriel's beautiful song, 'She came like a dream' successfully, her rich and powerful contralto showing especially well in the lower passages. Signor Mario then, with Mdlle. Liebhart, gave the Traviata duet, 'Parigi o cara.' The reception given to the veteran tenor was of the most gratifying character, and the pleasure with which he acknowledged it was very evident. The Signor sang with all that marvellous grace and fervour which won for him, on the Italian opera stage a position unapproached by any other artist, and even the pains he takes to repair the ravages ruthless time has made on his splendid vocal powers were oftentimes rewarded with hearty applause. Very admirably did he sustain Mdlle. Liebhart, whose singing was very expressive, and the applause at the close was hearty. Signor Sivori, the only living pupil of Paganini, who was destined to become the idol of the evening, followed the duet with a brilliant performance on his violin (with full accompaniment), of the Adagio Religioso, and the rondo of his great master's, La Chachette. Its perfection in execution and in feeling was quite worthy of Paganini, and so great was the applause at the finish that he had to return twice to bow his acknowledgment. The orchestra won additional laurels in their glorious realisation of the delicate and manifold beauties of Haydn's Surprise Symphony. To Signor Mario fell very properly the honour of the first encore of the evening. It followed upon his singing the cavatina, 'Spirito Gentil,' which produced a thrilling effect. Responding to the compliment, he sang 'Good-bye, sweetheart,' and the selection was received with much approval. Mdlle. Liebhart's 'Little bird, so sweetly singing,' was very prettily interpreted by Mdlle. Liebhart, and the brilliancy of a very elaborate finale quite 'brought down the house.' The old song, 'Oh, dear, what can the matter be?' was chosen for the response to the encore, and it was sung with a deal of humorous expression, much to the liking of the audience. Chevalier de Kontski next absorbed the attention of the auditory by his remarkable pianoforte performance, fantasia on Faust airs, and wonderfully rousing was his playing of the 'Soldiers' Chorus,' given with all that fire which is characteristic of such selections. Contrasting favourably with this fortissimo effect was his playing of 'Salve dimora,' and the other music of the garden scene. The grand operatic selection from Lucrezia Borgia, arranged with much artistic skill, was a glorious finish to the first part, and another honour for the orchestra.

"The second part possessed features of equal interest. It opened with the Gazza Ladra overture, grandiose enough in its martial colouring to symbolise the triumph of a victorious army, and closed with the exquisite "Wedding March" of Mendelssohn, and these performances would do credit to any Metropolitan orchestra; as would also the really artistic interpretation of Beethoven's andante movement from Symphony No. 1. Signor Mario sang with genuine feeling a new song, 'Deep in my heart there dwells,' by Walter Maynard, and he appeared at his best in the duet, 'Se m'ami ensore,' which he sang with Mdlle. Enriques. Mdlle. Liebhart sang Louisa Gray's pathetic song, 'A Blind Girl's Dream,' and in answer to the encore she gave, 'Coming thro' the Rye' with much humour. But it was Signor Sivori and the Chevalier de Kontski who came in for the highest honours. Together they shared the enthusiastic applause accorded to the performance of a Duo Concertante (Guillaume Tell). Signor Sivori's wonderful command over the violin was most thoroughly demonstrated in his performance of a remarkable Souvenir Perpetuel—a composition of his own. The applause at the end was vociferous, and in response, he played a fantasia on an air, capable of being splendidly burlesqued. The Chevalier's performance of L'Echo de la Guerre, a piece arranged by him in relation to the present war, introduced the celebrated March of Dessaix, and the 'Marseillaise Hymn,' and the power and expression with which it was played from the beginning to the end had a marked effect on the audience. Altogether the concert was a great success, a rare treat to all, and through it Mr. Winterbottom is at once established as a guide in our musical taste."

What the concert had to do with "Philharmonic," or "Oratorio," we leave it to Mr. Winterbottom (the "enterprising impresario") to explain.

DEATH OF MR. MACHIN.

In our obituary column to-day is announced the demise of our esteemed townsman, Mr. William Machin, a gentleman who attained fame as a vocalist extending beyond local circles. Mr. Machin, who resided in Mayfield Road, Handsworth, went out on Wednesday for a walk, in his usual health, returning apparently well to his residence. Late in the evening, about ten o'clock, while talking with a friend, he suddenly put his hand to his heart, and gave one or two spasmodic gasps. His friend alarmed, ran for medical assistance, but before it arrived Mr. Machin was dead. The deceased won repute in Birmingham, London, and elsewhere, as a bass singer, and for many years was one of the most active members of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society. During boyhood he was apprenticed to Messrs. Jennens & Bettridge (papier-mâché and japan works), but very soon joined the choir of the Cannon Street Meeting House, where his special gifts were early developed. A little later Machin became a member of the Lichfield Cathedral Choir, and while there attracted the attention of the late Sir Robert Peel, at whose recommendation he received the appointment of member of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, in which he acquitted himself so creditably that he obtained the Queen's special patronage for his concerts in this town. By virtue of his appointment at the Chapel Royal, he became member of Her Majesty's household. The deceased was one of the vicars choral of St. Paul's, London, and held an office in connection with the Temple Church. He was in his 73rd year, and through a long life endeared himself to a large circle of professional and private friends.—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

ALFRED NICHOLSON.

(From the "Athenæum")

The obituary of last week records the recent death, at Leicester, of Mr. Alfred Nicholson, aged forty-eight, after his having for some years been withdrawn from public duty by a wearing and hopeless illness. The choice of his instrument—the oboe—is one which may be said to limit the player to orchestral or concerted performances; but in these the excellences and values of Mr. Nicholson were well known, and honourable to his master, M. Barret. As a man, he was of a gentle nature and one who cherished refined tastes and fancies, besides those of his own art: in brief, belonging to the company of contemporary English players, who, so far as manners and culture are concerned, have most acceptably replaced those of the preceding generation in this country. The sufferings of his last years were kindly ministered to, and, as far as possible, alleviated by his friends and comrades in art. But this was no exception to a well-known rule. The unobtrusive kindness and liberality of musician to brother musician, in the hour of need and decay, cannot be over-estimated, and should never be forgotten by those protesting against the ascetics happily diminishing in number, who have been used to deery a gracious and lovely art as one which necessarily demoralizes its professors.

To the Editor of the "Choir."

SIR,—Your correspondent, "R. M.," enquires where the beautiful chorale, "Jesus meine Zuversicht," is published in England. I purchased many years back in London a collection of chorales harmonized by J. Sebn. Bach—371 for a few shillings—of which Nos. 101 and 198 are both the chorale mentioned, with two totally different harmonies. The work was published by Hærtel & Breitkopf, with a preface in German signed "C. F. Becker," Leipzig, den 9 December, 1831. The stamp of R. Cocks & Co., Hanover Square, is on the title-page. I will have pleasure in writing out for him the two arrangements if he will send his address.—Your obedient servant,

Broadway, Worcestershire. A. DAWSON

THE WAR-SONGS OF FRANCE AND GERMANY.

At the outset of an article on such a theme it is not easy to avoid discussing the part played by music and poetry in all national movements—a part so great that the philosopher who esteemed a maker of songs more than a maker of laws can hardly be charged with extravagance. We shall, nevertheless, keep clear of a topic upon which the utterance of anything but truisms is hopeless; and pass at once to the war-chants born of, or revived by, the unhappy contest now raging. The wide-spread influence of these effusions, and the honour conferred upon them by national adoption, demand that they, not less than other features of a wonderful historic event, shall have due notice.

Giving place to the victors, we must also give place, among the victors' songs, to Wilhelm's "Die Wacht am Rhein," which, more than anything else embodies the fervent Teutonic aspiration, and expresses the stern Teutonic resolve. For some time the authorship of its words was doubtful, but the distinction is now awarded to one Max Schneckenburger, a native of Thalheim, in Wurtemberg, who, as a youth, wrote verses and printed them; but, as a man, founded ironworks at Burgdorf, near Berne, and regretted his poetic folly. Dying in 1849, when only thirty years of age, this respectable German tradesman never dreamed of the great heritage upon which his name was fated to enter. He probably remembered "Die Wacht am Rhein" from the fact that it was one of his sweetheart's passionate vanity, as a gift to his betrothed; but we may be assured that he thought less of it than of getting together a compact little library and carrying on his ironworks. The library still exists; so may the ironworks; so, emphatically, does "Die Wacht am Rhein," and with it will live for ever the name of Max Schneckenberger. The composer, Wilhelm, is not unknown, apart from the famous song. Early set to musical studies by his father, the organist of Schmalkaden in Thuringia, he subsequently became a pupil of Louis Spohr, Aloys Schmidt, and André of Offenbach. A prolific writer, and one not less able than prolific, Wilhelm has given to the world many things which have made their mark; but his genius shines most when patriotism is the theme. The "Wacht am Rhein," composed in 1854, and written for male voices, the "Wache auf, Deutschland," with its determined refrain, "Kein Fuss weit von dem Deutschen Lands soll je Franzosisch werden" (1868), are, undoubtedly, achievements upon which Wilhelm's fame, as a national musician, may safely rest. The former is a model people's melody. Broad in phrase, well-marked in rhythm, and, so to speak, pulsating with vigour, the memory seizes it at once; and the heart responds, as by instinct, to its appeal. Very grand must have been the effect of its stately march as the German hosts sang—

Und ob mein Herz im Tode bricht
Wirst du noch dann ein Waecher nicht
Reich, wie an Wasser deiner Flut
Ist Deutschland ja an Heldenblut.
Lieb Vaterland, magst ruhig sein,
Fest steht und treu die Wacht am Rhein.

It is pleasant to know that Wilhelm lives to receive the honours bestowed by a grateful country, and, it may be, to deserve still more. Schneckenburger's widow also survives; while his eldest son carries a rifle in the Wurtemberg contingent.

The wonderful popularity of "Die Wacht am Rhein" has thrown the other national songs of Germany somewhat into the shade; but two, at least, have played no mean part in the struggle now going on. We refer to "Was ist der deutschen Vaterland?" and "Sie Sollen ihn nicht haben;" the former representing the agressive, the latter the defensive spirit of Teutonic patriotism. It may be objected that there is nothing aggressive in Teutonic patriotism; but the existence of a popular song which says—

So weit di deutsche Zunge klingt,
Und Gott im Himmel Lieder singt
Das soll es sein, das soll es sein
Das, wacker Deutscher, nenne Dein

—has a significance anything but reassuring to Germany's near neighbours. The song, let us add, is well adapted for its mission. To the terse sentences of a half-a-dozen catechetical verses are wedded abrupt and imperative melodic phrases; while the declaration that Germania extends "as far as German words shall ring" is set to music of chorale-like solemnity, as though it formed part of a religious creed. "Sie sollen ihn nicht haben" is a composition, both words and music, of inferior value; the melody wanting dignity, and the verses being little more than a petulant defiance of "all and sundry" to come and take the German river, if they can. It is interesting to know that shortly after the Revolution of 1830, when fears were entertained of a French invasion, Mendelssohn was asked to write music for this song. That the great composer declined argues nothing against his patriotism, but a good deal for his strong common sense, which set down as positively childish these reiterated declarations that nobody should take away what could well be defended without bluster. He may also have foreseen that so direct a challenge was sure to provoke the retort which, as everybody knows, has since appeared, in the shape of Alfred de Musset's "Rhein Allemand." Everybody does not know, however, to what extent lyric "crowings" of this sort have excited the passions and intensified the mutual hatred of the combatants.

The three compositions above named sufficiently represent the war-songs of Germany; and we may pass over the host which have done subordinate duty. Before turning to those of France, however, it may be well to remark how all display an intense love of country, and a not less intense hatred of the foreign foe. Here we have the reflection in song of those weary years during which a divided Fatherland was the prey of conquest—years, be it also noted, the fiery trials of which helped to fuse all German hearts into one.

In France, the "Marseillaise" has asserted its supremacy, demolishing the barriers set up by twenty years of proscription, and becoming the expression of national sentiment from the Tuileries to the utmost limits of what only a few days ago was the Empire. This might have been expected, for, more potent than the Fiery Cross of the Highland clans, the French revolutionary hymn not only summons to arms, but infuses the spirit wherewith to use them. Its glorious utterances may well turn cowards into heroes, and make the weak irresistible; in short, it realizes all that poets have dreamed of the power of the sister arts. The story of its composition by Rouget de Lisle, in the now-beleaguered Strasburg, is too well known for relation here; but we must not omit noticing the feeble attempt made by a newspaper correspondent to give the tune a German origin. The writer in question is unaware us believe that the "Marseillaise" is "German holy music found in an old church of the German village, Holzheim;" to which our reply is a distinct refusal to do anything of the sort, and a strong expression of belief in an ill-timed hoax. Singularly enough, the two most popular French songs, after the "Marseillaise," are, like it, vestiges of the great Revolution, the three being the only survivors of a group which included the "Chant de la Victoire," the "Chant du Retour," the Chanson de Roland" (Méhul's), the "Chant de Juillet," the "Chant Martial," the Hymne à l'Etre Suprême, the "Hymne à la Liberté, and Gossec's "Peuple, reveille-toi." Those to which we now specially refer are Méhul's "Chant du Départ" and Girey-Dupré's "Mourir pour la Patrie," the former inseparably connected with revolutionary sacrifices and triumphs, the latter, in its origin at least, associated with the noble band of Girondists whose fate its author shared.

Méhul's song is ill-adapted by the peculiarity of its construction for general use. In point of fact, it might be termed a cantata with solos for different voices, varied by passages in chorus. Thus two old men, a mother, and a bride successively utter patriotic sentiments suggested by their respective circumstances, the chorus answering each thus:—

"La République vous appelle;
Sachez vaincre ou sachez périr.
Un Français doit vivre pour elle;
Pour elle un Français doit mourir."

That the song—if we may call it—has survived in spite of such a construction, is good proof of excellence in other respects. The music does credit even to Méhul, a composer whose credit is of the highest. The refrain has the genuine clang of the trumpet in it, and the martial spirit animates the whole to an extent which sufficiently explains and justifies its popularity. The words of "Mourir pour la Patrie" are, of course, an adaptation of those written by Dupré a few hours before he ascended the scaffold; but the melody remains unaltered. The new song is, in fact, the "Chant des Girondins," with only such changes as have fitted it for general use. We question, however if any adaptation can secure for it immortality. Revived by an accident—the concurrence of Lamartine's Histoire des Girondins and the Revolution of 1848—and made popular by use in Dumas's Chevalier de la Maison Rouge "Mourir pour la Patrie" has won temporary rank as a national hymn, but words and music alike are wanting in that nervous force and resolute energy which are the first essentials of their kind. The songs of the First Empire can hardly be said to survive the second, "Partant pour la Syrie" being now as dead as Gretry's "Veillons au salut de l' Empire," Choron's "Sentinelle," or Suvan's "Veillant Troubadour." The airs of the Restoration, it need hardly be said, preceded these to the tomb; for it is long since "Vive Henry IV." and "Charmante Gabrielle" lost the semblance of that popular favour they never really enjoyed. On the other hand, the Revolution of 1830 gave birth to a song which still lives, and is a power in its way. We refer to the "Parisienne" of Casimir Delavigne, whose animated words, however, suffer much by union with an Hungarian air never thoroughly acceptable to French taste, though manipulated by a band no less distinctively French than that of Auber. From 1830 to 1870—from the "Parisienne" to the "Rhin Allemand"—nothing calls for notice; and De Musset's vigorous answer to "Sie sollen ihn nicht haben," is chiefly remarkable as bringing out into striking relief a feature of not a few national anthems. The "Rhin Allemand" was written during the consumption of one cigar; and the fact reminds us that the "Marseillaise" was the work of a night; that the "Sword" of Korner sprang from the exaltation which foreboded the poet's immediate death in battle, and that "Mourir pour la Patrie" was written while its author awaited the fatal tumbril. Such things must, indeed, be inspirations; and who can wonder that, coming, as it were, unbidden from the depths of a human soul, they move every heart to sympathy, and exert a power greater than all the material forces which are made their servants?

THADDEUS EGG.

A Word for the Fallen.

Another Sovereign of France has fallen! Louis Napoléon Buonaparte is said to have amassed enormous riches as Emperor of the French, and to be quite content to retire from the ruin he has caused into the splendid privacy which the resources of France will supply with every luxury. According to the prevailing rumours, he has money in the Dutch funds, in the English funds, in the American funds, and in railways all over the world. That such should be the popular notion is not surprising, for undoubtedly the Court of the Second Empire has had the control of incalculable sums. But persons of discernment will be quite prepared to believe that this opinion is entirely baseless. There have been Sovereigns who have been men of business. Louis Philippe was supposed to be one; Napoleon III. was not one at all. Whatever his faults, they were not in the direction of parsimony and private self-seeking. An enthusiast who believes in his cause, his fortune, his destiny, his overpowering will, his unerring judgment, is not the man to square his expenditure by his income. The man who saves is generally one who, though he does few great things, has the talent of doing small things well. This was just the reverse of the ex-Emperor's character, who, though till lately he applied to the concerns of the Empire a powerful judgment, always seems to have left details to others. What the Emperor's household must have been we may judge from knowing what the Emperor's army has been. The Emperor had a Civil List which economical Frenchmen thought exorbitant; but what were these millions to the expenditure of the Empire? What we have said will prepare our readers to learn that the rumours concerning the huge accumulations of the Emperor are absolutely without foundation. He went poor to France, and poor he has quitted it. People say there has been corruption; be it so—we do not deny it; we do not doubt it. Wherever there is a profuse expenditure, corruption as surely follows as disease follows the conditions which are favourable to it. But the Imperial family has profited nothing. Let the worst be admitted—that everything has been plundered—army, navy, public works, Paris improvements, political news, commercial enterprise; the jobbing has not enriched the Throne. Unless we are misinformed, the Emperor Napoleon, who has been the Chief of the French State for nearly twenty-two years, and its almost absolute master for nearly eighteen, retains no other private property than a small cottage which came to him from his mother. Call it rashness, call it overweening confidence, or call it a generous carelessness, it is proved by the event that he did not devote his reign to the accumulation of money. Whatever he has received from France he has spent in the country, in accordance with the social system which was established with the Empire. That system was, no doubt, extravagant in the extreme. No contemporary Sovereign has held such a Court. The Czar who owns vast domains as his private property, besides ignoring the limitations of a Civil List in dealing with the public Treasury, could not maintain such splendour. The Sultan may squander millions, but his Oriental magnificence has been mere shabbiness by the side of Paris. What our own Court is we all see; and as we know its cost, we may, when we compare it with that of the French Emperor, form some judgment of his expenses.

Thus we have a clear light thrown on the Court life of the late reign. The system was magnificent, profuse, extravagant, and, as the event has proved, relaxing to the best energies of the country. But the Chief of the State has paid the penalty. Fortunes have been made on all sides, but Napoleon and his family have made no fortune; they have spent all they received in maintaining their Imperial establishment at the high pitch which modern France, under their own tuition, has demanded. This will surprise no one who knows anything of the Paris of late years. Take, for instance, the reception of foreign Sovereigns and distinguished guests of all kinds, the lavish expenditure of 1867, and the constant entertainments at the Tuileries through a great part of every year. When to this are added the gratifications expected and received by the numberless friends of a dominant régime, we shall cease to wonder that the ruler, who is the paymaster of the whole, should not have amassed a private fortune. Napoléon III. will leave his German place of captivity at the end of the war almost as poor a man as he was when he entered France in 1848. The Empress has, indeed, her jewels, gifts at her marriage and on her fêtedays; but these are her private property, the State jewels being now in the hands of the French Government at Tours; she has, besides, an hereditary property in Spain, and the Prince Imperial has a house which has been bequeathed to him near Trieste. This, we believe, is all that remains to the family which lately was supreme in France. It need hardly be said that in speaking of these private matters our only object is to dissipate the calumnies which have assailed a dethroned Sovereign. In the country which he lately ruled no voice is ever raised in favour of the fallen. Sovereign, or Minister, or Republican celebrity, let him be but once overthrown, and he has the yelling crowd around him, and afterwards what is called History is too often tainted with the malignity of the hour. It is, therefore, not only excusable, but necessary, to state the truth at once. Napoléon III. has much to answer for at the bar of public opinion, but the world will do him this justice—that, though for so long a period he distributed the favours of the most splendid State in Europe, he left France in his old age with little of its wealth cleaving to him.—Times.

PRAYER AND SONG.

To all Christians, lovers of the Word of God, greeting!—As for public prayers, there are two kinds of them. The one is expressed in words only, and the other with song; and this is no recent invention, for from the first origin of the Church this has been the case, as appears in history. And even St. Paul does not speak of verbal prayer alone, but also of singing. And in truth, we know by experience that song has great force and power in moving and inflaming the heart of man to invoke and praise God with more vehement and ardent zeal.

It should always be seen to that the song should not be light and frivolous, but that it have weight and majesty—as saith St. Augustine; and also that there is a great difference between the music that is employed for the enjoyment of men at table and in their houses and the psalms which they sing in church in the presence of God and His angels. But when the form here given is rightly judged of, we hope that it will be found holy and pure, seeing that it is simply constructed for the edification of which we have spoken, as well as that the use of singing may be greatly extended, so that even in the houses and in the fields it may be to us an incitement and an instrument or means to praise God and raise our hearts to Him, and to console us in meditating on His power, goodness, wisdom, and justice, which is more necessary for us than we know how to express.

For the first, it is not without cause that the Holy Spirit exhorts us so carefully, by the Holy Scripture, to rejoice ourselves in God, and that all our joy should rest in Him as its true end. For He knows how truly we are inclined to please ourselves in vanity. Thus, while our nature draws and leads us to seek all manner of foolish and vicious enjoyment, on the contrary, our Lord, to separate and draw us from the allurements of the flesh and of the world, presents to us every possible means to fill us with that spiritual joy which he commends so much to us.

But amongst other things which are suitable for the recreation of men, and for yielding them pleasure, music is either the first or one of the chief, and we must esteem it a gift of God bestowed for that end. Therefore, by so much the more, we ought to see that it is not abused, for fear of soiling and contaminating it—turning that to our condemnation which was given for our profit and good. Even were there no other consideration than this alone, it ought to move us to regulate the use of music, so as to make it subservient to all good morals, and that it should not give occasion for loosing the bridle of dissoluteness, that it should not lead to voluptuousness, nor be the instrument of immodesty and impurity.

But further, there is scarcely anything in this world which can more powerfully turn or bend hither and thither the manners of men—as Plato has wisely remarked. And, in fact, we experimentally feel that it has a secret and incredible power over our hearts to move them one way or other. Therefore, we ought to be so much the more careful to regulate it in such a manner that it may be useful to us, and in no way pernicious. For this reason the ancient doctors of the Church often complained that the people of their time were addicted to disgraceful and immodest songs, which, not without cause, they esteemed and called a deadly and satanic poison for corrupting the world.

But in speaking of music I include two parts—to wit, the words, or subject and matter; secondly, the song or melody. It is true that all evil words, as saith St. Paul, corrupt good manners, but when melody is united to them they much more powerfully pierce the heart and enter in—just as when by a funnel wine is poured into a vessel, so poison and corruption are infused into the depth of the heart by melody.

What, then, is to be done? It is to have songs not only pure, but also holy—that they may be incitements to stir us up to pray to and praise God, and to meditate on His works, in order to love Him, fear Him, honour, and glorify Him. But what St. Augustine says is true, that none can sing things worthy of God but those who have received the power from Himself. Wherefore, when we have sought all round, searching here and there, we shall find no songs better and more suitable for this end than the Psalms of David, which the Holy Spirit dictated and gave him. And therefore, when we sing them, we are as certain that God has put words into our mouths as if He Himself sang within us to exalt His glory. Wherefore Chrysostom exhorts all men and women and little children to accustom themselves to sing them as a means of associating themselves with the company of angels. Further, we must remember what St. Paul says—that spiritual songs cannot be sung well but with the heart: but the heart requires the understanding; and in that, saith St. Augustine, lies the difference between the song of man and that of birds—for a linnet, and nightingale, and a jay (papegay) may sing well, but it will be without understanding.

But the peculiar gift of man is to sing knowing what he says. Further, the understanding ought to accompany the heart and affections, which cannot be unless we have the song imprinted in our memory, that we may be ever singing it.

The present book, for this cause, besides what otherwise has been said, ought to be particularly acceptable to every one who desires, without reproach and according to God, to rejoice in seeing his own salvation, and the good of his neighbours; and thus has no need to be much recommended by me, as it carries in itself its own value and praise. Only let the world be well advised that instead of songs partly vain and frivolous, partly foolish and dull, partly filthy and vile, and consequently wicked and hurtful, which it has heretofore used, it should accustom itself hereafter to sing these heavenly and divine songs, with good King David.

Touching the music, it appeared best that it should be simple in the way we have put it, to carry weight and majesty suitable to the subject, and even to be sung in church as has been said. JOHN CALVIN.

Geneva, 10th June, 1543.

WAIFS.

One of the greatest of singers, past, present, and to come—Marietta Alboni (the Countess of Pepoli), has arrived in London, and in all probability will remain for some time among us. May we look forward to hearing this consummate artist during the autumn and winter season—at the Crystal Palace or elsewhere? Let us hope so.

Mr. Tom Hohler has arrived in London.

Dr. Ferdinand Hiller has gone back to Cologne.

Gay's Beggars' Opera has been produced at the Gaiety Theatre.

The Bonn Beethoven Festival is fixed to take place in the spring of 1871, should there be peace.

All the theatres and café concerts have been closed in Paris, and music is silent every where but in the churches.

Madame Adelina Patti is still in London. She has consented to sing, as we are informed, at more than one concert in the country.

Signor Schira has returned to London, from Milan, where the general talk in musical circles is his forthcoming new opera, Leah.

Mr. Maurice Strakosch is in London, with his family—not, as some of our contemporaries have reported, at New York, with Mdlle. Nilsson.

Organ music seems to be making way at the Antipodes, and the Australian papers give an account of "a Congress of Organists" at a Wesleyan chapel, Sydney.

The London public will, it is said, have an early opportunity of hearing Mr. Benedict's new oratorio, St. Peter, the production of which was "the event" of the Birmingham Festival.

There is reason to believe that Cherubini's Deux Journées will shortly be produced, in an English dress, at the Gaiety Theatre, with Mr. Santley in the character of the Water-carrier.

We understand that Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to accept the dedication of Mr. Benedict's oratorio, St. Peter, which produced so great an impression at the Birmingham Musical Festival.

The farewell tour in the chief towns of the United Kingdom of Signor Mario has commenced. He is accompanied by Signor Sivori, violinist, the Chevalier de Kontski, pianist, and Fraulein Liebhart and Mdlle. Enriques, vocalists.

Sir Michael Costa's new German national hymn, "All Honour to the King," composed expressly for the King of Prussia, and first performed at Berlin in presence of the Royal Family, in 1868, has been published simultaneously at Berlin, Leipsic, and London.

Mr. Ridley Prentice's "Monthly Popular Concerts" at Brixton, will shortly be resumed; and in the same neighbourhood Mr. Lemare's Choral Society has issued its programme, among the promised novelties being Mr. Barnby's Rebekah.

The position of affairs on the Continent is exercising a natural influence on the movements of foreign as well as English artists, and the announcement that Signor ——— intends to remain in England during the autumn and winter is becoming a more and more common form of advertisement.—Choir.

The husband of Madame Pauline Lucca, Baron von Rahden, is not dead. He was severely wounded, but hopes are entertained of his recovery. Madame Lucca visited the head-quarters of the German army in France when she received the news. The Baron will be removed to his residence in the Victoria Strasse, Berlin, as soon as possible.

The Committee of the Birmingham Festival, through the Orchestral Chairman, Mr. Peyton, presented Mr. W. H. Cummings with a handsome gold chain and appendages in recognition of the obliging manner in which he had given much valuable and extra assistance both in the solo and concerted music,—a well deserved compliment to one of the most intelligent and conscientious artists before the public.

An accident occurred on Monday night by which a dancer was severely burnt, at the Alexandra Music-hall, in Peter Street, Manchester. A new ballet had been performed, and a set-scene was being completed by raising Miss Lucelle, leading danseuse, into view in the centre of the tableau, when the support on which she stood lurched, and she fell forward upon a row of gas jets, by which her dress was ignited, and she was severely burnt.

One of the most objectionable forms of "charity," called forth by popular sympathy with the sufferers by the war is that which induces persons to publish music absolutely worthless, under the plea that the proceeds of the sale will be devoted to the patriotic funds. The result in nine cases out of ten is that the composer airs his name, obtains credit for benevolence, and leaves his music with the certainty that he will be able to pay the printer.—Choir.

The final Report of the Royal Commission on Ritual is remarkable for nothing but divergence of opinion amongst Commissioners on nearly every point discussed. If their recommendations become law the only one effect in the musical portion of the services is that the rubrics after the third collect is to stand—"Here may follow an anthem or hymn"—instead of, "in choirs and places where they sing here followeth the anthem,"—merely by putting into words the practice of the day.

"Coming down this morning"—says a Paris correspondent—"I passed the church of the Madeleine. The scene there was certainly unique. The whole of the fine square which surrounds that still finer building was full of Mobile Guards going through their drill. It was strange to hear the music of the organ (Mass was being sung) mingle with the clashing of bayonets and the stern voices of drill sergeants. Inside the church the curate was preaching peace and goodwill, while outside the commander was shouting war and revenge."

The programme of the recent "National Musical Congress" held at New York, included the reading of papers. Dr. James Peck, organist of Trinity Church, read a paper on Academical Degrees in Music. Mr. G. F. Root discussed the principles of elementary musical education. Mr. Henry C. Watson read a paper on the Duties and Objects of the Congress. The musical director of the Peabody Institute at Baltimore discussed Musical Criticism; and Church Music was handled by a clergyman and a layman.

The Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, will be re-opened for Divine service to morrow. At the 10 o'clock service the sermon will be preached by the Rev. Francis Garden, M.A., Sub-Dean, and at 12 o'clock by the Rev. F. C. Cook, M.A., Canon of Exeter Cathedral and preacher at Lincoln's Inn. At Chapel Royal, Whitehall, the sermon at the 11 o'clock a.m. service will be preached by the Rev. Arthur Holmes, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Clare College, Cambridge, and at 3 o'clock p.m., by the Rev Francis Garden, M.A., the Sub-Dean. At Chapel Royal, Savoy, there will be holy communion at 8 o'clock a.m., morning prayer at 11 30 with sermon by the Rev. Henry White, Chaplain to the House of Commons and Savoy; evening prayer at 7 with sermon by the Rev. Dr. Barry, Principal of King's College, London.

To the Editor of the "Choir."

SIR,—I was glad to see, in your last week's issue, that a lay clerk had come to the defence of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury Cathedral for their most meritorious conduct in giving the Choir boys a holiday, a proceeding which seemed to have raised the angry passions of your tourist correspondent. If he does not remember the adage, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," surely the very fact that he was himself seeking recreation might have induced him to be more merciful to the young choristers. During my school days it was my lot constantly to attend the Cathedral, and I can bear testimony to the regularity of the choir, both men and boys, which I have reason to know still distinguishes them, and might with advantage be imitated in our metropolitan and other cathedrals.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Stockwell, S. W. AN OLD KING'S SCHOLAR.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

SATURDAY CONCERTS.—The Fifteenth Series of these Concerts will commence THIS DAY, 1st October. It will comprise Twenty-six Concerts in all—twelve before and fourteen after Christmas. The Subscription for Transferable Stalls for the twenty-six concerts is fixed at Two Guineas each. Stalls for a single concert, Half-a-crown. The Band and Chorus will be maintained at the same number and efficiency as during last season, and the programmes will be selected on the same principles as those of former years. The standard works of the great masters will be performed with all the care possible, new works of importance will be brought forward when practicable, and every endeavour made to maintain the width of range and excellence of performance on which the Crystal Palace Concerts have achieved their reputation.

The present year being the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Beethoven a more than usual prominence will be given to his works in the first twelve concerts. It is intended to perform his nine Symphonies, in chronological order, with the Mass in C, Op. 86, and the music to "The Ruins of Athens" (both for the first time at these concerts), and such of his Overtures, Concertos, and other compositions, both vocal and orchestral, as can be introduced; and all that intimate acquaintance, affectionate study, and careful rehearsal can do will be done to put these immortal works before the subscribers in a fuller and finer light than they have hitherto been presented, and thus do fitting honour to the memory of the greatest and most beloved master of the modern concert-room. One of the Saturdays the performance will consist of the opera of "Fidelio," in English, produced in the new Theatre. On Saturday, 17th December, the performance will consist of the second act of "Beethoven Festival." The Choral Symphony and other works of the great master will on that occasion be performed by a largely increased band and chorus, and the most eminent vocalists and solo instrumentalists obtainable will be secured in order to render this Festival a befitting homage to the genius of Beethoven.

The following eminent artists are already engaged for the concerts of this season:—Vocalists: Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, Edith Wynne, Josi Sherrington, Vanzini, Patey-Whytock; and Messrs. Sims Reeves, Foli, Patey, Nelson Varley, and Vernon Rigby. Solo Instrumentalists: Madame Arabella Goddard, Madame Schumann, Herr Joachim, and Mr. Charles Hallé. Other eminent artists, local and foreign, will be added, so that the solo department of this series of concerts will be superior in excellence, and more varied than its predecessors.

By order,
G. GROVE, Secretary.

HAMLET.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"

SUNG BY

MR. SANTLEY.

Price 4s.

"In a song entitled, 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the staging of Mdlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

ENGLISH ACTORS OF OUR TIME.

No. 4.—Mr. Charles Mathews.

The extreme and enduring popularity of Charles Mathews does not rest wholly upon his merits as an actor, great and conspicuous as these are. His temperament has a large measure of that buoyancy, the effect of which upon most people is irresistible. In private life the most popular men are those endowed with more than ordinary elasticity of temperament, men incapable of being permanently depressed by calamity, and sure to float with cork-like buoyancy over the waves of life. Such may not be the men whom we grapple "to our soul with hoops of steel," but they are the most pleasing and palatable acquaintances with whom we come into contact. Those on whom life's concerns press heaviest, and to whom its struggle is painful and sometimes scarcely endurable, reap a kind of cheerfulness from the contemplation of natures unlike their own, and cling to the vivacious and confident companion, as the invalid clings to the strong man, whose presence seems like an antidote against the evils with which life is perpetually menaced. The popularity enjoyed in real life by men of this stamp is inconsiderable, however, compared with that they obtain on the stage. Men who can present before us on the boards the spectacle of unending triumph over difficulty, of irrepressible cheerfulness and unconquerable elasticity, who can make us forget in their successes our own defeats, and can secure our sympathy while they move our laughter, obtain a personal hold over us such as can be gained in no other way. In England, especially, are characters of this kind acceptable. Men who successfully enact them seem to become our personal friends. We are strangely tolerant, moreover, in characters of this kind of moral shortcomings.

A viler and more reprobate knave than Sir Fretful Plagiary does not present than the Lovelace of Clarissa Harlowe; yet towards him, even, the worst of his class, we find lurking in our hearts some feeling not wholly separated from liking. Young Wilding, in The Liar, is profoundly mean and contemptible, yet we cannot hate him as we do many characters that would revolt us. While he come to the unprincipled rakes and libertines of Charles II.'s time, our moral code is reversed. Not for the life of us can we hold to our own views of propriety. Our sympathies are given to the worthy "cits," who are the prey of the spoiler, and withheld from the dare-devils whom we know in our hearts to merit our sternest condemnation. The characters of this class, Mr. Mathews is the only living exponent. On him has descended the mantle, worn by successive generations of comedians, from Mountfort and Verbrugge to Gentleman Lewis. During the years that have elapsed since first in 1835 he appeared in The Old and Young Stager, and learned from Liston how to handle the reins, he has played many score parts of different descriptions, and has become unequalled in representations of the shifts and resources to which a man may be driven by love or impecuniosity. In high class comedy, in general, he is unsurpassed among living actors, but in the portraiture of scamps and adventurers he stands without a rival. Bold, fearless sanguine, callecticed, incapable of betraying confusion, and sure to seize on every passing circumstance and turn it to advantage, he carries our sympathies with him wherever he goes and whatever he does, and returns them to us not seldom after they have been dragged in wretched misuse through the mire. Balzac might have had in view his acting when he imagined the character of Mercadet le Faiseur, which, since under its English name, Sir Affable Hawk has become one of Mr. Mathews's most successful representations.

Unlike many actors Mr. Mathews knows his own range well. The limits of this are pretty clearly defined. Whatever heroes of adventure or animal spirits the polite comedy presents belong to him of right. But with the comic his empire ends. When emotion of the slightest or most transient kind has to be presented the actor is at fault. When the shadow for a moment falls on the life he is like a pilot placed among strange seas and beneath unfamiliar skies. He may take for motto the legend of the dial-plate, "Horas non numero nisi serenas." In saying this we chronicle a fact and impute no blame. We are not of those who would direct the developments of genius, or quarrel with it for being other than it is. During late years Mr. Mathews has played about forty parts, in all of which he has been more than respectable, and in about a fourth of which he has obtained conspicuous success. A few of these are characters in which, during the days of his association with Madame Vestris, his reputation was first established. The majority of them were, however, first seen at a more recent date. Young Wilding in an altered version of The Liar; Tangent, in the elder Morton's comedy, The Way to Get Married; Lavater, in Mr. Planché's Not a Bad Judge; the chorus in The Golden Fleece burlesque at the same theatre; Sir Affable Hawk, in Mr. Game of Speculation; a successful adaptation of Balzac's Mercadet; Sir Charles Coldstream, in Used Up; Felix Featherly, in Stirling Coyne's Everybody's Friend; Tom Dexter, in The Overland Route; Captain Patter, in Patter v. Clatter; Plumper, in Cool as a Cucumber; and Puff and Sir Fretful Plagiary, in The Critic, are the parts in which of late Mr. Mathews has been seen to greatest advantage. His versatility is proved, however, by the fact that while presenting these various characters he has given a successful representation of a villain, Stewart Routh, in The Black Sheep of Mr. Edmund Yates, and has performed in French and has carried off the applause and approval of the most fastidious of French critics. Sir Charles Coldstream is probably the most generally diverting and the most artistic of his representations. Nothing can be conceived finer in its way than his representation in the first act of Used Up of aristocratic indifference and high-bred affectation The manner in which physical and intellectual strength and energy are indicated behind indolence and apparent incapacity for exertion is in the highest degree artistic. The strong arm hangs listlessly over the chair, the mouth scarcely opens except to yawn, and drops, without an effort, words of wit and wisdom. His friends are as ready to applaud his jokes as his wines, and he sits accordingly at a feast, both material and intellectual, of which he is the giver, while he is the only man to whom its delicacies are tasteless and insipid. No finer satire upon the manners of aristocratic society has been put upon the stage. Lord Dundreary, as depicted by Mr. Sothern, is equally clever but more caricatured. The manners of Sir Charles Coldstream are those of a certain section of English society. When the blacksmith, to whose wife he has made proposals of the culpability of which he is unaware appears, the manner in which he quickens into powerful and irascible manhood, is capital. The flush of indignation, aroused by such acquired habits as enable him to protract the commencement of a fight in order to ascertain under unprecedented conditions the state of his own pulse, is intensely droll. In the following act of the play the acting becomes farcical—a fault for which, however, the author, and not the actor is responsible. Mr. Mathews's performances in The Critic, wherein he ordinarily assumes the two characters of Puff and Sir Fretful Plagiary, are among the best of his impersonations.

Surprise is a vulgar and commonplace element in acting, and that form of surprise which results from a rapid change of character is among the lowest devices to which, ordinarily, an actor can resort. Still, some portion of the spectators' pleasure in seeing Mr. Mathews in The Critic is due to this device, of which he makes admirable use. Bewigged, cowled, cowhided, curtained, Sir Fretful makes his exit at one door, and at the same moment, as it seems, enters Puff, spruce, dapper, airy, volatile, irrepressible. Both these representations abound with touches of genius. Especially noticeable is the manner in which the good nature and bonhomie of Puff yield to the irritability he strives in vain to repress. His nervousness of manner, his asides, and his appeals to all around him who might minister to his self-complacency, or soothe his injured vanity, are in the highest vein of comedy. In Sir Affable Hawk the actor has fully realised one of the finest conceptions of one of the finest comedies of the most daring of writers. Neither Scribe, the model part, nor Got, his successor, had oplomb so ineffable. Geoffroy was but a "bourgeois" speculator. Mercadet, as depicted by him, knew in his heart that he was a trickster. But Mathews, aflame in his imagination, believes the lies he tells, and sees himself always on the point of possessing, if not possession, of the riches for which he has schemed and plotted. So much in earnest is he that the return of his partner and the unexpected realization of his own wildest imaginings ruffle but a brief while his serenity, and he is ready in a moment to start again just as sanguine, as hopeful, and as composed as before. Potter shows the singular volubility of utterance of Mr. Mathews,—volubility which, when the clearness of articulation with which it is accompanied is taken into account, is nothing less than marvellous. Plumper is simply a man to whom bashfulness or any form of reticence or reserve is wholly unknown. So supremely impressed is he with the sense of his own merits, and so occupied with the ideas that pass through his own mind, that no thought that his behaviour may perplex others can enter into his comprehension. The utter absence of consideration for others constitutes simply an irresistible inclination to talk. With the affairs of others has formed the basis of not a few clever representations—notably, Aggravating Sam, Percy Wilding in Mr. Sketchley's How Will They Get Out of It? and Felix Featherley in Stirling Coyne's Everybody's Friend. Among representations not to be lost sight of in the shows in the burlesque of Jason, In this the ludicrous solemnity and dignity of bearing of Mr. Mathews showed a full sense of the burlesque. Mr. Matthews's method or art is admirable. The only fault to be found is the manifestation of an occasional tendency to jauntiness and over sprightliness. His walk too often quickens to a run, and his exits from a room are at times over demonstrative. Taken, however, for all in all, he is the best representative we possess of that class of drama known as light comedy. K.

Cologne.—It is intended to celebrate shortly a "memorial service" for those who have fallen in the war. Herr Brahms' Deutsches Requiem will be performed under the direction of Professor Carbashaim. The new term at the Conservatory of Music begins on the 3rd October. The following are the gentlemen forming the professional staff:—Herren A. Breuer, Fr. Derekum, Fr. Gernsheim, Hompesch, Hülle, Japha von Königslöw, O. von Königslöw, O. Lindhuit, E. Mertke, F. Weber, and Dr. Derichsweiler. At the head of all stands Herr Ferdinand Hiller as Director. The above list of names will show that the institution still continues one of the best of its class in Germany.—The operatic season commenced very favourably as regards the singers with Verdi's Traviata. The band, however, is anything but satisfactory. It had to be made up anyhow, as all the musicians of any merit who could subsist without belonging to it, refused to accept engagements in consequence of notices having been published to the effect that the terms offered by the management were shamefully low.

THE STORY OF "MOZART'S REQUIEM."*

In the last ten years of the eighteenth century, there resided on his estates in Lower Austria, a certain Count Wallsegg, one of the wealthiest members of the Austrian aristocracy. Musical art was then held in high esteem; the Emperor Joseph was its zealous friend and patron; a long series of celebrated composers, of whom we will here mention only Haydn, Mozart, Salieri, and Dittersdorf, enjoyed the Imperial favour, and imparted unusual brilliancy to artistic life in Vienna. The Emperor's example was imitated by the nobility of the country; the noble landed proprietors especially were accustomed to keep up private musical establishments, to devote themselves to the study of music, and to strive after the reputation of being composers. Like others, Count Wallsegg did homage to this fashion of the time; kept a private musical establishment, and was fond of collecting around him celebrated musicians. His ambition was most particularly pleased at shining as a composer, and his hand had to execute every one of his compositions immediately it was written.

In the year 1791, the Count's wife died. Nothing was more natural than for the Count to wish to celebrate her memory in an artistic manner. He composed a Requiem to be performed at some funeral service in her honour. It was a rather considerable instrumental and vocal work, and the score, which still exists, and is written in the Count's own hand, bears the title: "Requiem, composto del Conte Wallsegg." The work was returned with great care. For a strengthened the orchestra, a number of excellent musicians were sent for from Vienna, and, at the beginning of the year 1792, a grand performance took place at the Count's country mansion. The success was brilliant. The competent judges, who had been invited from far and wide, were astonished at the sterling merit and the genial spirit of the work. The latter was repeated several times, and the reputation of the Count as a highly gifted composer was established.

At this time musical Vienna suffered an irreparable loss. On the 5th December, 1791, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, the greatest master of tone in any country, and in any age, breathed his last, at the very moment that his previously rather pinched pecuniary circumstances were beginning to improve, and when, too, people at home no longer refused to display that recognition which they had hitherto so sparingly paid his genius. Immediately after his death it was stated in the musical circles of Vienna, that the master, on feeling his end approaching, had composed a dying strain, a Requiem, of which the score was complete, and which would forthwith be publicly performed. The report turned out to be true, and the performance of the Requiem took place. The announcement ran thus: "Missa pro Defunctis, set to music by W. A. Mozart." The whole musical world of Vienna assembled to listen to the last legacy of the great composer. As a matter of course, it satisfied the expectations formed of it, and its fame instantly flew throughout all Germany. In Leipsic, too, and other towns, performances were given of it, and everywhere with the same successful result. Copies of the score were sold for high prices, and, to become the possessor of one a celebrated amateur of the day himself wrote out the work, note for note, placing in gigantic letters over the title the motto: "Opus summum viri summi" ("The greatest work of the greatest of men").

Up to this point we have been enabled to follow simply the course of events. We must now, however, acquaint the reader with the remarkable fact that the Requiem by Count Wallsegg, and the "Missa pro Defunctis" by W. A. Mozart, agreed exactly with each other; that they were both one and the same composition. But what is still more remarkable is that the real author of the work was neither Count Wallsegg, who could not have composed even three bars of such music, nor Mozart, at whose decease only a very little of it was finished. This remarkable forgery was the labour of two different individuals, one of whom attained after a certain notoriety, while the other was more nearly connected with the deceased master, and whom, therefore, when the noted falsehood began to be known, there was a wish to spare as much as possible: we allude to Mozart's widow.

Count Wallsegg was anything but a composer. His right to the authorship of the Requiem corresponded with that of a modern fashionable lady to her rich profusion of beautiful hair—he purchased it. As his vanity impelled him to appear in the character of an eminent composer, though he was not capable of writing the veriest trifle, he decked himself out in borrowed plumes, and bought from composers of repute at the time whatever he wanted. He gave a very good price, but made a stipulation that the author should renounce all pretensions to his work, and never claim it as his. In order to avoid the chance of discovery, the Count was accustomed not to print the compositions he acquired in the way described. He contented himself with having them performed by his private band at the concerts given by the latter. In order to escape even suspicion, he kept personally aloof from all the negotiations about these purchases; he had them carried out by exclusively confidential agents, so that the composers, as a rule, actually did not know what had become of their works, or into whose hands they had fallen. Of course, the worthy Count was not in a condition to deceive his own musicians as to the true state of his musical capabilities, but, as he paid them well, and, in other respects, treated them with consideration, it was clearly their interest to hold their tongue, and not spoil their employer's game.

After his wife's death, and when he had resolved on dedicating a requiem to her memory, the Count selected Mozart as the person best fitted to supply such a work. It is highly probable that Mozart had already executed commissions of a similar description for him; at any rate, the Count knew that the celebrated composer was in straightened circumstances, and consequently very ready to agree to such a bargain as the Count wished. One of his agents was, therefore, forthwith despatched to Vienna, to make arrangements with Mozart. This was the stranger, the subject of so much discussion, and who once played so mysterious a part in the concluding pages of the composer's biographies. Mozart expressed his readiness to execute the commission; he asked a certain sum, which the Count willingly paid in advance, and promised to double, as soon as the score was handed to him complete. Overwhelmed with a mass of other commissions, Mozart at first found but little leisure for this one; it was not till the others had been executed, and he had been reminded by the Count's agent of his promise, that he set to work with activity. About this time, the state of his health began to grow worse, and he had a presentiment of his approaching end. The fact that it happened to be a Requiem that was the occasion of him contributing very strongly to keep him in his melancholy forebodings. He continued, however, working very assiduously, until his medical man, who apprehended bad results from such application, forbade him most strictly to do so any more. A transient amelioration of his health supervened, and, during this, Mozart resumed his labours upon the Requiem; then he was suddenly called away to the land of eternal harmonies.

Mozart left his small family in very straightened circumstances. The non-completion of the Requiem caused his widow great anxiety. She feared, above all things, that the stranger who had given the order would, as soon as he heard the work was not finished, ask for the restoration of the money he had advanced. As, however, her husband's illness had nearly exhausted the whole amount, she was not in a position to refund it. In order to escape such a demand, she determined on having the work finished by some one else. She had plenty of acquaintances among the composers at Vienna, and, as for the expense, that would be fully covered by the extra money to be paid, according to promise, on the delivery of the score. After reflecting over the matter for some time, she came to the conclusion that the person best adapted for her purpose, was a young pupil of her husband's, Franz Xavier Süssmayer, who had been in daily communication with Mozart during the last few years of the latter's life; had assisted him in his labours; and, consequently, had scores for him. This young man, who was highly gifted musically, appears to have led a somewhat loose kind of life, without much stability of character. There are some compositions of his by no means without value, but, probably on account of his excesses, he died too soon to make himself a name.

According to the plan projected by Mozart, the Requiem was to consist of thirteen separate parts. One alone was quite completed at his death; others were commenced, or sketched out; but of the last four or five, there was not a single note. Süssmayer, who readily consented to undertake the task, completed what was unfinished, and supplied with his own compositions what was wanting. But he did even more than this. Mad. Constanze Mozart's widow, deemed it necessary that a full score should be written out in her husband's hand. This was really a more difficult task than the filling up of the music, for Mozart wrote a very peculiar hand, difficult of imitation. But Süssmayer was equal to this effort also. He had previously attained great dexterity in imitating his master's hand, and, by continued practice, soon brought it to such a pitch, that even the best judges were deceived. When everything was ready, he bound that part of the Requiem composed and written by Mozart himself with the parts he, Süssmayer, had added, and no one was able to discover even the slightest difference in the hand-writing.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At the annual meeting of the Governors of the General Hospital the secretary read a letter from Mr. Richard Peyton (Chairman of the Orchestral Committee), enclosing cheque for £500, part proceeds of the late Festival. As soon as accounts were closed and audited, Mr. Peyton hoped that a further sum would be placed at disposal of the Hospital board.

Mr. Jaffray had been requested to move a resolution with reference to the communication just made to the meeting, and was not sorry that Mr. Peyton was absent, inasmuch as his presence might hamper him in what he had to say about the services the gentleman had rendered. The resolution proposed by Mr. Jaffray is subjoined:—

"That the letter of Mr. Peyton be received and entered upon the minutes, and that in acknowledging the sum of £5,000, part proceeds of the late Festival, this Board desires to tender a warm vote of thanks to Mr. Peyton, chairman of the Orchestral Committee; Mr. W. J. Bent, chairman of the General Committee; and the other members of the Festival Committee, for time and personal labour, whereby the devotion of so large an addition to the Hospital funds has been secured."

As chairman of one of the sub-committees Mr. Jaffray could bear testimony to the work which the two gentlemen had performed. They gave up their business for some time before the Festival, and in the smallest things as well as in the greatest, in private as in public, they were assiduous, able, courteous, and unassuming. The thanks of the whole body of governors and of the town generally were their due. The most successful meeting up to 1864 was the one held in that year, and since then the Festival had gone on increasing in attractiveness. In 1867 the amount paid over to the Hospital was £5,641, and £5,000 had already been received on account of the late Festival. He believed that a further sum of nearly one thousand pounds would be received. That would be an answer to the objection entertained by some—namely, that a very large sum was expended in getting up the Festivals, while a comparatively small proportion of the proceeds was given to the Hospital. It could not be said that that was the case now.

Mr. Bickman seconded the resolution, and said there was no doubt that the proceeds would at least equal those of 1867, while he hoped Mr. Jaffray's estimate would be justified, of which there was at present some doubt. It was, therefore, desirable that a wrong impression should not get abroad. The account would be kept open for the purpose of affording gentlemen who had not subscribed the opportunity of doing so.

On the motion of the chairman, seconded by Mr. G. Heaton, the Orchestral Committee were re-appointed. D. H.

THE MUSICAL CRITIC'S DUTY.

L. H. Southard, Director of Music at the Peabody Institute Baltimore, read a paper on Musical Criticism at the recent Musical Congress. In the course of his remarks he said :—

"A musical literature, a musical criticism, is an indispensible necessity toward a national school of art and cultivated popular taste. Without it it is mere anarchy. With it comes regularity and the elevation of musical art to its proper share in the daily thoughts and life of the people. True, we must not lose sight of the fact that, to a certain extent, the public is to blame for whatever may be faulty in the musical press of the day. If there is little or no demand for high-toned and instructive articles, there will certainly be but a small supply. It is beyond question that we have in our three or four leading musical journals, and attached to a few of our most influential newspapers, gentlemen fully capable of writing with keen insight and just discrimination, and who sometimes give us articles which justly deserve to become part of our standard literature. But it cannot be denied that they reach a comparatively small class of readers, and that any marked improvement in popular taste must be heralded or at least accompanied by a corresponding change in the method of treatment of musical matters by the average daily press. But we urge then upon those who undertake to enlighten the public, the duty of making themselves at least a little acquainted with the estimation of elaborate works; of freeing themselves completely from all merely personal professions or prejudices, of merging the artist completely in the art itself, and of separating the private interests of the individual from the public interest so far as they may be incompatible. Nor is the essayist's influence in educating the public taste and appreciation of less importance than the critic's. A great composer must have a proper musical atmosphere, or his works die of suffocation, and it is the peculiar province of those who lead public opinion through the press to furnish such an atmosphere; which is obviously not to be done by merely accommodating one's self to the average taste of the general public. It is the critic's duty to pry the public out of those ruts to which it continually gravitates if left to itself, to make it feel the ugliness of tinsel and commonplace, and appreciate the sublime and beautiful. In doing this he becomes at once a public benefactor."

PROVINCIAL.

MARGATE.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"This healthy little watering place is crammed, and music has been exerting its attractions. Last week the Assembly Rooms were brilliantly attended on the occasion of Signor Mario's 'farewell' concert. Mdlle. Liebhart, Mdlle. Enriquez, Signor Sivori, and the Chevalier de Kontski assisted. Signor Mario, in excellent voice, was received with immense enthusiasm. He sang 'Parigi o cara,' with Mdlle. Liebhart, and the duet was encored and repeated. In response to the encore for a new song by Mr. Walter Maynard, Signor Mario gave 'Good-bye, sweetheart.' He also sang, with Mdlle. Enriquez, a duet from La Favorita. Mdlle. Liebhart introduced some of her most popular songs including 'Little bird' (G. B. Allen) and 'Deh vieni' (Mozart). Mdlle. Enriquez being encored in an air from Faust, substituted Mr. Benedict's 'Rock me to sleep.' The Chevalier de Kontski played several pieces in his usual style. Signor Sivori created a marked sensation in Paganini's 'La Clochette' and his own Mouvement perpetuel, at the end of which he was recalled. Mr. Walter Maynard was accompanist at the pianoforte. In the morning of the same day the Chevalier de Kontski gave a pianoforte recital, at which he performed several of his most effective compositions. He was assisted by the same artists, Signor Mario excepted. Mr. Hingston's benefit concert, at the Hall-by-the-Sea, has also taken place.

ALTRINCHAM (CHESHIRE).—Mr. R. Andrews recently got up a concert at the Lecture Hall of the Literary Institute in aid of the fund for the sick and wounded on both sides, in the Franco-German war A local journal says:—

"Mr. Andrews was ably seconded. Mrs. R. Cowley Squier, soprano, sang, without reward, but that which is in the consciousness of doing good. Miss Jones and Miss Winstanley, whom no ordinary motive could have induced to leave their homes for a public appearance, came forward and in the good work. Mr. G. Walton, bass; and Mr. Crogan, tenor, were just as willing. Messrs. Henry & Co. of Manchester, furnished a grand piano without charge. The directors of the Literary Institution gave their room for the same object. There was a numerous audience. It was hoped that the number would have been greater, but much had been already collected in this neighbourhood for the same purpose."

PENRITH.—A correspondent writes to us as follows:—

"Mr. and Mrs. Nunn's Annual Matinée Musicale took place on Wednesday, September 14th, in St. John's Hall, when a select programme of vocal and instrumental music was well performed. The concert commenced with a pianoforte quartet in G minor, Op. 6, by Henry Leslie, the executants being Miss Harry (piano), Mr. Vingoe (violin), Mr. Nunn (viola), and Mr. Barrack (violoncello). This was followed by H. Smart's duet, 'The Wood and the Wave,' admirably sung by the Misses Mitchell. The faultless execution by Miss Symons of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 14, in G was listened to with the greatest attention, and enthusiastically applauded. A beautiful composition by Berthold Tours, Melodie Religieuse, for violin, pianoforte, violoncello, and organ, was charmingly performed by Mr. Nunn, Miss Hose, Messrs. Marrack and Vingoe; the effect of the fine organ with the other instruments quite captivated the audience, and it had to be repeated. The rendering of 'Parto, parto' from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito, with clarionet obbligato, was a novelty and evinced careful training in both vocalist (Miss Woodcock) and clarionettist (Mr. H. A. Smith). The audience were more demonstrative in their applause of the trio by Dussek, 'O'er the star-lit waters gliding,' sung by the Misses Mitchell and Miss Davey (of Camborne). It was delivered with much taste and heartily encored. Songs were also given by Captain Douglas and Miss Davey; pianoforte duets, &c., by young ladies of the town and neighbourhood. The concert, which concluded with Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" march, performed on the organ by Mr. Vingoe, reflected the greatest credit on Mr. and Mrs. Nunn. The Hall was crowded in every part.

HALLE.—Herr Damm, a private gentleman of artistic tendencies, is now erecting, at his own expense, a large and splendid theatre. It stands in the midst of pretty gardens, and is so constructed that it can be employed as what the Germans call a Summer Theatre. Herr Damm will be his own manager. An excellent orchestra has been engaged, and will be under the direction of Herr H. Starke, of the Grand Opera, Paris. The only drawback is that Herr Starke is an enthusiastic Wagnerite, and may, perhaps, give the public more than they like of the Music of the Future. During the winter months, a series of concerts will alternate with the regular operas. It seems more than possible that Herr Damm and his new edifice will shut up the Stadttheater. Were the manager of the latter establishment an Englishman, he would probably say—"Damm it," and, under the circumstances, would be justified in employing such bad language.

MUSIC A MEANS OF CULTURE.

By J. S. Dwight.

Our musical history has been peculiar. We were in no sense a musical people forty years ago. Nothing could be farther from the New England character and "bringing up"—we will not call it culture. But strangely enough, it was not much in accordance with the common theory that the way to elevate the taste is to begin with what is light and popular), the first real and deep interest in music awakened here in Boston was an interest in the greatest kind of music. Handel, and then more irresistibly Beethoven, were the first to take deep hold on thoughtful, earnest, influential souls. That was when the new spirit of culture, in the fullest freest, highest sense, became in various ways so rife in this community. So that it is scarcely paradoxical to say, that music in this country, or at least this portion of the country, "came in with the conqueror." That is to say, the love for the highest kind of music (for it is only the love of it, not the creative gift as yet), which has for some time been imputed to this once Puritanical Boston and the regions spiritually watered from it, came in with the conquering ideas,—with the ideas of spiritual freedom, of self-reliance, of the dignity of human nature, of the insignificance of creeds compared with life and practice, of social justice, equal opportunities to all, a common birthright in the bountiful,—ideas which from the time of Channing began to quicken the whole thought and conscience of the young Republic, and which were glowing with fresh fervour of conviction in the light of that ideal philosophy which, where it made one mystic, made a dozen practical and sound reformers,—ideas fitly summed up in the one idea of culture, in the nobler sense in which it then began to haunt the mind, as something distinct from, and superior to, the barren routine of a narrow, utilitarian, provincial, and timid education; culture in the sense of free unfolding of the manifold powers of character, of conscious, quick, sincere relationship and sympathy with all the beauty and the order of the universe, instead of, in the old sense of a mere makeshift clothing upon, from without, with approved special knowledges, conventional beliefs and manners, and the time-honoured prejudices. Intimately implied in this idea, of culture is the æsthetic principle. For what is culture without art?—art, the type and mirror of ideal, complete life, the one free mode of man's activity, wherein he may become partaker in the Divine creative energy? And what form of art, what ministry to the æsthetic instinct, was so peculiarly the need and product of our age, so widely, easily available, as music? It was not strange that it should come in with the conquering ideas, as we have said.

At all events, it is a fact of some significance, that the interest was felt in Beethoven at the same moment with the interest in Emerson and notably in the same minds who found such quickening in his free and bracing utterance. It was to a great extent the young souls drawn to "Transcendentalism" (as it was nicknamed), to escape spiritual starvation, who were most drawn also to the great, deep music which we began to hear at that time. For, let it be remembered, the first great awakening of the musical instinct here was when the C minor Symphony of Beethoven was played, thirty years ago or more, in that old theatre, long since vanished from the heart of the dry goods part of Boston, which had been converted into an "Athenæum," where an "Academy of Music" gave us some first glimpses of the glories of great orchestral music. Some may yet remember how many young men and women of the most cultured circles, when the new intellectual dayspring had made thoughtful and at the same time open and impressible to all appeals of art and beauty, used to sit there through the concert in that far-off upper gallery or sky-parlour, secluded in the shade, and give themselves up completely to the influence of the sublime harmonies that sank into their souls, enlarging and colouring thenceforth the whole horizon of their life. Then came the Brook Farm experiment; and it is equally a curious fact, that music, and of the best kind, the Beethoven Sonatas, the Masses of Mozart and Haydn, got at, indeed, in a very humble home made and imperfect way, was one of the chief interests and refreshments of those halcyon days. Nay, it was among the singing portion of these plain farmers, teachers, and (but for such cheer) domestic drudges, that the first example sprang up of the so called "Mass Clubs," once so much in vogue among small knots of amateurs. They met to practise music which to them seemed heavenly, after the old hackneyed glees and psalm-tunes, though little many of them thought or cared about the creed embodied in the Latin words that formed the convenient vehicle for tones so thrilling; the music was quite innocent of creed, except that of the heart and of the common deepest wants and aspirations of all souls, darkly locked up in formulas, till set free by the subtile solvent of the divine harmonies. A certain gifted friend who sits in Harper's "Easy Chair," has lately told the world what parties from "the Farm" (and he was "one of them") would come to town to drink in the symphonies, and then walk back the whole way, seven miles, at night, elated and unconscious of fatigue, carrying home with them a new good genius beautiful and strong, to help them through the next day's labours. Then, too, and among the same class of minds (the same "Transcendental set") began the writing and the lecturing on music and its great masters, treating it from a high spiritual point of view, and seeking (too imaginatively, no doubt) the key and meaning to the symphony, but anyhow establishing a vital, true affinity between the great tone-poems and all great ideals of the human mind. In the Harbinger, for years printed at Brook Farm, in the Dial, which told the time of day so far ahead, in the writings of Margaret Fuller and others, these became favourite and glowing topics of discourse; and such discussion did at least contribute much to make music much more respected, to lift it in the esteem of thoughtful persons to a level with the "humanities" of culture, and especially to turn attention to the nobler compositions, and away from that which is but idle, sensual, and vulgar.

The kind reader will grant plenary indulgence to these gossiping memories, and must not for a moment think it is intended by them to claim for any one class the exclusive credit of the impulse given to dawn days to music. Cecilia had her ardent friends and votaries among conservatives as well. But is it not significant as well as curious, that these free-thinking and idealistic "come-outers" (so-called, for I referred to (call them "Transcendental dreamers" if you will, they can afford to bear the title now!) were so largely engaged in the movement,—that among the "select few," constant to all opportunities of hearing the great music in its days of small things here, so many of this class were found? The ideas of those enthusiasts, if we look around us now, have leavened the whole thought and culture of this people; have melted icy creeds, and opened genial communion between sects; have set the whole breast of the nation heaving, till it has cast off at least one of its great established crimes and curses; have set all men thinking of the universal brotherhood of mankind. These are the conquering ideas, and with them came in the respect for music, which now in its way too, is leavening, refining, humanizing our too crude and swaggering young democratic civilization. A short pedigree! but great ideas, by their transforming power, work centuries of change in a few years.

The great music came in then because it was in full affinity with the best thoughts stirring in fresh, earnest souls. The same unsatisfied, deep want that shrank from the old Puritanic creed and practice; that sought a positive soul's joy instead of abnegation; that yearned for the "beauty of holiness," and for communion with the Divine in some nobler way of worship than the old profession; that kindled with ideals of a heaven on earth and of a reign of love in harmony with Nature's beauties and the prophesies of Art,—found just then and here unwonted comfort, courage, and expression in the strains of the divine composers, of which we were then getting the first visitations. It was as if our social globe, charged with the electricity of new divine ideas and longings, germs of a new era, were beginning to be haunted by ærreal gleams and flashes of strange melody and harmony. Young souls, resolved to keep their youth and to be true to themselves, felt a mysterious attraction to all this, though without culture musically. Persons not technically musical at all would feel the music as they felt the rhythm of the ocean rolling in upon the beach. They understood as little of the laws of one as of the other fascinating and prophetic mystery. Beethoven, above all, struck the key-note of the age; in his deep music, so profoundly human and heard, as in a sea shell, the murmur of a grander future. Beethoven, Handel, Mozart, found no more eager audience than among these "disciples of the newness"(as some sneeringly called them), these believing ones, who would, not have belief imposed upon them, who waited more for life than doctrine and creed. Music was a prime necessity of heart and soul to make life genial. This was to them "music of the future," in a more deep and real sense than any Wagner of these later times has been inspired to write.

All this is to be sure, does not prove us to be a "musical people." It does prove that the great music, into which great, earnest men like Beethoven breathed the secret of their lives, has a magnetic, quick affinity, with the great thought and impulses beginning at that time to renew religion, politics, society, and the whole spirit and complexion of life in this country. While the adroit fetish authorities and creeds came this instinctive feeling for Art, as for a tangible assurance of the essential "substance of things hoped for." The æsthetic instinct works in us (to music's touch more quickly than to any other) to save this radicalism from sheer discomfortable, boisterous, quarrelsome negation, from the rude, antagonistic, and destructive attitude, from that hard, dry killing prose of life, unquickening, discouraging, conceited, overbearing, which is of the very essence of atheism, and overturns the altars of the old religions only to worship self and the almighty dollar. True radicalism is positive, affirmative, not negative; a seeker of agreement, unity, and not of difference; a puller down of only what obstructs the rising of a more divine and universal temple. Resenting imposition and authority, it has respect for all sincere beliefs, and loves to find the truth there is or ever was in each. Now much of that transcendental radicalism was of this true and natural kind, naturally found a reconciling, saving grace in Art; in music, most of all, as the most fluid, subtile, sympathetic of the arts; the Christian, modern, youngest art, which weaving air in motion into forms immortal, best illustrates life's perpetual becoming, and does not entail a milestone of arrested progress, the act which, while it is infinitely expressive and suggestive, does not limit to precise interpretations, to mere word meanings; or too inquisitive thought meanings does not tie us down to definitions.

We were but babes in music, doubtless, and capable of little scientific understanding of the works we heard with rapture. Shall it be said, then, that this love was mostly affectation, or illusion? What was the so great need of understanding? Are great poems written, are great pictures painted, were the old cathedrals planned and reared, only for those who have themselves the knowledge and the power to do the like? The picture in the window which all passers stop to see was not made solely or mainly for professional enjoyment, but for men laymen also, ignorant of the art that made it, yet open, it may be, to the full influence and beauty of the thing made. Is nature spread out only for astronomers and physicists and chemists, or to rejoice and raise, refine and harmonize, the unscientific heart and soul of you and me? The least instructed of us may like the greatest kind of music, for the same reason that he likes the greatest kind of man; for the same reason that we enjoy real poetry more than that weak and commonplace, or find ourselves happier with Shakspere than with Tupper. May not a community which prefers an Emerson for its lectures be credited with all sincerity in choosing to sit under the influence of Beethoven rather than of Verdi, finding itself more warmed thereby? And if you are personally attracted to a fine, deep, genial nature, rather than to a shallower creature of convention, why should you not be to the same kind of more finely developed, deeper natures put their very lives? It is not our own fault, surely, if we find that we love Mozart, as we love Raphael or Shakspere, and turn to such when we most need strengthening refreshment, while we should be simply bored by miscellaneous concerts, potpourris on the hackneyed sentimentalities, or flash fancies of third and fourth rate composers. And if a man insist that this is all sheer self-illusion, and that we really do not like the thing we think we do, of what use can it be to argue with him? Friend, be you true to your love, as we too would be true to ours! We will not quarrel.

MUSIC AT BRIGHTON.

We abridge as follows from the Brighton Guardian:—

"A fashionable and numerous audience assembled in the Dome on Tuesday night to hear the Grand Amateur Concert, on behalf of the funds of the International Society for the Relief of the Sick and Wounded in the War. The performances were in every way successful, the gratification of the audience was evident, the encores were numerous and the applause hearty and continuous. The amateurs who sang were Miss Harriet Young, Miss Hurlock, Mrs. Walrond Clark, Mr Sutherland, and Mr. Whitworth Jones."

"The only appearance in Brighton this season of Mdme. Adelina Patti will take place at an evening concert in the Dome on Thursday, October 6th. The notice given has been short; but the presence of the enchanting Marquise in England is due only to the war, and the concert has been hastily organized. Mdme. Patti has supporters worthy of her talent—including Mdlle. Dravill, Signor Urio, Signor Delle Sedie, Signor Zoboli, and Signor Felli."

"On Thursday evening Signor Mario sang at Brighton, on his farewell tour, the occasion being the benefit concert of Mr. Walter Newport, conductor of the Brighton and Sussex Choral Association. The claims of Mr. Newport to public support, the attraction of a new singer, and from the great Italian singer and the return to a Brighton platform, after a very long absence, of Signor Sivori, brought together a full audience. Refugee Royalty was there in the person of the ex-Queen of Spain, who sat in one of the inner rows of the stalls clad in a neutral-coloured dress and wearing a hat of the 'brigand' shape that was fashionable a short time back, the Bourbon lady being accompanied by her son, the Prince of the Asturias, and by some ladies of her suite. Mario was rather disappointing in that he was suffering from an evident hoarseness. The malady, though slight, was enough to prevent him from doing himself justice. Still he was Mario. It was a treat to listen to the style in which he sang the well-known Favorita air, 'Spirto gentil.' Great artists are always great, even in their decadence, and Mario is great now. It would be difficult to match the vocal tenderness he threw into the duet from the Traviata ('Parigi e cara') and from the Trovatore ('Si la stanchezza') —the one sung with Mdlle. Liebhart and the other with Mdlle. Enriquez. Signor Mario's second solo was a new ballad by Mr. Walter Maynard, 'Deep in my heart there dwells.' The melody is not very striking, though graceful and flowing, and Signor Mario sang it with a restraint that probably arose from want of acquaintance with the music and the words. It is well known, however, that Mario's singing of English ballads is almost a triumph for a born and bred Italian. Those who heard him on Thursday night will for long have a vivid remembrance of his great natural gifts and his exquisitely finished accomplishments. Signor Sivori made a capital impression on his re-appearance. His playing has still great individuality—a saying which must not be at all taken as implying mannerism. No wonder, therefore, that the audience should have become enthusiastic in applauding Signor Sivori's brilliant efforts, and should unanimously recall him to the platform. Signor Sivori was accompanied on the pianoforte in each of his selections by the Chevalier de Kontski, who also played three solos. Mdlle. Liebhart was in excellent voice, and had, consequently, the highest possible measure of success. Mdlle. Enriquez is a graceful singer, with a rich and sympathetic voice. She had the hearty recognition that is due to her talents. The choral performances were hardly equal to the standard hitherto taken by the association."

"The Military Promenade Concerts at the Pavilion have been resumed with great success, in both the social and musical sense. The band of the Inniskillens is a capital one, and is ably handled by the present bandmaster, Mr. H. Murray. An unusually large and fashionable audience assembled, and great pleasure was evidently derived from the performance."

LEEDS.—The Gewandhaus Concerts recommence on Thursday, the 6th October.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

Never did "old Drury" re-open under better auspices than on Saturday night. This house had been completely re-decorated, under the superintendence of Mr. C. J. Phipps and the white panels of the boxes, profusely ornamented with gold, presented a light gay appearance, the important work of the evening was a new version of Sir Walter Scott's Kenilworth, written by Mr. Andrew Halliday, and entitled Amy Robsart, constructed with a view to spectacular effect, and surrounded as it were with an historical halo, this is exactly the sort of piece that according to modern notions, is suitable to a large theatre. The day when it was universally believed that a genteel comedy could be properly performed on the spacious area of the old patent stage has long passed away, and yet there is a feeling that Drury Lane is to some extent deserved when employed for the production of mere melodrama. A clear discernment of these two facts has always accompanied the management of Mr. F. B. Chatterton, but was never more clearly displayed than on Saturday night. He gave the public a grand historical pageant illustrating the times of "Good Queen Bess," and the public accepted it with acclamations.

The plot of the play we need not describe, based as it is on one of Sir Walter Scott's most favourite novels, with the termination so altered that Varney falls into the trap which he has contrived for the destruction of Amy Robsart—a modification to be found in a dramatic version of Kenilworth, familiar to playgoers of a former generation. Theatrical justice demands with inexorable rigour that on the stage, at least, villany shall be punished and innocence escape unharmed, and we doubt whether any amount of pageantry would induce a mixed audience to tolerate the murder of such a lovely and harmless being as the wife of the Earl of Leicester. The piece is divided into four acts,—the first of which, the least striking of all, takes place in and near Cumnor Hall, and exhibits the relative positions of Leicester, Amy Robsart, and Varney. The second brings us to the court of Queen Elizabeth, shown at its height of grandeur in the Palace of Greenwich, and terminates with the august lady's departure in her State barge, which floats magnificently on the misty Thames. The gorgeous revels at Kenilworth Castle, with the little unpleasantries by which they were diver-lified, occupy the third act; and perhaps nothing was ever put on the stage that could exceed in splendour the allegorical dances and tableaux contrived by Mr. J. Cormack to illustrate the description of Sir Walter Scott. A burst of applause from every part of the house followed the termination of this remarkable spectacle. Quite of an opposite character is the last act "sensational" in the strictest sense of the word and ending with the fall of Varney through the trap and the salvation of Amy. The suddenness with which this act concludes shows great tact on the part of the author. Directly Varney is in the moat and Amy upon her knees the curtain falls leaving the audience in admiration at the triumph of innocence. The title stops short with effective abruptness. Altogether Mr Halliday has done his task well. Not a scene comes to a weak termination, and every act ends with effect.

The appearance of Mr. W. Beverley, the discipline established by Mr. Edward Stirling, stage manager, the costumes founded on historical authority, and the music of Mr. Lovey, contribute to the success of the piece. The character of Amy Robsart, with its mixture of pride and gentleness is well exhibited, and perhaps Miss Neilson never displayed greater force of discrimination than in her presentation of this ill-starred lady. If Miss Fanny Addison does not make Elizabeth "every inch" a queen, she gives a capital picture of feminine shrewdness and vanity lifelike throughout. Michael Lamb orne, always intoxicated or on the high road to intoxication, is played with much fulness of colour by Mr. Brittain Wright; Tres ilian, the virtuous man of the story, does not very well suit Mr. Morton Tavers; Mr. T. King's Varney is a villain of the accepted type, and Mr. J. B. Howard a somewhat overweighted Earl of Leicester. The short part of Sir Walter Raleigh is played with ease by Mr Charles, and Phibbetigibbet becomes a creature of supernal acrobatic power through the agency of Mr. Fred. Vokes. All minor defects vanish in the magnificence of the whole which may be curtailed in the first and fourth acts, but of which the success cannot be doubted.

SCHWERIN.—In the Cathedral, where Mr. George Hepworth officiates as organist, a splendid new organ is in course of erection. It is from the workshops of the celebrated organ builder, Friedrich Ladegast in Weissenfels. It has 84 registers with 4 manuals and pedal. One particular feature is, the fact of there being a Crescendo and Decrescendo for all the registers.

BRUSSELS.—Herr von Flotow's new opera, L'Ombre, has been successfully produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. M Duprez's opera, Jeanne d'Arc, is to be brought out shortly. The composer has already arrived for the purpose of superintending the rehearsals.

LYRE.—Allan Cunningham (father of the late Peter Cunningham), who wrote the ballad, "A wet sheet and a flowing sail." Charles Dibdin, who wrote "Tom Bowling," was educated for the Church, and hardly knew the stem of a ship from the "starn."

MARTIN HOLD.—George Gascoigne was one of those authors whom Gabriel Harvey (1578) found in the library of a maid of honour. The others were "Chancer and Surrey, with some medical authors." Gascoigne, besides other things, was chief amatory poet of his day, and yet, twenty years after death, was regarded as "author of an antique and obsolete school of poetry." He got more censure (in the modern meaning of that word) for his erotic effusions than he cared to bear when he grew older. Even the maids of honour, when married and sober, were as ashamed of him as old ladies at the end of the last century of having read Aphra Behn in their youth. Gascoigne met their humour, and published his love verses in a purified form, with a 'dedicatory' to certain reverend divines. It is as if Moore had released "Little," with a devout sense given to them, or altered Fanny of Timmol for the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge.

SAMUEL TOPER TABLE.—In Mr. Lane's edition of Charles Kemble's Plays of Shakspere there is a word in Hamlet which admits of dispute. To the king's question, "What do you call the play?" Hamlet replies, "The Mouse Trap!" "Marry, how? Tropically." In Mr. Dyce's edition, it is "Tropically." The text is not referred to by Mr. Collier's MS. Corrector. "Tropically" is defended as meaning that "Mouse Trap" is a trope—a figure of speech for something whereby the king or his conscience was to be caught. But where has Hamlet elsewhere converted, in such barbarous fashion, a noun into an adverb? Charles Kemble, we suppose, used "trapically," unless it be a misprint; and Mr. Bellew used the same word in his recent reading, uttering it as if "trapically" had good punning reference to "Mouse Trap." May not the original word have been "trapically"?—with the implication that though the title be comic, there is solemn earnest in the drama. It was as easy for the player as the printer to hurriedly make a mistake in the word. Charles Kemble himself once set a country theatre in a roar, when, in Shylock, instead of exclaiming "Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?" he screamed forth in that piping voice which unfitted him for much of the business he undertook on the stage,—"Shall I lay surgery upon my poll?"

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1870.

A SECOND HOLIDAY LEADER.

MY Editor permitted the Dolgelly article of last week to go in, suppressing nothing but his own retort. He is nodding at his post, beyond a doubt—even Homer nodded—and I am free. Query—Ought I to congratulate myself? "There is no more dangerous gift than freedom," say wise men. What if, after all, I am allowed the proverbial "rope enough" for the making easy a disagreeable operation which is also proverbial? I repudiate the idea, but shall be cautious.

In one special liberty I rejoice with exceeding joy. To me, a holiday-maker, the great world of music is nothing. I am supposed to know nought about it; and, though ignorance is often a qualification for the instruction of others, am expected to hold my tongue concerning all musical beings, doings, and sufferings. Gladly I accept the position. Let clique exterminate clique, and inaugurate the reign of "Chaos and old Night," I may pick blackberries from the Welsh hedgerows, and indite pastorals to my Editor. By the way, these mountain blackberries are not good, a fact at which I many times grieved, and only once rejoiced. Let me show the cause and circumstances of that rejoicing. Does any reader know Tan-y-groes Inn, on the road from Dolgelly to Festiniog? If so, he will understand how, after long tramping on dusty roads (and a proportionate refreshment), I could sit dreamily gazing through the homely latticed window at the beautiful picture below. The sounds of the place were in harmony with its sights. An old lady talked Welsh in the kitchen; a river tumbled down the ravine; Evan Rees's bees were buzzing among the gorse flowers; and a robin sang cheerily in the ash tree opposite. This was perfection; but alas! when perfection is caught, it disappears like a soap-bubble. There was a noise of feet in the road, and voices uttered words not Welsh; Heaven help me! There was more,—the unmistakable harmony of an unmistakable German band. I rushed from the place. An hour after those wretched Teutons—may the Fatherland claim them—were seen eating blackberries ravenously; and I rejoiced. The fruit was astonishingly sour, and German bandsmen, I suppose, have stomachs like ourselves.

From foreign to native out-door music is a transition so natural that even a lazy holiday writer can make it with ease. The ear-worn Londoner notices, gratefully, that very little of either assails him; while such as may be called native is seldom Welsh. Popular fancy in England depicts the "descendants of the Ancient Britons" as incessantly singing or harping, or whistling their ancient melodies. Popular fancy is wrong. Dolgelly, at all events, scouts the native lays; though Harlech is not far off, and Aberdovey is within easy reach, neither the "Men" of the one, nor the "Bells" of the other, will Dolgelly countenance; while it tolerates a dreadful old fellow who drones psalm-tunes to the accompaniment of a concertina; encourages Sunday school ditties of a "ranting" tendency; and is, by way of variety, much given to whistling "Wait for the turn of the tide, my boys." These be serious things for the supporters of Eisteddfodau to contemplate. Is the national sentiment decaying? Do the Welsh people care no longer for minstrelsy they have doomed to extinction along with the triple harp? I cannot answer these questions, but I know that the intensely Welsh county of Merioneth sings the lays of the Sassenach, when it sings at all. But I may be hurrying to false conclusions. There was an Eisteddfod at Dolgelly some weeks ago, and Miss Edith Wynne is quite competent to put the natives "out of conceit" with their own rendering of their own airs.

Some kinds of Welsh music—and those the best—will never die, nor even be affected by changing fashion. The music of trickling streams and of thundering torrents; the music of the wind as it rushes down ravines, and round weather-beaten hills; the music of the shepherd's voice far up the mountain, and of the sheep dog's responsive bark. These things remain, and while they remain there need be no lack of topics for a holiday "leader."

VIENNA.—The Beethoven Centenary Festival will commence on the 16th December next. The following is the programme:—Friday, the 16th December, Fidelio; Saturday, the 17th, afternoon, in the rooms of the Society of the Friends of Music, grand concert, comprising:—Prologue, Ninth Symphony; Playing by Madame Schumann and Madame Gompertz—Betrothing; Sunday, the 18th, morning, in the same locality, Missa Solemnis; evening, grand tanqnet; Monday, the 19th, morning, in the same locality, Concert of Chamber Music; evening, at the Imperial Theatre, Egmont.—Among the Beethoven MSS. in the library of the Society of the Friends of Music, there is the fragments of a Violin Concerto with orchestra accompaniment. The introductory movement is completed, and a large part of the Allegro; quite enough, in fact—at least so say competent judges, or those who consider themselves as such, to give an idea what was the plan of the whole work. Acting upon this suggestion, Herr Hellmsberger intends completing this torso and then having it performed. Herr Hellmsberger is a clever man, and might, so thinks the humble paragraphist who pens these lines, employ himself more profitably and more—sensibly. If Herr Hellmsberger wants a new pair of shoes—the said paragraphist is now indulging in a little sportive allegory—let him have a new pair, but whatever he does let him not attempt to step into a pair of Beethoven's. He would find them horribly too big for him.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

At the Crystal Palace Saturday Concert this day the Beethoven symphony is to be the No. 1, and Mr. Hallé is to play the pianoforte-concerto, No. 4 (G major). Among other good things we are also promised the Overtura di Ballo of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, recently produced at the Birmingham Festival, for which it was expressly composed.

It occurred to the original genius of Ebenezer Laycock, keeper of the now notorious Hotham Street dancing saloon, that he might be able to hide from the lynx-eyed law the liberal exhibition of fair bosoms, by marshalling them behind some busts of Shakspere; that he might make the delights of the not too cumbrously draped Terpsichore edifying, by linking them to the raptures of the chaste Shakesperean muse, in the form of Shakspercan Readings. But this desire to familiarize the masses with the world's great teacher has not been appreciated. Ebenezer Laycock has been fined forty shillings and costs.

Daniel Defoe's Review, which appeared with unvarying regularity three times a week for nine years, was the first newspaper England ever had. Antecedent to Addison and Steele's brochures, and in price one penny, it anticipated in most of its essential details the penny journals of to-day. We wonder how few persons know that Defoe was the original editor of the now prosperous Conservative newspaper in Scotland—the Edinburgh Courant! The literary influence which Defoe has exercised is scarcely less great than his influence as a social reformer. If we seek the source of the modern school of realistic word-painting, it is to Robinson Crusoe and the Plague of London that we shall find it.

Dryden has said that in Charles the Second's time two plays of Beaumont and Fletcher were acted for one of Shakspere. This, however, is disproved by the record of what was played, and by the book of Downes, the prompter, which shows that Hamlet brought more profit to the house and reputation to the players than any piece by any other author. But if Dryden had said that, not after the Restoration, but before the Revolution, Shakspere's plays had ceased to attract full houses, he would have said what cannot be denied, but can be easily accounted for. Shirley wrote The Sisters and The Brothers. The former was produced fifteen years after the latter, in 1641. In the prologue to The Sisters there are these lines:—

> "You see
> What audience we have; what company
> To Shakspere comes, whose pirth earth did once beguile
> Dull hours; and, buskin'd, make s'en sorrow smile;
> So lovely were the wounds that men would say
> They could endure the bleeding a whole day;
> He has but few friends lately."

The reason why Shakspere, and Shirley too, had thin audiences is clear. In 1641 men were engaged, not with the poetry of the past or present, but with the passion and politics of the hour. The Courts of Lincoln's Inn and the Temple were echoing with assertions of Liberty. The London apprentices were flashing angry torches in the eyes of Laud, at Lambeth Palace. The North was in the hands of Scotsmen. The South was a-blaze with the abolition of Episcopacy; and in London had just commenced the Long Parliament which the king could not control, and the king's master only could suppress. In short, the hurricane was then heard which shook the king from his throne, audiences from the theatre, actors from the stage, and for a time silenced the voices of dramatic poets. But the stage rose again with the monarchy, and Shakspere recovered his pre-eminence. Dryden, nevertheless, talked a quantity of nonsense about Shakspere.

It is all up with Meyerbeer's Huguenots. The critic of Freeman's Journal has spoken, and this is a portion of his utterance:—

> "We always dread this opera, because it has no real merit. The author took good care that all his hits should be endorsed by good names, as every part has to be filled by a great vocalist, and if we were to judge the composer by the performers, of course all should be praise; but, with true genius ringing in our ears, we have only to say that after those things which we have been permitted to hear from Mozart, Donizetti, and Bellini, we can only regard the performance of last evening as mere vocal declamation, in which no doubt, there was great merit. We hope the reproducing of Les Huguenots will be only in times to come, when it shall be given as an illustration of the follies of our ancestors and of those things for which we cannot account when 'The Prodigal Son' (the public) left their father's house to feed on the husks of swine."

Of course we accept the sentence, and bid a long farewell to poor Meyerbeer's master-piece, which never again can hope to see the gas light. But we will have our revenge. We may not question Freeman's opinion, nor resist his power, but his English—ha! ha! Freeman hopes "the reproducing of Les Huguenots will be only in times to come." Delicious! What other "times" are available? Freeman hopes, moreover, that it will only be given as illustrating "those things for which we cannot account when 'The Prodigal Son' (the public) left their father's house to feed on the husks of swine." O, unparalleled sentence! What does "those things • • • when" mean, learned reader? Who is the public's father? How is "The Prodigal Son" a plurality. Bravo! Freeman try again; but spare us our bad operas, and abolish bad writing.

MUSIC IN GERMANY.

(From a Rambling Correspondent.)

Opera in Germany, except in Austria, is now but little heard. Sunday is the principal day for the performance of the lyric drama. The two other days have national in their expression are chiefly given. In Vienna the Stuttgard tenor, Herr Heinrich Sonnh-im, and the Berlin tenor, Herr Wachtel, have been starring. There is an excellent local tenor in Herr Wath-n, who is not, however, such a powerful singer as either Sontheim or Wachtel, both of whom, like Duprez and Tamberlik, have any number of high cheek C's at command. Mr. Adams, the English tenor who sang at Covent Garden Theatre, has left Vienna. Miss Minnie Hauck is engaged at Vienna. In Berlin the Operahouse frequenters are anxiously waiting for the return of Pauline Lucca, who is now to Bonk-Mouscou (France) to nurse her wounded husband, the Baron Von Rohden. Frau Harriers-Wippern and Fräulein Lehmann are the leading prime donne. The former is known in London; the latter is likely to find her way there—she can act as well as sing. There is a Swedish tenor, Herr Arnold-en, who has made a favourable impression in Berlin as Count Almaviva. Herr Niemann is, however, the great magnet of attraction; he is perhaps now the best declamatory tenor in Europe. Fräulein Muzell has appeared with success as Gabriel, in Kreutzer's Das Nachtlager zu Granada. Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia has been revived in Berlin, and is, of course, as a martial opera most liked. The soprano part was originally written for Jenny Lind, who was to have sung it in English at Drury Lane Theatre, but broke her engagement to appear at Her Majesty's Theatre, for which a jury gave Mr. Bunn £2,500 damages. In the Prussian capital patriotic airs and part songs have been in the ascendant. Herr Taubert and Herr Eckert have composed national appeals; but the music of all this style of music is pitched in one key—there is a rawness which becomes monotonous. Heard from a marching regiment, some of the melodies are stirring enough. The old German repertory is unusually rich in national airs, and there is not a town in which a kapellmeister or director is to be found who is not contributing a new work; but the Lied am Rhein maintains its supremacy. Was blasen die Trompeten of Arndt (1813) is often heard, as, of course, Was ist das Deutschen Vaterland, also Arndt. Taubert's Vorwärts Vorwärts is exciting enough. Dr. F. Hiller's Zur Wehre is also a soldier's stimulant. As for the Siegesmarsch, the composition for the pianoforte are innumerable with names of all the localities where battles have been fought. Whilst music is thus brought to bear to stir up the nation, artists are at work night and day to produce prints of the feats of arms of the Germans. Portraits, photographic and otherwise, appear of all the generals, the royal ones in the ascendant, of course. But not the least curious of these art publications are the caricatures which are to be seen in the windows of every kind of shop in all the leading towns. Some of these prints are of a coarse kind, but the majority are sufficiently droll, and as they were published prior to the precipitate downfall of Imperialism in France, no particular objection could be made for the German humorists to present the Bonapartes in a ridiculous point of view, especially as the example had been set in Paris.

G. F. HANDEL OR JOHN CASPAR KERL?

Whilst collecting materials for compiling a history of the most celebrated organ players and composers for that instrument of the 17th century, I perused as an authority Sir John Hawkins's History of Music, for references concerning that famous organist and composer John Caspar Kerl, and to my great delight I found a specimen of his superior style of writing in the form of a canzona.* It will be easily seen, when compared with the chorus in Israel in Egypt, "Egypt was glad when they departed," that the latter is quite identical with Kerl's canzona. In both compositions we find nearly the same number of bars, the same subject and counter subject, the same harmonies and modulations and both are written in the same key and in common time. The method of treating of the different parts is also corresponding with the exception that Handel's chorus is treated in dispersed harmony for the convenience of singing in parts whilst the canzona is composed in close harmony. The measures are now and then altered for the better adaptation of the words, for example, the canzona commences: [musical notation] and the chorus: [musical notation] The whole of Kerl's composition leaves not the slightest doubt but that it was composed as an instrumental piece for the organ, and that Handel has turned it into a vocal composition. It may not be generally known that John Caspar Kerl was a great performer and composer. Hawkins gives the following account of him:—

"Kerl was a native of Saxony and having in his early youth made great proficiency in music, was called to Vienna by the Archduke Leopold and appointed organist at his court, where discovering signs of an extraordinary genius"

I subjoin to the preceding superficial narrative some more precise dates. He was born in 1625. In his earlier years he received instruction from Valentine, Chapelma-ter at the Court of Vienna. The Emperor Ferdinand the Third supported him afterwards, and at his expense he studied at Rome under the celebrated Carissimi. At the coronation of Leopold the Second at Frankfort he was invited to perform on the organ before the court. After a preludium in the grandest style, a subject written by the Emperor himself was handed to him, which he first treated as a fugue for two voices, then he worked it out for three and four voices, then formed it into a fugue for five voices with pedal obbligato, joined to it a contra subject, interchanging the time from common to triple time, and vice versa, interweaving the whole in a wonderful double fugue, so that the assemblage arose in raptures. A mass composed for the occasion charmed the Emperor so much (he having been highly skilled in the musical art), that he conferred upon him a knighthood. The Prince Elector and the Prince Palatine of Bavaria offered him the appointment as Chapelmaster, but he decided for the first one and entered his new position at Munich in 1658, where he composed for the Court Church a great number of beautiful compositions during the period of twenty years. Gerber relates the following incident:—Italian singers who had been engaged long before him at court and also for the church did not like the honest and strict German conductor; they intrigued against him whenever there was an opportunity, but he revenged himself in the following original way, by composing a very difficult piece, which they were obliged to sing publicly. They could not perform it, and breaking down, created laughter. Tired of provocations, he accepted the appointment as organist at the Cathedral of St. Stephen at Vienna in 1677. However he must have returned again to Munich where he died 1690, and lies buried in the Church of St. Augustus. A monument of marble upon which three choral notes are engraved with the word "Seni" designates his resting place. The greatest number of his collected posthumous works are presented in the archives of the Court Church at Munich. The best known works are: Delectus sacr. cantionum; Six Masses; Toccatas and Suites for the Piano; Trios for the Gamba and Violins; Missa Nigra, so called because no semibreves nor minims are used in it, but only crotchets; Concerto for two Castrates (eunuchs); voices with basso continuo; Compendioso relazioni sopraal contrapunto; Two Kyrie; Two Masses for two choruses with organ, violins, and four trombones; a Requiem. His principal work is his, "Modulatio Organico super magnificat," engraved and printed in folio, Munich, 1687.

Returning to the question who was the composer of the chorus in Israel in Egypt? I add to the already made comparisons the following arguments:—Kerl was born 1625 and died 1690. Handel was born 1684 and died 1759. The latter must have been only a child 6 years of age at the death of Kerl.—Handel composed Israel in Egypt in 1738 then in his 54th year and therefore 48 years after the death of Kerl. If the canzona of Kerl in Sir John Hawkins' History is a genuine specimen of his writing, which, I for my part believe it to be, we must come to the conclusion that the chorus, "Egypt was glad," so fine a composition as it is, is a plagiarism, and it is well known, notwithstanding the inaccessible position our immortal Handel occupies, that he sometimes used the motifs of others in his own compositions and that is the case with this canzona. That he knew Kerl's compositions and acknowledged his talent, we may be sure of. It has been said of Handel, and very truly, that whatever he appropriated, he made perfect, and his sound judgment must have easily detected the quality of gold he selected, which he purified and refined in his mental crucible for his own use. But what is most surprising is, how the words suit the music, whilst the character of them is preserved throughout. And again comparing the chorus with the canzona, we find, as already mentioned in the beginning of this review, that the length and brevity of the notes are altered when required for the words (text) also the use of rests when necessary for the same purpose throughout the whole chorus; and so skilfully is it done, so fluently are words and music combined, that the chorus may be designated as a masterpiece. To the question, we may safely rely upon it that the canzona is a genuine specimen of Kerl's composition as given in Sir John Hawkins's History of Music. I further-more remark that Hawkins became in possession of the musical treasures and manuscripts of Dr. Pepusch not immediately after his demise, but later, as he bequeathed them to his intimate friends, Travers and Kelner, and no doubt this collection contained compositions of John Casper Kerl, as it is generally known that Sir John Hawkins replenished his great work with materials from Dr. Pepusch's collection. For better comparing the digressions in the two compositions I extracted and have numbered the bars and marked them with a-teriaks, so that the divergence may be at once visible, but I have not taken further notice of the difference with regard to close or dispersed harmony, of which I have already argued.

In concluding this dissertation, I have only given my own humble opinion, and think the subject so interesting an i worthy of a searching inquiry that I trust it may create the desire of a more complete investigation, and be fully ventillated by others who are able to follow up the subject in view, so that we may ultimately obtain the following result—which of the two masters was in reality the composer of the music in question.

AMERICA.

(From a Special Correspondent.) New York, Sept. 16.

"She is Come."

Such is the heading given by more than one morning paper here to articles upon the advent of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. I am pretty sure that not one of the writers ever heard her, and yet they are all wild with enthusiasm. Isn't it strange? The eternal "interviewers" boarded the vessel which brought over the fair Swede as a matter of course, and immediately sought her presence; but were introduced instead to the portly and genial Jarrett, whose impenetrable countenance boded no good. The more experienced added up the amount of intelligence likely to be got out of him, and set down "nothing." Still he smiled blandly, took out his snuff-box, and looked complacently around. "Miss Nilsson suffered much from sea-sickness?" asked one. "More or less," said Jarrett. "Miss Nilsson afraid of the sea?" enquired another?" "More or less" replied the smiling manager. "Christine's voice all right?" demanded a third. "Better, if possible, than when we started," responded Jarrett, murmuring something mysterious, in which the words "sea-air," "bracing," "throat," were alone intelligible, while he waved his hand about as though endeavouring to illustrate something. Can we have the pleasure of seeing Miss Nilsson?" asked the chorus of interviewers? "By all means," responded the obliging Jarrett, and the whole party descended to seek the lady in the saloon; but lo! the bird had flown! (she was indeed the first to leave the vessel). Never did a man look more disappointed than Jarrett. The interviewers retiring with note-books, blank as their faces, made for the nearest groggery, determined, if possible, to make what they could not find, and judging by their next-morning accounts, succeeded perfectly.

That Mdlle. Nilsson is going to have a very great success here, I have every reason to believe. There is certainly a prevalent feeling that she might have been more attractively supported. Vieuxtemps is the only really great name beside hers, and he, I need scarcely say does not belong to that "sensational" class of violinists most admired in America. Ole Bull is still the reigning favourite here, though no longer followed in Europe. Mr. Wehli is held in some estimation as a "brilliant" pianist in New York, but can scarcely be called an attraction. M. Verger, the French baritone, is quite unknown in this part of the world. Mdlle. Carl, the contralto, is an American singer of no very great repute, and Beignoli, who has resided many years in the United States, is nearly "played out." Nevertheless, the prospects are excellent, and whatever success may attend the enterprise, will be entirely due to Mdlle. Nilsson, aided by the management of Max Strakosch, and the intricate Henry Jarrett.

The wire-pullers have got hold of the press completely, from the Herald downwards or upwards, and everything seems to portend a brilliant, financial result. Some of the musical articles will be quite wonderful. I will send you a few choice specimens. There will be for the New York concerts, at least—what is termed here a "grand orchestra," under the experienced and able direction of Max Maretzek, one of the best conductors and genial artists in America, and Mr. Wehli is to officiate as pianoforte accompanist as well as soloist throughout the tour. The programme of the first concert at Steinway Hall is not yet published, although the inaugurative performance takes place in three days—that is, on Monday, September 19th. The magic name of Nilsson is to do everything, I presume. The much-prized young artist had to undergo the operation of a serenade last evening.

The following account of it is from the New York Tribune:—

"A grand complimentary serenade was tendered last evening to Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, by her countrymen, the Swedes and Scandinavians of this city. Yesterday afternoon, Mrs. Nilsson dined with Prof. Dorenus and wife at the Clarendon Hotel, and later in the day sang a few Swedish airs, which those who listened to say were extremely touching. In the evening, she was the guest of Prof. Dorenus, at whose residence the serenade was offered. At about 11 o'clock, a procession, consisting mostly of Swedes, with a slight sprinkling of Danes and Norwegians, formed at Germania Hall, on Third Avenue, and marched 800 strong, each with a Chinese lantern, to the residence of the Professor, and entering the gate soon filled the garden. An immense number of people lined the sidewalks of the Fourth Avenue and obstructed the road, and the services of a large number of policemen were required to keep a path clear for the fresh arrivals. Within the house a proportionately large number gathered to pay their respects to Nilsson.

"The garden front of the house presented a beautiful and picturesque sight. Hundreds of coloured lanterns threw their light over the grounds, and illuminated the dark retreats and rural resting-places beneath the large trees. Banners, with the names of Nilsson and Jenny Lind, formed an arch over the front entrance, while behind it were the national colour—blue and yellow—of Sweden. Mademoiselle Nilsson appeared to be considerably affected at the display, and replied to a question of a friend if she did not feel gratified at this mark of affection, 'Ah! indeed I do; it makes my heart palpitate.' At this juncture she was waited upon by a committee from the company.

"Mr. Björkstrand addressed her in Swedish as follows:—'Mademoiselle Nilsson, we are delighted to meet you on the occasion of your first visit to America, and desire to express our heartfelt thanks that we have had an opportunity to greet our honoured countrywoman. We hope you will consider that every man has a personal esteem for you, and greets you most cordially through the Committee.' To which Mademoiselle responded in a sweet, unaffected manner:—'My countrymen, I hold and shall ever carry Sweden in my heart. I am glad to thank you for all this kind honour, and would have you tell each one that I thank him personally. My heart is very full.'

"The Committee then escorted Mademoiselle Nilsson to an upper window, and retired a little to allow her a place alone, where her beautiful face could be seen by the hundreds below. She was dressed in book muslin, flounced, with a blue silk overskirt and tulle ruches. As she sat at the window, with an elegant, brilliantly-coloured shawl thrown carelessly about her shoulders, and a white cloud over her head, though drawn back sufficiently to reveal the dark (?) eyes and pleasant, though decisive face, the crowd below cheered tumultuously, again and again; and the band, as soon as the noise subsided, commenced 'Reminiscences,' from Flyerberg. Among the beautiful pieces played was the 'Christallen den Finn,' a Swedish national air, containing the first song that Nilsson ever sang. At the conclusion of the serenade, the procession paraded before the singer, enthusiastic cheers were given, and the company separated."

Michael Angelo Ormolished.

I wish to say one word about Michael Angelo Buonarotti. I used to worship the mighty genius of Michael Angelo—that man who was great in poetry, painting, sculpture, architecture—great in everything he undertook. But I do not want Michael Angelo for breakfast—for luncheon—for dinner—nor tea—for supper—for between meals. I like a change occasionally. In Genoa he designed everything; in Milan he or his pupils designed everything; he designed the Lake of Como; in Padua, Verona, Venice, Bologna, who did we ever hear of, from guides, but Michael Angelo? In Florence he painted everything, designed everything, nearly, and what he did not design he need to sit on a favourite stone and look at, and they showed us the stone. In Pisa he designed everything but the old shot tower, and they would have attributed that to him if it had not been so awfully out of the perpendicular. He designed the piers of Leghorn and the custom-house reputations of Civita Vecchia. But Rome—here it is frightful. He designed St. Peter's; he designed the Pope; he designed the Pantheon, the uniform of the Pope's soldiers, the Tiber, the Vatican, the Coliseum, the Capitol, the Tarpeian Rock, the Barberini Palace, St. John Lateran, the Campagna, the Appian Way, the Seven Hills, the Baths of Caracalla, the Claudian Aqueduct, the Cloaca Maxima—the eternal bore designed the Eternal City, and unless all men and books do lie, he painted everything in it! Dan said the other day to the guide, "Enough, enough, enough! Say no more! Lump the whole thing! say that the Creator made Italy from designs by Michael Angelo!" I never felt so fervently thankful, so soothed, so tranquil, so filled with a blessed peace, as I did yesterday, when I learned that Michael Angelo was dead. Mark Twain.

Adulteration of Food.

The following is an abstract of a paper read at the Social Science Congress, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on "Legislation to Prevent Adulteration of Food and Drink," by Mr. Phillips Bevan, F.R.G.S.:—

Although it is one of our most important social questions, the apathy and ignorance of the public on the subject of adulteration is astonishing. Any person thinks that all others are mortal except himself, so he imagines adulteration affects any class but his own; and although we acknewledge its prevalence, and cry shame when we read of any particularly bad case, the sensation is but momentary, and we go on our way as before. What is adulteration, and what does it mean? It means the lowering of the physique of the nation, the poisoning of the people, the deterioration of our constitution; and, morally, a fraud practised by the seller on the buyer, a cheating to which we have become so callous that it has hardened our conscience for honesty in silver and bigger things. The great difficulty in dealing with it is, that the Government is so slow to move; and even men in high places practically defend it, by declaring that it is not so bad as it might be; that the buyer must look to himself, and so on. It is also a very common argument that people bring adulteration on themselves by buying such very cheap articles; so cheap, that they cannot be good for the money. But they do so in ignorance; and if the seller were compelled to label the goods with the names of the real ingredients, such as "best butter mixed with starch, mashed potatoes, and horse bone oil;" "coffee, with bread-crumbs and sand;" "tea, with iron filings;" "sugar, with chromate of lead;" "beer, with salt and cocculus indicus;" it is not the least likely that their cheapness would tempt the buyer; and, if a certainty of detection and punishment followed, we should find that the sellers would think twice before they offered such articles. A stronger that, in all our sanitary machinery, the food question and its purity have been so overlooked; but pure food is as necessary as pure air, good drainage, or wholesome water; and it ought not to be left to the philanthropist to remedy the evil, with the tolerable certainty that he will only get snubbed for his pains. It is a governmental question, as important as that of education or the Irish Church; and it ought not to be the duty of a private member of the House of Commons to bring in a bill.

With a view to arouse public interest, in conjunction with Messrs. J M. Johnson & Sons, of Castle Street, Holborn, in February last I established the Food Journal, feeling that there was a great want of some public organ to discuss these matters; and so convinced was I that no bill could properly be passed without the knowledge of the legislation which prevailed in other countries, that the late Earl of Clarendon was important so that of education, address the various British legations and consulates abroad on the subject. His Lordship not only gave that permission, but evinced his great interest in the matter by requesting that a circular should be drawn up, embodying all the inquiries on food matters that I was desirous to make. A thousand of these were accordingly issued through the Foreign Office; and Earl Granville, who has taken up the subject in the same warm and earnest spirit as evinced by his predecessor, has forwarded for publication in the Food Journal a mass of valuable information, which has never before reached this country. In detail even an epitome of these answers would take up far too much of the time of this meeting. I will, therefore, only briefly touch on some of the main points of the question of the circular, viz., "What legislative enactments at present exist in the country to which you are accredited respecting the adulteration of food and drink? Are these laws actively enforced; and how far do they appear to meet the evil?" Very valuable information comes to us from the United States, in Mr. Thornton's report; which adverts to the difficulty of getting systematic information, even through the well-arranged machinery of official correspondence. The State legislation varies very much in the different states, some possessing no legislation at all, and others inflicting very severe penalties. Each state legislates independently; and, in so doing, often delegates the regulation of these matters to the various town or county authorities within their borders. As a general rule, the adulteration of alcoholic liquors is almost universal.

The laws generally work well throughout the States, but all the reports show that there is generally a pretty high standard of reputation among the dealers, although it is at the same time true that the system of comprehensive laws, and the knowledge that they will be strictly enforced, tends to preserve this feeling.

The Prussian penal code provides that any person selling adulterated or spoiled goods shall be liable to a penalty of 50 dollars, or imprisonment for six weeks, with confiscation of goods. In these cases, it is not necessary that the seller be aware of the adulteration, for he is liable just the same. If death ensue, the seller is punished with death; but if only severe bodily injury, the penalty is imprisonment from ten up to twenty years. At Konigsberg there is an additional law respecting the sale of damaged meat, and particularly of pork containing trichinæ. At Leipsic the same regulations are in force, but the police are not active. At Hamburg, if any injury happens to the buyer, the seller is liable to be imprisoned for from three months to four years. In Holland, the Dutch law is very similar to the Code Napoleon, and inflicts a punishment of imprisonment for from six days to two years, with a fine of from 16 to 500 francs. The adulteration of bread with copperas or vitriol is dealt with by an imprisonment for from two to five years, and a fine of from 200 to 600 florins. Not only is punishment provided for people who mix ingredients for adulteration, but also for those who manufacture or sell the ingredients, knowing that they were to be used for adulteration.

Any fresh legislation on this subject should be compulsory in its character, and not permissive. All articles of consumption which are manufactured should have their ingredients declared, for there is a feeling prevalent amongst manufacturers, as, for instance, cocoa makers, that as long as their articles contain nothing hurtful, they are at liberty to call them by the generic name of cocoa. Still, a sophistication is, to a certain extent, a fraud, and every purchaser has a right to know what he is purchasing; and, although we might be safe in the hands of the largest and most respectable manufacturers, there is a considerable class of unprincipled makers who are not above taking advantage. Differences of opinion sometimes occur as to the relative hurtfulness of certain common adulterants; and an eminent authority has assured me that he had grave doubts as to whether alum was not a good thing instead of a bad one. I would suggest there should be a Food Sub-department formed, which should take cognizance of all food legislation and supplies. To it a board of two or three of the most eminent analytical chemists should be attached, who should examine and pronounce upon all disputed chemical questions, and whose opinion should be law. The sub-department should have the election of, and a certain amount of control over, the county; and analysts, whose appointment should be compulsory and not permissive; neither should it rest with vestries or corporations, many of the members of which are interly concerned in adulteration. Inspectors should have the power to visit and take samples from all dealers in food, subject to certain checks, so as to prevent any risk of tyrannical obnoxiliary visits. They should also have the power of testing the supplies furnished to public bodies, such as union contracts; for guardians have frequently a habit of accepting tenders for food at a price at which the real article cannot possibly be supplied; as a London Union Board did the other day in the case of butter. In cases where a petty dealer declares his ignorance that the goods which he sells are adulterated, I should make the onus of proving this fall upon him, and then it would be for the Food Commissioners to take the matter up, and prosecute the manufacturer. When adulteration takes place before importation, as in the case of the Maloo tea mixture, the department might well provide the machinery for setting consular and other influences to work to prevent it; and might also step in as the proper arbiter between conflicting interests. In this very case, a great fraud on the public was allowed to go unpunished, because the Customs could not legally forego the duty.

As to offences, when proved, I am no believer in either a very small or a very large fine; but I would have no sliding scale at the option of the magistrate. For the first offence, the penalty should be sufficient to make the offender smart in his pocket; for the second, I would double it, and have an affiche detailing the offence put outside his door, as also outside the door of the church, police-station, and town-hall, for a month. The case should also be advertised in the local papers at the offender's expense. For the third offence, there should be imprisonment for one month, with hard labour. Adulteration is either a fraud or it is not, and it should be punished like any other cheating.

[We make no apology for inserting the foregoing. Wholesome food is as much a desideratum for musicians as for any other member of the community.—Ed. M. W.]

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—May I ask the favour of you to convey the following notes to the reviewer of my "War and Patriotic Songs," published by Lonsdale, to avoid any misapprehension:—

No. 1. "The Sword in hand," by Mendelssohn, is not originally composed to the words; they have been adapted to the music, and is sung for some time ago as a patriotic song by many of our German choral societies.

No. 4. "The Fatherland's Call," by Mozart, is also sung as a patriotic song and the words adapted, dated from 1813.

I think it is in so far my duty to mention these facts for the purpose that these songs mentioned may not be considered as original composition, to the words.—Yours very truly,

September 26th. FERD. RAHLES.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—In answer to your call for an explanation of the term applied to the winter series of concerts just commenced at Plymouth under my direction, I beg to say that it is my purpose to give two miscellaneous concerts, such as that of the 14th inst., and two oratorio concerts. To the former concerts the name "Philharmonic" is applicable, and to the latter the name "Oratorio."—I remain your obedient servant,

Plymouth, Sept. 27th. W. WINTERBOTTOM.

HANDSOME IS THAT HANDSOME DOES.

Handsome is that Handsome does is the title of a new comedy-drama in four acts, written by Mr. Tom Taylor, and produced at the Olympic Theatre. "Comedy-drama," we may note, is the designation now applied to works deficient alike in the wit of comedy and the interest of drama proper. Of "tragedy-drama" we have had as yet no experience, but no doubt our playwrights could produce farther hybrids if required.

The scene of the new play is laid in the valley of Easedale, and what is called "local colour" is often so heaped upon the canvas that all sense of proportion is lost. The story was probably devised as a means of bringing upon the stage like and mountain scenery, a representation of a tempest on the hills, a wrestling match in which real combatants are employed, an auction guide in which "oak falls" on imitation turf, and a flood of dialect that passes very well for Westmoreland, being unintelligible to the ears of a southern. In the mouths of certain of the performers this dialect now a stage-Irish, now a Cockney flavour, which does not affect its value or redeem its tediousness. Some half-dozen undergraduates, members of a Cambridge reading party, with their coach, Tom Turner, B.A., have arrived at Easedale valley, and secured lodgings at the farmhouse of Job Tyson, Butterlip Knowe University students are seldom treated with much respect on the stage, but in the present instance playwright and players portray them as habitually indulging in the antics of circus clowns and the horseplay of Sunday-night roughs on the Embankment. Joshua Gawthwaite, a Dale schoolmaster of mathematical learning, is employed by the undergraduates in their studies. Joshua is in love with Elsie Fleming, daughter of a Dalesman, but the maiden regards his suit coldly, and is moved to bestow her affections upon the Hon. Henry Cleveland, member of the reading party. Mr. Cleveland is a weak-headed young man, who wears a perpetual smile, and is uneasy in his deportment; but his love is honest and he is most anxious to make Elsie his wife. There are difficulties in the way, however, and the youth is bound to become the husband of Miss Florence Conway, ward of his father, Lord Claremont. Presently his lordship and Miss Conway arrive. The father, surprised and indignant that his son should contemplate marriage with one occupying an inferior social position, does what either noble fathers have done under similar circumstances—he explaining the case to Elsie, hinting at the prior engagement with Miss Conway and appealing to the village maiden to release her lover from his promises, and turn a deaf ear to his further wooing. Elsie following prescription as faithfully as his lordship, and undertaken to reject the suit of Mr. Cleveland. She continues, however, to receive from him letters written in "invisible" ink, and to send replies. Joshua Gawthwaite who intercepts the correspondence, does not scruple to read letters never intended for his eyes. He is only by the sudden intervention of Elsie hindered from flinging his rival down a precipice. The play is clumsily constructed, and the termination is arrived at with awkwardness. There is a storm and a mist upon the hills. A rock upon which Mr. Cleveland is seated is struck by lightning, and his life is in peril. He is saved, however, by Joshua. The characters then transfer their affections with rapidity. Mr. Cleveland discovers that he really loves Miss Conway, a young lady, who seems to have been introduced merely that her fashionable airs and graces might divert the audience during "carpenter's scenes." Elsie discovers that she really loves Joshua Gawthwaite, for the reason that his deeds are more handsome than the looks either of himself or of Mr. Cleveland. Upon these discoveries the curtain falls.

The play is overburdened with words though not with dramatic interest. It has obtained but a qualified success, the undergraduate and wrestling scenes encountering opposition from an audience otherwise friendly and uncritical. Mr. Compton has been engaged to play Gawthwaite, but it is to be hoped that more suitable occupation may be found for so excellent a comedian. Gawthwaite is but a kind of Westmoreland John Mildmay, with jokes from the comic Latin grammar. Sentiment there is none worth platitudes, heroic action there are not in Mr. Compton's way, though he does all he can with the part. The best sustained character is perhaps the Matthew Fleming of Mr. Belmore. Miss Rheinhardt was graceful as the heroine. The others hardly call for remark, being provided with but little chance of distinction.

To Musicians about to Marry.

Woman has at last stepped into the shoes of man. The "Married Women's Property Bill" is the instrument which has effected this mighty change. To enable our readers to clearly understand the full scope of this measure, we will sketch an outline of the procedure formerly pursued by persons about to marry, as regards property, and the process which will now be required. All our readers know that, up to the present Act, all property accruing to the wife after marriage became, with few exceptions, absolutely the property of the husband, and even the personal earnings of the wife might be seized by her husband for his own use and benefit. Among a very large portion of the population, especially the more educated classes, this tyrannous exercise of power was curbed by ante-nuptial settlements, which instruments secured to the wife such portions of any property coming to her after her marriage, as might be agreed on by the contracting parties. Thus amongst the upper ranks was the balance fairly adjusted, but among the lower and uneducated classes, where settlements were not made, wives often became the victims of the foulest injustice. To remedy this evil an Act was passed, enabling wives deserted by their husbands to obtain a protection order from the magistrate of the district to save her property from the rapacity of her husband. It is abundantly clear that the maxim, "there is no wrong for which the law does not supply a remedy," was not falsified in this instance.

Now let us see what advantages the "Married Women's Property Bill" will give us. The substance of the bill may be summed up thus: "All property accruing to the wife after her marriage, with a very obscure exception, including her earnings, is absolutely her property, and she may employ it for her own use and benefit as fancy may dictate." Now this in the abstract is all very good, but there are one or two considerations of equity which very much detract from the beauty of the picture. Thus, what is to make the wife give a fair portion of her income to the support of the family? Say a women inherits real estates to the value of ten thousand a year. Under the recent Act she can spend every penny of this sum upon herself, and then come upon her husband to pay all the housekeeping debts. Such being the case, what will be the remedy to save the husband from an extravagant, thoughtless, or wicked wife? Why, the same remedy as before. It will now be absolutely necessary for a man to insist upon an ante-nuptial settlement, so as to compel the wife to give a fair portion of her income to the support of the family. Thus it will be seen that the husband and wife have changed places. Whether the result of this important alteration in the relations of the two sexes will be for good or evil time alone will show.

Feloverse.

WAIFS.

Frau Harriers-Wippern has returned to the Berlin stage.

The Michaelmas term of the Royal Academy of Music has commenced.

M. Hingel, the eminent music publisher, has returned to Paris from Brussels.

Herr Hans von Bülow (late son-in-law of Abbé Liszt), is now in Florence.

Signor Petrella, now residing at Florence, is engaged in the composition of a new opera.

Boieldieu's Dame Blanche has been revived in Vienna, Herr Wachtel appearing as Georges Brown.

Herr Eckert and Herr von Radecke have composed patriotic songs for the Operahouse at Berlin.

Miss Fanny Jarvis, the pianist, is now studying singing at Florence, with a view to her appearance in Opera.

A new organ, given by the Rev. Sir R. H. Jodrell, has been placed in the Church of Reepham St. Mary, Norfolk.

Lord Penrhyn has given £1,000 more (a third donation) towards the restoration of the choir of Bangor Cathedral.

Signor G. Lucchesi, the tenor, formerly of the Royal Italian Opera, is among the involuntary fugitives from Paris to London at this anxious period.

There is a new Italian tenor, Signor Cesena, who is studying German, and will make his début next month as Eleazar, in Halevy's Juive.

The professorship of the piano in the Milan Conservatoire is now vacant—salary, 2,000 lire. Applications may be made up to the 15th October.

The return of Pauline Lucca from Pont à Mousson, where she has been nursing her wounded husband, Baron von Rahden, is anxiously expected in Berlin.

Mr. Jefferson still draws crowded houses in the Rip van Winkle of Mr. Boucicault, at Booth's Theatre, New York. Our authority is Watson's Art Journal.

Mdlle. Lewitzsky, who sang at the Drury Lane Italian Operahouse last season, is engaged for St. Petersburgh, and will make her début as Marguerite in Gounod's Faust.

Mdlle. Stelli, who sang Lucia recently at the Frankfort Theatre, is likely to be heard in this country. Fräulein Lohmann, of Berlin, may be another importation in due course.

Madame Adelina Patti, who has not left England since the close of the Italian Opera season, was to sing at the concert at the Philharmonic Hall, Liverpool, yesterday, and is to sing again there to-day.

M. Henri Lütgen, the well-known violoncellist, of the late M. Jullien's Orchestra, has arrived in London. M. Lütgen was one of the instrumentalists who accompanied M. Jullien on his American tour.

The announcement of a new novel by Lord Lytton has excited a great demand for early sheets among American and, curiously enough, also amongst Dutch publishers. One American house is said to have offered £500 for them.

The destruction of artistic and literary monuments at Strasburg and Toul has induced a protest from the five classes of the Institute of France, in view of the probable bombardment of the monuments, libraries, and museums of Paris. It is addressed to every academy in the world, and invites adhesion.

"There is a division" (says the Athenæum) "in the ranks of the disciples of the 'Music of the Future' in Germany, caused by the marriage of Herr Wagner with the daughter of Liszt, the divorced wife of Herr von Bülow, the pianist, symmetry on of Wagner's most devoted adherents. The first act of the third part of the Nibelungen is completed."

An accessory of dinner, of which the Russians are fond, is music. Every restaurant of any pretensions has a barrel organ to play during meals—a large, handsome instrument, generally occupying the whole of one end of the room, and from which is heard the rolling of the drum, the thundering of the kettle-drum, the clashing of the cymbal. Every popular new air is at once added to its repertory.

A correspondent from Brussels writes as follows:—

"Dupuy, the celebrated ex-tenor of the Italian Opera, is at Brussels, preparing the representation of his opera of Jeanne d'Arc. A cantata, La dernière Nuit de Faust, by M. Emile Mathieu, performed for the first time yesterday, has been well received. A new oratorio, music by Benoit and words by Kreutzhoff, entitled Hymne à la Paix, will be performed in about a fortnight at the Théâtre de la Monnaie; 200 singers and 400 musicians are to take part in it. Medle. Block will be contralto, Medle. Sass soprano, and Signor Aaisel baritone."

The Cunard steamer Cuba, Captain Moodie, which arrived at New York on the 14th instant, encountered fearful weather on the outward voyage, and although it was her first voyage across the Atlantic, Medle. Nilsson was to a certain extent free from sea sickness. A gentleman passenger on board, and who combines literary with commercial matters, in a letter to a friend at Liverpool says:—"As a gratifying mark of testimony of the respect and esteem in which Captain Moodie, the commander of the Cuba, is held, took place just before entering the harbour of New York, in the presentation of a purse to that gentleman, containing £50. It was handed to Captain Moodie by the Hon. J. H. Pendleton in a very excellent and appropriate speech in which he alluded to the unanimous feeling ever expressed by travellers in the Cuba, that a kinder or a more attentive commander to those under his care it was impossible to find; and it is not too much to say that Captain Moodie is one of the most esteemed and popular captains in the service." Although there is no details given of the voyage of the Cuba across the Atlantic yet private letters state that the ship encountered fearful weather but rode through it like a cork; that all on board were as comfortable as if in fine weather; and that even Medle. Nilsson herself was astonished at the easy transit across the Atlantic.

"It is understood"—says Dwight—"that the Handel and Haydn Society are making arrangements to give three or four oratorios with Medle. Nilsson in November, about Thanksgiving time. What oratorio, it is not yet decided, though there can be little doubt that among them will be Elijah and Judas Maccabeus.—Of course the old society will give the Messiah and something else at Christmas time; and then they will be preparing for their great Triennial Festival, which comes round next May. What noble new tasks this involves, we have not learned. The government had set their hearts strongly upon Israel in Egypt; which resolution, we trust, will remain firm, so that at last we may hear the whole of this great oratorio worthily presented. With all this extra work, we suppose we must be resigned to the postponement of the noblest plan of all, the bringing out of Bach's St. Matthew Passion, for still another year. But we would ask if it be not practicable, as well as in every way desirable, that one part of one of the Festival concerts should be devoted to a judicious series of selections from the Passion music;—say, just the selections which were studied last winter, and which interested most of the singers very deeply, to wit:—the opening chorus, perhaps; the chorus with tenor solo, 'O grief,' and 'I'll watch with my dear Jesu awa';' the thunder and lightning chorus, and by all means, the concluding chorus; by all means also, several of the unspeakably beautiful chorales;—these, interspersed with two or three of the fine solo airs, and scenes of wonderfully expressive recitative. Think of it, brethren, and think seriously."

Musical, dramatic, and other entertainments are not quite unusual on board the splendid mail steamers that cross the Atlantic with such regularity and success; but an entertainment which took place on board the Cunard steamer Cuba, on her recent trip to New York, seems somewhat unprecedented in character, and particularly happy in its result. A gentleman very well known in the best journalistic, theatrical, and social circles of London, was a passenger upon the voyage, and being an adept in the mysterious science of conjuring, as well as brimful of animal spirits, he was naturally led—if not to "set the table in a roar" (an achievement of which he is also capable at discretion)—at least to mesmerise the guests after dinner with some of his sleight-of-hand accomplishments. This brought down upon the adventurous performer a deputation of young and lovely girls, headed by the distinguished artist, Mdlle. Nilsson, who insisted in the most irresistible manner possible that he should give "all hands" the opportunity of witnessing a set display of his magic power. Refusal was out of the question, and accordingly flaming circulars announced that on the night of Sept. 10th, under the patronage of Capt. Moodie, health and weather permitting, the Wizard of the Waves would give a grand soirée magique. The reserved seats were announced as established, and the admission free, but not so, however, the exit, as the sequel shows. The attendance was immense, Mdlle. Nilsson and party occupying front seats. The entertainment, prolonged by the amusing commentary of the performer himself, lasted two hours, and was pronounced a "tremendous success." The magician followed up this advantage by drawing a harrowing picture of shipwrecks and making an appeal for contributions to the Liverpool Seamen's Orphanage. This appeal was strengthened by the presence of sturdy sentinels at the doors, and the result was a collection of £41 4s. 6d.

The Boston Post says:—

"There must have been a fearful time among the four pianos, eight guitars, and a lonely violoncello and a flute, at the concert given the 10th instant, by the senior music class of Eminence College, Ky. A Cincinnati paper says it fell to three instruments, in the gentle hands of a bevy of Annies, Nannies, Lizzies, and Louisas, to describe the Battle on the Plains of Heaven, so musically conceived by the extraordinary genius who presides over the musical department of that institution. And here is what had to done, in eighteen movements:—

"First movement—Conspiracy of Satan; Council of Seraphs; Withdrawal of the faithful Abdiel; Announcement of the Revolt. Second—Summoning and Marshalling of the Heavenly Host, and Sounding of the Celestial Trumpets. Third—Moving of the Angelic Cohorts to Battle under the conduct of Michael and Gabriel; Their nimble tread through the pastoral air. Fourth—Sounding of Infernal Trumpets Summoning the Legions of Satan. Fifth—Marching of the Insurgent Army led by Satan. Sixth—Combat between Abdiel and Satan. Seventh—Trumpet Calls of the Battalions preparatory to the Grand Encounter. Eighth—First Onset; General Engagement; Satan Repulsed. Ninth—Bivouac of the Celestial Forces on the Field; Stationing of Outposts. Tenth—Council of War by Satan and Principalities; his Despair of the Council; Invention of Devilish Engines by Satan; Revival of Hope. Twelfth—Moraing Call of Infernal Trumpets and Rallying of Forces. Thirteenth—Call of the Ethereal Trumpets; the Infernal Machines Trained and Opened upon the Celestial Hosts; Disorder, then Rallying of Michael and his Angels. Fourteenth—Terrific Battle of the Mountains, Cessation of Hostilities. Fifteenth—The Son of God Commissioned to Expel the Revolting Hosts from Heaven. Sixteenth—Celestial Trumpets Sounded by Infernal Trumpets. Seventeenth—Messiah, 'Invested with Ten Thousand Thunders,' Rushing upon his Impious Foes; the Foes Dismayed by the Fierce Terror of His Countenance, Hurling themselves in Wild Chase, from the Verge of Heaven, down, down, to the Bottomless Pit of Perdition. Eighteenth—Rejoicing of Angels Around the Throne."

In a recent number of a weekly musical publication, an article has appeared entitled, Mr. Chorley and St. Peter, purporting to be a reply to the statement in the Athenæum of the 3rd inst., as to the book of the oratorio. In a still more recent number of a weekly journal, not especially devoted to musical matters, an article has also appeared, with the heading, The Athenæum Critic Criticised. The object of the first leading article is to defend Mr. Benedict as regards the St. Peter libretto; and the aim of the second missile is to attack the festival critic for his comments on the preface to the book of the words. Now, inasmuch as the writer of the articles in both publications is the "gentleman" referred to in Mr. Chorley's communication of the 3rd inst., "who consented to accept the strange task of remodelling another man's production," the intervention of such a champion of Mr. Benedict cannot be regarded as disinterested. He is, in fact, a particeps criminis, and cannot be called as an impartial witness. The colleague of Mr. Benedict in the concoction of the libretto, which superseded Mr. Chorley's version declared himself that he is "not in a position to judge between Mr. Chorley and Benedict on matters of fact." If so, why has Mr. Chorley's successor entered the list as the defender of Mr. Benedict, who has not yet attempted to disprove any of Mr. Chorley's assertions? Why has the "remodeller" displayed such acute sensibility respecting the remarks of the critic of the Birmingham Musical Festival, because the latter regarded the present version as neither "fish, flesh, nor fowl," and has been utterly unable to comprehend the meaning of the misty preface, which, whilst it professes that the composer's intention was to set a few incidents in St. Peter's life, disavows him as Peter the disciple and Peter the apostle, and will not treat him in any symbolical or representative character? The preface is, therefore, a mystification, for why is the oratorio called St. Peter?

ROTTERDAM.—The German operatic season has commenced. Le Nozze, Il Trovatore, Faust, Rigoletto, and Lohengrin have already been performed.

REVIEWS.

How long will thou forget me? Sacred song for Soprano or Tenor, with chorus ad lib., as sung at the Temple Church; set to music by WILFORD MORGAN. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THIS anthem—for such it is—opens with a short accompanied recitative in G minor, followed by an air in the same relative major, marked by a suave melody extremely pleasing in character, though, possibly, open to criticism on the ground of over prettiness. Few, however, would entertain such criticism, or regard the air as other than an admirable example of the emotional music which threatens to supersede the "high and dry" effusions of old church writers. A second recitative leads to another and well contrasted air, also in B flat major, the subject of which is taken up and amplified in a final chorus. There can be no question that Mr. Morgan has produced an anthem adapted for popularity as much by its character as its easiness.

The Princess Louise Waltz. Composed by CHARLES GODFREY, Band Master Royal Horse Guards. [London: Ashdown & Parry.]

ANY waltz bearing the name of Charles Godfrey, the public are sure to buy without waiting the opinion of reviewers. The public are, doubtless, right, but we may say, nevertheless, that the "Princess Louise" is a charming specimen of the Godfreyan handiwork, its melodies being fresh and beautiful enough to win favour everywhere.

PESTH.—The rehearsals of Herr R. Wagner's Tannhäuser have commenced at the National Theatre. The principal parts will be sustained by Mesdames Pauli-Marcovits, Helery, Herren Ellinger, Lang, and Hazos.

STRASBURG.—M. Emil Mark, manager of the Theatre, has been killed during the bombardment. He was formerly a popular member of the Odéon company, Paris.

DARMSTADT.—The Grand Ducal Theatre will shortly re-open. The first three performances will be for the benefit of the wounded German soldiers.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"

SUNG BY

MR. SANTLEY.

Price 4s.

"In a song entitled, 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mdlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

The manuscript thus completed was delivered to the agent, who immediately forwarded it to the Count. The latter, though well acquainted with Mozart's handwriting, suspected nothing, but was greatly delighted that his plan had succeeded so admirably. Mozart's sudden death, even more than his promise, protected the Count from discovery; he now considered himself perfectly secure, and did not have the slightest hesitation in calling the work his own. This time, it is true, he reckoned without his host, or rather without his hostess. The speculative Mdme. Constance was not contented with deceiving merely an unknown customer; on the contrary, she intended to deceive the whole world. Regardless of the agreement concluded between her deceased husband and the stranger, she retained a copy of the score for herself. This she had performed in Vienna, as Mozart's last complete work, and carried on a lucrative business with it elsewhere. Count Wallsegg was, probably, not a little alarmed, when he heard of the performance in Vienna; but he was not in a position to lodge a public protest; he contented himself, therefore, with sundry reproaches made privately, but the widow, who was not very sensitive, took no notice of them. It was not till 1800 that the score was published by Breitkopf & Härtel, in Leipsic. At this time a report was spread about that Süssmayer had had a share in the composition. The publishers did not consider themselves justified in ignoring this, and applied to him for information on the subject. Süssmayer did not deny that the work was partly his. The Leipsic firm published his letter, but accompanied it with the remark that it was not very probable a composer so little known could have been capable of producing music which bore the plain impress of the highest genius. All the musical judges of the period appear to have held the same opinion, for they paid no further attention to the matter. Süssmayer, who died not long afterwards, sank into complete oblivion.

Five-and-twenty years later, the controversy concerning the genuineness of the Requiem, was revived by a musical scholar of Darmstadt, Gottfried Weber, the founder of the Cäcilia paper. A careful examination of the score caused him, as he subsequently communicated, to come to the conclusion that the larger portion of it could not have emanated from Mozart; because, in all his other works, the great master had erred only very rarely against the laws of counterpoint. At the same time, Weber referred to Süssmayer's letter, and pronounced it as his opinion that the young man was only telling the truth when he claimed a portion of the authorship as his. Weber's appearance in the field created a warm controversy, in which many eminent musicians of the day took part. Mozart's widow, who had meanwhile married one of her deceased husband's biographers, preserved, for good reasons, a profound silence, and thus the dispute led to nothing more than Weber's being left in the minority, while the Requiem continued to be regarded as an irrefutable work of Mozart's.

In the year 1839, the matter entered on a new phase. Count Wallsegg was dead, and, some years after his decease, the very original MS. of the Requiem which had been furnished him by Madame Mozart, was found in his library. Count Maximilian Dietschens purchased it for the Imperial Library, Vienna, and this circumstance was the occasion of the whole matter being subjected to a new and thorough examination.

At the first glance, all experts in handwriting declared that the whole score, from the first note to the last, was written exclusively by Mozart. From this it appeared that all the reports about ungenuineness and Süstmayer's co-authorship, were based upon an error, and that the entire work ought to be regarded as exclusively the original production of Mozart. Fortunately, the persons interested had great experience of the forgery of manuscripts, which is sometimes done in the most deceptive manner, and, therefore, resolved to proceed with the utmost care and conscientiousness.

In the first place, they set about procuring the manuscript of such portions of the work which undoubtedly emanated from Mozart's own hand. These they compared with the entire score found in the Count's library. We must here remark that it would certainly have been the widow's interest to make away with all such MSS., and she would not have hesitated to destroy them altogether had her avarice permitted her to do so. After in vain attempting to dispose of them to a Frankfort publisher, on condition that they should be kept secret for a long series of years, she had got rid of the leaves separately, so that it appeared absolutely impracticable then they could ever be collected again. A fortunate chance, however, brought this about; all the pages fell into the hands of judges who were capable of appreciating their value, who placed them at the disposal of the Imperial Library.

Of themselves, these detached pages could not, certainly, excite any suspicion against the complete score. Mozart was accustomed to write down his first sketches upon loose leaves, which subsequently constituted a foundation for working out the whole. But they afforded, at any rate, an admirable opportunity for instituting exact comparisons as to the actual mode of writing the separate notes, words, and lines. These comparisons were made, but it was impossible to detect any difference anywhere. All the manuscripts submitted to examination appeared most decidedly to have emanated from one and the same hand.

Not contented with this, the persons engaged in the investigation procured about eighty other manuscripts, undoubtedly genuine ones of Mozart, and dating from different periods of his life. This rich store of materials was confided to a committee comprising musicians, experts in handwriting, and other duly qualified persons, for the purpose of examining and comparing them with the score of the Requiem recovered from among Count Wallsegg's effects. The committee set to work most conscientiously, and at length declared, and by a large majority, that the score in question might certainly have been written by another hand than Mozart's. A number of Süssmayer's manuscripts had been simultaneously included in the investigation, but they exhibited such very different distinctive marks, that the committee felt fully assured that any forgery executed by Süssmayer would be instantly recognised.

A minority of the committee granted that there was certainly a far greater probability of the genuineness of the score than not; but, at the same time, they considered the following striking points worthy of some consideration :—

1. Under Mozart's name stood the date, 1792, while it is well known that the composer died at the close of the year preceding.

2. The composition contains several passages which must, according to theoretical rules, be pronounced faulty, and hence it can scarcely be assumed they emanate from such a master of composition as Mozart.

3. A slight difference is perceptible in the formation of the signs denoting restoration, which are occasionally more like those in Süssmayer's scores than in Mozart's.

4. A difference is manifest, also, in the initial capitals, B, P, O, R, and T. These letters in the present instance are not like those in Mozart's other scores.

The last two instances of difference mentioned, commence only from the second page. In the first movement it was observed that the forms were invariably those usual in all Mozart's manuscripts.

In conclusion, it appeared that the numbering of the pages did not follow with perfect correctness, nor could it fail to strike anyone that Mozart would have made a fresh copy, instead of filling up and completing the one he had already commenced.

With respect to the error in the year, the committee were reminded that, having begun the work towards the end of one year, Mozart thought probably he should not be able to finish it before the commencement of the next, and for that reason selected the later date. Or he might have made a mistake, just, for instance, as he made one of a similar kind when he dated, with his own hand, a Rondo for the French Horn, "in Vienna, Good Friday, the 6th April, 1792." Now it was the Good Friday of the year 1791 which fell upon the 6th April; consequently, Mozart was in error as to the year. Each of these suggestions appears much more plausible than that anyone, who calmly and deliberately meditates a forgery, should stick to the forged document a date when the pretended author has long been dead.

With regard to the passages attacked upon theoretical grounds, it was argued that, in consequence of the work being so quickly executed, they may have escaped the composer's notice, or may have been left purposely by him, as he might have considered their employment exceptionally justifiable, as such theoretical mistakes being found in the works of many masters, and very often in those of Handel's especially.

Of the somewhat different formation of the marks for restoration, many examples could be adduced from other manuscripts of Mozart; it was a remarkable fact that these marks in the Wallsegg score tallied perfectly with those in the Rondo for the French Horn above mentioned.

The instances of difference in isolated initial capitals were not very glaring, but, on the contrary, were detected only after exceedingly minute comparison. It appeared, moreover, that, for instance, the letter B was formed differently in different manuscripts, and that the letter R in the word "Rondo" of the piece for the French Horn already repeatedly cited, resembled most exactly that in the word "Requiem." The word "finis" on the last page of the Requiem tallied, stroke for stroke, with the same word at the end of another of Mozart's compositions, a composition undoubtedly emanating from his hand, and written in November, 1791. Finally, there was another mark which tended to prove the genuineness of the manuscript. Mozart was in the habit of scribbling detached phrases or musical notes on the margin of pages he had written, and many notes thus scribbled down were remarked in the Wallsegg manuscript.

Finally, with regard to the incorrect numbering of the pages, as well as the improbability of Mozart's having written out the entire work afresh, instead of completing his former sketches, especial importance was attached to an assertion previously made by the widow, that her husband was extremely careless with his manuscripts, and, if a detached leaf got mislaid, was accustomed to supply its place out of his head, an easy task for him, as his memory was in this respect never at fault, instead of taking the trouble to look for the missing leaf.

Still, Stasmayer's own declaration, as well as the evidence bearing upon it, and collected at the time of the Weber controversy, from Mozart's widow and other sources, was important. Stasmayer's pretensions were speedily disposed of, being rejected as presumptuous and highly improbable; his capability of composing such music was denied without more ado, and, as some slight inaccuracies were discovered in his letter, his critics thought themselves justified in doubting the truth of the whole. The widow, too, contradicted herself frequently in her evidence; only modified importance was, therefore, attached to her assertions. Of the other witnesses, it was assumed that they were too imperfectly informed to be accepted as unconditionally worthy of credence.

TOM D'URFEY.

Thomas, better known as "Tom" D'Urfey, was the pet and idol o the age of Charles the Second, who was more than once seen walking up the "Mall" in familiar talk with him, dog and courtiers following behind. Nay, the merry monarch carried his complaisance still further and condescended to sing duets with him, Tom and he holding the music between them—a fact which the poet has recorded in his memoirs with great gusto and satisfaction. D'Urfey was principally known for his songs, which he wrote to old and popular tunes—sometimes, if not invariably, adapting as much as was quotable of the old words and choruses to new themes, and otherwise altering and amending, as Robert Burns did with the popular songs of Scotland more than a century later. The king was partial to the fiddle, as the violins was then called both by the fashionable and the unfashionable, and to those lively airs and jig tunes of which the fiddle was the best exponent. When in exile, with but slight chance of ever sitting on the throne of his ancestors, and when he could but ill afford luxuries of any kind, he lavished such money as he could command upon fiddles and fiddlers. When, after the death of the Great Protector, the Commonwealth of England found itself without a strong hand to rule it, and "the king enjoyed his own again," one of the first things he did was to engage a corps of four-and-twenty fiddlers to play for him during dinner, and his pleasant little private parties and conversations in the evening. It was on these occasions that D'Urfey's services were called into requisition to sing his own songs, not for reward and emolument, but wholly for the honour and glory of singing for the king and basking in the pleasant sunshine of his countenance, and that of the fair and frail ladies in whose society he took most pleasure. At the time of the Restoration, Tom was a gay young fellow of twenty-three, who had abandoned the study of the law for the pursuits of literature and conviviality. During the whole reign of Charles he lived like a prosperous gentleman, making small means to go a long way in keeping up appearances; and being always a welcome guest, not only at the palace, but at the houses of the nobility and rural gentry, where, after dinner he would sing his own songs without much, if any, pressing, and where the hosts and the other guests would join lustily in the chorus. A collection of his songs, under the somewhat coarse title—though it was not considered coarse in that age—of Pills to Purge Melancholy, was published by Tom, and had a highly remunerative sale. The poet lived to the good old age of seventy-four, and was buried in St. James's Church, Piccadilly, where a stone with the simple inscription "Tom D'Urfey, dyed Feb. ye 26th, 1723," points out the spot where he lies. He was not in such favour with the gloomy James the Second and the taciturn William the Third as he was with the merry monarch; but in the reign of Queen Anne he was again taken notice of by the court, and received fifty guineas from her Majesty for writing some verses in ridicule of the Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess-Dowager of Hanover, and mother of George the First. A sample verse will suffice:—

> "The crown's far too weighty
> For shoulders of eighty;
> She could not sustain such a trophy.
> Her hand, too, already
> Was grown so unsteady;
> She can't hold a sceptre,
> So Providence kept her > Away—poor old Dowager Sophy!"

Ten times as much for this poor doggerel as Milton received for "Paradise Lost!" But Tom's songs were better than his satirical pieces, and had a joyous ring about them which commended them to the gay cavaliers of the period. Four of them out of a vast multitude have survived in a lingering state of quasi-vitality to our day.—"The Brave Men of Kent," "Dame Durden," "The Bonny Milk Maid," and "Within a Mile of Edinburgh Town." In our day the Kentish men sometimes sing the song that Tom wrote in their honour, with its roystering chorus:—

> "The men of Kent,
> So loyal, brave, and free,
> 'Mong Britain's race, if one surpass,
> A man of Kent is he."

"Dame Durden" makes a capital glee, and the words and music rattle along together in a manner that King Charles heartily approved, and which will long preserve the little ditty in popular favour:—

> "Dame Durden kept five serving girls
> To carry the milking pail;
> She also kept five labouring men
> To use the spade and flail.
> 'Twas Moll and Bet, and Doll and Kate, and Dorothy Draggletail,
> And Tom and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his flail.
> And Kitty is a charming girl to carry the milking pail."

"The Bonny Milk Maid" is a good description of a country lass by a poet who was pre-eminently a Cockney. But, like other Cockneys of his day and ours, he took much real enjoyment in rural scenes; and his milkmaid is a true picture of a rustic, and not such a caricature of a high born damsel masquerading as a shepherdess, as was the fashion of that artificial age:—

> "When cold bleak winds do roar,
> And flowerets spring no more,
> The fields that were seen,
> So pleasant and green,
> By winter all candied o'er.
> Oh, how the town lass
> Looks with her white face
> And lips so deadly pale:
> But it is not so with those that go
> Through frost and snow, with cheeks that glow,
> To carry the milking pail."

"Within a Mile of Edinburgh Town" was written to please Queen Anne, who was fond of Scottish music, as became a scion of the House of Stuart. But little of it, as now sung, was written by D'Urfey, and the air, in imitation of the Scottish manner, was composed for Vauxhall Gardens towards the end of the last century by Hook the father of Theodore Hook, the wit and novelist.

Tom, who had ceased to be able to sing in the sere and yellow leaf of his age, fell into neglect, if not into penury, and a benefit was arranged for him at Drury Lane Theatre, which both Steele and Addison recommended and publicly supported. The latter was particularly cordial in the Spectator. "Tom D'Urfey," he said, "has made the world merry; and I hope they will make him easy as long as he stays amongst us. This I will take upon me to say: they cannot do a kindness to a more diverting companion, or a more cheerful, honest, or good-natured man." Tom was never married, and as a man about town, and a frequenter of the coffee-houses, was the best known personage of his day. But he long outlived his popularity, and his name and his works are now scarcely known except to literary antiquaries.

GAIETY THEATRE.

Donizetti's comic operetta of Betly is almost unknown to the British public. Some form of English version of it was given, we believe, at one of the minor theatres more than thirty years ago, or very soon after its first production, and a principal scene from it has been performed in Italian, with Mdlle. Alboni in the principal character. It is too slight a work, however, to obtain much hold upon the British public, which leans to musical compositions of a graver order. Betly, has some charming and graceful music written in Donizetti's later and superior style. It was produced at Venice in 1836, immediately after the composer had returned from his first visit to Paris, and had obtained his post of professor of counterpoint at the Naples College of Music. It belongs thus, to the time in which he produced Lucia di Lammermoor. Nothing can be simpler than its plot in which a soldier returning from the war, after fifteen years' absence, finds his sister indisposed to meet the advances of a man he deems suitable for her husband, and ultimately frightens her into the marriage he desires. The method of narration has much archness, which is enhanced by delicate and graceful music. Mdlle. Florence Lancia plays Betly, the heroine, pleasantly, singing with good intonation and faultless method. Mr. Cummings is thoroughly agreeable as the lover, and Mr. Aynsley Cook comic as the returning soldier. These revivals at the Gaiety are well done, and therefore popular.

MUSIC IN BRADFORD, YORKSHIRE.

(From a Correspondent.)

The rapid increase of the population of this flourishing town has produced a very natural desire for a corresponding increase of intellectual entertainments, and we have great pleasure in noticing the vast improvements which have been brought about in the management of concerts and musical gatherings. The oldest society of the town, the "Choral Society," has discontinued giving public performances, though its meetings are held regularly. However, a younger institution, the "Bradford Festival Choral Society," which derived its origin from the musical festivals which were held here some ten or twelve years ago, has acquired a well-earned notoriety by its assistance at various musical festivals in the provinces, as well as at the Handel Festivals at the Crystal Palace. Mr. James Broughton, of Leeds, is at present the conductor of this Society which has given its first concert of the season last Thursday, a detailed notice of which we shall publish next week.

For the last five years a few gentlemen, in conjunction with Mr. Charles Hallé, have arranged first-class concerts at St. George's Hall, a noble building capable of affording sitting room to upwards of 3,000 people. These concerts take place once a month during the winter, and are sustained by Mr. Hallé's splendid band of 70 performers, who come over from Manchester, and in oratorios by the entire strength of the Festival Choral Society; for the solo parts the best available London and foreign talent is engaged. When these concerts were commenced they resulted in a rather serious loss, but by dint of perseverance the committee has succeeded in making them self-supporting after a few years, and now they have become a permanent institution of the town. Chamber music finds its exponents in Mr. John Burton, a very clever piano player, who arranges occasional concerts, and in Mr. Gustav Wolff, a young German pianist and composer of great promise, who gives three classical concerts every season, and whose endeavours to promote the taste for the highest class of music find a ready response in the increasing numbers that attend his performances. Besides a number of very pleasing and cleverly written songs and smaller pieces for piano, Mr. Wolff has produced a trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, which was performed with great success last season. The popular department of music is now in the hands of Mr. Morgan, a local caterer of great energy, who gives concerts and other entertainments every Saturday night at St. George's Hall, at very low prices of admission.

MUSIC IN PHILADELPHIA.

It is too hot in our city of red bricks and level streets, to think much of amusements or of anything that necessitates full-dress or bright lights. The theatres open in a week or so, but music is still flirting at the sea-shore, or playing the mountaineer up in the North. It is to be supposed that our musicians have some ideas concerning their coming campaigns, but the few who are in town are very indisposed to talk much about them. The Academy of Music reports but one engagement of consequence; of course we will have our share of the stars of the day, but they either have not arranged their orbits, or have not thought it necessary to notify the local astronomers of their intentions. One enterprise is however fairly under way, for Mark Hassler, a well-known and competent leader of our city, fired by the exploits of Gilmore's military band, has organized one of excellent materials and size, and will probably make a prominent feature upon all occasions when it can be used.

Of orchestral music there is yet no mention, but it certainly becomes us to be active in this respect. Our musical weakness lies in our orchestral performances, and last season it was very rarely that we had one that was passably good. We have the nucleus of an admirable orchestra, but there is also too much dead wood in each organization, and the apathy of those who play for money soon chills the ardour of the younger members who have some artistic ambition. But if we had a new conductor who was willing to face and conquer difficulties, who had some love for his art for its own sake, and who, animated by the ambition of taking a first class position where he would finally be not only appreciated, but warmly seconded, to come to our aid, there is nothing too much for him to hope for. Several of our leaders have ability, and some ambition, but in our present state we want fresh, new blood to make orchestral music vital and active. As to the musicians we offer them in our pleasant city in our well-arranged and inexpensive houses, in our fine markets, comforts they can find in no other city, for nowhere else are such homes offered for scanty purses.

The two well-known societies, the old and the young Maennerchor, have combined, but unable to get a name that would be distinctive and satisfying to everybody, have simply joined their titles, and will hereafter be "The Old and Young Maennerchor." Why it would not suit them to be "The Maennerchor" is best known to themselves.

The prospects for our Beethoven celebration seem bright and promising. It is reported that among the German celebrations will be a performance of Fidelio, but this seems rather doubtful. The most important will most probably be that given by the "Beethoven Society" on the birthday of the composer. The programme will be miscellaneous and is well-arranged, with the proper and artistic desire not to undertake anything it cannot perform in a worthy manner. The conductor, Carl Wolfsohn, is however so well known from his Beethoven interpretations that there can be no risk of disaster if he but keeps everything well in hand.

Messrs. Wolfsohn and Jarvis will each give their series of concerts, and the Handel and Haydn, the Parlour Quintet Club, are all quite reliable for performances, so that after the mosquitoes and the warm days are gone and the Quakeress returns, there will be a proper degree of activity among the keyed instruments, the reeds, the brass, and the strings. There will be clearing of throats and industrious practisings, so that then I can give you some idea of what our winter prospects are likely to be.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

The coming musical season is likely to be a busy one, and there is every indication that it will be an exceedingly brilliant one. The visit of Nilsson, the Thomas concerts, the Harvard concerts, the Beethoven observances, the oratorio performances (in some of which Nilsson is sure to take part), the Handel and Haydn Festival in the Spring (in which. It is also hoped, Nilsson will likewise take part) and the great Gilmore Festival of the early summer, will make busy work for our concert goers and concert reviewers.

Mr. Theodore Thomas's series of concerts will be the first thing in order. The series will embrace ten concerts on the following dates:—Tuesday, Oct. 4th, Wednesday 5th, Thursday 6th, Friday 7th, Saturday 8th (afternoon and evening), Monday 10th, Friday 14th, and Saturday 15th (afternoon and evening). Miss Anna Mehlig and other artists are to assist at these concerts, and a great number of works entirely new here are to be performed.

The Harvard concerts will open November 3rd. The following symphonies will be performed in the course of the season: Nov. 3rd, Beethoven's No. 8 in F; Nov. 17th, Haydn's C minor No. 9; Dec. 1st, Mozart's in C (Jupiter); Dec. 15th, Beethoven's No. 7; Jan. 5th, Schubert's in C, No. 2; Jan. 26th, Mendelssohn's in A minor (Scotch); Feb. 9th, Schumann's E flat (Cologne); Feb 23rd. Gade's in A minor, No. 3 (first time); March 9th, Schubert's in C arranged by Joachim from Grand Duo. Op. 140 (first time); March 23rd, Beethoven's Eroica, or No. 5. The orchestra works of Bach, Gluck, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Gade, Rietz, Liszt, Wagner, Rossini, Raff, Grim, Volkmann, etc., concertos and solos by Bach, Viotti, Spohr, Moscheles, Chopin, and the vocal works of Mozart, Beethoven, Bach, Schumann, and others, will also be laid under contribution.

Mdlle. Nilsson's concerts will take place on the 21st, 22nd, and 24th of October. Four oratorio performances in November in conjunction with the Handel and Haydn Society, and four more in January, are among the things talked of, but nothing definite will be done regarding them until Mr. Strakosch returns. Miss Anna Cary (Mdlle. Cari as she has been Frenchified and Italianized abroad), who is to accompany Nilsson in her American tour, is a much esteemed Boston vocalist who has been absent in Europe several years.

The Handel and Haydn Society will give no oratorio performances until Christmas time, unless it be in conjunction with Nilsson as above suggested. The regular rehearsals will begin on the first Monday evening in October. Preparations will early be made for the festival, which is appointed for the second or third week in May. It will include five oratorio performances and several miscellaneous concerts, and probably one or more new oratorios will be given.

The arrangements for the observance of Beethoven's birthday have not been fully completed, as all the leading musicians and musical people, are yet out of town. It will be, however, an appropriate demonstration, and the leading musical organizations of the city will participate in the course of the three days.

Mr. Gilmore is, of course, awaiting the result of present events in Europe, before he enters full into the preparations for his great Jubilee. Should Europe be convulsed in war next spring, the affair will be postponed, but it is much to be hoped, and in fact, circumstances seem to indicate, that a genuine "Peace Jubilee" may be celebrated by that time. Meanwhile Mr. Gilmore is busy in shaping his plans, and when the proper time shall arrive, he will be prepared to push forward his preparations. The plans for a building capable of containing one hundred thousand persons, and other details are already engaging attention, as is also the musical selections to be sung. When the festival does take place it will be the grandest affair of the kind ever projected, far eclipsing in magnitude the Peace Jubilee of last year.

VIENNA.—Sig. Cereza is still being assiduou-ly "coached up" in German for his début at the Imperial Operahouse. He was formerly first tenor at the Italian Opera. Having amassed a large fortune, he retired. He lost it all, however, by unfortunate speculations, and consequently determined on returning to the stage. He is said to possess a voice such as has not been heard since the time of Fraschini. He will first appear as Eleazar in La Juive.—The "Gesell-chafts-concerte" recommence, on the 20th Nov., with Handel's Israel in Egypt.

SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

(From a Correspondent.)

Mr. J. Spencer Curwen read a paper before the Congress at Newcastle last week on the Philanthropic Aspect of the Tonic Sol-fa Movement. Starting with a quotation from the late Mr. W. E. Hickson, who said the Germans had been changed from a drunken to a sober nation by the influence of singing in their common schools, the author dwelt on the immense power music wields over the hearts of men—all the greater because, unlike painting and sculpture, it is independent of culture. And it was in singing rather than in playing our instruments, that the universal art would always find the most universal expression. But on the wide difference between singing by ear and reading music he was anxious to insist. It was the difference between learning to repeat a French poem by rote and learning to read the French language. If it was doubted whether this power of reading music could be imparted to the ignorant and the child, Mr. Curwen answered that it had been done, and was being done, by means of the simplified notation, and exact arrangement of topics known as Tonic Sol-fa; and though he had chosen in addressing a company of social reformers to speak of the philanthropic aspect of the work, it was incorrect to suppose that the Tonic Sol-fa movement only existed among the ignorant and uncultured. The author then proceeded to quote letters from the governors of reformatories, Band of Hope teachers, clergymen, and town missionaries, describing their experience in the use of the Tonic Sol-fa method of singing. The uniform testimony was that, having tried in vain to interest their pupils in the established notation, they had been led to take up the new, with best results. As to whether equal results could be obtained by the old system, these teachers, by taking up the new, had declared that they could not; and, more than this, the universal testimony was that, in the short time necessary, it was utterly impossible to explain the complex and contradictory signs of the staff notation. Teachers said that if they had not Tonic Sol-fa they must teach by ear as an alternative, the established notation being far out of the question. At the same time the relations of the two notations were quite friendly, for music was an abstract thing, independent alike of quavers and crotchets and of Sol-fa letters; and the pupil who was travelling to her citadel on one road would have no difficulty in crossing over to the parallel road close at hand. This was proved by experience, for Sol-faists were in fact under the old notation quickly without a master's aid, and musicians of the old school had learned to read Sol-fa at a sitting. Mr. Curwen also maintained that the good old Tonic principle, on which the system was so firmly built, was the best key to the difficulties of the old notation; and that, in fact, the Sol-fa letter notation first was the best introduction to the staff notation. Replying to the common statement that the success of the movement was due to the enthusiasm of its promoters, the author thought that history reads us no plainer lesson than that enthusiasm directed upon merely objects is stifled and paralyzed, and that truth only can alike kindle and sustain it. He concluded by urging upon those who have leisure for benevolent work the claims of this form of it upon them, ending as he had begun, with a passage from Mr. Hickson, who asked what penal measures and moral exhortations had done to soften and refine the coarser manhood of so many of our countrymen, and said—"Why not try to work upon them through the medium of their amusements?"

Mr. Colin Brown Ewing, lecturer on music at the Andersonian University of Glasgow, said he remembered the introduction of the system into Glasgow, had watched its spread through the various institutions of the town, and amongst the various sections of the people, and from the great difficulty experienced in perfecting scholars in the reading of music there had been in the last ten years not less than 20,000 children annually taught under the system, to read music as easily as any other description of writing. He had been struck by the change of music in the streets; and instead of those airs which might be picked up at a public-house or concert hall, the finest airs either religious or secular, and from the best authors, were heard. He was struck by this fact most forcibly on seeing some boys passing beneath his office window, who were carrying baskets on their heads, yet who were singing a part-song by Mendelssohn, as they went. The system had received the opposition of musicians generally but this did not prevent its spreading, and there was now scarcely a school in Glasgow without it. The cause of its success was, first, its simplicity, and secondly, its scientific usefulness; indeed, having it simple, having it good, and having it cheap, had been the means of introducing it amongst all sections of the people. It had been successfully introduced into the sabbath-schools, and choirs had been formed from the ranks of the scholars, and the result was, that in Scotland, where church music was proverbial for its badness, the choirs were the best now to be found anywhere. Having referred to the fact that out of a hundred candidates who obtained prizes and certificates at the last examination of the pupils in the Society of Arts, 57 were from Scotland; the speaker related an anecdote of Madame Rudersdorff, who after taking part in a concert, and receiving one of the books that each of the three hundred choristers used, had in a letter home (a notice of which had appeared in the Cologne Gazette) pronounced the Glasgow chorus as the most correct in its singing of any she had ever heard. At the concert each of the audience had a book of be music sung, turning over the leaves as regularly as the artist, and Madame Rudersdorff added that she would much sooner sing before a guinea London audience than have to go before a shilling Glasgow audience.

Mr. J. M'Kendrick bore testimony to the change effected by the introduction of the system into Newcastle, amounting as it did almost to a revolution.

The Chairman tendered the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Curwen.

Passion Plays.

The theatre is a large open wooden building at the west end of the village. The stage consists of a proscenium eighty feet wide by twenty feet deep, a covered-in stage thirty-six feet wide in the centre of the stage, with curtain, &c., as in ordinary theatres. In this the tableaux vivants, consisting of types from the Old Testament, are represented, as well as the different scenes in the play, such has Christ in the Temple, The Last Supper, The Crucifixion, &c. On either side of the stage are the houses of Pontius Pilate on the left, and Annas on the right; and on either side again of these are the streets of Jerusalem. The auditorium, capable of holding nearly six thousand persons, is uncovered, and affords no protection against rain or sun, except quite at the back, where wa had fortunately reserved seats. During the performance—which lasted eight hours, with one hour's pause—the large audience sat patiently on the rows of benches under a continuous downpour of heavy rain, which must have drenched them to the skin. Precisely at eight o'clock the chorus (numbering twenty persons, ten men and ten women) enter the stage from corresp nding doors on either side, and arrange themselves in a row across the proscenium, according to their height, the tallest in the centre. They are dressed, men and women alike, in long flowing robes of different colours; over these are white tunics of a light material, and bright coloured mantles fall gracely from the shoulders. Their hair is long, and flows over the shoulders, and they wear coronets on their heads. Their gestures are graceful and expressive, their movements slow and measured, and their general appearance indicates the solemn nature of their duties, which after the manner of the chorus in the old Greek plays, are to explain to the audience the different tableaux as they are presented on the stage, being types of the different scenes in the play, and to impress, upon all, the important lessons to be derived from them.

ARTEMUS WARD IN LONDON.

It is a sing lar fact, but I never set eyes on your excellent British Museum till to-day. I've sent a great many strangers there, and have been to your Tower of London, however. It happened thusly: When one of my excellent countrymen just arrived in London would come and see me and display a inclination to cling to me too lengthy, thus showin a respect for me which I feel I do not deserve, I would suggest a visit to the Museum and Tower. The Museum would ockepy him a day at least, and the Tower another. Thus I've derived considerable peace and comfort from them noble edifices, and I hope they will long continuer to grace your metropolis. There's my frend Col. Larkins, from Wisconsin, who I regret to say understands the Jamaica question, and wants to talk with me about it; I sent him to the Tower four days ago, and he hasn't got through with it yit. He likes it very much, and he writes me that he can't never thank me sufficient for directin him to so interestin a bildin. I writ him not to mention it. The col. says it is fortnit we live in a intelleckooal age which wouldn't countenance such infamus things as occurred in this Tower. I'm aware that it is fashin ble to compliment this age, but I ain't so clear that the col. is altogether right. This is a very respectable age, but it's pretty easily riled; and considerin upon how slight a provycation we who live in it go to entire each other's throats, it may perhaps be doubted whether our intellecks is so much massiver than our ancestors' intellecks was, after all.

* * * I first visited the stuffed animals, of which tha gorillers interested me most. These simple-minded monsters live in Afriky, and are believed to be human beings to a slight extent, altho' they are not allowed to vote. In this department is one or two superior giraffes. I never wouldled I were a bird, but I've sometimes wished I was a giraffe, on account of the long distance from his mouth to his stummuck. Hence, if he loved beer, one mugful would give him as much enjoyment while going down as forty mugfuls would ordinary persons. And he wouldn't get intoxicated, which is a beastly way of amusin oneself, I must say. I like a little beer now and then, and when the teetotallers inform us, as they frekently do, that it is vile stuff, and that even the hogs shrink from it, I say it only shows that the swine is a sensible beast. Now what's good; but to pour gin and brandy down one's throat as freely as though it were fresh milk, is the most idiotic way of goin' to the devil that I know of.

Eisleben.—The Oratorio Association lately gave a concert for the benefit of the soldiers wounded in the war. The programme was made up of compositions by J. S. Bach, Handel, Stradella, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Professor Fink. A very deep impression was produced by the fact that, as the soprano air, "Der du die Menschen sterben lassest" ("Thou who lettest men die") originally composed by Mendelssohn for St. Paul, was being sung, the bell of the neighbouring Roman Catholic church began tolling for a soldier brought from Strasburg who had died of his wounds. Herr Friedrich Fink, master in the Conservatory of Music, Stuttgardt, performed, with marked ability, an organ prelude, in E flat major, by J. S. Bach.

NILSSON'S DÉBUT IN NEW YORK.

(From the "New York Herald.")

Had the début of this beautiful and gifted young Swedish artist proved anything less than the great success which it did last night we should have been disappointed. But who could be dissatisfied with such a grand occasion? The art-loving public have been waiting with anxiety and expectation for, the advent of a great artist, of whose wonderful voice, great beauty and exquisite dramatic intelligence the Old World has been singing praises. The worshippers of art and the devotees of fashion crowded the house to hear Mdlle. Nilsson last night at Steinway Hall. So fair, so critical and so enraptured an audience has probably never assembled to welcome a young aspirant for the tributes of the American people, and surely never had genius a nobler recognition than was accorded to Nilsson. It is true that she filled to the full measure the highest expectations entertained of her, and, indeed, in many things surpassed them. The perfect figure—lithe, active, graceful in every motion, the type, indeed, and the model of life in its womanly perfection —harmonizes with the extreme purity which characterizes a face formed in a mould of classic beauty and radiant with the halo of innocence. The wonderful capacity of that girlish face to transform its expression to suit every interpretation of thought or passion was superbly manifested in the grand Ophelia scene from Hamlet. Nothing perhaps so electrical has been witnessed in a concert room in this country before. Without any of the accessories of the stage all the dramatic effects were produced with a wonderful fidelity to the story of the poor mind-tossed Ophelia that kept the audience literally bound in a spell.

Nilsson's voice is, strictly speaking, comparable to no other artist than Jenny Lind, of which, in point of immense power and delicacy combined, it much reminds one. In higher cultivation and distinctness of intonation, perhaps, she surpasses her predecessor. Success so unqualified as that which crowned the début of the young Scandinavian warbler is rarely bestowed by a New York audience except upon genius of the highest order. We are strengthened, therefore, in what we have always upheld, that sterling talent finds its high-tariff most judiciously disposed reward from the people of this country. It is no wonder, then, that Nilsson received an ovation too genuine to be mistaken from an audience composed of the most refined portion of the community—no wonder that when the last notes of her voice died away in the exquisite Swedish ballad which she gave in response to an encore, for the cavatina from Traviata, her countrymen should have assembled in a vast concourse and thronged the carriage to her hotel amid the wildest enthusiasm. The first one of the modes in which people express their appreciation of those entitled to honour; but the earnest, honest verdict upon Christine Nilsson's claims to the title of a great artist was best rendered by the two thousand people in Steinway Hall.

The picture would not be complete without its frame. It would be incomplete if we did not tell how kindly the audience recognized their old friends with a hearty welcome—Vieuxtemps, Wehli, and Brignoli —and how quickly they recognized in the fair débutante, Annie Louise Cary, a contralto of great purity, and an artist of more than ordinary merit; how they acknowledged in Verger, the new comer, from the Italian Operahouse, London, a baritone such as we have not heard for a long time, and how Flora and her whole tribe of art-radiant hurtiest-turi-ts were drawn upon to cover Nilsson from foot to forehead with sweet-scented tributes, representing all fantastic things known to land and water; in short, how an audience composed of the highest intelligence in this city most cordially endorsed Christine Nilsson as a grand artist worthy of all the honours she has won in the Old World and may win in the New.

The war pictures lent to the Crystal Palace Company by the proprietors of the Illustrated London News and the Graphic and laid open, to public view on Saturday, have a higher interest than many more finished productions, as they were taken on the spot, at the risk of life and limb, by gentlemen more zealous in pourtraying incidents than prudent in avoiding the danger of being arrested and shot as spies, not to speak of stray bullets. These artists have represented the most important scenes of the fields of battle, and faithfully delineated the striking incidents of the campaign.

MDLLE. NILSSON IN AMERICA.

A fortnight ago we were able to publish a special telegram announcing the great success of Mdlle. Nilsson's first appearance in New York. That the press of the Empire City agreed with the audience let the following extracts show :—

(From the "Herald.")

Mdlle. Nilsson sang "Angels ever bright and fair," the celebrated mad scene from Hamlet and the cavatina, "Ah! fora è lui." When she first made her appearance she received such an enthusiastic reception as rarely falls to the lot of any artist, and flowers, from the huge pyramid down to the tiny nosegay, were showered on the stage. The quality of her voice is so different from that of the Italian and English artists we have been so long accustomed to that when the first notes of the simple, childlike little air of Handel fell on the ear a feeling of wonder at first pervaded the audience. The quality of the voice is extraordinary clear and penetrating; it has none of the voluptuous roundness of the Italian school, but a limpidity, delicacy and transparent depth which is susceptible of the most intense expression and tenderness. This selection from Handel was so simple and touching that it requires a world of soul and feeling to give it the required interpretation. By her artless, unaffected rendering of it Nilsson won at once, not the expressed applause, but what was a higher compliment, the deep attention and sympathy of her hearers. The mad scene in Hamlet, where the unhappy Ophelia bids farewell to the gay court of Denmark, was sung and acted with such mingled abandon, childish glee and sad feeling that the entire audience broke forth in an avalanche of applause. But the crowning feature was the exquisite morceau, "Ah fors e lui." The andantino, was given with an intensity of passion and tenderness such as the operatic and concert stage has long been stranger to, and the wild, reckless spirit which is conveyed in the cabaletta, "Sempre Libera," was a whirlwind of mingled despair and gaiety. Nilsson never resorts to inartistic tricks to gain applause. Her style is finished and yet simple. What surprises us most was the breadth of tone apparent in her voice. She rarely displayed it, however, to its full extent, as we have heard from other artists, but keep it under admirable control. This apparent self-abnegation is true proof of art. We can say of Christine Nilsson what was said of Jenny Lind, whom she resembles in her voice and style, that we have heard an artist who makes a conscience of her art.

(From the "Tribune.")

When Mr. Maretzek led the prima donna upon the stage they saw a slight and graceful figure, beautifully dressed in white, with a few simple trimmings of green leaves and white blossoms; a fair sweet face, a charming smile, deep eyes, and the light golden hair which is the glory of the Northern women. She bowed gracefully before the storm of welcome, but with a little discomposure which was not unpleasant to see; and then, after a few notes of prelude from the orchestra, burst into the introductory recitative of "Angels ever bright and fair." For all our expectations, the first tones took us by surprise. From one so young, so delicate, we were not prepared for anything like the volume and richness of sound which the first measures displayed. As the song went on, and from the stately prelude she passed to the ethereal tenderness of the touching old song, breathing out its tender and pensive strains with such rare purity, such perfect intonation, such incomparable softness, our wonder grew that in this young girl should thus be united excellences which it has seldom been given the greatest singers to combine in their highest perfection,—majesty, richness, power, and delicacy like the breathing of a gentle breeze. The same extraordinary gifts of voice were equally well displayed in her second piece, the mad-scene of Ophelia but in this she showed more fully than in Handel's song the true refinement of her style, the extent of her vocal culture, and her marked talents as an actress which not even the restraints of the concert-stage could wholly conceal. We can imagine what an effect this scene must have had upon the Paris stage. Yet there can be no harm in saying here in Steinway Hall the scene is a very dull one. At the opera it comes in the fourth act, and the preceding three are such unmitigated dolefulness that Ophelia would come like a vision from the realms of the blest, if she came singing nothing better than "Old Dan Tucker." Taken out of its sombre setting, the scene lacks the advantage of contrast with surrounding gloom, and suffers accordingly. While its performance may have been relished last night by musicians capable of appreciating the peculiar ability which it served in display on the part of the singer, it was far less keenly relished by the audience generally than the "Ah! fors e lui" from La Traviata. It was in the part of Violetta that she won her first successes both in Paris and in London, and we are not sure but we ought to call this aria her principal success of last night.

It is not difficult, to pronounce after a single hearing upon the secret of Mdlle. Nilsson's success. She is young, she is beautiful, she is charming in her ways, and she has one of the most exquisitely lovely voices ever given to a woman. It is a voice altogether exceptional. Its purity is perfect; its quality is without a flaw; its evenness from the lowest tones of the soprano register even to those empyrean heights which Carlotta Patti glories in scaling, has no parallel within our existence. There is not a harsh nor a shrill, nor a husky note in its whole range. All is exquisitely sweet, all is fresh and beautiful as the singer's own face.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PUSCHIELLO.—No. Both the papers named by our correspondent are in error. Donizetti's Betly was never played entire at the Royal Italian Opera. In 1847 one scene from it used to be given, between opera and ballet (there was then ballet at both houses)—the scene containing the well-known Tyrolienne, "In questo semplice," which Alboni used to sing in such perfection.

A RECENT ACADEMICIAN.—An overture to the Tempest, an overture in D minor, and an overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor, all preceded the overture to Paranina. The one immediately following Paranina was an overture, styled Dramatic Overture. Of course Professor Bennett will allow none of these to be heard; and of course still he will let the world know nothing of the six symphonies preceding the one in G minor which (happily) he has permitted us to know; and yet not one should be permitted to die—and most particularly the No. 5 (in A), and the No. 6 (in G minor).

S. L., JUN. (Liverpool).—Meyerbeer's Prophète was first brought out in London at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Mr. Gye, in the summer of 1849, with Madame Viardot and Sig. Mario in the principal characters. The same composer's Pardon de Ploermel, under the title of Dinorah, was produced at the same theatre, and under the same management, in the summer of 1859. Sir Michael (then Mr.) Costa was conductor on both occasions. Verdi's "Exhibition Cantata" (1862), though not given, as intended, at the opening of the Exhibition, was once performed at Her Majesty's Theatre during the same summer. We believe that it was published by Boosey & Co. The other questions of our correspondent it is not in our province to answer. To reply to them would be to advertise the catalogues of music-publishers gratis.

THOMAS ADDER.—We happen to have had the article in our possession. In the main, Mr. Adder's memory has served; but as he will see, on perusing the paragraph to which he refers, there are one or two discrepancies in his preamble:—

"Fiat Justitia, especially when a fair city's honour is at stake. Yesterday I spoke of what seemed the apathy of Hereford in view of its Festival, and sought ingenious reasons why such apathy may have been excusable. It turns out that Hereford was merely circumspect, the inhabitants reserving both enthusiasm and bunting till the sun shone. No sooner was the order given, 'Pack, clouds away,' than the population descended into the streets, flags flaunted from the windows, and the little city put on an appearance thoroughly equal to the occasion. Fair weather continues, and Hereford is to-day more than ever taken possession of by its Festival. From the Cathedral Close to the city boundaries there are signs of the solemnity in progress; while even those who can only hope to catch the faintest echoes of the music wear a holiday and contented look. That the phenomenon of a Royal visit has something to do with these results may be assumed; but I must not anticipate what will have to be said in its proper connection."

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1870.

BEETHOVEN AND THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

CENTENARY homage to Beethoven has been sadly disturbed by the war. Germany, we are assured, would have done its best to honour one of its greatest sons, had the piping times of peace continued; and Beethoven would, pro tem., have reigned Lord Paramount over the nation of "culture." But, as matters now stand, the will must be taken for the deed. German brains have something else to think about, and German hands something else to do, while Bismarck, not Beethoven, is the man of the hour, and the national admiration directs itself more towards Von Moltke's strategy than to the Eroica symphony. By-and-by, perhaps, when the end of the war has come, Germany may remember Beethoven; but the victor's laurel-wreath is an absorbing toy. What, however, as regards "the balance of the world"?—for there are, as yet, a few countries not included in the reply to "where is the German's Fatherland"?

If Beethoven, like Shakspere, was "not for an age, but for all time," he was, also, not national, but cosmopolitan. Every country able to appreciate his genius may claim him, and share equally with "kinsmen according to the flesh" in the glorious legacy of his works. We are bound to say, however, that no very hearty appreciation of the fact has yet been shown. Poor France, of course, can do nothing, and we do not gratuitously insult her when we doubt whether, if she could, she would. Elsewhere on the Continent it would be idle to look. A Beethoven Commemoration has had place in America; but the great name was merely trashed on,—turned into a Yankee "notion," and sold, wrapped up in a copy of "Hail, Columbia" As for England, where thousands really, and tens of thousands affectedly, appreciate the master's genius, it at one time seemed as though nothing whatever would be done. The Birmingham Festival managers honoured the Centenary with half a programme; the Hereford Festival managers overlooked it altogether; and but a few hole-and-corner festivities have taken place elsewhere. Undoubtedly, till within the last few weeks, we were justified in fearing that England would let the occasion slip, and by refusing to grace it, disgrace herself. A conclusion to this effect must, however, have been arrived at without taking the Crystal Palace into account. No more serious omission could exist under the special circumstances of the case. The American aloe blooms but once in a hundred years; and the Crystal Palace makes a fuss over its flowers when they come. Was it likely that an equally rare event of far greater import would be overlooked; especially at a place where the managers publish a musical calender in weekly instalments? Assuredly not; and those who were confident in such a belief are now justified by the result. Beethoven is receiving honour at the Crystal Palace—not honour in an avalanche, such as that bestowed every three years upon Handel, but in exquisitely measured dribletts, with a promise of something special at the end. As a boy prolongs the sweet enjoyment of a tart by biting round the edges, and finally swallowing the jam, so the master is, perforce, to receive the tribute of his English admirers. Let us hasten to approve the arrangement as one far more useful, as well as more worthy, than the pretentious fuss of a regulation fête. He honours Beethoven most who most reverently studies his works, and in affording the best opportunity for so doing, the Crystal Palace not only fulfils its mission, but redeems the credit of a nation.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Moritz O. Klengel, formerly leader in the Theatre and the Gewandhaus Band, and teacher in the Conservatory, died on the 14th ult. in his 78th year.

PRAGUE.—A national and historical opera, Bretislaw, words by Krasnohorska, and music by Herr Carl Bendl, has just been produced, with what the local German Czeck paper terms great "outward" success.

CASSEL.—At the Industrial Exhibition, which closed on the 1st inst., prizes were awarded: To Herr W. Biese, Berlin, for great excellence in the manufacture of square pianofortes; to the firm of J. Blüthner, Leipsic, for excellence in the manufacture of grand pianos; to Herren Mollenhauer & Sons, Fulda, for wind instruments; to Herr K. Scheel, Cassel, for pianinos; to Herren J. & F. Schiedmayer, Stuttgarda, for harmoniums; to Herr Torletzky, Elbing, for a drawing-room organ; and to Herr Ed. Zacharia, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, for a newly invented pedal for instruments with key-boards.

BRUSSELS.—At the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Mdlle. Bloch has appeared in La Favorita. She was well—but not ecstatically—received. The critic of Le Guide Musical says she possesses a superb voice, a magnificent person, that she sings with skill, displays experience of the stage, and yet fails ever to electrify the house, for want of one spark of sacred fire. Another fair fugitive from the Grand Opera, Paris, who has appeared here is Mad. Sass. She sang in Robert le Diable. Of course, she achieved a great success.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THERE is no foundation for a report published by a weekly contemporary that Mr. Santley had been seriously ill. On the contrary, our vigorous baritone was never in his life more seriously well. True, he has been to Jersey (not Wight—as another weekly contemporary puts it); but visiting Jersey and being seriously unwell are distinct matters.

At the Crystal Palace Concert to-day, the Beethoven symphony is the No. 2 (D). Good. There are three overtures in the programme —Rossini's Siège de Corinthe, Sterndale Bennett's Paradise and the Peri, and Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream (all good, we need hardly add). The singers are Madame Vanzini, whom we know; Signor Foli, whom we know; and Mr. Nordblom, whom we don't know. Why is there no Beethoven concerto—Alexandre Billet being in London?

MR. COLIN BROWN EUING, Lecturer on Music at the Andersonian University of Glasgow, made a speech at the Social Science Congress, and said:—"Madame Ruderadorff added that she would sooner sing before a guinea London audience than have to go before a shilling Glasgow audience." We have no more doubt that Madame Ruderadorff expressed her real sentiments than we have that Mr. Euing construes her words into a splendid compliment for the Glasgow mechanics. What a thing is a Scotchman's belief in Scotch supremacy! No doubt Mr. Euing is in other matters "canny" enough.

DR. J. MENDEL, organist at the Cathedral of Berne, speaking of "Die Wacht am Rhein," says that, as originally written by MAX SCHNECKENBURGER, it had no burden, but each of the six strophes consisted of six lines, the last one only concluding with the words, "Lieb Vaterland," etc. Dr. Mendel, who, in 1840, at the author's request, set the song, always made the above two final lines the invariable burden, and supplemented the concluding strophe with the double verse, "Zum Rhein, zum Rhein," etc. Schneckenburger approved of these alterations in the text, and thus the song was first published as "by M. Sch.," music by J. Mendel. Just as it was first sung in Burgdorf at the Town Hall by the author's friends, Spiess, Blösch, Buri, Roller, Haas, Dürr, etc., it was first sung at Berne in the house of the Prussian Ambassador, Herr von Bunsen, before a numerous circle specially invited, by a small choral association, in which Herr Methfessel, the Musikdirector, who then resided at Berne, sang the first tenor part, and Dr. E. Gelpke, Professor of Theology, the second. The song was then printed and sent about. But the proper moment had been allowed to pass by; Becker's "Rheinlied" had already monopolized the public ear. Dr. Mendel intends including in a second edition of his compositions for male chorus, which he is shortly about to publish, his musical version of "Die Wacht am Rhein." "A quoi bon?" impartial people might remark, except to gratify Dr. Mendel personally. It seems, however, strange that the latter object can be achieved by the worthy Doctor's drawing especial attention to the fact that, had no one but himself set "Die Wacht am Rhein" that now world-renowned song would long since have been forgotten.

IN a review of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's last novel (Beauty— something), which appeared in the pages of a contemporary, we find the subjoined:—

"Another amusing though slight photograph is that of Mr. Mendelssohn Jackson, the music master, who would be a gentleman. Mr. Mendelssohn Jackson is a genuine revelation of Mr. Fitzgerald's. We recognise the truth of the portraiture at once, and also fairly confess that it has been taken from the life, and at first hand."

Who is recognized? Which among our "music-masters"—for the most part quite as much gentlemen as Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, or the literary editor of our contemporary?

AT the annual book trade sale of New York, when the auctioneers reached Mrs. Stowe's book of Defamation of Lord Byron in the catalogue, it was found impossible to get a bid for it. Half a cent a volume was offered amidst shouts of derision. At last the lot was sold for about its value at the paper mill.

THE ATHENÆUM AND ST PETER.

To the Editor of the "Sunday Times."

SIR,—On returning to town a few days ago, I saw, for the first time, a paragraph taken from the Athenæum, and some comments of your own thereupon. Permit me to supplement the latter. I promise to be brief, and so clear that even your contemporary shall understand me, I promise, further, to make my statement final; seeing that you have no space, and I have neither time nor inclination for a lengthened squabble with wounded pride and its sympathizers. The following are preliminary observations:—

I. I can add nothing to your just rebuke of a gross violation of press etiquette by the Athenæum. Personally, however, I have no reason to complain, since it opens your columns to this letter.

II. Before charging me with partiality, the Athenæum should have looked at home. That journal allows Mr. Chorley to air his private grievances in its pages; identifies itself with his cause, and then twits others with a biassed mind. A manifest case, you will say, of stone-throwing by a dweller in a glass house.

III. The remarks I have made in your paper, and elsewhere, must stand or fall by their own force, or want of it. The question of partiality does not affect them. Misrepresentation, for example, is none the less misrepresentation because pointed out, by, say, an advocate such as the Athenæum has made itself on Mr. Chorley's behalf. I come now to the main issue.

Mr. Chorley describes me (and the Athenæum is obviously proud of the description) as "a gentlemen who consented to accept the strange task of remodelling another man's production." What a pity it is when the imagination has to be drawn upon for facts! I consented to accept no such "strange task." Dissatisfied with Mr. Chorley's libretto, the composer of St. Peter did me the honour to invite suggestions for its improvement, which he might place before the author for acceptance; and so, on examining the MS., such suggestions were obvious. I agreed to make them. This was my task, at the outset, and not the arbitrary "remodelling" of which Mr. Chorley speaks. The opening of the libretto seemed to me admirable; and beyond advising some trifling excisions—such as that of a passage in which the "Leviathan" was classed among the inhabitants of Lake Gennesareth—I saw no room for improvement. Hence, the prologue of St. Peter, necessitating the disciple's long-delayed entrance, against which the Athenæum protested in diverting ignorance of its cause, is substantially Mr. Chorley's. Further progress of a like sort was barred by an insurmountable obstacle. Mr. Chorley, I was told, refused to hear of any alterations; and the composer being unable to adopt the book as it stood, it only remained for me to go on independently. Thenceforward my business was not to make suggestions, but to make a libretto; and I did it without the smallest reference to Mr. Chorley's MS., as a comparison of the two works would show. So much for the "strange task." I need only mention that the rejected book contained long episodes—such as the first miracle and the entry into Jerusalem, with neither of which was Peter specially concerned—to relieve myself from the charge of presumption in thinking improvement possible. As regards my own share of the actual libretto, I am not careful to defend it. Let the public voice decide its fate.

In conclusion, I would point out that every allowance should be made for Mr. Chorley at present. When a veteran poet, novelist, and critic finds himself rejected in favour of an unknown man, he is naturally, if not justifiably, indignant. All the greater need that his friends should keep cool and avoid getting into a sympathetic flurry. Whereof let the Athenæum take note.—I am, Sir, faithfully,

Sept. 29th. YOUR MUSICAL CRITIC.

MUNICH.—A three-act romantic opera, Morgiane, music by Herr Bernhard Scholtz, libretto, founded on the story in The Thousand and One Nights, by Herr Th. Rehbaum, has been produced at the Theatre Royal, with marked success. The principal characters were supported by Mdlle. Stehle, Herren Vogl, Bausewein, and Kindermann. At the fall of the curtain, there was a call for all of them, as well as for the composer, who himself conducted.—The Joint-Stock National Theatre, which has been taken in tow by the Theatre Royal, was to be opened on the 1st inst., under the management of Dr. Hermann Schmidt.—It is intended to serve as a sort of artistic nursery to the Theatre Royal.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The weekly orchestral concerts under the direction of Mr. Manns, which, from October in one year to April in the next, offer so many attractions to the lovers of genuine art, were resumed on Saturday afternoon. There was an unusually large attendance for a first concert, and the enclosed and commodious music-room has rarely presented a more animated appearance. The programme, varied as it was, and thus appealing to variety of tastes, did not contain a single piece, vocal or instrumental, against which objection could be fairly raised. We subjoin it en extenso :—

Overture "Oberon" ...	...	...	...	Weber.
Symphony No. 1, in C (Op. 21)	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Air, "I mourn as a dove" (St. Peter) ...	...	...	...	Benedict.
Air, "Oh, if there be on this earthly sphere" (Paradise and the Peri) ...	...	...	...	J. F. Barnett.
Concerto, pianoforte, in G (Op. 58) ...	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Duet, "Mira la bianca luna" ...	...	...	...	Rossini.
Ouverture di Ballo ...	...	...	...	Arthur S. Sullivan.
Pianoforte Solos ...	...	...	...	Schubert and S. Heller.
New Song, "Phebe the Fair" ...	...	...	...	Balfe.
March from Suite No. 1 ...	...	...	...	Lachner.

When Mr. Manns took his place before the conductor's desk he was received with a burst of applause, in which every one of the audience seemed more or less heartily to join. No such compliment was ever more worthily bestowed—and this for reasons with which all regular readers must be tolerably conversant. That the orchestra was the same numerous and well-trained body of executants which for many seasons, under the superintendence of their zealous—nay, enthusiastic—director, has helped to win an almost exceptional musical reputation for the Crystal Palace, the performance of Weber's overture to Oberon sufficed convincingly to show. Nothing more careful as to detail, nothing more spirited, could have been desired. Still more interesting, however, than this fiery and romantic prelude was the piece immediately following. It is generally known that, in consequence of 1870 being the centenary of the birth of Beethoven (who came into the world December 17, 1770—four lustres and one year before the death of Mozart), it is intended at the concerts preceding Christmas to accord unusual prominence to his orchestral compositions of this month, and especially to give his nine symphonies without exception. The admirable execution of the first of these undying masterpieces, the vigorous, bright, and everywhere melodious Symphony in C—the symphony in which, as it were at a bound, the Beethoven of all summers (or, as he himself, with sad veracity, might have styled them, winters) proved himself equal to Haydn and Mozart at their best—was an alluring foretaste of what we have to expect. And it may be stated with confidence, judging from experience, that what we may reasonably look forward to is a performance of each of the nine symphonies as good as any performances that have been heard elsewhere, at home or abroad—even at the Paris Conservatoire, where, but for antagonistic causes, lamented by all the civilised world, the universally renowned orchestral concerts, which the musical Germans themselves have never been able to surpass, rarely to emulate, would be just now about to commence. (Fancy the thunder of German cannons silencing the symphonies of Beethoven—most German of all Germans!). Thus much may be relied upon with confidence; and a better guarantee of what is to follow than the execution on Saturday of the "No. 1"—an execution to criticize which would, as it seems to us, be hypercritical—could not possibly have been afforded. Movement after movement—from the grave adagio ushering in the allegro con brio, first-born of the giants, to the humorous and exhilarating finale—was precisely what it should be. Every member of the orchestra apparently went through his task con amore—that is, if unswerving precision, the delicate observation of light and shade, and a sustained unanimity of attack which up to the final reiterated chords might have induced the belief that a single instrument with many various stops and voice had been played upon all the time, by some expert and vigorous executant, may count for anything. To say more than that each movement of the symphony was listened to with eager attention, and that at the conclusion the applause was loud and general, would be superfluous. Let us hope (and we have little doubt of it) that when the turn of the "No. 9"—Coleridge's Colossus comes round, we may be able conscientiously to exclaim, "The end is worthy the beginning."

Among the ingenious and instructive "programmatic" remarks signed with the familiar and, to amateurs, always welcome initial "G." (the signature of a genuine enthusiast, if there ever was one), there is one passage to which we must with deference take exception. "Except however," writes "G," "for the fact that it is Beethoven's first, the starting point in his mighty orchestral career, this symphony is hardly of any especial interest." Happily, a short way down, in his succinct but able analysis, "G." shows that he himself takes an "especial interest" in every part of the symphony. So did a greater than "G.", Mendelssohn, on being asked which of the seven great symphonies of Beethoven he liked best, answer abruptly, "Seven—why, there are nine;" and, on further discussion, said that he liked to hear one or another according to the frame of mind he might happen to be in. At times—and that the least frequently because of the enormous stretch of attention it demanded—it would be the "No. 9," at other times the "No. 7;" at others the "C minor"—and so on; but on no account would Mendelssohn hear of Nos. "1" and "2" being placed apart from the other seven.

If it is intended, which every one will hope may be the case, to include the five pianoforte concertos (as well as the violin concerto) in the auto-Christmas programmes, it was wrong, we think, to begin with the fourth. That to hear so noble and beautiful a composition, played, too, with such brilliancy and refinement as were exhibited by Mr. Charles Halle on the occasion under notice, must be agreeable under any circumstances can hardly be denied. Nevertheless, in order to make the scheme consistent, it would have been wiser to commence with the earliest concerto (C major, Op. 15), three proceeding chronologically, through the series, which culminates with the not inaptly styled "Emperor" (E flat, No. 5)—the grandest, perhaps, of all concertos, no matter for what instrument, or from what pen. By the way, Mr. Hallé, who was loudly applauded and called back to the orchestra at the termination of his performance, introduced in the first and last movements, the cadenzas written by Beethoven himself, who in his fifth and last concerto expressly stipulates that there shall be "no cadenzas." To our notion a cadenza—generally no more nor less than something interpolated in the work of a master which that master has not himself composed—is out of place and out of taste, unless improvised, as Mendelssohn was out to do. Cadenzas are simply opportunities for egotistical display on the part of the solo executant, and, in nine cases out of ten, blemishes on the otherwise transparent surface. That Beethoven held them in no great affection may be gathered from the cadenzas ostensibly meant to be introduced whenever his fourth concerto is played, but which are virtually so extravagant that one can scarcely refrain from the belief that in writing them the illustrious musician had chiefly in mind to turn the system of interpolation into ridicule. Regarded as abstract music, these cadenzas are out of sorts with the Orpheus inspiration with which certain zealous musicians who think Beethoven was incapable of a joke connect their every utterance. Improvisations, such as Mendelssohn, Hummel, and occasionally Moscheles, have been heard to make, by not a few amateurs now living, and such as Mozart, Beethoven, Woelfl, Steibelt, Clementi, and Dussek, according to credible authority, were accustomed to make, must always be entertaining in a degree commensurate with their merit; but written improvizations are pure anomalies. Nevertheless, we find many such perpetrations—like the ornaments supplied so prodigally for the pure and noble pianoforte concertos of Mozart, by men of no less repute than Hummel and John Cramer—actually printed and published with the works themselves, as though they formed integral parts of them. To the fact that Mr. Hallé played Beethoven's cadenzas well, no one who knows anything about pianoforte playing could be insensible; but that, on the other hand, these cadenzas, if only as matters of composition, were better omitted, must equally have been apparent to those who know anything about music. When Beethoven wrote over one cadenza, "Cadenza—ma senza cadere"—a bad play upon Italian words, he indirectly made known the small esteem he entertained for gratuitous exhibitions of "virtuosity;" and this was more emphatically shown by his sudden admonition to ambitious pianists, just at the long coveted "point d'orgue"—" no cadenza"—in the first movement of his E flat concerto. Mendelssohn left no opening for cadenzas in either of his pianoforte concertos; while, in his concerto for violin, finding that one might be in place and effective, he cunningly inserted a cadenza of his own, which reminds us of the terminal shake for the flute, in "Oh rest in the Lord" (Elijah) which saved the singer much pains and the composer, perhaps, still more annoyance.

Mr. Hallé's solos—"Musical Moment" (so-called—we can scarcely believe by Schubert himself), and M. Stephen Heller's Tarantella, by no means his best movement of the kind—were both executed as Mr. Hallé knows how to execute them. The first was encored and repeated.

Not the least interesting feature of this excellent concert was the Ouverture di Ballo of Mr Arthur S. Sullivan, written, it may be remembered, expressly for the last Birmingham Festival, and received at one of the evening concerts with marked and well deserved favour. Another hearing of this newest effort from the pen of our most promising composer fully justified the impression created by the first. The composition is in some respects unique, each movement being constructed upon a dance measure (polonaise—waltz—polka), and the whole knit together in such wise that we have a consistent and well wrought-out piece, with beginning, middle, and end, symmetrical in form, and amply developed. Apart from this, however, there is a certain lode-finable charm about the Ouverture di Ballo which may be described as fairly irresistible. It is full of genuine melody, and the instrumentation is throughout masteriy. Waber's Invitation à la Valse, together with two or three of Auber's overtures, may stand in our path, when about crediting Mr. Sullivan with an idea wholly original in the construction of his overture; but that takes nothing from its merit. A more sparkling and animated orchestral piece of its kind it would be difficult to name. The performance by the Crystal Palace band was, as might have been anticipated, splendid; and the new overture was greeted with no less flattering tokens of approval than, scarcely a month previously, had greeted it when performed, under Mr. Sullivan's own direction, by the magnificent orchestra of the Birmingham Festival.

That other selections from the programme of the late Birmingham Festival were included in Saturday's performance has been shown above. The lovely and truly devotional soprano song, "I mourn as a dove," from Mr Benedict's successful oratorio, St. Peter, was sung by Miss Edith Wynne with exquisite feeling; and the tenor air, "Oh, if there be on this earthly sphere," from Mr. J. F. Barnett's no less successful cantata, Paradise and the Peri, was given by Mr Vernon Rigby with even more than his usual earnestness. Both were heard with pleasure, and rewarded with applause. The new ballad, "Phœbe the fair," by our veteran composer, Balfe—whose muse is now too infrequently heard, and one of whose operatic overtures (like one of John Barnett's, E. J. Loder's, Vincent Wallace's, and G. A. Macfarren's) might occasionally be heard without dissatisfaction by the Crystal Palace audience—is graceful, elegant, and melodious. It is of the genuine Irish type, and was charmingly sung by Miss Wynne, but came too late in the programme to produce a marked effect. Rossini's melodious duet was well given by the lady and gentleman named; but who in the name of melophony wrote the orchestral accompaniments? The stately but not over original overture by Herr Franz Lachner is well-known Suite served effectively as voluntary to play the audience out.

For to-day's concert we are promised the second symphony of Beethoven; and among other attractive things, Professor Sterndale Bennett's "Fantasia-overture," Paradise and the Peri.

MR. HORSLEY'S EUTERPE.

On the occasion of opening the new Town Hall at Melbourne, a concert was given, whereat the chief feature was a new cantata for voices and orchestra, by Mr. C. E. Horsley. The result, we are glad to learn, was an unqualified success, and the composer, who also acted as conductor, received an "ovation" from his gratified fellow-townsmen. Some idea of the work may be gathered from the following analytical notice, which appeared in the Melbourne Age:—

"The overture in B, is founded on two principal themes in the cantata, the air, 'When the meek-eyed Maiden' referring to the power of music in charity, and the final chorus, directly alluding to the building of the hall. The allegro of this movement presents the subject in a variety of contrapuntal forms, aided by a fugued episode intended to heighten the climax. The real business of the composition begins, with an invocation to Sound. This chorus is in three movements,—the first slow and majestic, accompanied by full orchestra; the second, an allegro with florid accompaniment of strings, leads to a fugue finished by a recurrence of the opening subject, in the original scale, F major. In No. 2, a religious chorus, variety is produced by an appropriate use of the organ. The subject is an elaborated chorale in D flat. This is first sung as a quartet, "When in her sacred Fanes," and then taken up by the chorus. A novel effect is produced at the close by the voices singing in unison (not octaves), the grave notes of the sopranos coupled with the acute sounds of the men's voices presenting, no doubt, the result aimed at. No. 3 is a solo, 'And when that meek-eyed Maiden,' in A flat, for soprano; it is scored without violins for flutes, clarionets, bassoons, horns, violas, violoncellos, and contrabasso. After this (No. 4) we have an orchestral intermezzo, requiring great skill in the performers on the wood wind instruments, who have each solo parts to a rich accompaniment of strings. The intermezzo is in E flat, and leads without any pause to No. 5, the next chorus, 'Beautiful is Sound devoted.' This may be described as a good tune, harmonized with due regard to contrast; easy of performance, and of pleasing character. At this point the character of the music completely changes. A choral recitative, No. 6, in B major, 'When on the Battlefield,' leads to the 'War and Triumphal March,' No. 7. This is a powerful and elaborate composition, bearing the impress of vigorous thought. By a perfectly natural progress it, from triumphal marches we come to funeral dirges—'Slowly and mournfully moves a Procession.' No. 8, in G minor. This is of the conventionally lugubrious pattern, and has an effective solo for bass clarinet. Another change takes place, and the composer now shows us Euterpe in the domestic circle. No. 9, 'But pausing from Sorrow,' a short recitative for women's voices, introduces us to a lullaby song in C minor, for contralto, entitled 'The Night Shades gather;' and this is followed by a waltz chorus, No. 11, 'When the Summer Moon is beaming,' in G major. The title will explain the character of this piece, which is full of vivacity, the stringed instrumentation having plenty of dash and sparkle, while the rhythm is very distinctly marked. In No. 12 we have an ordinary ballad for a tenor voice, 'When Twilight glides with ghostly tread.' We do not think that in this number the composer has quite lowered himself down to the requirements of this style of composition. It is not, however, without elements of popularity. This phase of music in the domestic circle is brought to an end with a brilliant drinking song in C major for men's voices, No. 19, 'But hurrah for the Table that heavily groans.' This is scored by the composer with every means at his command whereby its spirit might be appropriately illustrated. A bass recitative, No. 14, 'When far from Friends and Home,' now turns our thoughts into another channel, and leads to the chorus No. 15, 'Then at Sea or in Wildwood,' in which, by a highly ingenious device, the accompaniment consists solely of 'Home, sweet Home,' played by violins. This chorus is in E major. No. 16 is an air for bass, 'In the yellow Flame of Evening,' in which a graceful oboe solo bears a prominent part. In No. 17 we have a soprano recitative, 'And thus it is that Music manifold,' the accompaniment cleverly contrived to introduce reminiscences of the leading themes which have preceded it. This recitative brings us to the final number, 18, the choral recitative, 'Now a Vision comes,' referring to the stately edifice raised by the 'Fathers, founder, of a mighty nation;' followed by the allegro of the overture worked up into a double fugue, and expressed in varied forms. This leads to a pedal point which culminates in a device greatly favoured by Handel—a long pause on a silent bar. The whole power of sound is then brought to bear on the concluding bars, and the work ends in the original key, B flat."

HENRY WALLACK.

Tidings of the death of Mr. Henry Wallack have come to us from America. Although never attaining the distinctive celebrity of his brother, James Wallack, whose memory is inseparably associated with Alessandro Massaroni in The Irishman, "Harry" Wallack, as he was familiarly called, was an admirable actor in his time. He made his first great hit in England at Drury Lane in 1832, as Silver Jack, in Douglas Jerrold's domestic drama, The Rent Day. When a mere lad he had played at the Surrey, about the commencement of the present century, then he went to America, and returned to this country in 1829, making his début as a full-grown actor at "Old Drury," as Julius Cæsar. He was an excellent stage-manager, a post which he filled with great credit for Osbaldeston, at Covent Garden, in 1837, and for Mr. Knowles, ten years afterwards at the Theatre Royal, Manchester. The most overdrawn period of his career was that which saw him lessee of Covent Garden Theatre, in 1843 and which might be described as marking the shortest season on record. He opened the theatre at the end of October, 1843, and closed it early in the month following. He had a company including Mrs. Nisbett, Miss Vandenhoff, Vandenhoff, Phelps, James Anderson, Walter Lacy, Mr. and Mrs. Keeley, and others; but the fates were not propitious. First he tried a comedy by Mr. Bourcicault, called Women. Then he introduced his brother-in-law, Mr. Thalaba, afterwards of Sadler's Wells, and now in Australia, as Charles Courtley in London Assurance. Othello was next tried, and The Lady of Lyons was promised; but the manager could not accede to the terms demanded by the author for the privilege of playing it. Finally he brought on the stage a troupe of French children called "Les Enfans Castelli," and on that night the audience blessed heartily for four hours and the theatre was closed. All this was in the space of three weeks, and in each week a fresh season had been announced in the playbill. The failure of his first season the lessee attributed to his tragedians, of his second to his comedians, and of the third to the serious conduct of a rival manager. The most amusing reminiscence of this time is, perhaps, the benefit which was being constantly announced but which never took place. In the first week the manager's benefit was fixed for a particular night; in the second positively for another; and in the third, most positively for the ensuing Saturday, by which time the theatre had finally closed its doors. The frequent reiteration of this announcement was very pleasantly alluded to by Mr. John Oxenford, who, under the signature of "Theocritus Cantabrensis," wrote some choice articles called Pratt Pages, for a little theatrical publication, called The Critic, then in existence, and now possibly quite forgotten. The manager summoning the call boy, who was to be sent to the printer exclaiming through his medium, "I will have a benefit Oh! boy, on Monday. Hasten to Fairbrother, mighty in type; to Fairbrother whose works adorn the metropolis. Fairbrother shall tell the world that I will have a benefit." And then followed the oft-repeated classic strain, "Sing, Oh! Muse, of the benefit that the future fondled in its lap and loved so much that it never yielded it to the present." The benefit never came off. Jullien took possession of the theatre, and many after gave promenade concerts. No ingenuity in smothering the outer walls with enormous placards could, however, entirely overshadow the original posters announcing this visionary benefit, and even two years after, when the famous "Corn Law League Bazaar" was held in the theatre, lingering remains of the great posters printed for this impracticable benefit were still to be met with in different parts of the building. The last time Henry Wallack appeared in England was at Drury Lane, under Mr. E. T. Smith's management, in 1853, when he appeared as Robinson, the thief, in Charles Reade's drama of Gold, the first form of the afterwards celebrated novel, Never too Late to Mend. Henry Wallack died on the verge of eighty.

PROVINCIAL.

Weymouth.—We read as follows in a local paper:—

"The distinguished concert party engaged by Mr. Avant gave two entertainments at the Royal Hotel Assembly Rooms, on Saturday. The afternoon concert was very thinly attended. In the evening, however, the affairs assumed a brighter aspect. The first piece on the programme was the allegro from Weber's grand sonata, in A flat, played by the Chevalier de Kontski, who proved himself to have richly earned the title of the "lion pianist." The recitative and aria from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, were very sweetly sung by Mdlle. Liebhart, who was loudly applauded. Mdlle. Enriquez followed with, 'She came like a dream.' She was rapturously encored, and responded with Benedict's charming ballad, 'Rock me to sleep.' The next duet, 'Parigi o cara' (Traviata), by Mdlle. Liebhart and Signor Mario, gave much satisfaction, and obtained considerable applause. Then came Signor Sivori, who played Paganini's 'La Clochette.' It was a superb performance. He was greeted with an enthusiastic recal, and retired to give place to Mario, the idol of former days, when his voice used to electrify thousands. He appeared before us Weymouthians to sing Donizetti's 'Spirto Gentil,' and was encored. The first part closed with 'L'Echo de la Guerre,' played by Chevalier de Kontski with astonishing transitions between fire and impetuosity and sweet melody (sic). The second part commenced with Da Beriot and Osborne's Duo Concertante for pianoforte and violin from Guillaume Tell, played by de Kontski and Sivori. Signor Mario was well received in the ballad, 'Deep in my heart there dwells,' and 'The blind girl's dream' was rendered beautifully by Mdlle. Liebhart. Next came a duo for two pianofortes from Les Huguenots, the performers being the Chevalier da Kontski and Mr. T. Avant. We are proud to say, for the honour of native talent, that our townsman came out with honour from the encounter. Mdlle. Enriquez then sang 'When all was young,' from Faust, and Signor Sivori was heard in a solo which demonstrated the perfection of bowing and staccato playing. The finale was a grand fantasia, on airs from Faust, played by the Chevalier with undiminished success."

REVIEWS.

Songs of the War (French and German), as now sung by the belligerent armies. With the original words and an English translation. London: Cramer & Co. The war songs of France and Germany are now so familiar that we scarcely need do more than specify the contents of this cheap and well-got-up selection. Of Teutonic lyrics, choice has fallen upon "The Rhine Song," "The German's Fatherland," "Die Wacht am Rhein," and "Kömer's" Sword," while the Gallic muse is represented by Musset's "Nous l'avons en votre Rhin Allemand," "Mourir pour la patrie," "Le Chant du Départ," and the "Marseillaise." The arrangement for voice and piano is, in all respects, excellent, and little exception can be taken to the English translations—some of all to those by Mr. Du Terreaux. De Musset's poem has, however, received but scant justice. For example, "Du pied de nos chevaux marqué dans votre sang" is rendered, "Our horses stampt in blood of your defeated line," and the grand warning, "Et surtout les morts de leur repos auguste," appears as "Take heed to wake the dead from their victorious shrine." On the other hand, some of the translations have the true battle ring in them.—L'Echo de la Guerre. Fantasie Militaire, par Chevalier de Kontski. London: Chappell & Co. The war, though an "ill wind," has blown good to the race of pianoforte for the piano by supplying them with a host of new and popular themes. In the work before us Chevalier de Kontski has taken "Lützow's Wild Chase," the "Deutscher Marche," and the "Marseillaise," making out of them, as will readily be believed, a very spirited and vigorous piece, at once showy and easy. The title-page presents a striking illustrative and allegorical design.—Twelve Popular Melodies; arranged for the pianoforte by Immanuel Liebich. No. 1. "La Marseillaise." London: Metzler & Co. This arrangement is the first of a series consisting, so far as yet announced, of French and German national songs. Judging of the rest from the example before us, we may pronounce them thoroughly adapted for popular use, Mr. Liebich having done his work in the case of "La Marseillaise" with studied simplicity. Moreover, he has taken thought for beginners as far as to finger passages which present but the smallest difficulty. For these things not a few will thank him.—Keep your powder dry. National song. Written by Henry B. Farnie. Composed by Dan Godfrey. London: Chappell & Co. This timely enforcement of old Noll's advice is appropriately illustrated by one of his buff-coated invincibles standing sentry on open Bible, and looking well to the priming of his musket. The words of the song enforce the lesson thus suggested in a hearty vigorous fashion which commands our entire approval. Mr. Godfrey's melody is broad and tuneful, but the refrain seems to us out of keeping, as wanting dignity in itself, and becoming absolutely trivial by comparison with that which goes before.—Rondo for the Pianoforte. Composed by Westley Richards, Associate of the Royal Academy of Music. London: Lamborn Cock & Co. Looking at the introduction to this rondo before reading the title-page, we saw the familiar arpeggios which precede the regulation morceau de salon, and expected to come in due time upon "Forest Whisperings," "The Mountain Rill," or something of that sort. We were agreeably disappointed; for though Mr Richards' piece bears, here and there, a striking resemblance to music not called by a classical name, it is a rondo nevertheless. Next time, perhaps, the composer will attempt no compromise between mere show and high art. The two are incompatible, and it is clear Mr. Richards has ability enough to warrant his devotion to the latter. Meanwhile, as a step in the right direction, we welcome the rondo.—Chappell's Organ Journal, consisting of favourite movements, selected from the works of the great masters, arranged for the organ, with pedal obbligato, by the most eminent organists; Nos. 6, 7, and 8. London: Chappell & Co. We are glad to see that this useful and interesting work goes on; for, though an organist owes his first devotion to music written for his instrument, he can hardly afford to ignore transcriptions such as those here presented. No. 6 contains a slow movement in C major from one of Mozart's quartets, arranged by G. E. Griffiths, who, also, has adapted a slow movement by Haydn for No. 7. The work, in each case, has been done with all needful regard both for the composition, the instrument, and the convenience of the player. As to the music, we may safely let the authors' names be sole guarantee of excellence. In No. 8 we find Hummel's Romanza (from Op. 104), a charming little movement which the majority of amateurs will recognize at a glance. The arranger in this instance is a gentleman—Mr. J. Hiles—whose skill has been well proven. As the pieces are all adapted for moderate-sized organs, our application of the term "useful" to this journal needs no vindication.—The Musical Pipes. No. 35. Twelve National and Patriotic Songs." London: Metzler & Co. The songs in this number are neither French nor German, as might be supposed, but English; the publishers hoping, perhaps, that out of the present rage for patriotic airs will come a little extra remuneration to those of our own country. A better selection could hardly be made, while the price, sixpence, could hardly be lower. Now is the time for lovers of the "Bay of Biscay," "Tom Bowling," "The Death of Nelson," "The Red, White, and Blue," and "The Tight Little Island" to gratify their tastes by an expenditure ridiculously small.—Lady Clare. Song. Written by Edward Legge. Composed for Signor Mario by Walter Maynard. London: Chappell & Co. A song of chivalry which tells of knightly devotion and truth. The music is often elegant, always pleasing; and we can readily believe that Signor Mario, in his happy moments, creates with it no ordinary impression. But in the hands of other and less illustrious tenors the song will be acceptable for more than a single reason.—The Blind Girl's Dream. Song. Written and composed by Louisa Gray. London: Chappell & Co. Touching words are here allied in music which, though of the simplest order, is perfect in its apt expression. As music, the song presents nothing on which to hang critical remarks; as both words and music, we must acknowledge it to be, in its way, an admirable thing. That "The Blind Girl's Dream" will be popular with all who love an unpretending yet pathetic ballad is beyond doubt.—The Buccaneer. Song. Written by E. Reece. Composed by Berthold Tours. London: Chappell & Co. Our impression was that songs in praise of pirates, highwaymen, gipsies, and the like had gone out of fashion, and were only to be heard from elderly gentlemen with deep bass voices and a knowledge of "The Wolf." We were wrong, it seems; for here is a brau new work lauding the sea rover's life in vigorous strains. And a very good song it is. The words are instinct with power, and Mr. Tours' music runs on with all the freedom and grace of the pirate's ship. In the latter, moreover, there are signs of skill and care rarely met with among works of the sort. We can give the song our heartiest commendation.

WAIFS.

This evening Mr. Santley is to make his first appearance at the Gaiety Theatre, in an English version of Hérold's opera, Zampa.

Mr. Alfred Baylis, the tenor, has returned to town from his provincial tour.

Among recent arrivals from Paris here are, M. Gounod and M. Faure.

Herr Ferdinand Ludwig, the pianist, has returned from his tour in Germany.

Prince Poniatowski, the friend of Rossini, and well-known musical amateur, has arrived in England.

Mr William Rea has resumed his interesting and admirable orchestral concerts at the Town Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Messrs Cramer & Co. have projected a concert in aid of the "Red Cross Fund," to take place in Brighton on Wednesday next.

Among our illustrious artistic visitors this winter will, we are informed, be Madame Pauline Viardot-Garcia, the worthy sister of Malibran.

We understand that a concert is shortly to be given in the Town Hall, Brecon, at which Miss Edith Wynne will appear. She will be supported by a Welsh tenor, whose voice is said to have the unusual compass of two and a half octaves.

There is no foundation for the report that Sir Michael Costa has resigned the conductorship of the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts.

It is stated that, after the surrender of Strasburg some of the French soldiers danced to the music of the Prussian bands, as the victorious besiegers entered the city.

Madame Adelina Patti sang at a concert at Brighton on Thursday evening, with what brilliant success may easily be believed. Among her companions was Sig. Delle Sedie.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's cantata, The Rose Maiden, will be given at the end of November, at St. James's Hall, Mdlle. Tietjens and Mdme. Patey are to be among the principal singers.

Mr. C. J. Bishenden, the well-known bass, gave a lecture on Wednesday last, at Belmont House, Ealing, on "The Voice and the Art of Singing," introducing many excellent songs, all of which were highly applauded. Mdlle. F. Naingans and Herr Weber assisted Mr. Bishenden.

Before Paris was invested nearly all the leading artists took their departure for other countries. Many are in Belgium and Holland, and the operahouses in the Netherlands will therefore have the advantage of singers and instrumentalists of note. It is already announced that M. Dupres, who is in Brussels, will produce his opera, Jeanne d'Arc, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, with a strong cast of emigrant singers.

An evening concert will be given, on the 12th inst., in aid of the fund of the German Association for the Sick and Wounded. Amongst the artists who have promised their co-operation are Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, Madame Rudersdorff, Fräulein Drasdil, Herren L. Ries, H. Bohrer, Benedict, Signor Randegger, &c. The United German Gesang-verein will sing national part-songs, including Dr. Hiller's new composition, "Zur Wahre," Arndt's "Vaterland," and Wilhelm's "Wacht am Rhein."

We take the following from the Harvard Advocate, and recommend it as a college song:—

"The human lungs reverberate sometimes with great velocity,
When windy individuals indulge in much verbosity.
They have to twirl the glottis sixty thousand times a minute,
And push and pinch the diaphragm as though the deuce was in it.

CHORUS.

"The pharynx now goes up; the larynx, with a slam,
Ejects a note from out the throat,
Pushed by the diaphragm."

An enthusiastic Prussian has written to an English journal, requesting the editor to inform his readers that the melody of the famous "Marseillaise," now once more so popular in France, is not French but German. It is, we are assured by him, German sacred music, which was found in the old church of the village of Holgheim; the French having merely adapted it to their words. This is, perhaps, the most cruel attack yet made by the Prussians upon the French nationality. Are we really to believe that all the famous romance about Rouget de l'Isle, celebrated in so many histories, and glorified in so many pictures, is mere delusion? and the young Southern composer, who has certainly done more than man ever did before to stir the hearts of a people, only an impudent plagiarist? Perhaps so; but the Prussian correspondent referred to might have been more explicit. When and by whom was it found in the old church? Obviously, the antiquity of the church would prove little; for there is of course nothing to prevent very new music being found in a very old church. The Prussian gentleman ought to have shown that a German copy existed undoubtedly, older than the revolutionary period when "La Marseillaise, paroles et musique," was first published in France. Till we have some such evidence, we must hold the claim of Rouget de l'Isle to be unshaken. Meanwhile, patriotic Frenchmen may console themselves with the reflection, that no national melody ever yet escaped from a controversy of this kind.

The new Bouffe has not yet begun at the Grand Operahouse, New York; but that establishment was the scene of a rencontre some days ago, between Mr. James Fisk, jun., proprietor, and his impresario, Max Maretzek, which has greatly amused the town. Fisk sent Maretzek to Europe to engage the company, and complains that his agent swindled him in a large amount. At the first morning rehearsal of the corps he proceeded to tell Maretzek so, applying to him the epithets of liar and thief, upon which the latter attacked Prince Erie, and the two fell together in desperate conflict on the floor. Beyond a few scratches and bruises, and ruin of Mr. Fisk's violet velvet coat, no harm was done, but as Maretzek's assault was the first actual violence that has been offered to the person of Fisk, and as he has been a possible subject of it for many months, the "scrimmage excites no little talk, and has since been transferred to the daily papers, where the combatants are firing cards at each other and the public. It has been suggested that the "mill" should be introduced into one of Offenbach's extravaganzas, and be repeated upon the boards of the Grand Operahouse, so that the public might see it. Fisk might then appear, first in his gorgeous array as Colonel of the 9th Regiment of Volunteers, and next, on the encore, in his resplendent uniform as Commodore of the Fall River Steam-boat Line on Long Island Sound.

The autumnal equinox is over, and New York has resumed its wonted appearance of animation. The inhabitants who ran off for the summer to the mountains or the sea-side have mostly returned to their homes; the hotels overflow with Western and Southern merchants, who have come to buy goods, and the theatres have reopened for the season with such attractions as the managers have been able to secure. Nilsson, the sweet songstress of Sweden, is just now the reigning novelty, and she has been received with a warmth that is but rarely elicited by foreign favourites. Had she appeared in opera there is no knowing to what height the enthusiasm of her admirers might have gone. As it was, the old compliment was paid her by a dozen young men of taking the horses from her carriage and dragging her themselves from the concert hall to her lodgings, a freak that did not fail of course to bring out the time-honoured but just rebuke that they proved themselves donkeys in so doing. Miss Nilsson, so far, has sung only in concert, and it is set forth by her manager that she will not sing in opera at all in the United States; but this is only a ruse to secure good houses, and we may be reasonably certain that before the winter is over we shall see her announced as Ophelia. Simultaneously with the arrival of the cantatrice came the distinguished German violinist, Maria Seebach, who has made her début in America, as Marguerita, with great success.

THE COLSTON HALL ORGAN.

A "festival" was held in the Colston Hall, Bristol, on Tuesday and Wednesday last, to celebrate the opening of an organ, for which the citizens are chiefly indebted to the munificence of Mr. Wills, of tobacco fame. The specification of the instrument runs as follows:—

Stops.	Feet.	Stops.	Feet.

3 Swell to Great Unison		6 Great "
4 Swell to Great Super-octave		9 Choir to "
5 Choir to Great		10 Bellows "

The patent atmospheric combination movement is applied, in four changes, to each of the Manuals.

Four Pedals, acting on those of the Great Organ, also affect the Pedal Organ, and adapt it to the power then obtained in the Great Organ.

Four Pedals act on the couplers as composition pedals act on ordinary stops.

A double-acting pedal produces a pp Pedale, even when the infill pedale is arranged.

The Swell and Great Organ are played through the agency of the pneumatic lever.

The bellows, which are placed in a chamber, are blown by three of Duncan's hydraul engines.

In the afternoon of both festival days, a choice selection of classical music was played by Mr. W. T. Best, to the gratification of large audiences. The instrument, which gives entire satisfaction, has been built by Mr. Henry Willis.

SERONIARD.—The Abbate Franz Liszt, according to a correspondent of the Ton, is still engaged on the "great work" which he commenced so successfully at Weimar. Baron Anton Augusz has placed a whole castle at his disposal, and the artist's pupils, friends, and admirers come to him here just as they used to come at Weimar. Among his present visitors are Herr Servais, son of the well-known violoncellist, the Polish Countess Janina, a passionate lover of art, and Mdlle. Menter. There is a very general wish in musical circles that the Abatte-Virtuoso should settle definitively in Hungary, where he might do a very great deal to improve and raise the character of the national music. As, probably, for political reasons, he may not feel inclined to return to Rome or Weimar, he might, it is believed, be induced to stay in Hungary, provided anything worthy his acceptance could be offered him. It is proposed that the high Hungarian clergy should endeavour to secure his services for the music of their Church.

THE "ROYAL" EDITION

OF

STANDARD OPERAS,

FOR VOICE AND PIANOFORTE.

EDITED BY

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

The wide-spread popularity which of late years has existed for the master pieces of the Lyrical Drama, has suggested to Messrs. BOOSEY the expediency of publishing a popular edition of the chief Operas at present holding the stage.

Under the title of The "Royal" Edition of Standard Operas, Messrs. BOOSEY propose issuing, at fortnightly intervals, the complete Pianoforte scores, with words, of the chief Operatic Works of the day, in a form at once compendious, elegant, and moderate in price. The Musical text, given in all its integrity, and including in many cases whole pieces usually omitted, will be thoroughly and carefully revised by Mr. ARTHUR SULLIVAN, with whom will be associated Mr. JOSIAH PITTMAN. The words will be in Italian (that being the recognized language of the lyrical drama throughout the world), together with a carefully executed English version, printed under the Italian text. To meet every demand on the part of the public, it is intended to issue extra editions of the most important French and German Operas, with words in their original language, in addition to the versions now publishing in Italian and English. These will be announced hereafter. The unaccompanied recitatives which occur in the older Operas will be given, for the convenience of the public, in the form of dialogue, in both languages.

This Edition will be printed from a new fount of type, of remarkable clearness, on the finest paper; thus, the convenient size and completeness of this edition will serve not only for study at the Pianoforte, but will effectually supersede the libretti used in the theatres, enabling the auditor to follow the representation of an Opera in the manner that has been so popular at the performances of Oratorios.

The Operas will be published in volumes, Super-Royal 8vo, containing from 200 to 270 pages, price Half-a-Crown each; also elegantly bound in crimson cloth, gilt lettered, and gilt edges, 4s. each.

The Operas will appear in the following order:—

November	1st	Mozart's DON GIOVANNI.
„	15th	Beethoven's FIDELIO.
		(This Edition will include the FOUR Overtures.
December	1st	Rossini's IL BARBIERE.
„	15th	Bellini's LA SONNAMBULA.
January	1st	Flotow's MARTHA.
„	15th	Verdi's IL TROVATORE.

The "Royal" Edition will include all the principal acting Operas, the titles of which will be announced in future Advertisements.

Subscribers' names will be received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers in the United Kingdom, or by the Publishers,

THE STORY OF "MOZART'S REQUIEM"*.

The result of all these investigations was, as we have already remarked, a tolerably firm conviction that the score was genuine. An accident, however, gave rise to fresh doubts. Up to this period, only two short and rapidly written manuscripts of Süssmayer's had been available for the purposes of comparison; notwithstanding every research, it had been impossible to obtain a larger store, when several fragments of an opera composed by Süssmayer in 1793, two years after the death of Mozart, were unexpectedly obtained from a Baron von Lannoy.

Immediately these fresh pieces of documentary evidence were submitted to the examining committee, they created the utmost astonishment. The manuscripts of Süssmayer's previously examined, differed most essentially from Mozart's; but the fresh ones, to everybody's amazement, tallied so completely with them, that it needed the strictest proofs of their origin to convince competent judges that they did not emanate from Mozart. On near scrutiny, the resemblance to Mozart's writing became even more deceptive and astounding, but what was of incomparably greater importance was the fact that the comparison of these manuscripts with the Wallsegg manuscript proved the complete identity of the writing in both cases; there were all the peculiarities, already mentioned, in the hand, and the peculiar form of the letters B, Q, and R, which were not so shaped in Mozart's manuscripts, appeared again in these new manuscripts of Süssmayer's.

As a matter of course, the points upon which a stress had been laid in the report of the minority now gained additional weight; but the longer and more carefully the investigation was continued, the more entangled did the matter appear to grow, as in the score of the Requiem, there was also found a very great deal that seemed most decidedly to tally rather with Mozart's handwriting than with Süssmayer's.

In order to find an outlet from this labyrinth of contradiction and embarrassment, the committee considered that the most advisable course they could pursue would be to apply, with an earnest appeal for a truthful answer, to Mozart's widow, who was still alive. As we know, she asserted, immediately after her husband's death, that he completed the Requiem; but this statement had been, at a subsequent period, partially withdrawn by her. After the lapse of so many years, during which all motive for concealing the truth had disappeared, an answer fully worthy of belief might reasonably be expected from her. The wished-for answer was soon received this time; its expressions were, also, more decided than those obtainable at former periods from Madame Constanze.

"If the score is complete," writes the widow, "it cannot emanate from Mozart's hand, for he never finished the Requiem. It is easy to perceive what Süssmayer wrote, since, in my opinion, it is impossible to imitate anyone's hand in such a manner, that the imitation cannot be distinguished from the original. So much on this head; I declare that no one but Süssmayer finished the Requiem, which was no very difficult task for him, as the plan of the work was precisely laid down in advance for him, and an error on his side was hardly possible."

This decided the matter. Another thorough examination of the score established with satisfactory clearness the difference of the handwriting in the first movement which really emanated from Mozart, and that of the subsequent parts added by Süssmayer. It is true that some persons still refused to be convinced, and still clung to the opinion that the whole work was due to one and the same hand; the proofs, however, were too overwhelming, and the actual facts spoke too loudly for any serious doubt to be still entertained about the ungenuineness of the Requiem.

What motive induced Süssmayer many years after Mozart's death to imitate his handwriting is yet a riddle. Perhaps he was actuated by a mere boastful spirit, or by pride at the success of his first attempt, or perhaps it was his intention to publish some more of his own works as Mozart's. One fact is certain: there would have been but little chance of deciding the question of the genuineness of the Requiem had not the later imitations been fortunately discovered.

However little respect we may entertain for Süssmayer's moral character, his skill in imitating Mozart's handwriting, and his talent for composition, are certainly deserving of great admiration. The writing of musical notes and signs is quite as individually peculiar as that of ordinary letters, and whoever is at all familiar with a composer's hand can immediately recognize it. The imitation of musical writing is quite as difficult as, if not more difficult than that of ordinary writing. There have been some cases known of great skill in this art. Joachim, the celebrated violin virtuoso, amused himself, when a young man, by imitating the writing of Mendelssohn, for whom he entertained a profound respect, and he obtained great dexterity therein. The wife of the younger Bach could imitate his writing in such a manner that no one was able to see any difference. Süssmayer's imitation must have been masterly, or it would not have been so long a subject of dispute among experts, yet it was executed in a very short period, for, on hearing of Mozart's death, the Count, no doubt, immediately demanded the delivery of the score which he had ordered, and paid for in advance.

But Süssmayer's talent for composition is even more astounding than his power of imitating handwriting. As we have already remarked, there was only one movement of the Requiem, the first, quite finished by Mozart. For some of the following, he wrote the vocal parts, and gave probably, here and there, suggestions as to the instrumental accompaniment. Here Süssmayer had to carry out and complete the intentions of the composer, and the fact of supplying, in a style worthy of such a composer, what was wanting most certainly required extraordinary capability. Mozart wrote only a few bars of the "Lacrymosa;" Süssmayer had to carry out the idea, scarcely suggested, of the entire movement, and he did it in such a masterly manner that the possibility of the fact was most emphatically denied. But, as though this were not enough, he added creations, exclusively his own, and of scarcely less value, as being these of the master; at least, he claimed them as his, and we have no reason for doubting the justice of his claim, though many distinguished critics declared, on purely musical grounds, that such an assumption was untenable. Gottfried Welser, who was the first to direct attention to the ungenuineness of the Requiem, was, nevertheless, of opinion that it contained many beautiful ideas of Mozarts which could not have come from Süssmayer's garden. The well-known critic Marx, after citing several passages from the "Agnus Dei," says: "Now, if these passages are not Mozart's, it was, at any rate, a Mozart who wrote them." But it is precisely these passages which, as far as we can speak from our knowledge, founded upon a long chain of irrefutable proofs, which were certainly not written by Mozart, and by no other than Süssmayer. The sole solution to this riddle must, perhaps, be sought in the fact that Süssmayer, who, during Mozart's last illness, scarcely allowed an hour to pass without visiting him, may have come into the possession of sketches, which he employed in working out the last part of the composition, or that he heard Mozart play the said motives, and then, thanks to his good memory, confided them to paper. He must, however, have been musically gifted in a musical sense, and we can only sincerely regret that so few of his own productions have been preserved.

A belief in the genuineness of the Requiem can now-a-days no longer be defended! However wonderful and incredible it may appear, Mozart furnished only the smallest part of it; all the rest is the work of another, who, however, knew how to embue himself completely with the spirit of the master, and to imitate his handwriting in the most deceptive manner. We are not acquainted, in the domain of art, with another forgery executed with so much skill and genius, and so successfully deceiving the world for a period of from forty to fifty years.

PARSON versus ORGANIST.

At the Honiton petty sessions, on Wednesday, the Rev. Henry George Tompkins, vicar of Branscombe, summoned Miss Mary Ford, the organist of the church, and Mr. W. Ford, one of the oldest inhabitants, for disturbing the services of the church. The case against Miss Ford was first proceeded with. On the 15th of September last a Harvest Thank-giving Service was held in the parish church. The vicar sent word by the sexton that there would be no hymn sung until just before the sermon. The sexton neglected to deliver the message, and when the service had proceeded as far as the third Collect, Miss Ford commenced playing a tune upon the organ. The Rev. Mr. Tompkins continued reading the prayer for the Queen, and some confusion followed. Immediately that Miss Ford discovered the mistake she desisted, and the service went on. The rev. complainant gave out a hymn just before the sermon, but Miss Ford, not understanding the hymn, did not play the organ, nor did the choir stand up to sing. The rev. gentleman accordingly started the Old Hundredth tune, and sang the hymn himself. The Archdeacon of Exeter preached, and while the collection was being made at the close another hymn was given out, which was duly sung by the choir. For this disturbance of the service the vicar summoned Miss Ford and her brother, under the second section of the 32nd chapter of the 23rd and 24th Victoria, which gives power to the magistrate to inflict a fine not exceeding £5, or to commit to prison for a term not exceeding two months. The Rev. Mr. Tompkins stated that he was greatly disquieted, and acting under the advice of the Archdeacon of Exeter, he, on the following day, dismissed the organist, the choir, and a portion of the singers. The inhabitants felt very indignant, and drew up a memorial, which was presented to the Bench. Lord Sidmouth, without calling for the defence, dismissed the case. The summons against Mr. William Ford was withdrawn.

FRANZ LISZT AS A BOY, DESCRIBED BY CARL CZERNY.

In his Autobiography, written in 1842, and now just published, Carl Czerny says:—In the year 1819, a short time after the Bellaville had left us, a man brought me one morning a little boy of about eight, and requested me to hear him play something on the piano. The child was pale and weak-looking, and, while playing, rocked to and fro upon the chair as though he were tipsy, so that I was afraid he would fall on the floor. His playing, too, was utterly irregular, incorrect, and confused, and he had so little notion of fingering that he flung his fingers quite at random over the keys. Despite of all this, however, I was astounded at the talent with which nature had endowed him. He played a vista something I put before him, in a purely naturalistic fashion, it is true, but, for that very reason, all the more in a manner showing that in his case nature herself had formed a pianist. It was just the same when, at his father's request, I gave him a motive on which to extemporize. Without the slightest acquirements in harmony, he infused a certain genial significance into his performances.

His father told me that his name was Liszt; that he was a subordinate official in the service of Prince Esterhazy; that he had hitherto himself instructed his son, but begged to know whether I would not take little Franz in hand when in a year's time he came to Vienna. I readily consented, and gave him directions how he was meanwhile himself to continue the boy's instruction, showing him the exercises on the scales, &c. About a year later, Liszt moved into Vienna with his son, and took a lodging in the same street as ourselves. I had little time in the day, but I devoted almost every evening to the boy. Never had I had so zealous a pupil, or one with so much genius.

As I knew from experience that just such geniuses as he, with whom mental powers anticipate physical strength, are in the habit of neglecting to study thoroughly technical details, it struck me that it was necessary above all things to dedicate the first few months in so regulating and fixing the boy's mechanical dexterity that it would be impossible for it to go astray in years to come. In a short time he played the scales in every key with the most masterly ease, which he had acquired, thanks to his fingers, so favourably formed for pianoforte-playing, while by making him study seriously Clementi's Sonatas (which will always be the best school for pianists, if only studied in the proper spirit), I accustomed him to be always correct in his tempo, a particular in which he had hitherto been deficient; to obtain a beautiful touch and tone; as well as the most irreproachable fingering and correct musical declamation, though the said Sonatas at first appeared to him somewhat dry, for he himself was always lively and in very high spirits. The result of this method was that, when a few months later we took up the works of Hummel, Ries, and Moscheles, followed by those of Beethoven and Sebastian Bach, it was no longer necessary for me to devote my attention to mere mechanical rules; I was enabled at once to initiate him into the spirit and character of these several composers. As he was obliged to get up each piece very quickly, he finished by becoming so skilful in playing at sight, that he was capable of playing off at once even very difficult compositions, as though he had been studying them a long time. I also fostered his talent for improvization by frequently giving him themes on which to exercise his powers in this way.

Little Liszt's unvarying cheerfulness and good humour, together with the extraordinary development of his talent, caused my parents to love him like their own son, and me to love him like a brother; and not only did I teach him for nothing, but I made him a present of all his music, which comprised pretty well all that was good and useful existing at the time. A year later, I was able to let him play in public, and he excited in Vienna such enthusiasm as but few artists succeed in exciting.

The next year his father gave concerts with him for his own benefit; the boy played Hummel's Concertos in A minor and B minor, the quite new; Moscheles' "Variations," and Hummel's Septet; Ries's Concertos, and many of my compositions, besides extemporizing, at every concert, on motives given by the audience. The world was then really not wrong in thinking they beheld in him another Mozart. Unfortunately, his father wanted to gain large pecuniary advantages by him, and when the boy was in the very best of his studies, and as I was just beginning to initiate him in composition, he commenced his travels, first visiting Hungary, and, afterwards, London, Paris, &c., where he created the greatest sensation, as all the papers of the day testify. In Paris, where he settled with his parents, he made, it is true, a great deal of money, but lost a great many years, as his life, like his art, took the wrong road. When I went to Paris sixteen years later (1837), I found that his playing, despite all its immense bravura, was, in every respect, decidedly wild and confused. I thought the best thing I could do was to advise him to travel through Europe, and, when he came to Vienna a year later, his genius took another flight. Amid the unbounded applause of our delicate-minded public, his style soon displayed that brilliancy combined with clearness, for which he is now rendering himself so famous in the world.

BRADFORD FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

(From our own Correspondent.)

This season's first concert came off with great success on the 6th inst. at St. George's Hall, and was opened by Handel's "Occasional" overture for organ solo, performed, in masterly style, by Mr. James Broughton. Unfortunately, the instrument, though a very large one, is not kept in good condition by the directors of the hall, and is hardly fit for solo playing. The great attraction of the concert was, of course, the performances of the chorus, which excited a special interest by the fact that Mr. Broughton made his first début as conductor in Bradford. The steadiness of his beat, the thorough control he exercised over every individual singer in the large chorus before him, the nicety with which the most difficult passages were brought out, and the due attention which was paid to light and shade and to proper expression showed that the members have every reason to congratulate themselves in having secured the co-operation of so talented a gentleman. Spohr's anthem, "How lovely are Thy dwellings fair," a composition full of difficulties, such as only Spohr can create, by his peculiar mannerism and the great many chromatic harmonies he introduces, was given with great precision, excepting a slight unsteadiness in the last fugue. The 43rd Psalm of Mendelssohn, for eight parts, without accompaniment, was the best performance of the evening, and brought out the splendid resources of the society to great advantage, affording another proof that nothing can surpass the effect of some 300 well-trained voices expressing breathing sweet harmonious strains—now swelling out like a mighty storm. "Alma Virgo," by Hummel, concluded the first part. The performances of the chorus in the second part comprised Callcott's glee, "In the lonely vale of streams;" Bishop's "Tramp Chorus;" Sullivan's part song, "Hush thee, my baby;" Mendelssohn's part song, "The Nightingale," and the "Hunting Chorus," both very effectively rendered; the "Echo Chorus," by Neithardt; and concluding with Purcell's "Come, if you dare." These were interspersed with solos, by Mr. Thornton Wood, Miss Amy Empsall, Mrs. Lindley Sutton, Miss Myers, and Mr. Charlesworth Prince, who each contributed their share to the success of the evening. Miss Empsall, who has lately come to reside in Bradford, made her first appearance at these concerts, and we were agreeably surprised by her finished execution, which, allied to a mellow, rich soprano voice of considerable compass, will make this young lady a very valuable addition to our local talent. Her selecting the great air from the Freischutz, "Softly sighs," for her first introduction, might, perhaps, be considered too ambitious; but we had heard her sing it, we could not help thinking that she had done right in showing what she really could do. Altogether, it is very gratifying to know that a really first-class concert can be got up in Bradford by purely local talent; and the result of this evening's performance will be very encouraging to the members of this society.

COLONIAL.

SYDNEY.—A complimentary concert, tendered by the friends and fellow-artists of Mr. Fairfax, took place at the School of Arts last night. The programme was carried out by most of the leading members of the corpes de concert of Sydney. The most noticeable features were Mr. Fairfax's and Mr. Hill's performances. "The Last Man" and "The Exile's Lament," by the former gentleman, were given in his well-known excellent style. For an encore to "The Exile's Lament," he substituted "Will-o'-the-Wisp." Mr. John Hill, K.S., R.A.M., performed upon the harmonium the overtures to William Tell and Semiramide, the execution of each eliciting unbounded applause. Mr. Hill also appeared as a vocalist, in Blumenthal's "Requital." Mr. Sebastian Hodge played a selection from Il Barbiere di Seviglia on the clarionet. Miss Kosten was most successful in her efforts to please, and was recalled after her first song, "The Queen of the Sea."—The Empire (August 10th).

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—The report of the directors submitted to the shareholders at the quarterly meeting on the 10th inst., at the Norfolk Street offices, gives the receipts for the quarter ending at Michaelmas, £36,693 7s.; for the financial year ending at the same date, £133,176 17s. 11d.; the grand totals, £1,583,359 15s. 2d. The withdrawals were, £399,971 3s. 9d., and the reserve fund, £10,500. The auditors were re-elected and the report adopted. Viscount Ranelagh occupied the chair, and among the directors and members present were Col. B. Knox, the Hon. and Rev. W. Talbot, Col. Jarvis, M.P., Col. Meyrick, Mr. Goodson, Mr. T. K. Holmes, Mr. Newcomen, Mr. Stride, Mr. Winstanley, Mr. John Ashdown, Mr. Sangster, and Mr. C. L. Gruneisen (secretary).

GAIETY THEATRE.

A new English version, by Mr. Alfred Thompson, of Hérold's romantic opera, Zampa, was produced at this theatre on Saturday night, for the début of Mr. Santley, whose return to the English lyric boards, upon which he won his earliest laurels, has naturally been looked forward to by the musical world as an event of exceptional interest. That the manager of the Gaiety intends, at least for a period, to make opera, of one kind or another, his principal source of attraction is tolerably well known. It would scarcely have answered the purpose to resort to M. Offenbach and his school for the first appearance of one, not only the most popular baritone of our day, but for years ranking among the chief ornaments of the Italian operatic stage; and though, for various reasons, we are inclined to believe that Zampa was not precisely the best work to select, at all events, as the admitted masterpiece of a celebrated French composer, it conferred a certain dignity upon the occasion.

With Zampa and its composer, even had space been more accommodating than is the case just now, there would be no necessity to occupy the attention of our readers at any length. Originally brought out at the Opéra Comique, in 1831 (two years before Hérold's death), when it drove the easily moved Parisians almost wild with delight, Zampa has kept the stage ever since, and is scarcely less popular in Germany than in France. A history of the several occasions upon which the London public have been enabled to judge it, terminating with its resuscitation—with accompanied recitative in lieu of dialogue—at the Royal Italian Opera, during the summer of 1858 (Mdlle. Parepa, Madame Nantier-Didiée, Signors Tamberlik and Ronconi in the chief parts), would be of little interest; nor are we called upon to dwell upon the critically-the merits of an opera sanctioned by the approval of nearly two generations, and the melodies of which, incomparably its most legitimate claims to esteem, have, through various mediums, become familiar to all musical Europe. Least of all shall we be expected to inflict upon our readers a new description of the libretto of M. Mélesville's work, or of the late Scribe's earliest co-labourers, but this time acting solely on his own responsibility. Those who have forgotten or are unacquainted with the story of Zampa di Monza, a dissolute nobleman, a rover in two senses, Corsair and Don Giovanni in one;—how he has destroyed a certain Alphonso in this guise; how he becomes a corsair; how, under threat of murdering her father, he frightens another young maiden, Camilla, into consenting to be his bride; how, at a banquet with his lawless retainers, he beholds a marble statue of Albina, and, overcome with wine, in mocking redemption of his early promise, places a wedding ring within the statue's hand, which, to his consternation, clutches and retains it; how, hardened in iniquity, he, in spite of this, marries by force the terrified Camilla, to the despair of Alphonso di Monza, to whom she loves, to whom she has pledged her troth, and who must time out of mind send to be Zampa's own brother; how, to "make short tale," at the moment of importuning Camilla, and defying Alphonso with his sword, the "Marble Bride" unexpectedly appears, claiming the Corsair for her own, seizing his hand, and sweeping him off to regions unknown—these matters are forgotten or are unacquainted with these striking incidents can hardly do better than repair to the Gaiety, where they may appreciate them for themselves, together with other notable events too numerous to specify, and where, whatever they may think of Zampa and his achievements, or misachievements, they will listen to some very pretty music, and, best of all, hear Mr. Santley sing.

That Mr. Santley was greeted with enthusiasm may easily be credited. His general notion of the Italian Don Giovanni,—ho, daring and reckless as the Spanish Don Giovanni, is, like that di-tingui-hed personage, submitted to supernatural influences and carried to perdition by a spectre in stone—differs in no material respects from what has been long accepted as the correct one. Signor Tamberlik saw the character from much the same point of view as M. Cholley, the original; and Mr. Santley, though he could hardly have witnessed the performance of either, instinctively adopts their idea, and illustrates it after his own fashion. That the part has never been better sung than by him may be fearlessly asserted. The music which Hérold has given to his hero, unlike ordinary music, can be made to suit a tenor voice (even a high tenor voice—witness Tamberlik), or a baritone. The original Zampa was a tenor of that peculiar stamp belonging by prescriptive right to the Opera Comique. The voice of Chollet (also the original Fra Diavolo) was, in the meridian of his career, neither a low tenor nor a high baritone, but a kind of mixture of the two. During his whole career he shone more as an actor than as a singer; but what he lacked in one respect he made up for in another—good taste, strong feeling, and remarkable dramatic power more than atoning for certain mechanical deficiencies as a vocalist. What Chollet could accomplish by means of certain artifices may be seen in the tenor parts of Fra Diavolo and Zampa, as they exist in the recognized published scores of Auber and Hérold. For a quarter of a century the part of Zampa has been indifferently sung by tenor or baritone, according to the immediate resources of the theatre where the opera happened to be given; but in Germany, since the once renowned Fischer undertook the character, it has most frequently been confided to a baritone. So that although Mr. Santley gives some of his songs in the original keys, he cannot now fairly be accused of high treason against the majesty of Hérold, seeing that if treason there be it has long been sanctified by tradition, and, moreover, has been the means of preserving Hérold's most highly valued opera from comparative oblivion. The four solos put into the mouth of Zampa—the barcarole, "Que la vague écumante lance vers les cieux" (Anglice, "What if the foaming billow"), the most striking passage in the first finale; the cavatina and scena in the opening scene of Act 2, "Camille, tu m'appartiendras" ("Camilla's there," &c.), in the last movement of which wanting a Leporello, Zampa celebrates his conquests, not to a long-suffering Elvira, but in soliloquy, for his own edification; the barcarole, "Douce jouvencelle" ("Maiden eyes are glancing"), which plays much the same part in the second finale as its predecessor in the first; and the address to Camilla, "Quand tremblez l'or" ("Thou art my Queen," &c.)—are among the most attractive passages in the whole, and upon their effective delivery no little depends. True, Mr. Santley sings none of them exactly as Hérold composed them—a liberty in defence of which we may cite honourable precedent; but on the other hand, he sings each and all of them in a manner for which precedent would by no means be so easy to find. Where all was good it will suffice to single out that which was best of all—the scena at the commencement of Act 2 (Zampa's "Il Catalogo" —without the "Madamina"). This was perfect from end to end, and brought down such a storm of applause that Zampa was forced to recount his victories over again; and there were not a few present who would willingly have listened to the recital even a third time.

Mr. Santley had, for the most part, reason to be satisfied with his concerted music. Madame Florence Lancia gave the music of Camilla with the facility and correctness of a practised artist, and acted with equal intelligence and feeling. Camilla's music, apart from the romance wherein the story of Albina, Zampa's victim, is narrated ("Dune haute montagne," the theme of which occurs early in the overture), exhibits more of Hérold's weakness than his strength. When, as often occurs in Zampa, he tries to imitate Rossini and the followers of Rossini's early manner, he is as lamentably feeble as when, agreeably to his nature, writing in the pure French style, brought to perfection by Auber, he is strong. Thus his Camilla, in a musical sense, is the poorest character of the opera. Nevertheless, the part requires experience and skill to sing with fluency; and both are possessed by Madame Lancia in such a degree as to make one regret that her voice has not more power and quality. In the dramatic scene between Camilla and Zampa, near the end of the last act, Madame Lancia fairly divided the honours with the hero of the night. Nothing could be more engaging and acceptable than Miss Emmeline Cole, as Rita, Camilla's favourite attendant; and nothing more careful and refined than the part that Mr. W. H. Cummings had to sing, in the somewhat lackadaisical character of Alphonse, Camilla's lover. Mr. Cummings is as yet a novice on the boards; but our lyric stage is greatly in want of singers so unpretentious and, at the same time, so thoroughly efficient. Mr. Aynsley Cooke exhibited his accustomed vigour and broad idea of humour in the part of Daniel, the Corsair's chief mate; and Mr. Charles Lyall, as Dandolo, the timid bellringer, so frightened at the apparition of Zampa (a small part, of which Rosenthal was by no means unequal), justified further hope that, should such a desirable institution as a permanent English opera ever be established in London, an admirable representative of certain subordinate, though by no means unimportant characters, is immediately at hand. Owing to this gentleman's quaint and yet natural acting, the trio for Camilla, Rita, and Dandolo (Act 1), when the last-mentioned enters, terror-stricken at the menaces of Zampa, threatening him with instant death should he ring the bell for the marriage of Camilla and Alphonso, became one of the striking effects of the performance; and this was the more gratifying inasmuch as the trio itself is, perhaps, the best piece of concerted music in the entire opera—best alike whether judged from a musical or dramatic point of view.

With regard to the execution generally, we need only say that Herr Meyer Lutz, the conductor, deserves credit for the skilful manner in which he uses the materials at his disposal. Though the orchestra under his control is by no means strong enough, either numerically or otherwise, to produce the effect contemplated in music like that of Hérold, it contains some excellent players in its ranks; and the familiar overture was given with such spirit as to draw down an encore, apparently so unanimous that Herr Lutz felt bound to repeat the whole—thus, we think, injudiciously prolonging the performance. The chorus is, for the most part, good—and this, remembering that an opera by Hérold, and not an opera by M. Offenbach, or M. Hervé (M. Offenbach's shadow) is under consideration. Much, indeed, of the finales to Acts 1 and 2, the two most ambitious concerted pieces, was extremely well done. A line must suffice to say that Mr. Gordon has devised some very appropriate tableaux for the occasion —a Sicilian coast scene (Act 2) being especially noticeable for its picturesqueness; and that the ballet and mise-en-scène, comprising an exceedingly well-managed representation of the "Marble Bride," are quite up to the standard to which the public have been accustomed at the Gaiety. The performance, as may be gathered from the foregoing remarks, was a complete success—not only for Mr. Santley, but more or less for all concerned; and the fall of the curtain at the end of each act was merely the signal for its being raised again. Herr Lutz, who has made some very advisable "cuts," may venture still further in the same direction, without injury to Hérold's music, which is not unfrequently diffuse to little purpose. In conclusion, if it is the director's intention to go on with operas of so pretentious a character as Zampa, one thing should be impressed on his mind as indispensable—his orchestra must be numerically strengthened; more "strings," above all, are required; and the complement of wind instruments (the "wood" imperatively) should be filled up.

THE OLD NEWSPAPER STAMP.

The old newspaper stamp, abolished on Friday, September 30, had an existence of 158 years. In the year 1712 Queen Anne sent a message to the House of Commons complaining of the publication of seditious papers and factious rumours, by which means designing men had been able to sink credit and the innocent had suffered. On the 12th of February in that year a committee of the whole House was appointed to consider the best means for stopping the then existing abuse of the liberty of the Press. The evil referred to had existence in the political pamphlets of the period. A tax upon the Press was suggested as the best means of remedying the evil, and for the purpose of avoiding a storm of opposition the impost was tacked on to a Bill for taxing soaps, parchment, linens, silks, calicoes, &c. The result of the tax was the discontinuance of many of the favourite papers of the period, and the amalgamation of others into one publication. The Act, passed in June 1712, came into operation in the month of August following, and continued for 32 years. The stamp was red, and the design consisted of the rose, shamrock, and thistle, surmounted with a crown. In the Spectator of June 10, 1712, Addison makes reference to this subject, and predicts great mortality among "our weekly historians." He also mentions that a facetious friend had described the said mortality as "the fall of the leaf." The witty Dean Swift, in his Journal to Stella, under date of August 7, speaks of Grub Street as being dead and gone. According to his report the new stamp had made and havoc with the Observator, the Flying Post, the Examiner, and the Medley. Twelve years afterwards—namely, in 1724—the House of Commons had under consideration the practises of certain printers, who had evaded the operation of the Stamp Act by printing the news upon paper between the two sizes mentioned by the law, and entering as pamphlets, on which the duty to be paid was 3s. for each edition. Its deliberations culminated in a resolution to charge 1d. for every sheet of paper "on which any journal, mercury, or any other newspaper whatever shall be printed," and for every half sheet thereof the sum of one half-penny sterling." In 1751 the stamp duty upon newspapers was made 1d., or £4 1s. 8d. for 1,000 sheets. The next change in the stamp duty was effected on the 28th of May, 1776, when Lord North advanced the price from 1d. to 1½d. Another alteration was made on the 12th August, 1789. On this occasion the stamp was increased from 1½d. to 2d In 1794 the stamp went up to 2½d., and in May, 1797, to 3½d. The highest rate of the stamp was obtained in 1815, when the amount was 4d. After this date a period of decline ensued. In the reign of William IV. an act was passed for the reduction of stamp duty upon newspapers from 4d. to 1d., and ¼d. upon any supplement. This Act came into operation on the 15th of September, 1836, from which date the rise of the cheap paper may be dated. The next improvement occurred in 1855, when the compulsory use of the stamp was abolished, save and except as a means of passing the paper through the post. During the last Session we had the latest touch of Stamp Act legislation, when it was decided to determine the operation of the old Act, and to inaugurate a new order of things more in accordance with the liberal spirit of the age.

GLOBE THEATRE.

Redecorated by Mr. E. W. Bradwell, under the direction of Mr. Walter Emden, and opened by Miss Alleyne, the Globe Theatre on Saturday night presented a very pretty appearance. Everything was new and bright, and the act drop, representing Shakspere's old Globe Theatre on the Bankside, Southwark, conveyed an impression that something of the higher order would be attempted in the house. This was confirmed by an address, written by Mr. Walter Lacy, and spoken by him, after the conclusion of an introductory farce. The main piece of the evening was the abridged version of the Taming of the Shrew, commonly played under the title of Katherine and Petruchio. The fair vixen was represented by Miss Alleyne, who modestly professes herself a novice. Her voice and appearance are greatly in her favour, she speaks with discrimination, and her manner generally recalls that of Miss Neilson. Of the character of Katherine she takes somewhat too sensible a view, keeping the "Shrew" in the background, and more plainly revealing the loving nature which ultimately leads to the reconciliation of the tamer with the tamed. But altogether it was a most creditable début.

Had Miss Alleyne, who confesses inexperience, been better advised, she would have revived, not the farce, always played as an after-piece at the patent theatres, but Shakspere's entire comedy, with the character of Christopher Sly, after the fashion in which, some years ago, it was admirably reproduced at the Haymarket Theatre by Mr. Benjamin Webster. She would then at once have marked out her theatre for what is technically called a "speciality," and, at the same time, have concealed the weakness of her company. Comparatively few have seen the comedy, but everybody is familiar with the farce, which is associated with the names of our greatest comic actors. Mr. Fairclough, who plays Petruchio, does his best, and is a good declaimer, but of the buoyant, joyous gallant represented by Charles Kemble and others he has no more notion than Mr. Cathcart has of Grumio. Sad errors, too, are there in the general conduct of the piece, showing that oblivion of tradition does not necessarily cause increase of light. The leg of mutton which provides the rage of Petruchio was really burnt to a cinder, the cup which he rejects really ugly. Now, the gist of the play consists in the assumption of motiveless rage by a man who wishes to put to shame the unreasonable temper of his bride. The wrath of Petruchio on being handed such a joint as is served up at the Globe Theatre would have been natural in a fiery gentleman of the 16th century who had not attained that control over passion which is the boast of the nineteenth. Had the old comedy been revived with all its appointments in a sound archæological spirit, the defective details would have been lost in the novelty of the spectacle.

The evening concluded with Mr. Palgrave Simpson's romantic drama, Maces Spada, originally produced by the late Mr. Charles Kean at the Princess's Theatre. N. D.

MUSIC AT VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

Business is very good just now at the Imperial Operahouse. This may partly be attributed to the great number of strangers here at present. Mdlle. Bertha Ehnn has returned, after a long absence in Italy, and re-appeared in Faust, Mignon, and other operas. Miss Minnie Hauck, too, is singing away again as blithe as a lark; she is a great favourite in parts like Zerlina, but her more serious efforts are not so popular. Speaking to Tartuffe, that worthless brother-in-law says: "Les hommes la plupart sont étrangement faits," adding: "Et la plus noble chose ils la gâtent souvent, pour la vouloir outrer et pousser trop avant." Now this assertion is as applicable to the principle of "alternation" as to any other, a fact most convincingly proved by something which happened lately at the Imperial Operahouse. At that establishment the principle has been laid down, once for all, that the various artists representing the same line of business shall, as it is termed, "alternate" in the different parts, or, to speak more idiomatic English, that each artist shall play every part in his turn. Robert le Diable was announced. Herr Rokitansky was Bertram. Herr Rokitansky was, moreover, hoarse, and very hoarse, to boot. But the principle of "alternation" required that Herr Rokitansky should, on that particular evening, sing the part, though he had not a note in his voice, and he consequently did sing it—without a note in his voice—while not fewer than four other bassos—Herren Schmidt, Draxler, Hablawetz, and Meyerhofer, all belonging to the theatre, in the rudest health, and the best possible vocal feather, if such an expression be permissible, were in the front of the house, seeing their unfortunate colleague sing. Most decidedly Red Tape is not patronised exclusively in England. S. S.

MUNICH.—Herr Czerny, formerly conductor at the Augsburg Theatre, has just sent in a new opera, Das Testament, to the Royal Operahouse here. The Volkstheater was re-opened on the 1st inst.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM.—Our own correspondent from this town writes to us as follows:—

"The Festival excitement having cooled down, thoughts are being turned to the winter musical season. Last week there was a concert at the Town Hall, with Madame Rudersdorff, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Lewis Thomas as principals. The programme was of the usual miscellaneous character. On the 24th Mr. Mapleson's troup is to commence a series of six performances at the Theatre Royal, Don Giovanni, Lucia, Norma, Masaniello, Lucrezia Borgia, Sonnambula, and the Huguenots are to be the operas, with Mdlles. Tietjens, Ilma di Murska, Trebelli, Sinico, Scalchi, and Signori Bellini, Vizzani, Rinaldini, Ciampi, Tagliafico, and Mr. W. Morgan as singers. The conductor's name is not yet mentioned. More anon.—BUTTON OF BIRMINGHAM."

BRADFORD.—On the 6th inst. the first concert by the Festival Choral Society for the year 1870 was given in St. George's Hall. The audience was large. The principals were—Miss Amy Empsall, Miss Myers, Mrs. Lidney-Naylor, and Messrs. Robert Leach, Thornton Wood, Charlesworth Prince, and William Northrop, supported by the entire strength of the members and the orchestral subscribers, numbering nearly 200 voices. The organist and accompanist was Mr. A. Moorhouse, and the conductor Mr. Broughton. The programme included Spohr's "How lovely are Thy dwellings fair," Hummel's "Alma Virgo," with other important sacred and secular works.

CARMARTHEN.—The Journal of October 7th says:—

"A Festival of the choirs of the Church Choral Union of the Rural Deanery of lower Carmarthen, was held at Lampeter Belfrey Church on the 28th of September, on the occasion of a thanksgiving, and for the purpose of publicly evincing gratitude for the late bountiful harvest. The Laugharne, Narberth, Llandissilio, and Lampeter Belfrey choirs attended on the occasion, and formed into procession and sang the processional hymn, 'Onward, Christian Soldiers,' and were followed in procession by about twenty clergymen, the singing throughout was considered excellent. At the close of each of the services collections were made, part to be given in aid of the funds of the Choral Union of the Deanery."

MALVERN.—From a notice in the local Advertiser of October the 8th, we abridge as follows:—

"During the present week the concert-room has been occupied by the English Opera and Burlesque Company, who hall, we believe, from the metropolis. The company is one of undoubted merit, and it is therefore satisfactory that the performances have been well patronized. Balfe's Bohemian Girl was the first opera given, and in The Rose of Castile on Tuesday the company acquitted themselves creditably. Il Trovatore was given on Wednesday, and on Thursday La Sonnambula was presented to a crowded house. Friday's performance included Balfe's Satanella. All the characters throughout the week have been well sustained, and the audiences have appeared highly gratified."

WARMINSTER.—Apropos of a new operetta by Mr. Frank Spinney, a local paper says:—

"Mr. Spinney promises by his industry and talent to attain a position in the musical world of no mean standing. Some time ago he wrote a cantata which brought him prominently before the notice of local musicians, and now he has produced an operetta which will undoubtedly gain him the attention of a much wider circle. The latter was presented to the public for the first time on the morning and evening of Wednesday last, at the Town Hall, Warminster, in a manner that the character of the work deserved, and was evidently much appreciated by the large audience on each occasion. The libretto, from the pen of Mr. Percy Thornton, entitled Village Belles may be characterized as spirited and expressive. The ideas are prettily woven, pungently and well expressed, and the musical composition harmonizes with them in a pleasing and striking manner."

HEREFORD.—We read as follows in the Bristol Times of October 8th:—

"The grand organ erected in Castle Hall was formally 'inaugurated' yesterday. At present it has an unfinished look. If the outer covering is incomplete, however, the organ itself is finished, and is a magnificent production of Mr. Henry Willis, at a cost of £2,500. It is the largest in the West of England, and is next in size and power to that of Birmingham. The festival commenced with an organ performance in the afternoon, the player being Mr. Best. The pieces chosen for the recital had been most carefully selected so as to display the various features of the instrument, and consisted of:—1. Organ Concerto, in G minor—Handel; 2. Larghetto, from the quintet for clarionet and strings—Mozart; 3. Rondo and Fugue, in G minor—Bach; 4. Air with variations, for the organ—J. L. Hatton; 5. Grand Fantasia, 'Orage suivi par une prière'—Lemmens; concluding with the National Anthem, arranged by Mr. Best himself. The capabilities of the organ were admirably displayed. In the evening the Messiah was performed, the soloists being Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The chorus was the fullest and most complete ever assembled in Colston Hall. The solo singers were all in excellent voice, and have seldom sung better. Miss Wynne especially charmed by her able interpretation of 'Rejoice greatly' and 'Come unto me.' Very warm applause also greeted Miss Julia Elton after singing 'O thou that bringest' and 'He shall feed his flock.' Her most successful effort was, perhaps, 'He was despised.' Mr. Vernon Rigby sang all his music with his usual care and excellent taste; as did also Mr. Lewis Thomas. The choruses were given with great precision, and were most effective. The voices were well balanced and went harmoniously together, which must have been gratifying to Mr. George Risely, the conductor. 'He shall purify,' 'For unto us,' and 'All we like sheep,' were interpreted in a manner seldom heard in the provinces. The organ performance of Mr. Best was astonishing. At times the different string and brass instruments were imitated to perfection, and a better substitute for a band could not have been found. The Pastoral Symphony was well played."

LEEDS.—The Leeds Express of October the 3rd says:—

"The compositions of Mr. Henry Smart were thoroughly enjoyed at Saturday night's concert, by a large audience. There is no composer living who more thoroughly devotes his talents to legitimate music than Henry Smart. There is not the slightest approach to vulgarity or clap-trap in his popular ballads; and no inane words will be found wedded to Mr. Smart's music. For variety, for melody, for good writing, and for what people love to call 'prettiness,' no modern compositions equal his. This was evident when the audience, although hearing nearly all the pieces for the first time, at once became so interested of them as to demand numerous repetitions. Most charming is the song, 'The birds are telling one another,' and Miss Winder sang it with great taste. 'The Switzer Maiden' is an excellent characteristic song, which Miss Hiles gave effectively—the inevitable echo in it being capitally produced. Amongst the most taking of the pieces was a MS. song, 'Hurrah! for merry England,' capitally given by Mr. Dodds, in which Mr. Smart has shown that vigorous, stirring music, and a most pleasing melody may be combined. The words of this song are by Barry Cornwall, and, as soon as published, it will become popular amongst amateur vocalists. Organ solos were played by Dr. Spark, all of which were enjoyed. The Andante gracioso in G was especially noted for its lovely flowing subject and elegant treatment. Mr. Smart might have had the singularly beautiful reed-stops in our Town Hall organ in his mind when penning this composition, so charming were the effects produced."

GLASGOW.—Mr. Sims Reeves appeared on the 8th inst. at a "Saturday Evening Concert." We take the following notice of the event from the Daily Herald:—

"On Saturday evening the City Hall was crowded, and numbers had to be turned away, a circumstance which always occurs when Mr. Sims Reeves' name is announced. The immense popularity our first (we had almost said only) tenor enjoys it is nothing more than due to his great talents. It is comparatively easy for a vocalist to obtain a passing esteem, but it is seldom granted to any artist to make and maintain such a position as Mr. Reeves has done. Speaking for ourselves, there is no vocalist from whom we have derived more pleasure than Mr. Reeves. Listening to him we acknowledge a master, and are happy to find ourselves at the feet of such a teacher. Long may Mr. Reeves' superb voice be spared, but even were that to fail, he could still exercise over the art that influence which has been acquired by years of thoughtful study. On Saturday Mr. Reeves' appearance was a signal for an enthusiastic reception. He was in splendid voice, and in its use unsparing. He first sang, 'In Native Worth,' which was listened to with breathless attention. At its termination he was twice called back. He also sang a manuscript ballad, 'Marnie of the Mill.' The ballad of itself is without any pretension, but to its simplicity is added purity. In reply to a hearty demand, Mr. Reeves repeated the song, and as an encore to Bishop's 'Pilgrim of Love,' he gave 'My Love is like a red, red Rose,' which was enthusiastically received. We have always a strong sympathy for any artist appearing with Mr. Reeves. The fact that the audience are as-sembled to hear him alone places all the other singers at a disadvantage. It is, therefore, the more to the credit of Misses Blanche Cole and Fennel and Mr. Bantian Kelly that they made a favourable impression, and were so well received. Mr. Berger, who satisfactorily discharged the duties of accompanist, played a composition of his own, under the somewhat polyglot title, 'Tarantelle impromptu Punchinello.' The 'Tarantelle' is not difficult to perform, and was encored."

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS, HANOVER SQUARE.—Mr. Robert Cocks has obtained a renewal of his license for music and dancing at these renowned rooms.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

FLAUTO MAGICO.—Charles Nicholson made his début in London about 1820, with that form of flute usually called the "concert-flute," to distinguish it from the old German flute. It was bored on a new and better principle, and its holes were enlarged, and graduated with more exactness, though still on an unequal scale. With this flute, improved in tone and extended in compass, Nicholson presented himself before the public, fifty years ago. It is true he only introduced a very old friend, but so changed in voice and appearance that it was practically new, and this was one cause of his popularity.

B. OF B.—Fifty of Haydn's symphonies are arranged for the pianoforte, and, if we are not mistaken, may be obtained at Novello's.

EPHRAIM BOTTLOCK.—No—just the opposite. Cherubini dedicated his Medée to Méhul.

PURPLE POWIS.—Donizetti's operetta, Betly, was first heard in English at the Grecian Saloon, where the late Robson played Daniel. The story of Betly (the same as that of Scribe and Adolph Adam's Chalet) has been often dramatized here. The late Keeley may be remembered in The Swiss Cottage; and another version was produced at the Lyceum.

DR. SEPTIMUS WIND.—The question asked by Dr. Wind can only be answered by the author of St. Peter (first and unsettable version) himself. We have no wish to take any part in the controversy. Mr. Chorley, like his reviser, has enjoyed the advantage of the publicity conferred by our columns.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1870.

AN EXAMPLE OF BAD TASTE.

WE hear a good deal about German "culture;" and, no doubt, it is an excellent thing in its way. Unfortunately, "what is bred in the bone will be sure to come out in the flesh"—culture or no culture; and hence our Teutonic brethren are occasionally liable to ebullitions of the old barbaric spirit. He is the truest gentleman, as high authorities tell us, who shows most consideration for the feelings of others. Per contra, he is the truest savage who regards only his own. Judged by this standard, the Germans resident in London are worthy descendants of the tribes who swarmed over the Alps, long ago, and extinguished Roman civilization.

There is a society in London calling itself the "German Association for the Relief of the Sick and Wounded in the War of 1870"—a very laudable society, with a very praiseworthy object. It wants money, as a matter of course, and adopts various methods of supplying the want—among others that of concert-giving. Against this there is not a word to say. If "the end does not sanctify the means," there are some ends—notably that of succouring fellow-creatures in distress—which make the use of every lawful means imperative. So far we are entirely in line with the German Association, &c. Further on, we diverge at the greatest possible angle.

Our London Germans, however important an element they may be in metropolitan life, are aliens in a strange land, with the obligation upon them not to abuse the hospitality they enjoy. Just now, their position is one of extreme delicacy. They live among a neutral people, who watch with pain and sorrow the bloody struggle between a kindred race and a good neighbour and firm ally of twenty years' standing. They live, moreover, in a country which is proud to sustain its old character, as an asylum for the distressed of all nations, by receiving and sheltering the thousands of French people whom the cruel exigencies of war have driven from their native soil. In view of this position, what line of conduct would naturally suggest itself to a German of delicacy and good taste, supposing the phenomenon to exist? Would not the fortunate possessor of such a nature say within himself—"On this neutral soil I must refrain from exhibiting my sympathies, lest they should prove compromising to those whose guest I am. Still more must I keep clear of demonstrations certain to pain my fellow guests, whose position, as enforced exiles, gives them a special claim upon forbearance." A German reasoning thus might belie his national characteristics, but he would prove himself a gentleman and a man of taste. Unfortunately, the character is hypothetical—at least within the ranks of the German Association for the Sick and Wounded, whose concert, at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday night, was nothing less than an outrage upon decency. The offence, be it understood, lay not in Herr Hallé, playing extracts from Schubert and Chopin; in Herr Hammer, essaying variations on a maudlin melody; nor in Herr Nordblom, conveying his impressions of a battle-field. These things, and others like them, were harmless, if not edifying; but we cannot say so much for the blatant shouting, by a German Gesangverein, of German battle-songs; for the recitation (save the mark!) of gigantic puffs of "Vaterland;" and for the cry of "Vorwärts," raised by Frau Ruderdorff, to the music of Herr Randegger—as if such a cry were needed while any part of France is available for "requisitions." We hold these things, however tolerable in their place—that is, in Germany, or in exclusively German gatherings—to be examples of the worst possible taste when brought forward at a public gathering, in the heart of a neutral city, and within possible hearing of those whom right feeling should guard from every chance of insult. If the French give a concert on behalf of their wounded, let us hope they will gain an advantage over their conquerors by showing that delicacy at least remains to them.

WIESBADEN.—The war has, of course, sadly deranged all artistic matters here just as elsewhere. The Administration of the Kurhaus was accustomed to get up every year from six to ten concerts, at which the most famous artists from all parts of Europe were engaged. This year, also, the Administration had arranged a splendid programme for the season, but the concerts were summarily stopped after the second. The artists at the first concert were Mad. Loderer-Ubrich, soprano, from Darmstadt; Mdlle. P. de Smet, pianist, from Brussels; Herr Betz, baritone, from Berlin; and M. Léonard, violinist, from Paris. Those at the second were: Mad. Peschka-Leutner, from the Leipsic Theatre; Mdlle. P. Fichtner, pianist, from Vienna; Herr Schelper, baritone, from Berlin; and M. Jules de Swert, violoncellist. The band from the Theatre began the concerts by some overture, and executed the necessary orchestral accompaniments. After these two concerts, a third was given, but the artists belonged to the place or to some town not far off. The performances at the theatre have gone on as usual.

MOSCOW.—The Italian operatic season commenced on the 27th Sept., with Donizetti's Lucrezia. The leading singers engaged are Mesdames Carlotta and Barbara Marchisio, Artot-Padilla, Murska, Volpini, Wiese, Trebelli; Signori Tamberlik, Stanjo, Bettini, Marini, Rota, Padilla, Steller, Belleval, Bagagiolo, and Bossi. Señor Guis, a Spaniard, is the conductor.

An Improbization.

Picked up in the Crystal Palace Concert-Room, on Saturday, October 8th.

THE TENOR'S APPEAL.

When other artists sing this song,
And burst on upper A's,
They'll sing so long and sing so strong,
Enough the roof to raise.
You'll grind your teeth when they sing sharp,
Or break on E or G;
But as I sing both loud and strong,
Then you'll remember me.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Without wishing to stop the flow of charity, we may express little sympathy with the entertainment given in St. James's Hall for the German wounded. Concerts for charitable purposes are oftentimes the cause of great imposition upon artists, who are called upon to work real sacrifices while the audience get a quid pro quo. But apart from this was it decent for the Gesang-Vereine to be shouting their war-songs in the heart of neutral London, and within hearing of the French refugees who have sought our hospitality? Surely there was music enough without bringing forward compositions so manifestly out of place.

Ernest Feydeau—author of Fanny, Un Début l'Opera, Monsieur de si Bertrand, Le Mari de la Danseuse, and other infamous books—is at Boulogne-sur-Mere, struck (like the country which he, and others, like himself, have been the means of debasing) with paralysis. To the sinister influence of such writers as M. Feydeau, more than any to other cause, is France (especially Paris) indebted for the state of degradation into which it has hopelessly sunk. The tolerance (not to speak of approval) for so many years, of writers like M. Feydeau, who have made the liberty of the press a pest and a mockery, instead of a blessing, would alone suffice to explain why the modern Babylon has collapsed.

The programme is published of the resuscitated Olympic Games, which are to take place at Athens, not at Olympia, and to celebrate, not the deeds of Hercules, but the opening of the Greek Industrial Exhibition. This revival deserves to rank with the Eglinton Tournament, but seems scarcely conducted with such purism. On the first day, indeed, the 16th of October, gymnastic games are to be held at the Panathenaic Stadium, and competitors are to appear in the ancient Greek costume. Considering what that was on such occasions, there will be no great call on the costumiers. On Sunday, the 23rd, we are promised a lottery, with swimming and boat-races in the harbour of Phalerus. "Sea-manœuvres after the fashion of the ancient Greeks" are also announced; so we may presume that the modern Greeks have solved the Trireme problem.

It appears that Mr George Perren has resumed his post as director of the Crystal Palace operas. We are glad to hear it, because, doubtless, Mr. Perren may be trusted to work far better results than those we have had of late. The prospectus mentions several additions to the established repertory of the Palace, among them being such important works as Der Freischütz and Fidelio. Mr. Perren needs no assurance that the music of Weber and Beethoven will tax all his resources, and that its execution will be judged by a different standard than the execution of English ballad operas. Knowing this, he may be trusted to do his very best with the means which the entire absence of an English school of lyric drama so seriously limits. Let us add a hope that in the prosperity and long-continuance of Crystal Palace opera, we may see the beginning of a change which shall develop musical talent by establishing an English lyric stage. Should this result come about the Sydenham "glass house" will have made another claim upon national gratitude by accomplishing another national good.

It is doubtful consolation for the sufferers from street music to learn that the character of its strains is the result of Protestantism. Mr. Kaines, tell us such is the case, and that even "the emotional cravings and wild unrest" which mark the melodies of our times are indications of the religious spirit of the age. We do not contest the position that national temperament influences national music, and should be prepared to find in the music of the north a more sombre tone than in that of the south. But we find a difficulty in accepting the theory that when "Protestantism broke the spell under which the human intellect was bound by Roman Catholicism and enlarged the sphere of man's knowledge," the temperament and music of northern nations became saddened by an increased sense of responsibility, and the thought of the mysteries of life and death, thus losing the brightness and cheeriness which unreformed people of the south still retain. It may be questioned whether any modern English music can be called national; and if there be a tinge of sadness in the airs heard in street and drawing-room we should feel inclined to ascribe it to that dreariest of follies—comicality, sometimes miscalled humour.

"St. Peter" and Mr. Benedict.

As I perceive that the conductors of St. Peter are not content without attracting new attention to their proceedings—and that this attempt continues to take a form not so much defensive as offensive, rendering misapprehension possible—I am obliged to return to the subject.

In answer to a letter published in the columns of a contemporary on the 2nd ult., I have to point out, first, that not a single one among the statements made by me in this journal, on the 3rd of September, is contradicted. On the contrary, they are confirmed; especially the one in which attention was called by me to the engagement of an assistant by Mr. Benedict to make the changes, which, he assured me, he had him self made by aid of a Concordance, and which, as having been made in total contravention of our expressed agreement (that is, without consulting me), I declined either to examine or to sanction. The writer of the letter entirely overlooks the fact, that betwixt the months of May and January I was ignorant of Mr. Benedict's proceedings; having till then the impression that he was thoroughly satisfied with the libretto committed to him by the Birmingham committee to compose, and not to be patched, to suit his confessed incompetence, by a strange hand.

Further, with regard to the criticisms in the Athenæum, which it appears I am supposed to have influenced, let me state that I was absent from every rehearsal of St. Peter, in London and Birmingham; that I have not seen a line of the music in manuscript or in print to this day, and that I was totally unacquainted with the book of the oratorio till the morning of its production, on the 2nd of September—after my letter which appeared on the 3rd had been written and printed. My statement had only to do with the transaction, not with its results. The critic of Mr. Benedict's oratorio has never to this day seen a line of the original book on which Mr. Benedict's accomplice—alike indelicately and unjustifiably—pronounces his judgment, after private perusal; and is thus totally unaware of the extent of the transformations of a libretto accommodated to the musician to compose, and by him accepted with every expression of satisfaction.

I must reluctantly add a few words more. These in my former letter were withheld out of forbearance. They may now become necessary to the completion of an unpleasant story. On Mr. Benedict, in January last, expressing his amazement and vexation at my refusal—after the sale of his oratorio—to make acquaintance with changes not made by myself and as such expressly provided against, I offered to refer the matter in debate to the arbitration of two mutual friends of ours—Sir Michael Costa and the late Charles Dickens. This he distinctly declined. I did not, however, conceive myself prevented by such refusal from laying the case and the correspondence which had passed between us before two judges so competent, and above all suspicion of favouritism. I have the opinion of both before me; and if Mr. Benedict and his assistant desire further publicity in regard to their strange transaction, I am ready to publish the entire correspondence.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Walworth.—The members of the Choral Society in connection with the Literary Institution, opened the session of 1870-71 on the 7th Inst. with a public performance of selections from the first and second part of the Messiah. The works announced for rehearsal during the season are Handel's Semele, Mendelssohn's Elijah and Antigone, Mr. Sullivan's Prodigal Son, and Dr. Bennett's May Queen. The opening performance on Friday night, although upon a small scale, there being no instrumental adjunct save the piano, was thoroughly satisfactory as it went, and well deserved to have been better attended. The solo singing (by members of the class) was really admirable, and would have elicited a very favourable opinion even if regarded from a severely professional point of view. The chorus, too, quite maintained the excellent reputation it gained by the performances of the two last seasons. The principal singers were Misses Dix, Ford, Stringer, and Houghton, Messrs. Evison and Kaberry. Mr. F. Corfeus played the accompaniments. W. H. P.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—In the notice of the late Henry Wallack, by E. L. B. (may his pantomimic shadow never be less!), which appeared in last week's Musical World, there is a slight error which should not go uncorrected. Mr. Hoskins (not Hoskins) was son-in-law (not brother-in-law) of Henry Wallack, having married Julia, his daughter. Mrs. Hoskins, under the name of Julia Harland, played in opera for one or two seasons at the Princess's Theatre under the management of Mr. Maddox. I think the last piece in which she appeared in London was an opera by Hérold, called Marie. Subsequently, she played for some years in the provinces, with an operatic troupe, including Fanny Reeves, Elliot Galer, Henry Corri, &c.—Yours, Drinkwater Hand.

ENGLISH ACTORS OF OUR TIME.

No. 5.—Edmond Phelps.

Mr. Phelps cannot be said to belong to that race of tragedians in whose footsteps he essays to tread. Of the three constituents of tragic acting to which reference has been made, not one can in any plenary sense be said to be characteristic of him. His emotional power and his psychological perception are small, and his command of form is quite inadequate to the poortrayal of the higher characters of the tragic drama. But he is, notwithstanding, a clever, useful, and conscientious actor. Measured by the tests of a previous generation he seems small in stature, but placed side by side with his self-constituted rivals, his proportions are more than respectable. Earnestness of purpose and persistence of effort are revealed in all he does, and their presence goes some way to atone for the absence of any salient quality of perception or divine spark of creative power. His method in art is limited. The inflections of his voice are few, the more significant of his gestures are so frequently repeated as to become familiar and expected, and his general acting has a large measure of exaggeration, such as is in time adopted by all actors who play in large theatres and possess no special art or talent for the expression of passion. While, however, he comes short of greatness, Mr. Phelps is far removed from the commonplace. Some of his most ambitious attempts in tragedy, while they fail in subtlety and beauty, exhibit genuine and undeniable overs of a kind, and his comic impersonations are admirable in many respects, and contain at times a measure of the underlying fire wanted in his tragic assumptions. No English actor at present on the stage has been seen in so many parts of importance. By the manner in which, at Sadler's Wells or elsewhere, Mr. Phelps has mounted the plays of Shakspere he has rendered a service to lovers of the drama, and his impersonations of Shakspercan characters, while unsatisfactory in most cases to the student and the critic, are free from caricature, and incorporate fairly enough for the average playgoer those general features which are handed down by tradition.

In comic or semi-comic parts Mr. Phelps goes further, and adds to the tradition he inherits something of his own. More than one of his representations of this class has breadth, depth, and originality. Of the Shaksperean characters he has essayed we are inclined to regard his Justice Shallow as the best. In parts in which a measure of nobility is to be preserved, Mr. Phelps has always been most successful. His King Lear, strikingly defective as it is in many respects, is decidedly the best of his purely tragic impersonations. In parts, however, in which the pathos is remote, and the comic side of the character is that nearest to hand, Mr. Phelps is often admirable. Shallow is the type of a bore, and is drawn obviously from the life. Once and again, doubtless, has the hard been wearied past endurance with the imbecility and brag of the antiquated old simer, whose wits have rusted in country occupations. But the character is drawn forcibly, and redeeming traits are not spared. In the manner in which these are put forward by Mr. Phelps lies the secret of his success in the character. The exterior of the man and the interior are almost equally well presented. There is, perhaps, a little exaggeration in the manner in which old age is depicted. The tongue stammers over much, and the motion of the head and hands is too tremulously senile. In the expression of face the mixture of fatuous self-content with a measure of greediness is good. A sort of sordid cunning, such as long residence in the country and occupation with rustic pursuits is apt to breed, underlies the expression, and the confidence assumed is not without a vague suspicion of evil. The feeble moralizings of Shallow upon death interrupted by his curiosity as to the price of beeves, his self-assertion modified by an affected depreciation of his own office and possessions, his vapourings concerning the prowess of his youth and other doings with the swashbuckler men, he has told so often he at last believes them, are all admirably rendered. Shallow with Mr. Phelps is vain, foolish, cunning, pragmatical, and irreverent, with little of the bovine stupidity characteristic of the country justice, and with a touch of common sense which enables him to accept the defeat which the mortification of Sir John brings upon him with no vain lamentations, but with an approach to philosophical serenity. More or less resembling the Shallow in the manner in which age is depicted, is Mr. Phelps's representation of Richelieu. In this there are many good points and the whole assumption is spirited and not wanting in light and shade. But while the memory of the Richelieu of Macready is fresh, that of Mr. Phelps can never obtain but half-hearted approval. It lacks altogether the dignity and the grandeur and power almost leonine which Macready imparted to the wily, astute, and unscrupulous-ing precursor and preparer of the revolution. The Falstaff of Mr. Phelps has received great and perhaps exaggerated praise. In one or two instances it is excellent, and it is in all respects intellectual. But it is, to our thinking, erroneous in its basis. Falstaff is not, as Mr. Phelps represents him, a hard dry man, preserving an unsympathetic demeanour while delivering jokes by which others are moved to hilarity. He is thoroughly unctuous and sensual. He laughs with those around him and delights to feel the shaking of his own fat sides. He speaks of himself as "old and merry," the latter, a word he would not use were his humour not affluent and unrepressed. An admirable point, however, in Mr. Phelps's impersonation is the preservation of a sort of courtliness in the old knight whom he never allows quite to forfeit his claim to gentility. Adequately to present the defeat and mortification of Falstaff at the close of the Second Part of King Henry IV. requires the talents of the tragedian, which as we have said, Mr. Phelps does not possess. No nearer approach to psychological subtlety has been made by Mr. Phelps than in his representation of Bottom, in the Midsummer Night's Dream. The contrast in this between the well-worn stolidity and pragmaticalness of the character in the opening scenes, and its dreaming, dazed, and bewildered look and gait is finely conceived and executed. Bottom, in certain scenes, and notably in those wherein, after his magic experiences are over, he awakes to the realities of life, is invested with a measure of dignity. Gross as is his nature he is still like the man in the Kubla Khan —

> "He on honey dew hath fed
> And drunk the milk of Paradise."

There are divine recollections behind the muddled and besotted brain. Not altogether lost even in the most commonplace natures, are the visions of higher and lovelier life which visit us in sleep. And Bottom remains translated. If Mr. Phelps had presented no characters besides Shallow and Bottom he would have won himself a position upon the stage. There are, however, many parts in which his acting, while less subtle and original than in these creations, is decidedly effective. His Sir Pertinax MacSycophant, in The Man of the World, is an exceedingly good assumption. The dryness of style which is so sensible a disadvantage in many of Mr. Phelps's presentations, is in this thoroughly effective, and his acting in some scenes of the play rises nearly to the level of that in Shallow. Much inferior to this, is his Sir Giles Overreach. In this character the confines of tragedy are reached, and although the greed and avarice of the terrible old miscreant are depicted, the more splendid ideas of his character are altogether lost. Mr. Phelps's Cantwell, in The Hypocrite, is a good assumption; his Lord Townley and his Mr. Oakley are respectable. A version by Mr. Halliday of Sir Walter Scott's Fortunes of Nigel converted Mr. Phelps with two characters, both fairly suited to his powers. The plausible cunning of the miser, Trapbois, and his love for money, so keen as to do duty for valour, contrast cleverly with the undissembled cowardliness and total want of kingly dignity of King James. In more serious parts the tendency of Mr. Phelps to extract and to exaggerate the gesture and emphasis operate as a serious drawback. His Marino Faliero and his Manfred are undignified in bearing and stilted and declamatory in delivery. When we come to purely tragic characters—Othello, Richard, Hamlet, King John, Iago, Macbeth, Timon, Coriolanus, and Wolsey, intellectual shortcomings and the defects of method are equally noteworthy. What small measure of subtlety any of these impersonations exhibits, is inherited and not original, and the representation is blurred by offensive mannerisms and tricks of delivery. Rant, violence, and exaggeration are their principal characteristics, and the same objectionable method is employed to denote the existence of opposite passions. In comedy a rank close to the highest, in tragedy one equally near to the lowest, is the position we must accord Mr. Phelps. A little less dryness, or at least compensation for dryness in the shape of occasional unction, a little breadth and colour in comic impersonations, would raise Mr. Phelps to the very front of our comedians. In tragedy, to win the position he seeks, his entire theory and method must be un-learned and re-considered. K.

THE CHRISTY'S MINSTRELS.

(From "The Period.")

Who and what are the Christy's Minstrels? Are they artificially blacked by nature, or is their inky hue, like their elegant comedy, the effect of the highest art? Do they at their birth salute the world with a "Yah! yah!" instead of the usual shrill shriek whereby other infants are accustomed to announce their advent, and do they cut their baby teeth by gnawing corn-drums of their admiring nurses? Do they reside in the Waterloo Road and devote their leisure hours to beer, skittles, and the my-teries of Tommy Dodd? Or do they, a happy family, inhabit a model plantation somewhere in the wilds of Euston or Hampstead, and beguile the weary hours before performance with the practice of part-singing and telling each other funny stories? Where do they go when they die? Does the original Bones play sonatas on his own femora? and do Sam and the Professor preserve their lugubriousness of aspect, even in death? Do they ever perform out of London, and, if so, by what means have they contrived to obtain for themselves not only a local habitation but also a name with the portion of the public that adores them, swears by them, sits out their performances, and, moreover, pays its entrance-fees in hard cash for the blessed, the honoured, the glorious privilege of laughing at their witticism and weeping at their songs of sorrow?

Some such questions as these occurred to us on our first (and last) visit to St. James's Hall, during the pleasing operation of filling the seats after the mode adopted with so much success in packing pilchards at the Ives; an operation which, though exhilarating in the extreme to an "outsider," is not so pleasing to an interested party. It will be seen that we had gone thither determined to do at Rome the thing which is done of the Romans. We were resolved to laugh even to tears; to be funny at all hazards. The notion of being bored by an entertainment to which some hundreds of respectable—very respectable—people were flocking with an admirable eagerness, was something too absurd. Bored? Preposterous idea! Is not Mr. Moore a fellow of infinite jest? Is not the great Rawlinson a Sims Reeves, who modestly black his face instead of simply colouring his moustache? Is not

Little Bob" a refined and exquisite comedian? Can such men be simply the synonymes of so many soporifics? Bah! The thought is absurd. So we sat, with a glowing presentiment of misfortune, and a sickly attempt at awakening an artificial enthusiasm, and watched the assembling audience. Comely maidens and their adorers, respectable old gentlemen, old and middle-aged ladies, young men clad in garments of sober hue and preternatural gravity of aspect; all regardless of the seats (which certainly are detestable and undesirable in the extreme), all patiently enduring the heat,—and anxiously attendant on the moment when Mr. Moore should burst upon their gaze in all the glory of shirt-collar and brass bott-ons, and inform them generally, to the accompaniment of harps and trumpets, that he felt like a morning star, or that he saw his lovely Angelina going down Piccadilly, and that he laughed at her attempt to do the Grecian bend: with what results is well known.

Presently a tuning of instruments was heard to proceed from under the stage. Then the lights were suddenly elevated, and before the excitement attendant on this proceeding had subsided, the real original Christy's Minstrels made their appearance. As the original Bones flopped down into his chair, there was a general delighted whisper of "There's Mr. Moore!" There, indeed, was Mr. Moore, as disgreeably obtrusive on the stage as he is pleasantly modest on the hoardings. He is evidently a popular favourite, and the audience hailed his first and last wittieism with equal favour. This remark will serve to characterize its behaviour during the dreariest two hours that we have been our lot to spend either within or without the walls of any place of amusement whatever.

Certes, he must have been a mad wag, indeed, who first applied the term "entertainment" to the performance of our black brothers. Divided into two parts, with an interval of three minutes between the most grateful and indeed of the evening), the Minstrels gratified their audience awhile with a sort of sardine, the comic element representing the traditional Vauxhall slice of ham, the serious the thick bread-and-butter wherewith it is enveloped. Nothing more depressing than Christy comedy, nothing more exhilarating than Christy pathos, can well be imagined. "Little Bob" displayed his humour and his love in bidding farewell to Sally, we felt moved even to tears; and when Mr. Romer told of his love for a certain Little Somebody, expressing his passion in notes so deep that we thought he was doing a comic De Profundis, we laughed outright, though we had not laughed since the departure of Mr. Charles Mathews for Australia. Mr. Cyrus W. Neile, "the Christy's peerless tenor," scarcely answered the brilliant expectations advertisements had led us to form of him. His style and capabilities, moreover, do not disgrace his surroundings; while his fausset "high C" falls amidst even the set of Exeter Hall. Of Herr Wachtel, has apparently ceased to exist, even in the vivid imagination of Mr. Burgess, to whom we owe, we presume, so many brilliant paragraphs in the first page of the Daily Telegraph. Nor were the marvels of the Christy's "marvellous alto" any more conspicuous. A Mr. Rawlinson, Double primopa, sang a song in a hard thin voice, describing a certain "Little Daisy;" and when his confrères were whispering the chorus in mournfully monotonous tones, they reminded us of nothing so much as of a set of mutes bewailing the untimely decease of true and genial humour.

Of the second part, which consisted almost entirely of chorographic exhibitions, we need say but little. Though most of the performers displayed what Artemus Ward called "a smart chance of spryness in their legs," yet they had so little notion of grace and elegance as to excite a feeling rather of pity than of admiration.

We have a collection of Christy melodies beside us as we write; and turning to it, we are enabled to perceive, for the first time, the poet of the age is named not Tennyson, not Swinburne, not even Tupper, but Green. Mr. Green's muse may be described as one of the rural order; but no buxom milk-maid is she,—her cheeks flushed with the sun, her arms hard with exercise, her figure worthy of the natural beauties amongst which she dwells. Still less is she a bergère à la Watteau, with a score of ribanded sheep, a crook, and a Thyrsis who plays the flageolet. No; the muse is evidently of Cockney origin. She wears a chignon and hoops her in tremendously; when she chants the country, it is not as one who knows it, but as one who reads a little pastoral poetry and goes to Hampton Court on Sundays. Mr. Green seems, indeed, to have seen the country par raccroc, and to have remembered only that leaves are generally green, that brooks are in the habit of flowing musically along, and above all, that the nightingale sings every evening on the tree. That unfortunate bird is being continually dragged in, whether she will or no; for, should Mr. Green invite Bella, or Rosalie, or Nelly to meet him, he invariably concludes his catalogue of the inducements offered by nature, the weather, and the scenery, with an announcement to the effect that the nightingale is up, and may be heard as usual. This is an idea of the country that savours more of Bow Bells than of Llanberis; of Cremorne Gardens than of the open champagne: but it is an idea that, as music-makers

MUSIC AT LEIPSIC.

A grand concert was given, a few days ago, by the members of Riedel's Association, in St. Thomas's, for the benefit of German soldiers and their families. It commenced with J. S. Bach's choral piece for the organ, "Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott," well played by Herr Louis Papier. Then came two Hussite songs for chorus, which, as well as the other pieces of a similar kind, two sacred songs by Peter Cornelius, two choruses from Mendelssohn's Elijah and St. Paul, were sung with spirit and correctness by the members of the Association. Herr and Mdme. Joachim executed together the solo for alto and obbligato violin accompaniment, "Erbarme dich meiner, o Gott," by J. S. Bach. Mdme. Joachim sang also the air, "Ich weiss dass mein Erlöser lebt," from Handel's Messiah, while Herr Joachim performed, as only he can perform, two Andantes from Bach's Violin Sonatas, a similar composition by Tartini, and Schumann's "Abendlied." Mdlle. Mahlknecht sang the soprano solo from Raff's "De Profundis." —First Gewandhaus Concert on the 6th inst.: Oxford Symphony, Haydn; air from Judas Maccabæus, Handel (Mdme. Peschka-Leutner); Concerto in A major for Pianoforte, Mozart (Herr Reinecke); Recitative and Aria, Mozart (Mdme. Peschka-Leutner); and the Seventh Symphony, A major, Beethoven.—The Directors of the above concerts contemplated, a short time since, raising the subscription, in consequence of the very high prices demanded by "stars," especially by all vocal stars. With reference to this circumstance, a correspondent wrote a very strong letter to the Leipziger Tageblatt. Among other things he said:—

"We feel convinced that the real friends of music will applaud the Directors, if the latter will simply refuse to listen to exorbitant demands, even at the risk of our not hearing here in Leipsic some celebrated songstress, while, on the other hand, by proper remuneration, they seek to retain the admirable members of the band, and to gain fresh ones, for the great attraction of the concerts is the celebrated orchestra; it is solely their performances, not strange virtuosi, which have obtained for the concerts their world-wide renown."

In consequence partly of this article, perhaps, the Directors have made no alteration in the subscription. Herr August Lngert has just completed a new opera, entitled Dornröschen, which has been accepted at the Stadttheater, and will be produced this season. The libretto is by Dr. Alexander Levy of Treves. The rehearsals of Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger have been resumed. The scenery is ready, and in all probability, the opera will be produced towards the latter end of December.

MEETING OF BOOK AND MUSICSELLERS.

(From the "Melbourne Daily Telegraph.")

This meeting took place at Mechanics' Institution, Carson occupying chair. Chairman opened by detailing steps taken, at instance of Wilkie, Webster, & Allan, against several publishers for selling certain books said to contain indecent copyright.

Twelve months ago, the Weston and Hussey Minstrels opening Operahouse, made an arrangement with Clarson, Massina, & Co., to print, in collected form, the melodies they were singing. These, sold at the place of performance, came into demand at the booksellers' shops, nearly every bookseller being a vendor. On the issue of the second book, Wilkie & Co. deeming some of the tunes issued an infringement of copyright, made, through solicitor, a demand for account of profits and destruction of books. In view of this damage, Clarson, Massina, & Co., by outgoing mail, made overtures to English publishers for permission, on terms, to print tunes for which any demand might arise. Frequently a tune suddenly became popular, and, no copies being here, demand ceased before copies could be imported, and thus considerable loss resulted to English owners. This proposal, in transitu, Wilkie & Co. served notices, and filed nineteen bills in Equity against publishers and vendors, calling upon them to render account of sales, and destruction of plates and copies. In view of impending litigation, Clarson, Massina, & Co., after endeavouring to effect amicable settlement, received notice that suit should be stayed on payment of costs. Instead of settling on their own account, that firm refused any arrangement except as settlement for all concerned, and offered, without prejudice, £100 as settlement in full, which was declined. At this a public meeting was convened, prior to which, however, a proposal from Wilkie & Co. came, offering to settle for £250. Clarson, Massina, & Co. accepted, on condition that it should quash all proceedings which might be taken under alleged infringement, against the whole trade or themselves; the following receipt being read:—"July 29th, 1870.—Received from Clarson, Mu sina, & Co., cheque £150, amount agreed to in settlement of all suits, subject to compliance with requirements of correspondence. Wirewould to be instructed as to settlement by defendants.—Crisp, Lewis, & Wilks." On close of chairman's statement, several contended that action might have been successfully defended; but majority agreed that the matter was better settled thus. On motion of Miramo, seconded by Needham, it was resolved:—"That arrangement entered into by Clarson, Massina, & Co., with Joseph Wilkie, to set aside (by payment of £150) all proceedings in respect of publication of books said to contain copyright music, be accepted as satisfactory, and that a subscription be opened to defray the costs." Wilkie & Co. are agents defending interests of their principles, and are not responsible for imperfections of law.

NEW MUSIC.

War March ("Die Wacht am Rhein") for the pianoforte. By Selmar Kahlenberg. [London: Lamborn Cock & Co.]

Of the making of war music there is no end, and we should very much like to see the aggregate of "rejected communications" which have been returned to aspiring composers by unsympathetic publishers. Their number must, indeed, be legion; but, however great, it hardly meets the justice of the case. Here is Herr Kahlenberg's March for example. Why it was composed we cannot tell, unless for the sake of embodying "Die Wacht am Rhein," and why it was published is still more inexplicable. There is absolutely nothing to recommend it. If the Germans could not fight better than some of them can write war marches they would hardly be investing Paris now.

All Honour to the King. Hymn, composed and dedicated to his Majesty the King of Prussia, by Sir Michael Costa. [London: Lamborn Cock & Co.] This hymn is, we believe, not born of the Franco-Prussian war, but of some other war in which Bismarck has had a hand. If, however good reasons existed then for bespattering King William with praise, they exist in far greater number now. Indeed, were not the monarch so pious, he might array himself, like Herod, in his royal apparel, and confidently expect to be saluted as a god. We must say for the author of the words before us that he has laid on his laudation pretty thickly. The King is hailed as one

> "Who with undying will
> A weary people's bonds unbound."

We do not exactly know what an "undying will" may be, but we can understand the unbinding of bonds after the fashion shown to the fasteners some twenty years ago. The second verse begins thus:—

> "Almighty heaven protect
> A life that's given mankind,
> A span of mighty deeds
> With equal love and hope entwined."

It is fortunate that "Heaven" is omniscient as well as almighty, and can understand exactly what this confused utterance may mean. Sir Michael Costa's music is vigorous, plain, and straightforward—such, indeed, as might be expected from his ready and practised pen.

Marinella: Canzone, Parole del Signor Ciabatta; Musica di Alberto Randegger. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

This canzone is written throughout with Signor Randegger's unfailing fluency and grace. The melody is really charming, while not a few devices of accompaniment are used which, besides giving piquancy to the song, show once more the composer's ingenuity and its constant desire to obtain that variety which accompaniments so frequently lack. We recommend "Marinella" to all lovers of Italian music.

Onward, Christian Soldier: A Sacred Choral March. Brightly Gleams our Banner: Choral Processional Hymn. Thy Will be Done: A new Choral Setting. Though Nature's Strength Decay: Choral Hymn. Composed by J. Tillerd. [London: Novello, Ewer, & Co.]

The first two of these pieces are fair examples of the modern hymn tune, but their rhythm is surely against resolution for marching purposes. Mr Tillerd went out of his way to write in three-four time, the metre clearly suggesting four-four. How would he keep his procession in step, with right and left feet alternately marking the beginning of the bar? The third hymn has a good and expressive tune; but we see little in the Te Deum to recommend it for notice above the shoal of settings already available. The last piece has our hearty approval, and, taken in conjunction with the others, inclines us to place Mr. Tillerd among the best psalmodists of the day.

An old dispute has at length been settled at Berlin. Schiller's statue is to be erected in front of the Schauspielhaus. It will be solemnly uncovered on the 10th November next.

WAIFS.

Madame Arabella Goddard is still at Boulogne-sur-Mer. Owing to the war she has been compelled to renounce for the present her continental tour, and will be heard this winter both at Monday Popular Concerts and the Crystal Palace.

Mr. Augustus Harris has returned to town.

Mr. Charles Millward is writing the Christmas burlesque for the St. James's Theatre, and Mr. Farnie that for the Adelphi.

Madame Parepa is about to make a tour through America with an English opera troupe from London.

The St. James's Theatre re-opens this evening with Victorien Sardou's Fernande, revised by Mr. Sutherland Edwards.

Kapellmeister F. Wagner, of Dresden, is said to have been amongst the killed at Sedan.

Mr. Swinburne's Ode on the Proclamation of the French Republic is said to have been written at a sitting.

Mr. Charles E. Stephens has been elected an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music.

Birth, a new comedy by T. W. Robertson, principal character, sustained by Mr. Sothern, has been produced with unqualified success, at the Cheltenham Theatre.

Mr. H. J. Byron has written a drama, in four acts, entitled The Last Shilling, and another "original play," the title of which is not yet fixed. He has also a comedy, entitled Tom Thumb, in preparation.

Mr. W. H. Liston takes his benefit to-night at the Olympic Theatre, when a new extravaganza Paul and Virginia, is to be produced, in which the manager's wife will make her appearance.

A musical celebration has been organized in Cologne, in memory of the victims who have fallen in the Franco-Prussian contest—the "Requiem" of Brahms being a leading feature of the programme.

Mr. J. T. Stone, author of The Classical Organist and The Student's Organ Companion, &c., has just been appointed organist of St. Mary's Church, Leicester.

Mr. G. W. Martin's great choral gathering at the Crystal Palace, on Wednesday night, is to be repeated on Wednesday next, when we hope to be able to attend and report our impressions.

Madame Goldschmidt-Lind, being indisposed, did not sing on Wednesday at the concert in aid of the German wounded. In revenge, however, Herr Otto Goldschmidt played a duet, for two pianos, with Herr Jules Benedict.

The bag of postal cards despatched by magnesium balloon at the Crystal Palace fire-work display on Thursday week, was picked up at Acrise Farm near Folkestone, and the cards posted at Hythe, reaching their destination by first delivery on Saturday.

Alexandre Dumas, who is staying in the neighbourhood of Dieppe, is not expected to recover from the illness with which he has been afflicted since the present troubles broke out in France. His daughter is likely to seek a refuge in England.

Mr. Chatterton has entered into a partnership with Mr. B. Webster, by which the Adelphi and the Princess's are placed under their joint management. The Adelphi opens on the 22nd inst. Madame Celeste will appear for a few nights as Miami, in The Green Bushes, and take her farewell of the stage.

Herr Julius Blüthner of Leipsic, piano-manufacturer to the King of Saxony, who gained the first German prize at the last Paris Exhibition for his grand piano, has also, we read in the Zeitschrift fur Musik, gained the first prize at the Industrial Exhibition, held at Cassel, in September last.

We take the following from a contemporary :—

"It has been stated to us as a singular coincidence, by a friend who is curious in such matters, that the greatest Oratorio Society in the world—the Sacred Harmonic of Exeter Hall—has never performed either Handel's first or last oratorio, Esther and Jephtha."

Our contemporary's friend's curiosity has led him slightly astray. Jephtha was performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society.

On Tuesday night week a fire broke out in the Philharmonic Music Hall, Ramsgate, and the building was totally destroyed. The Philharmonic was the first music hall erected in Ramsgate. Before the fire broke out there had been the performance of a piece called The Ship on Fire, in which a miniature ship in flames is sent across the stage. It is conjectured that sparks fell upon some sawdust and rubbish beneath the stage, which smouldered unobserved till the hall was closed. Several bed-rooms in the tavern adjoining the hall were burned, but happily no lives were lost.

The Beethoven contributions to the Crystal Palace programme of to-day are the Prometheus overture and the Eroica symphony. Signor Delle-Sedie and Madame Florentini are the singers; Signor Batesini plays a solo on the double-bass; and the concert ends with Schumann's overture to Genoveva, which many amateurs hold to be his finest.

That young and promising singer, Mdlle. Anna Trafford, according to the Italian journal, L'Arte, has had a brilliant success at Bergamo, as the Queen, in Gli Ugonotti. Mdlle. Trafford has concluded an advantageous engagement for the Carnaval season at the Teatro Comunale di Trieste, where she will sing in Une Folie a Rome and Lallah Roukh.

Mdlle. Elena Corani, who has been singing in Italy and Brazil with much success, has arrived in London, and will appear at the Crystal Palace Concert on Saturday the 22nd inst. Mdlle. Corani is a native of Dublin, and daughter of the late William Sarsfield Conran, the once eminent pianist of that city.

Two concerts of national melodies with bands of harps were recently given by the Workmen's International Exhibition, at the Agricultural Hall, with a chorus of 300 voices. The conductor was Mr. Reviloff; and the solo singers were Miss A. Sinclair, Miss J. Derby, Mr. Beardwell, and Mr. J. H. Pearson.

Anna Trafford e il nome di una avvenente cantatrice, che esordiesteb con brillante successo ai teatro di Bergamo, nella parte della Regina negli Ugonotti. Questa giovane possiede un tesoro di voce ed a tutti gli altri doti del canto, alla scuola dell' egregio maestro Sangiovanni. Essa ha firmato un onorifico contratto per la stagione di carnovale e quaresima al teatro Comunale di Trieste. L'ARTE.

In reference to the amateur performance of the Oxford Dramatic Club, Mr. Mitchell writes to say "that we have not attempted a dramatic entertainment for some time, and as it is likely to mislead our friends, may we trouble you to inform them that we have no knowledge of the parties who gave it, or that they have ever been connected with us in any way for the sixteen years we have been established."

Madame Adelina Patti, who has been singing at St. George's Hall, Liverpool (two concerts), and at Free Trade Hall, Manchester, left on Monday, with Mr. Maurice Strakosch (enterprising impresario, if there ever was one), for Holland, where, at the Hague and Amsterdam respectively, she was to give concerts. Madame Patti will shortly go to fulfil her engagement at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburgh.

One of the especial qualities of the late Mr. Bowley as administrator was his organization, a long time in advance of the performance of any musical undertaking in which he was engaged. Amongst his papers have been found the arrangements of the Triennial Handel Festival, which takes place next year. Sir Michael Costa will be conductor. The Sacred Harmonic Society commences its season next month, with Sir Michael Costa as conductor.

The opening of the Italian Opera season in St. Petersburgh is announced for the 19th of October; the company will comprise Madame Adelina Patti, Madame Volpini, Madame Penco (of the Grand Opera, Paris), the Sisters Marchisio, Signora Perelli, Madame Dall' Anese, Signori Calzolari, Mongini, and A. and J. Corsi (tenors), Signori Graziani, Steller, Everardi Bagagiolo, Capponi, Zucchini, Fortuna, and Baccolini, baritones and basses. Signor Vianesi is conductor.

Foreign journals announce the death of Princess Amalia of Saxony—a lady who beguiled the tedium of German court life by writing comedies, which made their way on the stage for a while, and the best of which, for their purity and quiet humour, deserve to be remembered. A translated selection from them, with a prefatory memoir was some years ago published by Mrs. Jameson. The Princess wrote under the pseudonym of Amalia Heiter.

The Italian opera season in Dublin came to an end last Saturday night, when Oberon was performed for the benefit of Mdlle. Tietjens, who created a furore by substituting for encored pieces some of Moore's melodies, which, though seldom sung now-a-days in private circles, and not often heard in places of public amusement, still possess a charm for people of all ranks. The great prima donna was detained on the stage long after the curtain fell, bowing her acknowledgments to an audience who appeared desirous to retain her for ever.

Madame Adelina Patti sang at the Free Trade Hall in Manchester last week, with the co-operation of Madame Patey, contralto; Signor Mario, tenor; Signor Delle-Sedie, baritone; Signor Foli, bass; and Mdlle. Carreno, pianist. The Gentlemen's Concerts have been commenced for the season. Madame Vanzini and Mr. Vernon Rigby were the vocalists, and Mr. Carrodus violinist, the last named playing the allegro from Beethoven's concerto and Ernst's Pirata. The symphony was Mozart's in E flat, and the overtures Der Freischütz, Masaniello, and the Gazza Ladra.

"M. Auber" (says Dolby's Musical Circular) "is in England. Did we not read a little while ago of the inspiring effect produced on the youth of France by the enrolment of the veteran composer as a National Guard? Were we not told all about his musket and bayonet? and about the mince-meat which with the aid of those weapons he might be expected to make of the enemy? And did we not figure to ourselves M. Auber 'at the front,' the gayest and liveliest of the young troops of France? And now M. Auber has executed a well-known strategic movement, and has effected a masterly retreat? And quite right too. At 87 it is rather late to learn the goose-step, and to the fourth quarter of a century marching and drilling are not agreeable diversions. Besides, M. Auber's life is not the property of France, nor, for the matter of that, does it belong to himself."

[Unfortunately, the illustrious composer is not in England.—Ed.]

Two young men of shabby-genteel appearance lately arrived at one of the hotels in Motherwell. The object of their stay there they said was the management of a grand concert in the Masons' Hall. Some of the best talent in Glasgow were engaged and a dealer was induced to lend a handsome pianoforte. Tailors gave fashionable outfits, and the latest style of hats from Glasgow was indispensable. The printers' account for flash show bills was heavy, and many assistants and hangers-on had to be paid, but no accounts could be settled until the close of the entertainment. They were early at the door drawing the cash while the audience flocked into the hall. The concert was a success, the performance excellent, and all were in high spirits; whisky and cigars were plentifully ordered and abundantly distributed, but in the middle of the jubilation it was discovered that the two clever managers had decamped, and at midnight it became painfully evident that all employed by them had been most successfully duped.

Prince Poniatowski, the composer of L'Aventurière, a gentleman well and worthily known as a man of letters and a scholar, and a musical amateur of no ordinary attainments, is an exile among us, and a severe sufferer by the war. It is his intention to devote himself to the art which he has lovingly studied for so many years, and to enter the ranks of profes-ional musicians. On this head a contemporary remarks that: "The prince is reduced to the sad necessity of earning a livelihood by giving instruction in singing." No doubt this paragraph is intended merely to express its writer's regret at the unlooked-for calamity which has caused so great a change in Prince Poniatowski's position. But it is a pity that it should also be susceptible of another interpretation, and that it should seem, however faintly, to imply that there is anything degrading in the step taken by Prince Poniatowski. There can be no degradation in the honest and conscientious pursuit of any art, and even a prince may become an artist without losing any self-respect or dignity. That Prince Poniatowski himself takes this view of the case we feel sure, and we have no doubt that our contemporary is at one with us in the matter, but the paragraph is a little awkwardly worded.—Dolby's Musical Circular.

To those of our readers whose newspaper literature is confined to the London "dailies" and "weeklies" it would, we believe, be absolutely refreshing to dip occasionally into the large insets of some of the provincial contemporaries. In musical criticism, more especially, the writers are unequalled, and although in a few cases there are qualified men on the staff, as, for instance, in the case of some of the old country papers, the gentleman who "do the concerts" as a rule, lamentably deficient in musical knowledge and still more wanting in common sense. Thus for example, in a paper just forwarded to us for quotation we are assured that the conductor "wielded the baton of chef d'orchestra (sic) with spirit and taste, and displayed another striking instance of his qualifications in this department of art. The instruments were so well proportioned (!) and in such capital hands that it is almost invidious to point out special merits, but we were particularly pleased by the superior playing of the first violins and the violoncello. The violas had a very pleasing effect; and Mr. ——'s contribution to the general harmony was of an especially excellent character." Surely a greater proof of the need of the Elementary Education Act could scarcely be provided. If this represents the mental power of the writer, what must that of the readers be!—Choir.

A very laughable circumstance occurred at Arundel a few nights ago, where a concert was given at the Town Hall by Madame Bodda Pyne's concert party. Just before eight o'clock, the gas lights began to flicker suspiciously, and it was evident there was "water in the pipes," for after jumping about to the bewilderment of those present, the gas finally went out. All the shops in the town were closed, and the hall was in darkness. Several gentlemen, were next seen rushing about in great confusion to collect candles and candlesticks. The hall-keeper brought out his small supply of candles, and in the absence of candlesticks, one or two "cotton dips" were stuck in some vases. One gentleman came back to the hall armed with two tin chamber candlesticks and two brass ditto, in which candles were placed; and by putting one chair on the top of another, and a candle in the seat of the uppermost chair, sufficient light was found for the pianist. The skirmishing party sent out into the town soon returned with candlesticks of every conceivable design, chiefly antiquated, and with candles as could be best collected. By these means a row of about twelve dismal lights was placed in front of the platform, some were high and some were low; and after each piece the ticket-taker who was armed with a pair of snuffers walked round and topped the wicks. In the latter part of the evening the lighting up became grander as the tallow "dips" were substituted by wax candles, and the performance proceeded with an occasional encore.

One of the queens of song, an artist, who in almost all European languages has sung on the lyric stages of Italy, Spain, England, France, Germany, Russia, &c., Pauline Viardot-Garcia, is about to visit London, to resume her professional career. Her fortune has been sacrificed by the war in France, of which country her husband is a native. Whilst M. Viardot is at Tours, having joined his former political and literal colleagues in office, Madame Viardot has been compelled to quit her residence in Baden-Baden, to begin a fresh career. This is a sad reverse for the gifted sister of Malibran. Viardot's débuts as Desdemona in Paris and London in 1839, when she was only eighteen, can be well remembered by opera frequenters. In Berlin she stood her ground at the height of Jenny Lind's popularity. She doubled on one occasion in an emergency, the parts of Isabella and Alice in Robert le Diable. Viardot's Fides in the Prophète is familiar to the audiences of Paris and London. Her last great part was in Gluck's Orfeo. She has given to the world singers of note, her pupils, and it is as teacher and composer (for she has written an opera in two acts, The Last Magician performed in several theatres in Germany) that Madame Viardot seeks a position in London; and royalty, rank, and fashion which recognized her when a prima donna, will not fail her in the hour of need, when she presents herself as a professor of the grand school of singing of the Garcias.—Athenæum.

Writing from Berlin a correspondent says:—

"War or peace, a city's life goes on much in the same manner. Are they not buying and selling, marrying and giving in marriage, singing, dancing, dining, and sipping absinthe even now in poor splendid Paris? The echoes of M. Offenbach's last opera can scarcely be out of their ears, when, behold, the merry and musical piece of extravagance is reproduced at the Friedrich Wilhelm Stadt Theatre here, with all the care and ability which distinguish that establishment. I went the other night to see and hear Die Banditen which is tuneful from beginning to end, and which, for the closeness of its fable, the neatness of its satire, and the perfect purity of its fun, may take a high if not the highest place among the books of M. Offenbach's sometimes too gyasi the Grande Duchesse. The comedy and the music have been both well Germanized and the performers, down to the least responsible supernumerary, are perfect in their several parts. But, I should say, the most patriotic of Germans must soon begin to feel bored by the interpolated allusions to the neutrality question which greet him nightly from every stage. Go where you will for amusement in Berlin you are sure to hear of those unlucky cartridges and coal cargoes. I really begin to feel culpable in the matter, and to dread lest the eyes of the whole theatre should be turned upon me severely whenever these misunderstandable reflections are cast from beyond the boundary line of footlights. Indeed, I have been obliged to tell my neighbour on one occasion that, although an Englishman, I am, strange as it may appear, neither a gunsmith nor a coal merchant. An entirely new opera, not so sparkling as M. Offenbach's, but quite as frothy, was brought out the other night at the King's House—every seat being taken. When I say that the title of this musical work by Herr Bernhard Schola is Zwölben Husaren, you perceive directly that the time is the Seven Years' War and that the story has a good deal to do with the gallantry of the Prussian soldiers and the magnanimity of Father Fritz. The character of a rustic servant girl was hardly suited to Fran Mallinger, who nevertheless took the principal honours of the evening, and sang the flimsy, conventional music of her part with all the sprightliness needful to win for it applause beyond the cold mechanical palm-beatings of the claque. The names of Harriers-Wippern, Lehmann, the passable tenor, Woworsky, and the excellent baritone, Betz, made up, with those of Herr Salomon and Herr H. Krüger, the rest of the cast."

SAN MARINO.—This important republic will not be much longer without a theatre. One is now being erected by a joint-stock company. Signor Ghislanzoni has been commissioned to write, for the inauguration of the building, a libretto founded on an incident in the history of this famous state. The libretto is to be set to music by Signor Agostino Mercuri, a young native composer.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"

SUNG BY

MR. SANTLEY.

Price 4s.

"In a song entitled 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mdlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

MR. CHORLEY AND ST. PETER.

(From the "Sunday Times," Oct. 30.)

When answering a letter which recently appeared in these columns, Mr. Henry F. Chorley stated, with evident relish, that no part of the story of St. Peter, as told by himself, had been refuted or even denied. We entertain no doubt of the feeling of security in which he then revelled; but, unhappily for Mr. Chorley, it was based on nothing more real than his own imaginings. With an eagerness astonishing in a veteran, Mr. Chorley assumed that the writer of the letter aforesaid was speaking on Mr. Benedict's behalf as well as his own, and that if little reference was made to Mr. Chorley's accusations against Mr. Benedict it was because they were unanswerable. The wish which fathered these thoughts begat a most misleading offspring. Our correspondent, like Hal-o'-the-Wynd, "fought for his own hand," Mr. Benedict, knowing nothing of his intentions, and being prejudiced neither by what he said nor by what he left unsaid. Mr. Chorley is not a cautious tactician, or he would have taken steps to discover this fact before celebrating a fancied victory with a premature war-whoop. By this time he has found out his mistake. Mr. Benedict was in no haste to close with Mr. Chorley; calling to mind, perhaps, the adage which speaks of giving certain people "rope enough." It may also be that the composer shrank from open warfare with an old collaborateur, about a private transaction which ought never to have been dragged before the public eye. There is a line, however, beyond which forbearance cannot go, no matter who or what the assailant; and Mr. Chorley's latest and most intemperate communication to the Athenæum absolutely demanded a reply. Hence the following letter which appears in the current number of Mr. Chorley's organ:—

"To the Editor of the 'Athenæum.'

"2, Manchester Square, Oct. 20, 1870.—In answer to two communications, signed 'H. F. Chorley' recently published in the Athenæum, I beg to submit a simple statement of facts. Nearly thirteen years ago Mr. Chorley expressed to me his surprise that, as conductor of the Norwich Festivals ever since 1845, I had not seized the opportunity of composing an important work for one of those meetings, signifying also his willingness to furnish me with a libretto. On the 11th of April, 1853, I mentioned to him two subjects, one of which, viz., St. Peter, he approved of. I explained my views of the form of libretto constructed upon St. Peter's life, which I consider most amenable to musical treatment, and Mr. Chorley promised to take them into consideration. The terms proposed by Mr. Chorley, viz., a certain sum—the first half to be paid to him on the completion of the first part, the second half on the completion of the work—were verbally agreed upon. We were at that time on such terms that no reference was ever made to a written agreement. 'The words,' said Mr. Chorley, 'will belong to you; you may do with them as you like; set them to music, lay them aside, or destroy them.' Within twelve days after our conversation I received from Mr. Chorley the first part of his libretto, and paid him the first instalment (23rd of April, 1853). The complete book, being entirely a compilation from the Scriptures, was finished by the middle of June, 1853. I then contemplated having my oratorio ready for the Norwich Festival of 1860, being pledged to the Committee to produce some new work for that occasion. Finding, however, certain alterations in the libretto of St. Peter indispensable to the effective musical setting, as I conceived it, I applied to Mr. Chorley to make them, and his refusal to accede to my suggestions was the reason of the oratorio not being composed for the occasion intended.

"Under these circumstances St. Peter was laid aside for seven years. In the winter of 1865-6, however, the Committee of the Norwich Festival applied to me to write a sacred composition for their next meeting. Upon this I again had recourse to Mr. Chorley, suggesting such modifications in his libretto as might enable me to set it in a manner which, according to my own feelings, was most advantageous to musical effect. Mr. Chorley promised to reconsider the work, and to make such alterations as, on reflection, he might deem improvements, but, after attentive perusal, he came to the conclusion that no change could be made for the better, and would only consent to a curtailment here and there, to avoid undue length. The result was, that having pledged myself to write a sacred work for the Festival in question, I asked Mr. Chorley to co-operate with me in a Cantata, to which he agreed, and at his own proposition, in a letter, dated the 19th of December, 1865 (to which I shall make further reference), St. Cecilia was substituted for St. Peter.

"In 1869, at the friendly suggestion of Sir Michael Costa, I wrote to Mr. Richard Peyton, chairman of the Orchestral Committee of the Birmingham Festival, on February 17th, expressing a wish to have an Oratorio, upon which I was then engaged, performed at the Festival of 1870. The answer I received from the Committee, through Mr. Peyton (dated April 26th, 1869), was favourable to my proposal and conveyed to me a wish on the part of the Committee, to be made acquainted, among other things unnecessary to specify, with the subject upon which my Oratorio was founded, and, if possible, that the book should be sent for their approval. In the interim I wrote to Mr. Chorley (March 25th, 1869), telling him what proceedings I had taken with regard to St. Peter, at Birmingham. In his reply (March 27th, 1869), he wrote as follows:—

"'I had entirely forgotten that you have an Oratorio book of mine till your note recalled the fact to me, and then it was long ere I could recollect the story. I should be glad to see it on my return. I may, however, have a rough copy somewhere, and will try to revive my interest in what is virtually for me a dead thing.'

"Nevertheless, our last conference on the subject of St. Peter took place so recently as the winter of 1865-6, which the following extract from a letter addressed to me by Mr Chorley, dated 19th of December, 1865, proves:—

"'Why not compose the first part of St. Peter, "Christ on the sea-shore," as Berlioz did his Flight into Egypt? When you have finished the first and second parts of the Oratorio I will then look again at the third. At present I am indisposed to give any labour to be laid aside for five years to come. I am in no ill-nature, but because I have much on hand, and less power to work than formerly.'

"In reply to Mr. Peyton's letter of April 26th, already referred to, I communicated to him the subject of the Oratorio, according to the Committee's desire. On May the 13th I received a letter from Mr. Peyton, containing the passage subjoined:—

"'Would it also not be an advantage, irrespective of the question of length, if some character could be introduced for a principal soprano. I make this latter inquiry, having seen a rough copy of the book (belonging to Mr. Chorley), in which it appears that this important element of interest was wanting. Possibly, however, this has already been altered in the modified work: in any case, if you think well to afford the Committee the opportunity of seeing the book on Saturday, I am sure they would be glad to do so.'

"Here let me observe that I knew nothing of any modification. However, the book as it stood was sent in, and the subject approved. Mr. Chorley being absent from London nearly four months, I had no further communication with him on the subject of St. Peter, although letters passed between us respecting another matter which he pressed upon me, viz., the composition of a new Cantata for the Norwich Festival of 1869. My obligation to the Birmingham Committee being imperative, I was anxious to proceed as quickly as possible with the Oratorio. I therefore consulted a concordance (as Mr. Chorley having learnt the fact from me says with perfect truth); but, being unable to satisfy myself with this very ordinary means of assistance in such cases, I applied to a literary gentleman, who entered at once into my views, and gave me several valuable suggestions, which I was authorised to submit to Mr. Chorley for approval. This led to a correspondence with Mr. Chorley, from whose letters I find it necessary to cite a few extracts. The first is from a letter dated January 14th, 1870:—

"'The Birmingham Committee accepted my book, before it was entrusted to you, on my recommendation. You accepted it as it stood, with every possible time for deliberation.'

"On reference to what I have already stated, it will be found that both these assertions are inexact. The second extract is from a letter, dated January 21st, 1870:—

"'I have no longer the slightest interest in the work, but I will not do anything to prejudice you in your dealings with the Birmingham Committee; nor shall I mention the matter to any one save to Sir M. Costa and Mr. Dickens (friends of yours as well as mine). On the discretion of both those gentlemen I can count.'

"This hardly tallies with Mr. Chorley's statement in the Athenæum of October 8th, which runs thus:—'I offered to refer the matter in debate to the arbitration of two mutual friends of ours—Sir Michael Costa and the late Charles Dickens. This he' (meaning myself) 'distinctly declined.' No such offer was ever made by Mr. Chorley. If it had been, I need hardly say how readily I should have accepted it. The same letter (January 21st) contain the following postscript:—"Let me add my receipt of the cheque. It shall go to the Birmingham Hospital—anonymously.' The cheque (for £25) referred to above was an over-payment, inadvertently made by me; it having escaped my memory, and apparently that of Mr. Chorley, that the whole sum agreed upon (£50) for the book of St. Peter had been paid as far back as June, 1848. Nevertheless, Mr. Chorley sent the money to the charity—not anonymously, as he stated in his letter, but in his own name—'H. F. Chorley—£25.' My last extract is from a letter, dated February 28th, 1870:—'This closes all correspondence and all personal acquaintance betwixt yourself and its writer.'

"A punishment which I shall endeavour my best to survive. I trust to your well-known impartiality for the insertion of this letter, in your widely-circulated columns.

JULES BENEDICT."

Comment upon the above may appear superfluous to any reader who has followed the controversy from its outset; nevertheless we shall place in juxtaposition, and in the smallest possible compass, certain of Mr. Chorley's assertions and of Mr. Benedict's replies:—

1. Mr. Chorley speaks of his libretto of St. Peter as a chef d'œuvre, upon which he had bestowed great care and pains. Mr. Benedict answers, that the first part was completed in twelve days.

2. Mr. Chorley leads us to infer that he was ever consumed with anxiety about the fate of his work. And yet, in March, last year, he had "entirely forgotten" what was virtually to him a "dead thing."

3. Mr. Chorley asserts that Mr. Benedict was thoroughly satisfied with the libretto. Mr. Benedict replies that, in 1860, and again in 1866, he requested Mr. Chorley to make alterations.

4. Mr. Chorley states that his book of St. Peter satisfied, and was accepted by the Committee at Birmingham, who entrusted it to Mr. Benedict to compose. Mr. Benedict proves that the Committee were not satisfied with the book, while his entire letter is a refutation of the story about his having been "entrusted" with its composition.

5. Mr. Chorley declares that he proposed the arbitration of Sir Michael Costa and the late Mr. Charles Dickens, which proposal Mr. Benedict "distinctly declined." Mr. Benedict, on the other hand, asserts that no such proposal was ever made, and quotes a passage from one of Mr. Chorley's letters, wherein the writer states merely his determination to consult the gentlemen named.

We might go further, but have gone far enough, and now leave the reader to form his own conclusions. Few, we apprehend, will be sorry for Mr. Chorley, who, influenced by misdirected self-love, made that public which concerned the public not a whit, thus placing himself in a false position, and wilfully abandoning the slightest claim to sympathy.

A NEW MASS.

Mr. Oberthür's mass (St. Philipp di Neri) was performed last Sunday at "Our Lady's" Chapel, in the Grove Road, St. John's Wood. There was a good choir, including, as solo singers, Miss Bailey (soprano), Mdme. Laura Baxter (contralto), Mr. Lloed Zarwill (tenor), and Mr. Marler (bass). Mr. Charles Hargitt presided at the organ, and the composer conducted his composition himself. The performance was excellent throughout, and the opinions expressed about the work by many who were present, amongst whom were not a few connoscenti, were highly favourable. The "Kyrie" begins with an andante movement (B flat), the subject of which is afterwards taken up by a fugue, wherein the resources of counterpoint are well used. In the "Gloria," we must especially point out the effective soprano solo, and afterwards trio, "Gratias Agimus," as also the bass solo, "Qui tollis peccata mundi," and the "Cruci," the solo quartet, "Et incarnatus est," immediately followed by the duet, "Crucifixus etiam pro nobis." The "Sanctus" begins very solemnly, and is followed by a lovely movement, "Plenis sunt cœli." The "Benedictus," a very pleasing composition, begins with a duet for tenor and bass, the subject of which is afterwards taken up by the chorus, and very effectively harmonized. The "Agnus Dei" in G minor leads to the "Dona nobis" in B flat, for which the figure of the "Kyrie" is again introduced. We hear that the Mass is scored for orchestra. As "Offertorium," the Psalm "Exaudo Deus," also Mr. Oberthür's composition, was performed with harp and organ accompaniment, the tenor and bass solos being given with excellent effect. The last movement is a full chorus, in which arpeggios for the harp were freely introduced. The service concluded by Haydn's splendid Motet, "Insane et vane curæ," which was very well performed.

CHRISTINE NILSSON.

AN AMERICAN CRITICISM.

Leaving to others the task of criticising, we shall only essay to convey to our readers what must necessarily be a very inadequate idea of the profound impression made upon us by Christine Nilsson.

We avoid criticism, simply because the fascination she exercises over us is caused by something totally apart from her possession and display of gifts common to all eminent vocalists. We may refer, for instance, that her voice is rare in power and volume, that it is rich in melody and indescribably sympathetic in quality, that her management of it is faultless, that her expression is the truest, her taste the purest, that she is, in fine, a consummate artist—and yet having said all this, and elaborated it indefinitely, here, where we should have satisfactorily concluded our notice of any other singer, we feel that we have really said nothing of her—nothing that can convey to others the faintest idea of the respects in which she differs so essentially from all others.

We confess that we had almost arrived at the conviction that neither the present nor the future could bring us artists comparable to those who have charmed us in our earlier days of opera and concert-going. Memory often brought before us Jenny Lind with her marvellous volume of voice; Bosio, one of the most finished and delightful of singers; Sontag and Colson, with their rare loveliness of person and brilliant talent, and more recently Adelina and Carlotta Patti and Parepa Rosa, for all of whom we have felt an earnest admiration—yet, having heard all these and many more, we cannot discover in Nilsson the faintest resemblance to either of them.

The idea seemingly uppermost in the minds of many persons, is to compare her with Parepa; but this is an utter absurdity. As well compare the beauty of the pure and placid lake, whose surface alone is at times disturbed by a ripple, while its depths are unmoved, to the mountain torrent, or the rapid stream, in perpetual movement, residues in power and motion, from its ever-changing aspect. Yet in both the elements are the same. Imagine a young, fair, graceful woman—a woman possessing beauty of the rarest type—at once highly intellectual and in the most degree emotional—a face whose features you forget to dissect, so absorbed are you with the infinite variety and intensity of expression by which it is characterized—a face in one moment the saddest you ever beheld, the next radiant with a brightness which startles you, so unlooked for is the change—a manner now full of dignity and tragic power, now tender and persuasive, now frank and playful and laughing—endow this creature with a voice full and pure and strong as it is sweet, that is somebody says, there are tears in it—certainly its tones touch the depth of our nature, now uttered with marvellous power, and instantly subdued to what might be called a tenefal whisper, so soft is it, and yet so distinct, as to be audible in remotest corners of the vast building, and you have a faint conception of Nilsson.

Her presence alone was a song more varied in expression, from the deepest sadness of tragic sorrow, to the highest reach of sparkling, gushing gladness and goodness of soul, than anything she sang. To see her merely was a rare treat unspeakable, and the delight we should always have in only recalling the vision of her pure and spiritual face, will realize, better than we ever thought it could be by any mortal features, the truth of this line of Keats—

"A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

We fancied at times that her very breathing must be musical, so natural and easy did every utterance seem. Either Nilsson's genius is so wonderful, or her art so consummate, that all she does seems but a simple and natural expression of feeling. It is evident to all who heard her, that she is a superb actress. Such scenes as those from Hamlet and from Faust, leave no room for doubt on that point, and we must hope that she will remain in the lodge of her histrionic ability by appearing in opera before she leaves this country.

The ineffable grace of her action, simple without redundancy, her exquisite elocution, her deep yet controlled passion, and the magic of a voice thrilling even in a whisper—this form of Phidias with the genius of Sophocles—entirely enraptured a fastidious audience.

DRESDEN.—Herr Julius Schulhoff, who has for years followed his profession in Paris, will pass the winter here.

MUNICH.—A regular stage performance of Die Walpurgisnacht was to be given on the 4th of November, the day of Mendelssohn's death.—A colossal bust of Beethoven, by Professor Conrad Knoll, has created a great sensation at the exhibition of the Art Association. Herr Franz Lachner, who, in his youth, was on intimate terms with Beethoven, says that the bust is the finest and best likeness he ever saw.—At the Royal Operahouse the following works will shortly be performed: Iphigenie auf Tauris, Gluck (words by Edward Devrient); Rigoletto, Verdi (with Mdlle. Kaulmann, Herren Kaulmann and Nachbaur); Die Minnefahrten (Joconde), Isouard; and Rienzi, Herr R. Wagner, the only one of that composer's operas not yet performed here. On the 5th December, the day of Mozart's death, Don Juan is to be brought out with entirely new scenery, dresses, and decorations, besides a partly new libretto. People complained very justly that Don Juan and Die Zauberflöte had disappeared from the repertory. The reason was that the management had no scenery worthy of these two masterpieces, and they could not take the artists off Herr R. Wagner's literary and musical marvels. However, a better era appears to be now dawning.

MR. REA'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS AT NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

(From a Correspondent.)

The people of Newcastle have again had the opportunity of attending one of the brilliant series of concerts provided by Mr. Rea. When some five years ago, this gentleman inaugurated orchestral concerts in Newcastle, the attempt was considered hazardous, and not a few prognosticated failure. Year after year, however, these delightful musical evenings have come and gone, and have gained a firmer hold of the musical taste of the locality. The design of twenty-four concerts on consecutive evenings, and by artists at the head of the profession in their respective departments, could only have originated in a comprehensive mind and an enthusiastic temperament; and the manner in which this idea has been carried out abundantly proves that Mr. Rea possesses the ability to execute as well as the power to conceive. His concerts have done an immense deal towards creating and disseminating a liking for orchestration; and to them we are mainly indebted for acquaintance with the symphonies of the great masters. Mr. Rea's exertions have evidently been appreciated, and we may now hope that these concerts are permanently established. The past season commenced on the 3rd October and terminated on the 29th. The subscription was fixed at two guineas for a reserved and numbered seat, while a guinea and a half admitted to any part of the hall except the two guinea seats, for all the concerts, and secured a reserved numbered seat on special nights. Non-subscribers were admitted at 2s. 6d., 1s., and 6d. on ordinary nights, and on other occasions at double those figures. Mr. Rea spared no efforts to secure the best talent in the country for his orchestra; and the success attending his indefatigable exertions will be manifest by a perusal of the subjoined list of names:—

With such an imposing array the concerts could scarcely have been other than successful. Each executant sustained his reputation, but the solo performances of Messrs. Carrodus, Radcliff, Howell, Reynolds, Lockwood, and Phasey obtained the lion's share of applause. The programmes compared favourably with those of former years, and offered the same varied interest which has previously attracted large audiences. During the months there were performed no less than 19 symphonies, from Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Spohr, and Schumann; 23 overtures; 35 instrumental solos; 15 selections from operas, cantatas, &c.; 10 part songs; 15 pieces of dance music; 6 marches, besides Haydn's Seasons, Mendelssohn's Lauda Zion, The Son and Stranger, the finale from his unfinished opera Loreley, and many other works never before heard in Newcastle. Mr. Rea was likewise very successful in his arrangements for vocal music. Among other well-known artists, there were Madame Vanzini, Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Blanche Cole, Mdlle. Jose Sherrington, Miss Katherine Poynts, Madame Patey Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Nordblom (the new tenor), Mr. Nelson Varley, Mr. Cotte, Mr. Patey, &c. Mr. Rea's choir also appeared and contributed materially to the general effect. Mr. Sims Reeves was of course the most brilliant "star" in this vocal galaxy; but the reception accorded to Madame Vanzini was enthusiastic. This lady made her first appearance in the finale to Loreley, which she rendered with consummate skill and produced a profound impression. Her address, voice, execution, and phrasing were universally admired. Every song that she gave was boisterously encored, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the audience could be restrained from insisting upon their prerogative, when Madame Vanzini deemed it unadvisable to comply with the vigorously expressed desire for repetition. On the second night of her engagement she sang Spohr's charming production, "Rose softly blooming" with so much acceptance that she was compelled to appear twice and bow her acknowledgments. Altogether, Madame Vanzini's singing afforded extreme pleasure, and her re-appearance in "canny Newcastle" will be looked forward to with interest. The concluding concert of the season was given on Saturday evening last, when the Town Hall was crowded to excess. The performance passed off with success, and at the close Mr. Rea, received an enthusiastic ovation from the gentlemen of the orchestra, as well as from the audience. His re-appearance being vigorously called for, he returned, and delivered a brief address. He thanked the subscribers and the public generally for the patronage accorded to him, and also the gentlemen of the orchestra for the energy they had displayed, and for never having shirked any amount of trouble in carrying the concerts to a successful issue. He also desired to express his obligations to the ladies and gentlemen of the choir; he was quite sure that those who had had the pleasure of hearing them would feel that they were a body of vocalists of whom the town may well be proud. He had very great pleasure in alluding to this, because he had received the highest praise of those vocalists from Mr. Sims Reeves, Chevalier Lemmens, and other celebrated musicians, who had expressed themselves in the warmest terms of the chorus. He looked forward to the time when they would have not only 100 but 200 voices, and then they would be second to none in the kingdom. He afterwards drew attention to the large répertoire presented at these concerts, and hoped next year to produce something still more worthy of patronage. The season of 1871 will be pleasurably anticipated, and we hope that Mr. Rea's zealous and disinterested labour for the advancement of music in the North will meet with that encouragement and support to which they are so eminently entitled. "Tis not in mortals to command success," but Mr. Rea assuredly deserves it.

MDLLE. NILSSON IN AMERICA.

In its notice of the second Nilsson concert at Philadelphia (which, by the way, brought in 6,600 dollars) the Inquirer says:—

"The second appearance of Mdlle. Nilsson, last night, was to an audience, if possible, larger and surely more enthusiastic than before. Every part of the building seemed equally filled, and seats invariably taboed on other occasions were eagerly sought for, and their discomforts forgotten in the exhilarating influence of the surrounding thousands of happy faces. Nilsson's appearance was the signal for great rounds of applause, at the subsiding of which she sung Gounod's 'Ave Maria.' This fine air has a most agreeable compass, and its gracefully flowing cantabile would be grateful to almost any voice unusually smooth, but with an organ so exceptionally even and pure throughout as that of Mdlle. Nilsson it may be supposed that the piece was given with admirable effect. Still, there was no improvement on the Handel aria of the preceding concert, for while the tempo was more accurate there was less of that pathos which rendered 'Angels Ever Bright and Fair' so touching.

"It was in the scene from Hamlet that we were best able to judge of Miss Nilsson's powers, and we doubt if any one present last night ever witnessed such a concert performance before. It was evident from the first that she would endeavour to rid herself as far as possible from the ordinary limits of concert singing, and we were at first disposed to doubt the good taste of such a hazardous undertaking; but her splendid success disarmed criticism. From the first chords of the orchestra she was a changed woman. The dramatic fire learned from her eyes; every motion, every expressive change of her countenance helped to render the force and meaning of the score more apparent. Her vocal feats, too, were here abundant and wonderful. There were chromatic runs of the greatest accuracy, and trills on the very highest notes of the scale which were marvellous, while she sharped the upper C of the scale with the utmost nicety and power. The whole scene was in fact a dramatic illusion. We forgot the circumscribing bounds of the concert room forgot the orchestra appliances and all else in the intense dramatic emotion of the part, and felt we were recalled to the concert sphere of musical experience by the usual persistent and absurd encore which followed, and which she was absolutely compelled to accept, in spite of its wretched impropriety after such a performance. At its close she was rewarded with a huge bouquet, containing the national flags of Sweden and the United States.

"The great dramatic effect of this concert-rendering of the Hamlet selection has only intensified the general desire of the public, and almost increased it to a demand, that Mdlle. Nilsson shall be presented to us in that more fitting sphere in which all of her greatest triumphs have been won—that of the opera. And while we would be greatly interested to hear this modern work which, next to Wagner's compositions, has occasioned the greatest amount of comment we would also plead with the management to revive here Rossini's Otello, in which Mdlle. Nilsson produced so brilliant an impression in London, and which has been unheard on our stage for so many years."

An Italian Opera Buffa Company will, it is said, commence a series of performances at the Lyceum Theatre, in January next.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mr. Mapleson commenced his brief winter series of operatic performances on Monday night with genuine success. The opera selected for the occasion was Il Flauto Magico, an almost inexplicable extravaganza rendered immortal by its union with music in which affluence of melody truly Orphean is found combined with harmony just as divine, construction everywhere ingenious, and orchestration not less clear and transparent than rich in detail and delightful in balance. But—as all whose opinion is worth anything have long admitted—such is Die Zauberflöte, or Il Flauto Magico, the dramatic "swan-song" of Mozart; and to say another word about it at this time would be superfluous.

The opera was, on the whole, effectively sung, and the performance generally, under the direction of Signor Bevignani, up to the average mark. Mdlle. Tietjens, as Pamina, gave that delineation of Astrifiammante's daughter to which she has accustomed us, and which, long before her time, tradition had made classical. Never has the admirable artist thrown more genuine pathos into the exquisitely beautiful air, "Ah! io so, piu non m'avanza," in which Pamina, bewailing her sad fate, invokes death to her rescue. Not less happy was Mdlle. Tietjens in the duet with Papagena—the famous "Là dove prende, amor ricetto"—in which her associate was Signor Cotogni, whose extremely correct and careful singing of all the music which Mozart has put into the mouth of the incongruous bird-catcher was duly recognized not long since. Signor Cotogni's performance on Monday more than confirmed the impression it produced when he first essayed the part at Covent Garden, and his share in the honours of the evening was by no means insignificant. Besides the encore awarded to the duet just mentioned, he obtained another in the quaint air, with accompaniment of bells—"Colomba o Tortorella" and a third in the deliciously comic duet "Pa-pa-gena! Pa-pa-geno," with Madame Sinico, whose impersonation of the bird-catcher's wife is as sprightly and attractive as could be wished. Late as it comes in the opera, this duet was one of the sensations of the evening. Signor Bettini played Tamino; and, though apparently somewhat indisposed, gave his music, including the melodious apostrophe to Pamina's portrait ("Oh! cara immagine") with the studied and conscientious accuracy for which he is always noted; while his accomplished partner, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, with her rich voice and artistic acquirement, aided materially in the effect of the concerted music allotted to the sable-clad attendants on the Queen of Night. The lowest voice-part in the pieces of like kind belonging to the good Genii was happily intrusted to Mdlle Scalchi, whose companions were Mdlles. Schofield and Banermeister, those of Madame Trebelli being Mdlles. Cruise and Madigan. The other subordinate parts were sustained more than respectably by Signora Rinaldini and Baleaza, Wilford Morgan, Casaboni, Ciampi and Tagliafico—the last, as the black slave Monostatos, exhibiting considerable vivacity.

The two most striking personages in the opera—Sarastro and his arch-enemy the Queen of Night—were represented by Signor Antonucci and Mdlle. Rosa di Murska. Signor Antonucci has an imposing presence, and a voice of fair quality, if of little power; but he is hardly equal to the efficient delivery of either of the solemn airs through which Mozart imparts musical weight and dignity to the High Priest of the Temple of Isis. On the other hand, the Astrifiammante of Mdlle. di Murska has never been surpassed, if, indeed, it has been equalled, in our remembrance. With her, in a dramatic sense, the Queen of Night is by no means the abstraction, or lay figure, so frequently put forth; while her execution of the two great airs ranks legitimately among the most perfect exhibitions of contemporary art. In the last, the most elaborate and difficult, Mdlle. di Murska, as usual, transported her hearers; and so overpowering was the applause at the conclusion of the opening section that she was compelled once again to commence the air. It is a pity that so splendid and impassioned a musical outburst should not be allowed to go on right through to the end without interruption. The effect, seeing that Mdlle. di Muraka declaims the last part just as finely as she does the first, would be doubly great.

The opera, which was preceded by the National Anthem (Inno del chorus), was evidently to the taste of a very numerous audience. Ivernia Borgia was given on Tuesday, and the Trovatore (of course) on Thursday. The opera announced for this evening is Oberon.

LEIPSIC.—The Euterpe Musical Association will give ten concerts this season. Herr Volkland will be the conductor, and Herr Svendsen, from Christiana, the leader.—The Berlin Domchor will shortly give a concert here.—The concert given at the Gewandhaus for the wounded and the survivors of those who have fallen of the 12th Armee corps, was very numerously attended. Herr Carl Reinecke composed "Fest Ouverture" expressly for the occasion. Herr Gura sang an air from Euryanthe, together with songs by Schubert and Löwe. Mdlle. Hauss performed Mozart's D minor Concerto, and Mdlle. Bosse gave an air from Iphigenie auf Tauris.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The Beethoven concerts are going on prosperously. Since our last reference to them the Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5 have been given. The "D major," full of exuberant life and genial humour, with a larghetto rarely surpassed in melodious grace; the "E flat," of colossal proportions, first christened "Buonoparte," and subsequently rechristened "Eroica," in which the aspiring musician unanswerably established his claim to the position he has since maintained with easy pre-eminence at the head of orchestral composers; the "B flat," prodigal of original fancy, comprising an adagio of ineffable beauty with a finale, the spirit of which seems unscrutinisable; and the "C minor," which many amateurs, not without colourable pretext, regard as "the symphony of symphonies," have all been heard in the order which belongs to them. Each, too, has been, on the whole, superbly played, as even fastidious judges, who may object that the first movement of the "Eroica" and the adagio of the "B flat" were taken just a shade too fast, must allow. Further, we have had the overture to Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, a ballet (fancy Beethoven at work upon a ballet!) composed in 1800, and produced at Vienna the year following—the first of Beethoven's overtures which ever became familiar in this country; the third pianoforte concerto (in C minor), with Miss Agnes Zimmermann, a worthy executant of the solo part; and, most noticeable of all, the four overtures written for Fidelio,—the first three (in the key of C major), generally known as the "overtures to Leonora," and, in immediate succession, at the beginning of the concert, the last (in E), accepted for a long period as the "overture to Fidelio," as though the other three had not been in existence, at the end. The introduction of these overtures in one and the same programme was tried by Mendelssohn at the Leipsic Gewandhaus, in 1840—with what complete success is recorded by Schumann in one of his most genuine criticisms. We doubt if even on that occasion, with Mendelssohn himself as conductor, the overtures were played with more careful finish or more hearty enthusiasm than at the Crystal Palace, under the direction of Mr. Manns, on Saturday afternoon, when the great C minor symphony not excepted, they formed unquestionably the chief attraction. The close attention with which they were listened to, by the most crowded audience of the season, and the applause at the end of each, were conclusive evidences of the interest which this novel and extraordinary presentation of Beethoven had excited. Anything more instructive, indeed, to those who study the higher manifestations of genius with befitting earnestness, than to watch the development of the great musician's thoughts in that of the first three overtures—if not, as Schumann says, from an acorn to an oak, at least (comparatively) from a sapling to an oak—could hardly be imagined. Again, when finding that all which possibly could be got out of his first idea had been obtained, the bold confidence which, at the revival of Fidelio in 1814 (nine years after its first production), induced Beethoven to prepare a fourth overture, in a different key, in quite a different style, and yet after its manner as genuine and fine as any of the others, is a fresh source of interest to the admirers of his music. The separation of this overture from its precursors at Saturday's concert was a wise arrangement on the part of Mr. Manns.

Independently of Beethoven, the instrumental department of these concerts, as usual, has offered much to commend unreservedly. No symphonies, except those of Beethoven, it is true, have been included in the programmes; but, to atone for this, overtures of merit by other composers have been given;—as, for example, Schumann's impassioned Genoveva; Rossini's brilliant Siège de Corinthe; M. Gounod's pastoral, Mireille—so well played that the absence of its composer, whose appearance at the concert had been looked for, caused general regret; the well known Midsummer Night's Dream and Ruy Blas of Mendelssohn; and last, not least, Professor Sterndale Bennett's Paradise and the Peri, the first performance of which at the Crystal Palace Concerts was welcomed with such unanimity that, like the Naiades of the same composer, it may be now safely regarded as one of the future stock pieces of Mr. Manns' repertory. In addition to all this, the greatest of existing performers on the double bass, Signor Bottesini, has appeared once more, showing, by a marvellous execution of his own fantasia on themes from Lucia di Lammermoor that his power of astonishing and delighting an audience in equal degrees remains as of yore. Signor Bottesini was received with all the old enthusiasm.

In the vocal way the only novelties have been the début of Herr Nordblom, a young tenor with a good voice and much to learn; and the return of Mdlle. Corani, an old English, or rather Irish favourite, with a newly Italianized name, from whose powerful soprano voice and energetic delivery much may be reasonably expected.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Such an event as Italian Opera here for six nights in succession has not happened since I cannot tell when—suppose we say within the memory of that useful, if somewhat mythical being, the oldest inhabitant (a so-called) a period at once sufficiently vague and, at the same time, comprehensive. The opera which closed the short season last year, Don Giovanni, was the one selected to commence the present series, the Donna Anna, in both instances, being Mdlle. Tietjens, who now stands unrivalled in the part, and who both sang and acted with that ability to which the public has been long accustomed. As Donna Elvira, Madame Sinico again won the plaudits of her hearers, while Madame Trebelli-Bettini, as Zerlina, despite the transposition of "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai Carino," created a highly favourable impression on a Birmingham audience, before whom (strange to say) this was her first appearance. The qualifications indispensable to a complete Don Giovanni are so rare, that one may look in vain for one equal to the task of embodying the character to the life. That Signor Cotogni falls short of the ideal must be admitted, but he has a good voice, while, as an actor, he has wonderfully improved of late. On the whole, Sig. Cotogni's performance was creditable. Although suffering from hoarseness (which compelled the omission of "Il mio tesoro"), Sig. Bettini got through the part of Don Ottavio in a manner that called forth general approval. As Leporello, Sig. Ciampi found scope for that dry humour which is associated with all he does. Signor Casaboni was Masetto, and the Commendatore found a fitting representative in Signor Tagliafico, whose name one couples unconsciously with the nameless man of stone.

In Lucia di Lammermoor Mdlle. Ilma di Murska again captivated her hearers (as she had done twelve months since) by her marvellous representation of the heroine. her mad scene, in particular, producing a strong sensation and great applause. Signor Frapolli, as Edgardo, acquitted himself with effect in the malediction of the second, and dying scene of the third act. Signor Cotogni was Henry Ashton, and Signor Antonucci Raimondo. Masaniello (compressed) concluded the second night's performance.

That Mdlle. Tietjens should play Norma was naturally to be expected, and that her embodiment of the betrayed Druid priestess should awaken enthusiasm was equally to be looked for and equally realized. Madame Sinico, a charming Adalgisa, well deserved the applause bestowed upon her throughout. By persistently singing too loud, Signor Vizzani did himself and the part of Pollione injustice. Signor Antonucci was an imposing Oroveso, while Mdlle. Baumeister, as Clotilda, and Mr. W. Morgan, as Flavio, were careful and effective.

With anything like a tolerable cast, La Sonnambula is sure to be attractive, and those who had heard Mdlle. di Murska on Tuesday evening were no less anxious to repeat the pleasure on the Thursday, when Bellini's familiar music was to be given. How well the part is suited to the gifted Hungarian lady is well known, and it would have been indeed surprising if the audience had not cordially responded to a performance so historically and socially delightful. None but a consummate mistress would ever dare those extraordinary flights, which seem almost impossible, and yet are executed with as much certainty and perfection as if they were mere ordinary scale passages. As for the acting of Mdlle. di Murska, every look, gesture, or action was fraught with meaning, and the whole embodiment was natural and spontaneous. Mdlle. Baumeister's Lisa, Signor Fancelli's Elvino, and Signor Tagliafico's Count were all more or less praiseworthy.

Lucrezia Borgia (like Norma) has become a speciality of Mdlle. Tietjens, whose conception of this Duchess of Ferrara is too well known to require comment. Anything finer than her singing in the first two acts could hardly be imagined; but, unfortunately, a sudden hoarseness (brought on by the draughts of the theatre) compelled the omission of much of the music of the last act. The part of the Duke fell to Signor Cotogni, for whose voice, however, it is too low: nevertheless, it was by no means badly sung. Signor Fancelli's Gennaro was fairly satisfactory, and Mdlle. Scalchi was encored in the "Brindisi."

Saturday night brought the series (which, wonderful to say, did not include the Trovatore) to an end, with the Huguenots, first time in Birmingham. His indisposition continuing, Signor Bettini had to resign Raoul di Nangis to Signor Vizzani, who, considering that he had never before played the character, acquitted himself well. Signor Cotogni's Conti di Nevers left little to desire. Signor Caravoglio, as San Bris, was not quite perfect, and Signor Antonucci, although looking Marcel well enough, fell short both in his singing and acting. Madame Sinico was a graceful and competent Marguerite, and Madame Trebelli-Bettini took the house by storm as Urbano, the "No, no, no," being rapturously encored, and the whole performance characterized by high intelligence. All trace of the hoarseness which had afflicted Mdlle. Tietjens the night before having entirely disappeared, Valentina was the crowning success of the week, and after the duet in the third act (with which the performance concluded) the recall and applause were enthusiastic. The ballet during the week has been sustained with Mdlle. Blanche Ricois and M. Desplaces as principals. The chorus, though small, was quite large enough for the theatre, and thoroughly competent, with a fair band of some thirty instruments, and Signor Berignani as an efficient conductor, while Mr. A. Harris, as stage manager, has greatly contributed to the completeness of the best and longest Opera season ever given in Birmingham.

The Festival Choral Society announce Mr. J. F. Barnett's Paradise and the Peri shortly, and soon after the beginning of the year Mr. Benedict's St. Peter will be given by the same body.

BUTTON OF BIRMINGHAM.

OPERA COMIQUE.

On Saturday night another new theatre of considerable magnitude was opened in central London! It stands close to the Olympic and the Globe, the address given in the bills, "299, Strand," indicating not the exact site of the edifice, but the fact that it is approached from the main thoroughfare by means of a broad subterranean but well illumined passage. As far as its beauty is concerned the proprietors need not fear competition with any of the numerous speculators with whom they have entered into competition; and, like the St. James's it is evidently arranged with a view to aristocratic patronage.

The name of the theatre, "Opéra Comique," seems rather to have been chosen to denote the uses to which its stage is just now appropriated than to have been fixed upon as the permanent title of the edifice. The emigration of Mdlle. Déjazet with the whole of her company from France could hardly have been anticipated when the foundations of the building were laid, and probably we shall not be wrong in regarding its occupation by a French instead of an English troupe as one of the results of the siege of Paris. At all events the name is not happily selected. To Parisian ears the "Opéra Comique" performed at the theatre so called denotes a species of composition often as substantial in its way as the works brought out at the Académie, and is generally distinct from that modern "Opéra Bouffe" represented at the Variétés or the Folies Dramatiques, which so many have attempted to naturalize in this country. But the piece which occupies the chief place in the bills of our newest theatre is even far less musical than Opéra Bouffe. By the author, M. Victorien Sardou, who wrote it for the Théâtre Déjazet before he had gained his present eminence, it is modestly called a "Comédie mêlée de chant et de danse," and this is precisely what it is. Its effect depends entirely on the acting, and the songs, few and far between, are of the kind executed by comedians who cultivate singing as an accessory art, not by professional vocalists. No doubt it is typical of the repertory of the French company now engaged at the theatre, representing the house on the Boulevard du Temple, which was opened by Mdlle. Déjazet, after her long and brilliant career at the Palais Royal, and which still bears her name.

The appearance of Mdlle. Déjazet, whose very advanced age is one of her glories, was the great fact of Saturday night. Without her, Les Prés St. Gervais, as the piece is called, would have made no great impression. The character of the Prince of Conti, which she plays, is very like those of the Young Duke in Les Premiers Armes des Richelieu, and of Gentil Bernard in the comedy of that name, in both of which this celebrated actress made herself famous. The Prince of Conti, yet a student in his teens, finds himself among a party of bourgeois assembled for a pic-nic on the Prés St. Gervais, and being at first mistaken for a ridiculous boy, soon becomes a favorite with all the gentlemen and ladies, more particularly with the latter, and is evidently a libertine in the bud. Now when in the tight-fitting costume of the 18th century, with powdered hair, and a little sprapfel of school-books dangling from her hand, the veteran artist tripped upon the stage, a sensation of general wonder was the immediate result. With the aid of an opera-glass it might indeed be discovered that the face of the schoolboy prince was not youthful; but in the vigour, in the upright bearing, in the movements, in the attitudes, there was every indication of juvenility, a juvenility withal of a princely, gay, and gallant order. The perfect ease of the performance is rendered only the more marvellous by the exquisite finish of the actress, who never becomes careless for an instant. The songs, sentimental and comic, are capitally sung. That the voice has lost the body it once had is evident enough; but Mdlle. Déjazet knows how to economize what is left, and while she retains that force of expression which was always her own, she is never guilty of a false note. As a shout of welcome followed her first entrance, so did a burst of admiration follow the descent of the curtain.

Two short pieces, the one played before the other after M. Sardou's comedy, complete the evening's programme; and while the names of most of the actors will be new even to travelled Englishmen, the public will learn that the Théâtre Déjazet, though not situated in the most fashionable quarter of Paris, had the advantage of a good working company.

THE MOHAWK MINSTRELS.

(From an Occasional Contributor.)

At the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, the Mohawk Minstrels gave an entertainment, on the 2 th ult. for the benefit of widows and orphans of seamen lost in the Captain. The party acquitted themselves very creditably. Messrs. Arthur Raimont and Holland Harland (vocalists) and Mr. Dean Edwards in an eccentric dance) were particularly good. Two pianoforte solos, Souvenir de Faust (De Kontski), and (in response to an encore) Irish Diamonds, by (M. Willie Pape) played by Miss Amy Weddle on one of Kinkman's concert grands cannot be too highly praised. The appreciation of Miss Weddle's merit was evinced by the attention she secured, and the applause that followed each of her performances.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1870-71.

DIRECTOR—MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

THE Director begs to announce that the Thirteenth Season of the Monday Popular Concerts will commence on Monday Evening, November 14, and that the Performances will take place as follows, viz.:—

1870. Monday, November 14; Monday, November 21; Monday, November 28; Monday, December 5; Monday, December 12; Monday, December 19.

1871. Monday, January 2; Monday, January 16; Monday, January 23; Monday, January 30; Monday, February 6; Monday, February 13; Monday, February 20; Monday, February 27; Monday, March 6; Monday, March 13.

Morning Performances will be given (Seven) on Saturdays, January 28, February 4, 11, 18, 25, March 4 and 11 (1871).

THE BEETHOVEN CONCERTS.

The present year being the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, the Director has thought that it would be a fitting tribute of respect to the memory of that immortal genius to confine the programmes before Christmas exclusively to Selections from his Instrumental and Vocal Works. Every concert, until the end of the year, will therefore be a Beethoven Concert. In the course of the series, the Six Quartets, Op. 18; the Three Quartets (Rasoumowsky), Op. 59; the Quartet, No. 10 (E flat); the Five Trios for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; and as many of the Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violin, Pianoforte and Violoncello, and Pianoforte alone, as can be comprised within the limits of eight programmes, will be given. The Vocal Music will in all instances be selected from the Chamber Songs, with Pianoforte Accompaniment.

PROGRAMME OF FIRST CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 14TH, 1870.

To Commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

PART I.

QUARTET, in F major, Op. 18, No. 1, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello—Madame Norman-Neruda, MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti .. .. Beethoven.
SONG, "Theresa"—Mdlle. Clara Doria .. .. Beethoven.
SONATA, in E flat, Op. 7, for Pianoforte alone—Mr. Charles Hallé Beethoven.

PART II.

SONATA, in F major, Op. 5, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Violoncello—MM. Hallé and Piatti .. .. Beethoven.
SONG, "Know'st thou the land"—Mdlle. Clara Doria .. Beethoven.
QUARTET, in G major, Op. 18, No. 2, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello—Madame Norman-Neruda, MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti .. .. Beethoven.
Conductor .. .. Mr. BENEDICT.

Sofa Stalls, 5s.; Balcony, 3s.; Admission, 1s. Tickets to be obtained of Mr. Austin, 28, Piccadilly; Messrs. Mitchell & Oliivier, Old Bond Street; Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co., 48, Cheapside; Hay's, Royal Exchange Buildings; and of Chappell & Co., 50, New Bond Street.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JUPITER GAMMON.—No. Boieldieu's last opera was Les Deux Nuits.

THOMAS NOON GADD.—An English translation of Spohr's Selbst-Biographie was published (by Messrs. Longman & Co.) in 1865. About Mandel, the best authority is, unquestionably, Herr Chrysander.

SIGNORINA OF CINCINNATI had better address himself to Colonel Bateman, father of the celebrated actress of the same name. The "restless colonels" alluded to were not musicians at all—not even "fiddlers," to employ the depreciating phraseology of our correspondent.

DR. WHOLEBIDGE.—The controversy about the Requiem is by no means settled to the satisfaction of impartial judges. Our own conviction is that Süssmayer was a humbug, and Constance Mozart (afterwards Mdme. Nissen) another. Dr. Wholebidge may possibly be convinced, but if so, it seems to us to be on insufficient grounds.

INDIGATOR.—The only composition of the late Sir George Smart's with which we are acquainted is a glee called "The Butterflies' Ball." The name of the opera by Mr. Henry Smart which was produced at the Haymarket Theatre, is Bertha. Mr. Henry Smart is the nephew, not the uncle, of Sir George. Mr. Clifton Potter has written two symphonies in G minor; but only one of them (composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society) is printed, as a pianoforte duet.

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

THE ST. PETER CONTROVERSY.

THERE is a certain fitness in the controversy now raging about St. Peter. The Apostle himself was a hot-headed and quarrelsome man. No doubt he was chiefly among those who contended which should be first in the Kingdom of Heaven. He had more than one reprimand from his Master—notably in connection with the cutting off a poor man's right ear; and his row with St. Paul at Jerusalem is the first illustration in Christian annals of the odium theologicum. Since his death his very bones have been bones of contention. "He never was at Rome," say some. "He was Rome's first Bishop," say others. "He was never appointed Head of the Church," say some. "He is the Prince of the Apostles," say others. "He is not the Church's foundation," say some. "Upon that Petrus the Church is built," say others. So the game goes on; and we are not at all surprised that the oratorio, St. Peter, has given rise to a fight. Nevertheless, the fight is a scandal to him who has provoked it. In proof of this, we need not enter upon any details, the broad facts of the case being enough. What are the facts? Simply these:—Mr. Benedict bought a libretto of Mr. Chorley, and paid him his price. He (Mr. B.) did not like it when bought; so, doing with his own property as he pleased, he put it aside, and procured another. Of what has Mr. Chorley to complain? His interest in the work ceased when Mr. Benedict paid over the £50, and if the latter had re-sold the MS. to his butterman, Mr. Chorley would have enjoyed no locus standi in a court of redress. These things should be kept in mind, for they make all the lesser points connected with the matter of no account at all. Nevertheless, a consideration even of the lesser points is not without instruction, if entered upon in the light of Mr. Benedict's letter, which appears in another column. Taking that letter as a text, we might "improve the occasion" up to a fifthly or sixthly at least. Here, for example, are some illustrations of how good can be obtained from the waters of this musical Bethesda, which Mr. Chorley—not obviously an angel—has "troubled."

In the first place, it is unwise to halloo till you are out of the wood. Mr. Chorley sang a pœan in the Athenæum, by way of celebrating a victory, while Mr. Benedict was buckling on his armour. Mr. Chorley may now turn his attention to dirges. In the second place, the man who enters upon a controversy should keep his memory green. Mr. Chorley's memory is dry—very dry. In the third place, when the memory is dry—very dry—it is dangerous to ask Fancy to make good the deficiency. Fancy is the Puck of human nature, and is never so pleased as when leading a benighted wanderer "through brake, through brier." It has served Mr. Chorley as though he had grievously sinned against Fancy at some time or other (perhaps when he wrote The Prodigy), leading him through horse-ponds and many sloughs. Let the reader carefully perase Mr. Benedict's letter, and he will be able to trace the unfortunate gentleman's delusions. Oh! Fancy, thou tricky spirit, why didst thou persuade Mr. Chorley that his book had been approved by the Birmingham Musical Festival Committee; that he had been the means of procuring Mr. Benedict the task of setting it to music; that Mr. Benedict had from the first, and always, liked it; that he (Mr. Chorley) had offered to submit to the arbitration of Sir M. Costa and Mr. Dickens; that but why go on till these questions are answered, O most wicked Fancy? Behold the result. Mr. Chorley flounders in a quagmire; admired—as a flounderer, by the public, to whom he appealed as the embodiment of cleanliness. Truly "we are poor folk" when dreams thus lead us astray. But good may always be extracted from evil; and Mr. Chorley, one moment self-elevated on the pedestal of justice, the next prone on the ground, like Dagon before the Ark, is an instructive spectacle.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Paper has been illustrating the force of strong imagination. It credits Jules Janin with the following description of Mr. Wehli's left hand:—

"'Tis as if there had been another convocation of Macbeth witches—only these were good fairies—and when this marvellous left hand was being shaped, and tapered, and perfected, the first witch flew into the magic circle, and cried, 'I bring thee strength!' 'I bring thee grace!' cried the second. A third came with 'dexterity!' a fourth with 'speed!' a fifth with 'elasticity!' a sixth with 'daring!' a seventh with 'sonority!' and then the chief witch moulded them into one perfect whole; and so the left hand 'de notre charmant pianiste' was made!"

We have no doubt that the great French dramatic (not musical) critic might, with perfect truth, have said this, and much more, concerning Mr. Wehli; only he didn't, which is awkward for Frank Leslie.

THE admiration of our friend Watson for Miss Kellogg is intense, even to incoherence. Here are some choice extracts from a recent notice of the American prima donna:—

"It (the applause) was the Kentish fire of true enthusiasm, with its fibre so closely laid that you knew it was the spontaneous voice of the heart."

"The fibre of fire being a spontaneous voice, is good.

"The orchestra gave the warning note of silence, when freeing herself from the acid of the violins, &c."

Poor Miss Kellogg. We wonder if the acid hurt her!

"It (Miss K.'s voice) flashed without an effect, a silver thread from the shining reel of her throat and wound itself irresistibly around every heart present."

In presence of this amazing figure we can only stand bareheaded, overcome with reverent admiration. Let us stop quotation and watch the silver thread.

SOME of the American papers are lying through thick and thin about Mdlle. Nilsson. We shall keep a sharp look out upon their doings, and impale every lie as dead kites are nailed to barn-doors—pour encourager les autres. Here is an instalment:—

Lie No. 1.—"The sudden collapse which she suffered in '68, and which rendered her ineligible for operatic honours in Belgium and elsewhere for quite a period."

Lie No. 2.—"By skilfully manipulating the press, this alarming fact (Lie No. 1) was discreetly ignored by the clever management."

Lie No. 3.—"The glaring defects * * * have been the subject of gossip in the English and Continental capitals ever since her first failure in London in the Magic Flute, when an injudicious effort to use the chest-notes early in the evening prevented her finishing the opera, and ultimately reduced her to the level of a third-rate artist."

The last lie is what Mr. Dick Swiveller would call a "stunner;" and if it and the rest were true, how we should admire the stern rectitude of our American contemporary! As it is, how we admire his mendacity!

ARE there two Delle-Sedies. The New York Weekly Review says:—

"Delle-Sedie, owner of a villa at Sevres, is in England."

Delle-Sedie, the opera singer, we know, but who is "Delle-Sedie, owner of a villa at Sevres?"

A SINGULAR exploit was performed on the battle-field of Sedan by the band of the 59th Prussian Regiment, not with the trumpets and trombone, but with muskets and swords. The bandsmen were left to guard the knapsacks of the regiment. While thus occupied they observed some hostile infantry and cavlary approach under cover of the neighbouring wood. The chief bandsman, Müller, did not consider long, but ordered the men to take up muskets—of which there was no lack on the battle-field—and, drawing his sword, he led them to the charge. The French bullets missed their aim, nor did they stop the impetuous attack. The band was victorious; it drove the hostile detachment, and made 13 prisoners. The surprise of the regiment on their return may be imagined. It is satisfactory to hear that Herr Müller has been rewarded with the Iron Cross, which he has deserved the more since he and his men have done excellent service in all battles as voluntary bearers of wounded.

HERR R. WAGNER'S "Festgabe," or "Festival Gift," to the centenary of the composer of Fidelio, in December, will shortly be published by Herr E. W. Fritzsch. It is an oration in the grand style, and a contribution to the philosophy of music, the title being, Beethoven, von Richard Wagner.

THE Bethoven Festival at the National Hungarian Theatre, in Pesth[e] will take place on the 16th, 17th, and 18th December. On the first evening, Goethe's Egmont, with Beethoven's music, will be performed, and, on the second, Fidelio. On the third evening, there will probably be a grand concert in the Redouten-Saal. In consequence of a request made by the Intendant, Baron Felix Orczy, the Abbate Franz Liszt, has promised to conduct the concert. Simultaneously with Baron Orczy's request, the Abbate received a similar one from Vienna, for him to conduct the Beethoven Festival there, but he decided in favour of Pesth. The programme of the concert will, in all probability, comprise the Ninth Symphony, and Liszt's Beethoven-Cantata. It is said, too, that the Abbate will play one of the great composer's Pianoforte Concertos.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

BRIXTON.—The Monthly Popular Concerts of classical chamber music, which Mr. Ridley Prentice established a year ago, were resumed last week. The Angell Town Institution, where they are held, was crowded in every part, and the audience evinced a lively appreciation of the programme provided for their entertainment. The programme commenced with Haydn's string quartet in G minor (No. 56), played with artistic taste and finish, by Messrs. Weist Hill, Folkes, Barrett, and W. Pettit. Then Mr. Winn sang "Revenge! Timotheus cries," from Alexander's Feast, with well-deserved applause, and Madame Dowland sang, with genuine feeling, a sacred song of considerable merit, composed by the director to the words of Herbert's 23rd Psalm. The first part ended with a masterly performance, by Mr. Prentice, of Mendelssohn's pianoforte Sonata in E major (Op. 6). The second part comprised the Melodie Religieuse of Berthold Tours, and Lady Thompson's trio in D minor, the former of which was encored. The songs were Hatton's "Change of Twenty Years," sung by Mr. Winn; Benedict's "In my wild mountain valley," and Bishop's "Love has eyes," both by Madame Dowland. The pianoforte accompaniments were played by Mr. G. S. Minson. Mr. Prentice may be congratulated on his management of these concerts, which deserve the encouragement and support of all lovers of music.—W. H. P.

A CONCERT was given, on the 27th ult., at the St. Pancras Vestry Hall, in aid of the fund for the relief of the sick and wounded of French and German armies. The vocalists were the Mdlles. Clara and Rosamunda Doria, Julia Elton, Minnie Poole, Messrs. Carl Stepan, G. T. Carter, G. Taylor, with Miss Angell, Messrs. J. B. Chatterton, Richard Blagrove, Francesco Berger, and W. H. Eayres as instrumentalists. The Mesdames Doria each gave a song by Mr. John Barnett, as well as Francesco Berger's spirited duet, "Love and War," in all of which they were encored, as was also Mr. F. Berger in a pianoforte solo of his own, "Marching with the band," on which, being encored, he substituted Thalberg's "Home, sweet home;" he also created an effect (with Mr. W. H. Eayres) in Osborne and De Beriot's Duo Concertant Guillaume Tell. Miss Angell played two pianoforte solos, by Ascher and Benedict, obtaining much applause. Messrs. F. Berger, S. Naylor, and W. Ganz were the directors.

MR. AGUILAR'S first performance of pianoforte music for the present season, took place on 20th October. We subjoin the programme:—

Sonata in C (Aguilar); "Oh in the stilly night," Transcription (Aguilar); Impromptu in A flat, No. 4 (Schubert), Miss Mina Bourchier, pupil of Mr. Aguilar; Melody in F, and Etude (Rubinstein); Sonata in A flat, op. 26 (Beethoven); Lieder ohne Worte (Mendelssohn); Variations of an air from L'Elisir d'amore (Thalberg), Miss Mina Bourchier; Le Desir, Transcription, (Aguilar); Polonaise in A, op. 40 (Chopin); The Birds at Sunset, Valse Brillante (Aguilar).

INDIVIDUALITY AND SCHOOL.*

I.

In all ages, there have been bitter complaints that mediocrity in art is so overwhelmingly predominant, that prolific scribbling without talent, and careless of everything save the fashionable articles that command a sale at any particular period, have assumed such large dimensions, and crushed really talented productions. These complaints arise from time to time, and are by no means new; voices have always been heard making a noise about the decay of art, the poverty of ideas characterising artists, and so on. In one instance, people smiled sarcastically at the striking family likeness between certain compositions, which dished up mere flourishes, and constantly recurring phrases. These betray, it is true, the musician duly brought up according to scholastic rules, but they exhibit no trace of that artistic spirit, permeating his subject, or producing a real musical idea. Such composers have been flung by dozens into the same heap. On other occasions, critics have been found who discovered talent in this or that composer, but declared that it had unfortunately perished under the rubbish of commonplace. Yes, the poor fellow, it was said, possessed splendid talent, which might have enabled him to pursue his course along the narrow path of true art, and, as a genuine artist, to offer the public nutritious food, but the lure of ease or a greedy for quick profits had thrown him in the broad and well trodden road of everyday mediocrity, where the musical appetite of the public is perfectly satisfied with vapid skilfet.

Such complaints, as we have said, are not new; they have been made in all ages. But it is also invariably happened that the persons making them were the very first to pick up a stone to fling at any artist, as an innovator and a revolutionist, who attempted to shame their useless lamentations and exhibit distinctly marked individuality. They are the very persons who will be found ready to attack any old jog-trot course of art; their lamentations on the decadence of the latter, and its want of intellect, are merely meant to be wonderingly admired as deep penetration, as wisdom calculated to excite respect, and their apodictical assertion, "Genius has died out in the world!" must not be doubted.

Genius has died out; there is no longer any artistic individuality!—Ridiculous! There are at the present day men with artistic individuality just as much as ever there were. The only difference is, perhaps, that now-a-days artistic individuality is developed, and indeed must be developed, otherwise than formerly. As to the questions: How is artistic individuality developed? What can be done to aid its development?—we will now proceed to examine them more nearly.

Genius is born with many, Yes, many may be correct; but innate genius may be nipped in the bud, and never successfully manifested, just as, on the other hand, talent originally small, may, by proper guidance and training, achieve extra triumphs. What says Goethe? "The most happy genius is nothing more than talent developed in itself to the Uncommon by nature and instinct alone. Art is always Art! No person who does not deeply ponder over it, must call himself an artist." Even Lessing, who asserted genius to be a model mind, very wisely adds to the estimate of a genial artist: "The thinking and scientifically educated artist is worth as much again." Only Industry produces model works; even genius must labour, if it would achieve anything, and the man who is the happy—or, if the reader prefers it, the unhappy—possessor of innate genius, has no easy task before him. It is, most certainly, much more difficult for him than for others, to submit to be shackled by the tight fetters of the schools, to move in the narrow paths, along which scholastic instruction must gradually lead him, if that foundation is to be laid, on which alone the development even of innate genius is possible. Every where does genius agitate its wings, endeavouring to break through the limits imposed on it, and woe to it if the driver does not hold the reins tightly enough; it flies wildly about in space, from which it is suddenly precipitated, for its wings have not the strength to carry it securely through endlessness. In the case of talent, or mere capability for art, all these things are much easier. In this instance, one thing comes with its slow jog-trot step after another; it is not till one step is taken that there is the slightest presentiment of the succeeding one, and what lies beyond through the appointed boundaries is beyond the sphere of possibility.

But who bears the responsibility of both? He who has to guide both, to watch the way pursued by both, in short—the teacher to whom both art-disciples are confided. The teacher's position is, indeed, a difficult one, and frequently we can scarcely understand the nonchalance with which a young sprig just escaped from an educational establishment, announces himself, without more ado, as teacher of composition, and pianoforte playing, and singing, as though with the wisdom painfully acquired, perhaps, in a short time, he had suddenly become possessed of the qualifications necessary for the most difficult of all positions, the position of a teacher. The mannikin takes his stand, with the most conscientious composure upon the proverb: "Wem Gott ein Amt giebt, dem giebt er auch Verstand." * "O sancta simplicitas!

Yes, the office of teacher is an onerous one, and its responsibility is great. How many talented persons, whose education cost a goodly sum, but who never turned out anything, have the wortny teachers upon their conscience! Thank goodness, however, there are, of course, among the great number of teachers, some men of sterling worth, who have perfectly understood the difficulty of their calling, which they faithfully practice. But this consciousness of discharge of their duty is at present incomparably more difficult than formerly, for art has grown; it has steadily gone on developing itself, and extending its circles more and more, just as a stone, thrown into the water, forms, in concentric modulations, a series of rings which keep increasing and increasing in size, till they dash, perhaps, against the distant bank and cannot go further.

Formerly the matter was much more simple.

The old school did not know the difference between the various kinds of music, or did not, at least, recognize it. Sacred music, chamber music, and operatic music, did not exist for it; it knew only one kind of music, the creations of which were framed according to certain rules. Whether the pupil intended, at a subsequent period, to devote himself to one particular kind or another, was a matter of indifference to the teacher; it never struck the latter that he ought to devote especial attention to any partiality or aptitude manifested by the pupil for any one branch of his art more than for another; it never struck him that he ought to adapt such aptitude, or even give it the advantage of separate instruction. On the contrary; if any pupil exhibited any such well-stamped individuality, it was mercilessly rooted out; the pupil had to accommodate himself exactly to the unalterable plan of scholastic rules—note up and note, one syllable under one note—etc., etc., for months and for years, till the entire theory of the art of musical composition had been gone through. "Yes, my son, now go; you are the first singer in the world!" said Porpora to Majorano, commonly called Caffarelli, after making him sing for six years nothing but some exercises written upon one octavo leaf. It is said that no one was more surprised than Caffarelli himself. A similar thing happened no doubt to many who studied composition in those days, and who, on terminating their course of study, were dismissed by their teachers as finished masters.

There was, however, some sense in this, inasmuch as the different branches of musical art did not, as far as essentials were concerned, diverge particularly much from each other, and a naturally gifted pupil might, without very well achieve considerable success in the church and on the stage by the same means. But there was far less sense in the system, when, after the lapse of some decennium, two kinds of musical art branched off in diametrically, opposite directions, which kept growing further and further apart, in spite of which, however, teachers still clung firmly, with a sort of pious feeling, to the old plan of instruction. Genius is born with a man; it cannot be given him; where it exists it must make a way for itself, and when it does not exist, why, then, if the artist is lost, the loss does not matter. According to this view of the case, people continued to believe that the only correct course was to give all pupils, without exception, a certain amount of general musical education, and then dismiss them as perfect, allowing the development of individuality to be the business of the individual.

The old singing-masters died out, bequeathing by tradition the rules of their method to their successors, without, however, being able to bequeath them also their spirit and their genius as teachers. Of course, it could not fail, in lapse of time, to come to pass that with this traditional inheritance the most bare faced humbug was practised; and we know that, even in our own days, there are persons who boast that they have received, found out, discovered, the mode of teaching followed by old Italian singing-masters, and, in consequence, qualify as absurd all that anatomy, physiology, and psychology have recognized as the laws of nature. It is clear to every unprejudiced man that the old singing masters, to judge by what they achieved, could not have founded their method on anything but the most intimate acquaintance with the human voice, and of what it was capable, in conjunction with the innate psyche, or spirit of the singer. But the nimbus does it; that entices pupils, though, of course, they are those to whom intelligent teachers have in vain explained the uselessness of their efforts, and to this kind of pupils belong, as a rule, those who pay best. Manibus cult dec——

It was otherwise with those who taught the art of composition. They could not very well set up the humbug of tradition. In this instance, there were palpable, evident rules, which anyone might, with a greater or less amount of exertion, make his own, and start from exactly the same basis as everybody else in his endeavours to imitate the great models of his art. That art emerged from its childhood; the twin-sisters, Sacred Music and Operatic Music grew up into vigorous, blooming young women, each having peculiar pretensions of her own. If anyone wished that each should enjoy her due, he had to recognise also her pretensions, and endeavour to satisfy them. For a time, it was possible to combine this with the principle that the individual qualification of the artist for this or that branch of his art must open up a path for itself, supposing he had been raised to the stand-point of a thorough general musical education. But something new was added, and very soon people here and there beheld the phenomenon of an individual, when left to himself, stumbling over all sorts of objects, and—pleasing the multitude exceptionally, while he flung forward all the rules of his profession.

Instead now of seeking the ultimate reason of this horrible phenomenon in the phenomenon itself, the teachers screamed out about treachery to art, banning and excommunicating the unhappy malefactor, who felt exceedingly contested at hearing the jubilation of the crowd and enjoying the laurels he reaped, as well as the ringing equivalents for them. The innovations of the apostate caused the hair to stand upon the heads of many. At such moments, there were never more than a few, who, with clear presence of mind, recognized the justice of such innovations. The horizon of the majority was too circumscribed for this, and the easiest plan was to empty the child out of the bath with the dirty water,* i.e. not to condemn the artist alone, but, with him, the entire branch of art to which he had devoted himself. If a really great man launched his anathema against it, he found imitators by hundreds; these imitators were not even capable of raising themselves to the appreciation of the case, but repeated believingly whatever formula the great man chose to initiate.

MUSIC AND THE WAR.

(From the "Graphic.")

The "European hurricane" has blown all manner of musical waifs and strays to our shores; some lent upon improving the occasion, others desirous only for a quiet refuge until the storm is over. Among the latter are men of renown, like Gounod, Faure, and, it is said, Auber, though the veteran composer's whereabouts remains a matter of dispute. We may be assured, however, that he would not court publicity under the present distressing circumstances of the country he loves so well; and that any attempt to drag him from retirement would be resented as impertinent. M. Gounod has been seen at the Crystal Palace; lured thither by the performance of his own Pot Doux (La Colombe), which we hope he enjoyed. M. Faure has made no sign. Madame Adelina Patti left England some weeks ago, having been detained by the exigencies of warfare ever since the close of the opera season. She was not altogether idle during this enforced residence among us. Everybody knows that the Birmingham Festival Committee rejected her enormous terms; but elsewhere the fascinating Marquise had to do with more complacent negociators; and Brighton, Manchester, and Liverpool have exchanged notes with her on mutually agreeable terms. Madame Patti is now on her way to St. Petersburgh; where, no doubt, she will turn the heads of the jeunesse dorée completely round, as usual. But though one refugee has left us, a score have arrived to take her place, and the cry is still, "They come!"

It is to be feared that disappointment awaits not a few singers who come with impaired resources among a people knowing them only by repute, or having known them so long ago, that all interest has passed away. A prevalent notion with foreign artists is that anything does for England, where the natives are not musical, and are willing to be hand-somely for being thought the reverse. Only thus can we explain the frequent apparition here of worn-out people who consider themselves ill-used when given to understand that our island is not actually a receptacle for the off-scouring of all things artistic. In ordinary times we should contend for a prompt and pitiless exhibition of this fact to those whom it may concern; but, just now, who would have the heart to do so? Our musical visitors come against their will: many of them, it may be assumed, are poor; and all have made heavy sacrifices. Under such circumstances the English may be trusted to act generously, even where the absolute claim is very small. Such a confidence was not misplaced, so far as concerned the Crystal Palace audience, when two refugee artists, Madame Florentini and Signor Delle-Sedie, made their appearance. Both lady and gentleman will be remembered by opera-goers as at one time connected with our great lyric theatres; but now the former has little voice left her, and the latter, with all his skill, had little at any time. Their reception, however, was courteous, not to say warm; and thus early in the season a good example has been set which, there is every reason to believe, will not want imitators. Of course there are some of these art exiles on whose behalf nothing need be said. Signor Bottesini, for example, speaks through his marvellous double-bass in tones which nobody can withstand. He excited the Crystal Palace audience to enthusiasm with as much ease as might Madame Alboni, did that queen of contraltos choose to come out from her retirement among us, and let her glorious voice be heard. For the presence of such artists (to whom we have still to add Madame Pauline Viardot we have reason to thank a war otherwise accursed, and we would willingly retain them through good as well as evil.

In contrast to the position of so many of her craft is that of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, who could not have acted more wisely had she known, long ago, that war was coming. The fortunate young lady slipped away to America just in time to escape disaster, and is now reaping a golden harvest in pecuniary profits. Trustworthy reports inform us that the incoming is all she could wish. As regards enthusiasm however, our American cousins are older if not wiser than they were twenty years ago; moreover, they have had experiences adapted to make them sadder. On the whole, Mdlle. Nilsson cannot reasonably complain of her reception, while she ought devoutly to thank the good luck which opened to her a Land of Goshen free from the plagues of Europe.

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—The subjoined is extracted from the Irish Times of October 26th:—

"At the Misses Glover's fashionable morning concert, given at 14 Talbot Street, under the patronage of her Excellency the Countess Spencer, the following pieces were performed:—Quartet, 'Faithless Emma' (Stevenson); solo harp, 'Martha' (Oberthür); scena, 'Ah! perfido' (Beethoven); cavatina, 'The Diver' (Loder); trio, 'L'usato ardor' (Bochsa); piano solo, 'Don Pasquale' (J. W. Glover); trio, 'La mia Dorabella' (Mozart. Part second:—Trio: harp, piano, and violin, 'Der Freischütz' (De Beriot); ballad, 'Jessie the flower of Dumblane, (Tannahill); piano solo; Allemande, Bourées (Sebastian Bach); quartet, 'The Bells of St. Michael's' (Knivet); finale (by desire) 'Skedaddle galop' (J. W. Glover)."

LYMINGTON.—We take the following from a local paper:—

"The session of the Literary Institution was inaugurated on Tuesday night, at the Assembly Rooms, by a concert-lecture, given by Mrs. John Macfarren, assisted by Miss Annie Sinclair. The hall was completely filled, the aristocracy of the town and neighbourhood being well represented. Mrs. Macfarren, as a pianist, is almost unrivalled: her execution is truly wonderful. The marvellous interpretations of music, its sympathy with nature in all its scenes, found in this talented artist their true expression. Miss Annie Sinclair added to the charm of the evening by one of the sweetest voices in the world, full of purity and feeling."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The following remarks on Mr. Nordblom, who made his first appearance in the provinces at one of Mr. Rea's concerts, are extracted with some inevitable abridgments from a local journal:—

"Mr. Nordblom had every reason to be gratified with the reception he experienced. He was suffering from a slight cold, and was therefore not heard to the best advantage. A fair estimate could nevertheless be formed of his voice and style. He possesses an organ of considerable compass both in its upper and lower register, together with flexibility and power. A pupil of Frank Mori and the protégé of Madame Parepa, he has nevertheless much to learn in phrasing and musical declamation. His début was eminently successful, as he received an encore on both occasions when he sang. In a ballad from The Bohemian Girl, he threw out a genuine ll that from the chest with great effect. Altogether this gentleman is a most promising vocalist, and will undoubtedly rise in his profession."

CHORLTON-ON-MEDLOCK.—We read as follows in the Manchester Courier, Oct. 27:—

"A concert was given on Tuesday, for the benefit of Mr. Charles F. Anthony, professor of music. The room was filled, and the audience respectable. The artists were Miss Katherine Poyntz, Miss Chadwick, Mr. de Jong, Mr. Horton C. Allison, and a glee party. A decided improvement is apparent in Miss Poyntz's singing,—more breadth, style, and finished case. She gave 'Convien Partir,' 'That's the way for Willie and me;' and gained an encore for 'Lo! here the gentle lark,' with De Jong's brilliant flute obbligato. Miss Chadwick won favour by her unaffected singing, receiving an encore in 'Huliah's Storm.' To laud M. de Jong's flute solo were 'to gild refined gold;' suffice it that his tone and execution were as ever. Applause and encores showed how highly appreciated were the pianoforte solos of Mr. Allison. He can claim, and have his claim allowed, to a place among the first pianists. The glee party agreeably varied the solos. Messrs. J. W. Harper and C. F. Anthony accompanied.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

BALFE.

Though English opera, after a brief existence, has for many years been a mere recollection, few Englishmen will have heard without sincere regret, of the death of Michael William Balfe, which occurred last week. We shall prise the memory of Balfe as that af the only British musician who has achieved a European reputation,* and whose artistic status is perhaps even higher in France and Germany than in his own country. The great charm of Balfe's music is its evident spontaneity, grace, and natural charm of melody. He rarely strained after effect; and when, in the age when Meyerbeer, Verdi, and Gonned flourished, he was content to be an English Donisetti, appealing more to the ear than to the intellect. The present generation can scarcely appreciate the popularity Balfe once enjoyed. His melodies were sung in every drawing-room, and ground on every barrel organ; and so fluent and fertile was his muse that he appeared to produce operas and songs for nearly thirty years, just as easily as he talked. In temperament he much resembled Rossini, for in spite of his wondrous fertility he was naturally a lazy man. When he had satisfied the demands of the opera managers and music-sellers, he appeared not to care what became of his productions, offering, in this respect, a strong contrast to Meyerbeer and Gounod, who were never thoroughly satisfied with their own efforts. But in spite of his constitutional dolce far niente, Balfe was never careless; though not deep or scientific as a composer, he was neither vulgar nor slipshod. Knowing well the full extent of his genius he wisely avoided that rock on which Verdi and other modern composers have split—the hope of rivalling Beethoven and Meyerbeer—an ambition which leads merely clever musicians into being dull and heavy. Balfe's only native rival was Vincent Wallace—like himself an Irishman—and perhaps a more original genius; for to Balfe's gift of tuna he added an elevation of style, which, had he lived, would in all probability have enabled him to develop a school quite as original in its way as that of some of the most fashionable Continental composers. Balfe and Wallace are, however, dead; and in their graves lies also, we fear, all hope of a revival af English opera. It is satisfactory to know that Balfe's latter years, unlike those of poor Wallace, were full of well-earned honours, and passed in ease and comfort. His daughter after upholding the family name as a prima donna, married first an English ambassador, and then a Spanish grandee of the most aristocratic bine blood; and, during the last few years of his life, the composer of the Bohemian Girl devoted all his energies to the cultivation of a pleasantly-situated farm in Herts, and was more proud of his pigs and crops than of all his Ops. In private life Balfe was a universal favourite, for to a rich fund of native humour he united the savoir faire of the man of the world while his ripe and varied artistic experiences enabled him to be equally and cordially appreciated both in the orchestra and the salon. His death will be mourned by an unusually numerous circle of friends, whose constant attentions pleasantly varied the bucolic delights of his rural retreat.—Liverpool Porcupine.

AUTUMNAL OPERA.

Mr. Mapleson has accustomed the public to Italian opera in November; but it is doubtful whether the public value it as they should. A century of usage, under certain conditions, has made both entertainment and conditions appear severally necessary to a complete thing. Italian opera in "the dark days before Christmas" is an anachronism; while, played to audiences at cheap prices and in frock coats, it is robbed of half its distinction. That these ideas should assert themselves against better judgment, proves with what success an originally exclusive amusement has retained its exclusiveness. Now, hardly less than when manager Handel was ruined by warfare with "society," Italian opera is an exotic, which flourishes only during the London season, under the stimulus of high prices and lofty patronage. Autumnal performances are therefore looked at askance, as by no means the real thing. They are to the performances of spring and summer what "Paris diamonds" are to the gems of Golconda; and, supporting them one feels inclined to take credit for an act of condescension. Evidently the state of things must be changed before we can hope for the naturalization af opera in England; and because tending to such a result, Mr. Mapleson's annual off-season has a very decided value. It shows what can be done towards making efficiently-performed Italian opera available for the public at large; while it also tests the general readiness to use whatever advantages may be afforded. A glance at the prospectus of the six weeks' campaign which began last night proves the former result, at all events, to be satisfactory. True, the list of artists contains the name neither of Madame Patti nor of Mdlle. Nilsson, and Mr. Santley is conspicuously absent; but Mdlle. Tietjens stands at the head of a troupe which many a Continental theatre of renown would be proud to possess. Clearly, therefore, out-of-season Italian opera can be made a very good and acceptable thing. We are not so sure that it will yet escape being under-estimated; but it is pleasant to try to believe in a quickly approaching time when opera, Italian and other, will be a necessary amusement, not for the few but for the many.—Daily Telegraph.

On the 23rd, 24th, and 25th of the present month, Dr. Wylde is to lecture on music at Gresham College.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Locke's old-fashioned music to Macbeth has been revived at the Academy of Music on the occasion of the production of Macbeth, for the debut of Mme. Janauschek as Lady Macbeth, and Walter Montgomery as the Thane. Mark Smith, so well known in London, took the part of Hecate, and sang better than actors usually do. Locke's quaint strains, however, do not prove very attractive to New York audi-nces.

A new musical organization, called "Euterpe," is talked of. It will consist of a chorus of fifty voices, organized on a co-operative basis, and intended to accept engagements for concerts just as an orchestra does. The profits are to be divided among the members. Motets are to be the specialty of "Euterpe," and several, never yet heard here, are to be produced.

Miss Nilsson has made an immense success in Baltimore and Philadelphia, and will give two concerts in this city on the 24th and 26th instant, when she will be assisted by Miss Cary, Vieuxtemps, and Brignoli. Wehli having left the troupe, to join that of Miss Kellogg, there is now no solo pianist with the Nilsson party. It does not appear at all probable that we shall have any opera with Nilsson this season. After a few concerts here she will go off West, where her success is certain; Parepa has, however, left a splendid reputation in our Western States, and Nilsson will find Chicago and St. Louis bent on making comparisons.

The English Opera season will begin on Monday night, at Niblo's, with Martha. A different opera will be given every night; Caroline Richings and Rose Hersee are the two prime donne of this troupe.

The German Opera Company, at the Stadt-Theatre, has just made a great success with Lucrezia Borgia. Clara Perl was really so sick she could scarcely speak, but she went through her part in spite of present disappointment. Her physician will not let her sing again for a week or two, and her place is to be filled in the meantime by Fraulein Krause, a mere beginnar. Carl Formes has had a quarrel with the management and has left the troupe. Clara Perl is to sing soon in the Barber and The Prophet.

Theodore Thomas, with his excellent orchestra, is giving concerts in the Eastern States with unvarying success.

The concerts of the Gottschalk sisters—three in number—created only a temporary ripple on the surface of society. The friends of the pianist, Louis Moreau Gottschalk, attended in goodly numbers, and the sisters were cordially applauded in the compositions of their brother, of which chiefly their concerts consisted. TROVATOR.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

Mr. Falconer's drama, Peep o'Day, revived at the Princess's by Messrs. B. Webster and F. B. Chatterton, is a good specimen of what a "sensational play" really was, when "sensation" was in its lusibood—that is to say, immediately after the first "run" of the Colleen Bawn. It was the first grand success achieved at the Lyceum after a series of dull years, and is said in some measure to have originated the present prosperous management at Drury Lane. The stone-quarry, animated with a marvellous attempt at murder and a more marvellous escape therefrom, was noised about town as Mr. Telbin's masterpiece, and the "Shan van Vogt" of which the existence was only known as an historical fact somehow connected with '98—at once became a popular London melody.

Revived at the Princess's now, as it were, the home of that "sensational" domestic drama which is fast losing its hold on other theatres, and is to be broadly distinguished from the historical spectacle, the favourite tale of treason again puts on all its lustre. It has also the advantage of making the public more familiar with Mr. Shiel Barry, an excellent delineator of Irish character, renowned in the provinces, but unknown to London before his appearance in Mr. Boucicault's Rapparee.

The older play is preceded by two acts of Mr. Andrew Halliday's Great City, which was produced several years afterwards, but which, brought out at Drury Lane and performed for a long series of nights, showed that the taste for ultra-realism had not yet begun to decline. The two acts terminate with the scene of the "Beggar's Club," and prove that the Great City is so far endowed with the nature of an eel that cutting it in half does not impair its vitality.

STUTTGARDT.—The King of Wurtemberg has conferr-d the cross of the Frederick Order, second class, on Herr Sontheim. The decoration was handed to the artist on the stage of the Theatre Royal, before the entire company, by the Intendant, who accompanied the presentation with a highly complimentary speech.

EVERY well-wisher to art must hope that the report about Mr. Rea's Orchestral Concerts at Newcastle-on-Tyne being given up is unfounded. Such legitimate entertainments are not too plentiful.

BRADFORD SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS (SIXTH SEASON).

(From our own Correspondent.)

The first of these high-class entertainments took place on the 28th ult., and with it our musical season may be considered as fairly opened. Mr. Halle's splendid band of seventy performers, amongst whom we were glad to discover all the principal artistes, whose faces have been familiar to us for many years, played the first overture (Oberon) with a delicacy and with a spirit, such as we have never heard excelled. Another proof of what a large orchestra can do, by constantly playing together, was rendered by the extreme pianissimo with which Berlioz's "Ballet des Sylphes" was given. Though the composition itself has little value, yet it contains some extraordinary effects of wind, strings, and harp, which never fail to take upon the audience—provided the latter is quiet enough, as was the case here, to hear the zephyr-like whisperings. The great piece of the evening was Beethoven's first Symphony in C major, to which the orchestra did full justice, and which, with its simple and beautiful melodies, and its lively and pleasing strains, was listened to with the utmost attention by the large audience. The overture to Hackiet ins Cevnacks, by Mendelssohn, was heard here for the first time. Though we do not wish to pronounce a decided opinion after a first hearing, yet we cannot help thinking that it stands far behind any of Mendelssohn's other overtures. Mr. Hallé was greeted with several rounds of applause on taking his seat at the piano, and his performance of Mendelssohn's Serenade and Rondo giocoso with orchestra, as well as his playing of Schubert's Impromptu in F minor, in the second part, was received with great enthusiasm. The vocal part of the concert was entrusted to Madame Trebelli-Bettini and Signor Bettini. For the latter gentleman an exense was made on account of sore throat; however, he managed to sing with half his voice "O caro immagina" from Il Flauto Magico, and two pretty duets with his spouse. As if to compensate the audience for her husband's deficiency, Madame Trebelli voiced several more beautiful than ever. The richness of her lower octave combined to the sweetness of her higher notes, and the wonderful flexibility and ease with which she sings makes this lady one of our greatest stars. She sang the air from Semiramide, "Ah qual giorno," and a very pretty air of Weber's, "O Fatima," from Abu Hassan, which has not been heard here before, and the beautiful rendering of which secured a very decided encore. In substitution for a song which had to be left out on account of Signor Bettini's hoarseness, Madame Trebelli volunteered Gounod's Serenade with violoncello obbligato, played by M. Vieuxtemps. The concert closed with Wagner's spirited march from Tannhauser, which gave the brass full scope to exercise its powers.

NEW MUSIC.

Berceuse pour le piano. Par FREDERIC H. COWEN. [London: Boosey & Co.] So many works of this kind have been written that the production of anything original, especially as scope and style are limited, must be a difficult matter. Mr. Cowen has partially succeeded at least. He begins by lulling baby to sleep in the orthodox manner—a soothing melody for the right hand, simply accompanied by the left. But as baby remains deaf to the voice of the charmer, he tries another style and key; passing to the relative minor and becoming somewhat animated. Baby likes this better than anything else, and enjoys the fun; whereupon Mr. Cowen grows with a flourish to his dominant seventh, and gives out softly the original theme, accompanied before, but with arpeggio chords for the right hand. Little by little this tells upon Master Wakeful; the eyelids droop and finally close; whereupon Mr. Cowen having trilled a little—pianissimo—with the theme in his left hand, just to make quite sure, closes also.

The Amateur Organist: A Collection of Voluntaries for the Organ or Pianoforte. By EDWARD TRAVIS. [London: Brewer & Co.]

Assuming that, in this superscription, the preposition might be substituted for Pianoforte with equal advantage and propriety, we have to say that Mr. Travis's ninth volume fully sustains the interest of its predecessors. This fact proves beyond question the editor's research, and, also, the discrimination with which he works. In brief, the Amateur Organist, should it never reach a tenth volume, will contain one of the largest and choicest selections of original and adapted pieces ever offered to the public. The book now before us is made up of ninety-five compositions a thoroughly eclectic group, which includes something good of all sorts, from movements by Beethoven and Mendelssohn down to psalm tunes. In every case simplicity has been kept in view while not losing sight of effect, and, as a consequence, the work is well adapted for extensive use. Organists may, perhaps find cause of complaint in the fact that few pieces have a pedal obbligato; but on the other hand, the vast and increasing army of those who delight in harmonium will rejoice. The Amateur Organist is carried out upon a plan which seeks "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," and even those who are best suited in other ways may legitimately give it their approval.

WAIFS.

At to-day's Crystal Palace concert, the pieces by Beethoven are the Mass in C (No. 1) and the grand overture, Op. 124, in the same key, which, together with Mendelssohn's overture to Athalie, will constitute a programme of more than ordinary excellence.

Mr. Kennedy, the Scottish vocalist, has been giving his characteristic entertainment in his native country with the accustomed success.

Miss Katharine Poynts has been singing at Manchester, Newcastle, and other places in the North of England.

Mdlle. Ilma di Murska left London on Tuesday, for Moscow, where she is engaged for the winter season.

Madame Szavardy (late Wilhelmine Clauss) is among the artistic refugees from unhappy Paris at this period.

The Choir learns with regret that Mr. Rea intends to make the present the last season of his annual concerts which have rendered the month of October one of the most enjoyable portions of the year to the musical "lads o' Coaly Tyne." The speculation, it appears, like too many others where an endeavour is made to put forward "the good and true," has not been a financial success, and thus the corporation organist has been compelled to relinquish the endeavour to infuse a love of the classical into his fellow townsmen.

"The Anemoie Union," under the direction of the great clarionetist Mr. Lazarus, with Madame Thaddeus Wells, and Miss Jessie Blair (vocalists); Mr. W. Shakspeare (pianist), and Mr. Nicholson (flute), are making their fourth annual tour in the provinces, and (to judge from local accounts) with signal success. Leicester, Ilarsiem, Todmorden, Clitheroe, Penrith, and Glasgow, were visited during the first week, and at each place the performances of the "Anemoie Union" were listened to with the utmost attention, and applauded according to their worth.

CHECKS AND CHEATS.

Few comparatively of the persons who are in the habit of paying their money at the door of a theatre are aware that a species of fraud is constantly practised which inflicts a serious loss upon the managers, though most of them have declared with becoming resignation that all attempts to suppress it must be necessarily futile.

The playgoer is aware that on entering the porch of a theatre he first goes to the pigeon-hole of the money-taker and there pays his cash, in return for which he receives a card called a "check," which he gives to the gentleman at an interior gate, and consistently called a "check-taker. The purpose of the check-taker is to prevent fraud on the part of the receiver of cash, over whom there would be no control whatever if mere payment insured an immediate entrance. According to a plan established for many years, the money-taker is provided by the manager with a certain number of checks to be issued as occasion requires, and each of these when received by the check-taker is or ought to be dropped into a sort of till, of which the manager has the key. At the end of the evening, when both functionaries render their accounts, the number of cards in the till of the check-taker is checked with the number left in possession of the money-taker, and if the former are duly represented by cash and the latter proved to be the correct residue of the total number of checks given out in the first instance, all is supposed to be right. In the language of trade, the manager has "taken stock," and is bound to be satisfied. Here comes the fraud. As coastguards are sometimes the allies of smugglers, whom it is their duty to repress, so is there very frequently an unholy compact between the check-taker and money-taker, by means of which the manager is systematically robbed. The check-taker has only to avoid dropping a few of his checks into the till, and somehow contrive their return into the hands of the money-taker, and, lo! a neat little sum is accumulated, for which there is no visible voucher and which the accomplices may conveniently share between them. Of the extent to which this system of fraud is carried on everybody practically connected with the management of theatres is perfectly aware, and all sorts of ingenious schemes have been devised for the purpose of preventing it. But so ill have these schemes stood the test of experience, that the very theory that a check-taker can be controlled has come to be regarded as utopian, and the manager makes up his mind that if he is only robbed a little he will refrain from pursuing useless investigations, and let bad alone, satisfied that it is no worse.

However, the philosopher's stone seems to have been at last discovered, embodying the art of extracting gold from hitherto unprofitable vouchers. Mr. Calvert, manager of one of the Liverpool theatres, has invented an instrument which appears destined to defeat the machinations of the most astute check-taker, and render impossible one peculiar violation of the Eighth Commandment. He makes his checks or vouchers not of mere bit of copper, and these he inserts in a fitting cylinder, with a vertical opening, through which the whole pile is visible. The trouble of counting is not required, the cylinder being marked on a graduated scale, the single degree of which corresponds to the thickness of the vouchers, so that the manager may at a glance see the state of his prosperity, as he could that of the weather by the thermometer. But this mystery of the cylinder is not revealed to the money-taker, who receives it enclosed in a mahogany case (locked, of course), with a trap at the bottom, which it is his function to open, allowing the vouchers, one at a time, to fall. The check-taker is provided with a similar engine, similarly enclosed, but so far differing from the other, that the opening is at the top, not at the bottom. Every check dropped in is duly registered by the cylinder. The scheme is brought to perfection by the connection of each machine with an electric clock, on the dial of which the state of the cylinders is instantaneously recorded whenever a voucher is taken from the one and dropped into the other.

Mr. Calvert's patent-right to the "Recorder" (as he terms it) is now the property of Mr. Chatteris, of the Strand, and the machines have already been largely purchased by managers. Will its utility be compromised by a strike on the part of oppressed check-takers, deprived of the right prescriptive of doing wrong, which they and their predecessors have exercised for many generations—possibly from the days of Shakspere. We have heard a story told about a machine, invented some years ago, which, though less perfect than Mr. Calvert's, at least threatened to make the practice of fraud a little more difficult than before. The check-taker, instructed as to the purpose of the invention, presented himself boldly to the manager and said, "Sir, if this machine is used, my office is not worth holding." And thereupon he took his leave.

"BEHOLD! HOW GOOD AND JOYFUL."

DEAR SIR,—It may interest you and many readers of your valuable paper to know, that on Monday next, the 7th inst., an event will take place unparalleled in the history of music, viz, the consecration of a Masonic Lodge, entirely devoted to the interest of the musical and theatrical professions, which will be entitled "The Lodge of Asaph." The desirable event has been brought about entirely through the untiring exertions of Br. Stanton Jones, Br. Charles Coote, Br. Chamberlain, and myself.

The late most worshipful master, the Earl of Zetland, frequently refused to recognize the importance of allowing two professions so closely allied to have a Lodge of their own; but at last we have obtained that which, I sincerely hope, will for ever destroy an awful bane to the progress of our divine art in this country, the "green-eyed monster, Jealousy."

Thinking you may deem this interesting event worthy a passing notice in your next issue,—I beg to subscribe myself, yours faithfully.

12, Markham Square, Chelsea, Nov. 1st., 1870. A. J. PHASEY.

P.S.—Br. Stanton Jones will be the first worshipful master of the "Lodge You will find in the Psalms of David that Asaph was the Chief Musician. of Asaph."

[What does Mr. Phasey mean by the latter portion of his P.S.? Does he suppose we do not know our Bible?—ED.]

THE "ROYAL" EDITION

OF

STANDARD OPERAS,

FOR VOICE AND PIANOFORTE.

EDITED BY

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

The wide-spread popularity which of late years has existed for the masterpieces of the Lyrical Drama, has suggested to Messrs. BOOSEY the expediency of publishing a popular edition of the chief Operas at present holding the stage.

Under the title of The "Royal" Edition of Standard Operas, Messrs. BOOSEY propose issuing, at fortnightly intervals, the complete Pianoforte scores, with words, of the chief Operatic Works of the day, in a form at once compendious, elegant, and moderate in price. The Musical text, given in all its integrity, and including in many cases whole pieces usually omitted, will be thoroughly and carefully revised by Mr. ARTHUR SULLIVAN, with whom will be associated Mr. JOSIAH PITTMAN. The words will be in Italian (that being the recognized language of the lyrical drama throughout the world), together with a carefully executed English version, printed under the Italian text. To meet every demand on the part of the public, it is intended to issue extra editions of the most important French and German Operas, with words in their original language, in addition to the versions now publishing in Italian and English. These will be announced hereafter. The unaccompanied recitatives which occur in the older Operas will be given, for the convenience of the public, in the form of dialogue, in both languages.

This Edition will be printed from a new fount of type, of remarkable clearness, on the finest paper; thus, the convenient size and completeness of this edition will serve not only for study at the Pianoforte, but will effectually supersede the libretti used in the theatres, enabling the auditor to follow the representation of an Opera in the manner that has been so popular at the performances of Oratorios.

The Operas will be published in volumes, Super-Royal 8vo, containing from 200 to 270 pages, price Half-a-Crown each; also elegantly bound in crimson cloth, gilt lettered, and gilt edges, 4s. each.

The Operas will appear in the following order:—

November	1st	Mozart's DON GIOVANNI.
„	15th	Beethoven's FIDELIO.
	(This Edition will include the FOUR Overtures.
December	1st	Rossini's IL BARBIERE.
„	15th	Bellini's LA SONNAMBULA.
January	1st	Flotow's MARTHA.
„	15th	Verdi's IL TROVATORE.

The "Royal" Edition will include all the principal acting Operas, the titles of which will be announced in future Advertisements.

Subscribers' names will be received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers in the United Kingdom, or by the Publishers,

"In a song entitled 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mdlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

CONCERNING MR. CHORLEY.

(From the London Correspondent of the "Birmingham Daily Post.")

Birmingham has been the innocent cause or occasion of a new version—or rather, to speak by the artistic card—replica of "The Enraged Musicians," with this difference, that Hogarth did not illustrate what the Hibernians call a one-sided reciprocity. There is but one musician to the present dispute; but then there is a musical critic—there is Jules Benedict, and there is Mr. Chorley. The quarrel is a very pretty one, and all about the words of St. Peter. Perhaps one might compromise the difficulty by calling the enraged ones a musician and a half, though obviously the expedient would not be approved by the compiler of the original book of St. Peter. The history of the quarrel is new of somewhat ancient date, but it first had ventilation in the Birmingham Festival week, when Mr. Chorley rushed into print with his wrongs. Mr. Chorley in his first epistle—for he, without waiting for his antagonist, quickly followed with a second—started on principle. "I have always held," he said, "that in an oratorio no intermixture of secular words with those from Holy Writ were in accordance with reverence or good taste." He never had been able to comprehend, Mendelssohn notwithstanding, how anyone could venture to dilute or eke out the text of the Bible, nor to acquiesce to the introduction of verses from the Psalter or Hymn Book into Scriptural stories, such as occurs in the oratorios of Sebastian Bach, "unless, indeed, these be performed according to their author's intention—that is, with the audience joining in congregationally." So refined a distinction has probably not been urged since the famous question of the Schoolmen—"How many million of angels could dance on the point of a needle?" But the real grievance and wrong does was unto Mr. C.'s own refined distinction as a libretto maker—that he, the compiler of the oratorio which Benedict merely composed, should have been ignominiously put on the shelf at Birmingham. Mr. Chorley, to make a rather tedious tale shorter, complained that his completed book having been submitted to and accepted by the Festival Committee, was handed over to Mr. Benedict—"who had been selected to compose the new oratorio for the year 1870 early in last year." He adds that "Mr. Benedict, both personally and in writing expressed himself (to speak moderately) entirely satisfied with what was set before him and this not only to myself, but to other persons. It was further expressly agreed on in terms of the most perfect amity, that no alterations or modifications of the text were to be made save by myself." The grievance in a word—without more particular reference to the elegant embellishments, the "amazing translations," "contempt to myself," "full impertinence," and "persons pretending to hold a place in the rank of artists"—written short, is, that the author of St. Peter had contented himself with a concordance and another paste pot and pair of scissors. Mr. Benedict has at length, in every sense, replied. Condensed, these are his facts. In 1858, he explained to Mr. Chorley a projected oratorio of St. Peter, the libretto of which the latter undertook for £50, half to be paid on the completion of the first part, and the second half on the completion of the work. The eminent scissors were diligent, for within twelve days the first instalment was paid. A few weeks more and the tremendous work was completed. It was a verbal agreement. "The words," said Mr. Chorley, "will belong to you; you may do with them as you like: set them to music, lay them aside, or destroy them." Mr. Benedict contemplated a production of the work at the Norwich Festival, 1860, but finding certain alterations in the libretto indispensable, as he conceived, to the "effective musical setting," he applied to Mr. Chorley to make them, and the refusal of Mr. Chorley to accede to the suggestions was the reason of the oratorio not being composed for Norwich. For seven years St. Peter was laid aside, till the winter of 1865, when the Norwich committee again applied to Mr. Benedict for a sacred composition. Again he applied to Mr. Chorley to make alterations. "Mr. Chorley promised to reconsider the work, and to make such alterations as, on reflection, he might deem improvements but, after attentive perusal, he came to the conclusion, that no change could be made for the better, and would only consent to a curtailment here and there to avoid undue length." In 1869, at the suggestion of Sir Michael Costa, Mr. Benedict offered the oratorio to Birmingham, and it was accepted with the results now known to the world. Between the acceptance and production, a peppery correspondence would seem to have passed between the compiler and the composer. On the 28th of February, 1870—note the great fact in this date!—the first-mentioned great genius wrote:—"This closes all correspondence and all personal acquaintance between yourself and its writer." The unhappy composer, nevertheless, is sanguine enough to hope that he may "survive the punishment." Ought we not to rewrite our musical history; or, at least, reverse the position of the heroes—substituting for the insignificant person who merely composes, the gifted creature who clips

THE OPERA AT FREE ROME.

(From a Correspondent.)

As already stated in these columns, the operatic season commenced at the Teatro Argentina with Donizetti's Don Sebastiano. It was strange to see the distinctive characteristics of the old and of the new state of things brought face to face on the occasion. The libretto still contained the "permesso" by which the Vicar General vouched for the moral harmlessness of the work; the Papal Censor, Sig. de Ricci, for its political harmlessness; and the Inspector of Public Exhibitions, for its æsthetical harmlessness. But a deputation, consisting of the Marchese Carcasa, the Principe di Teano; the Marchesi Bornio, Autaldi, Vitetteschi, and Sig. R. Bompiani, had already taken the direction of matters theatrical into their hands. No Monsignore had attended the grand rehearsal of the opera and the ballet to see that everything was proper and correct. The public seized on the slightest allusion that in any way afforded an opportunity for a political demonstration. After the overture, the King's March was demanded, and repeated several times in the midst of the greatest enthusiasm. The words, "Corriam á morir pel Re," in the first act, were received with thunders of applause, and encored. When Gen. Cadorna appeared in a side box, the applause was so loud as completely to overpower the music. The poor choristers, on the contrary, who represented the high court of justice in the fourth act, had an uncomfortable time of it, the bearing of the audience towards them being intended as a vote expressing want of confidence in the Monsignori, who, up to the present time, have constituted the highest court here. C. C.

J. A. RÖCKEL.

There died at Cöthen, on the 19th September, Joseph August Röckel, at the age of 87. His name is well known in connection with the introduction of the master-pieces of German opera into England. The fact of his being an intimate friend of Beethoven, and the Florestan especially selected by the latter for Fidelio, is matter of history, and will, probably, lend an interest to a short sketch of his life. Born on the 28th August, 1783, at Neuenburg, vor'on Wilde, in the Upper Palatinate, and originally intended for the Church, he enjoyed a classical education, which proved all the more serviceable to him, as, in his twentieth year, he exchanged theology for diplomacy, entering the service of the Elector of Bavaria as Secretary of the Legation. On the outbreak of the war in 1804, between Bavaria and Austria, and the dissolution, in consequence, of the embassy at Salzburg, young Röckel accepted a tempting offer from the lessee of the Imperial Theatre at Vienna (who had heard him sing at an amateur operatic performance), to become first tenor at the Imperial Operahouse. He achieved so great a success, that he decided on following up an operatic career. It was at the commeneement of the latter (in the summer of 1805) that his rendering and, so to speak, creation of the part of Florestan, in Fidelio, gained for him the friendship of Beethoven,—a friendship which endured up to the great composer's decease. In 1823, Franz I. appointed Röckel Professor of Singing at the Imperial Opera. It was in this capacity that Röckel proved how admirable his method was, by producing a number of distinguished pupils, among whom was Henrietta Sontag. In 1828 he accepted the management of the Opera at Aix-la-Chapelle. The year following he conceived, and carried out, the notion of introducing German opera into Paris, by means of a complete German operatic company. In consequence of the splendid success attending this bold scheme—the electrical impression produced by his chorus being especially remarkable—Röckel remained in Paris till 1832, when Monk Mason, manager of the King's Theatre, induced him to try the same experiment in London. We still recollect the enthusiasm excited by his first introduction of German opera into England, and the impression produced by the first performance of Fidelio, Der Freischütz, and other master-pieces of the German school, with a company including Madame Schröder-Devrient, as prima donna; Haltzinger, as first tenor; and Hummel (Röckel's brother-in-law), as conductor. In 1836, Röckel withdrew from the theatre, but continued to follow up his career of musical usefulness, the great aim of his life, in his adopted country, England. It was not till 1863 that he at length returned to his native land, to enjoy in peace the well-earned fruits of his active and eventful life.

MUSICAL PITCH.

It will be recollected that the Society of Arts set on foot, some little time since, inquiries in reference to the pitch in use in various countries on the Continent, and, through the courtesy of the Foreign-office, replies were obtained from the principal Continental cities. The letters received have been published from time to time in the Journal of the Society of Arts, and two others, lately received, are appended below. The following resumé of the correspondence has been made.

Questions.....	Is there any standard musical pitch officially prescribed, and in use; and, if so, what is it, and by what number of vibrations for "C" is it represented?	By what authority is it adopted, and how enforced?	Is it compulsory on any, and what class of musicians, and whether or not in military bands, conservatoires, operas, royal chapels, &c.? Name these, if any.	Remarks.
*BADEN (Grand Duchy).....	No; but Paris pitch commonly adopted.	None.	It is only obligatory when ordered by authority, and only exists in the Grand Duchy at the Court theatres at Carlsruhe and Mannheim, and in the military bands.	The introduction of the normal pitch necessitates purchasing new wind instruments, therefore private persons are glad to avoid the change of pitch.
BERLIN	No; the new Parisian orchestral pitch is only employed at a few theatres and orchestras.	It is not enforced.	It has only been introduced at Berlin in the Royal Opera-house, by command of the Intendent General of the Royal Theatres.	It is to be expected by degrees the Parisian pitch will become universal, as it offers special advantages to singers.
BOLOGNA	No musical pitch, officially prescribed, exists in Bologna.	No authority to regulate the pitch.	No.	The pitch adopted by the orchestra of the theatre, and of the Musical Lyceum, is represented by 887-77 vibrations for La.
BRUSSELS.....	No standard pitch, except for the military bands, and that the old pitch commonly in use, 902 vibrations.	None, except the Minister of War for military bands.	Not generally, only for the military bands.	A Royal Commission reports there would be no advantage in lowering their pitch, which is 902 vibrations, nevertheless the Theatre Royal has adopted the French normal pitch of 870 vibrations; the Conservatoire Royal de Musique and the Orchestra of Popular Classical Music still keep the old pitch of 902 vibrations.
*COLOGNE.....	No. The Concert Society (Conzertgesellschaft) of Cologne adopted the French normal pitch some years since.	None.	Only obligatory for the representations of the Concert Society.
COPENHAGEN	No.	None.	Not compulsory.	The pitch of the Opera (Theatre Royal) is taken from two old forks nearly agreeing with the normal French pitch. The A of the military bands is at least a quarter of a tone higher than that of the theatre. The School of Music has the pitch of the Royal Theatre.
*DRESDEN	No officially prescribed musical pitch.	None; but the French pitch is adopted in some chapels and orchestras, comprising about one-sixth of all the chapels and orchestras.		The pitch in the Royal Chapel at Dresden, for A is represented by 892 vibrations. In the Roman Catholic Court Church of Dresden the old so-called chorus-tone still exists, representing, for A, 855 vibrations.
FLORENCE	There is none.	None.	The musical pitch adopted in Florence is generally that of Vienna.	The pitch is left entirely to the taste of every orchestra director.
*LEIPSIC	None. The pitch in common use is high, 920 to 940 vibrations for A.	None. The authority for its use is merely custom.	The pitch compulsory for military bands at Leipsic is the same as at Dresden.	It has not been considered necessary to alter the pitch, as the alteration would involve a renewal of brass instruments.
MILAN	At Milan there is a pitch officially adopted in the Royal Conservatoire of Music, in the theatres of La Scala and Canobbiana, in the schools of music and theatres connected with them, and in the National Guard. This pitch is the Paris pitch, namely for La, 870 vibrations.	The authorities which regulate this pitch are the Academical Council for the Royal Conservatoire, and the Committee of the Town Council for the theatres, the schools connected with them, and their musical bands.	The pitch of 870 vibrations for the note La is compulsory on the before-named musical bodies, but without government interference.

Quarrtows	Is there any standard musical pitch officially prescribed, and in use; and, if so, what is it, and by what number of vibrations for "C" is it represented?	By what authority is it adopted, and how enforced?	Is it compulsory on any, and what class of musicians, and whether or not in military bands, conservatorios, operas, royal chapels, &c.? Name these, if any.	Remarks.
MOSCOW	No answer received.
*MUNICH	The officially prescribed pitch for music and musical instruments is the French pitch.	It is prescribed by authority of the Royal Musical Intendance (Koniglich Hofmusik Intendanz), and its general use has been thereby secured; only such tuning-forks are allowed to be used in Bavaria as have been approved and stamped by the above-named Intendance.	The directors of all establishments for instruction and education in Bavaria are made specially responsible for the exact observance of this regulation.	The use of the standard pitch is, therefore, obligatory on all classes of professional musicians, and as no objection has hitherto been raised against the regulation in question, it may be assumed that the French pitch, which is especially calculated to prevent the overtaxing of the human voice, is at the present time in universal use in Bavaria.
NAPLES	None.	None.	None.	The pitch usually adopted is that of Vienna.
ST. PETERSBURG.	The same as the French pitch.	It is established by ukase.	It is compulsory for the Imperial Chapel, the Imperial theatres, for the orchestras of regiments, and, in general, at all musical establishments. It is equally compulsory for manufacturers of musical instruments.
STOCKHOLM	No answers received.			The Academy have taken the subject into their consideration, and propose to petition the King to adopt the French pitch.
*STUTTGART	None; but the French pitch may be regarded as the customary pitch in Wurtemberg.	None.	The French pitch is used in the Conservatorium and Stifts Church, the organ of which has been tuned thereto. Private theatres and concerts, as well as the town and church orchestras in Wurtemberg still continue the old high pitch, either on account of the expense or difficulty of re-tuning the church organs.	The French pitch is not introduced for military music, as there is no vocal music, and it would not be worth the cost of providing new instruments.
TURIN	None.	None.	None.
VENICE	No fixed musical pitch. Our orchestras adopt the musical pitch of Vienna, because the greater part of their wind instruments are made in that city.	As no officially prescribed musical pitch exists, no authority regulates it, and as our orchestras have no fixed pitch, it varies according to the taste of the directors; it ought, however, to be stated these artists try to keep the pitch as low as possible.	The non-existence of a fixed musical pitch answers this question. However, it may be observed that the organ of the metropolitan chapel of St. Marco was formally tuned on the basis of the old La, very low. A few years ago it was directed to be raised, because the bowed instruments lost their fulness of tone, and the wind instruments manufactured in Vienna were not in tune with it; now, this organ is tuned a quarter of a note lower, but still it is higher than the normal French pitch. The other organs are tuned according to the fancy of the builders. Modern builders generally adopt the Vienna pitch in preference to that of Paris. There is no authority which regulates the pitch in bands of the army and the National Guards.

VIENNA	No; but the French standard pitch has been introduced in both the Imperial theatres, in the Court band, and in the more important concert societies in Vienna.	None. The Lord High Chamberlain's Office introduced the pitch of the Imperial theatres, and the Grand Master of the Ceremonies' Office that for the Court music. The French standard pitch was introduced in these two establishments in 1862. The Society of Friends of Music in the Austrian Empire followed this example, on their own account, for their "conservatorium," as also did the Society of Philharmonic Concerts.	The French standard pitch is only obligatory for the two Imperial theatres and the Imperial band of music. The remaining theatres in Vienna, and all the theatres in the provinces are not Court or State establishments. Neither is the "conservatorium" of the Society of Friends of Music. Therefore a measure of this sort, connected as it is with pecuniary sacrifices, could not be dictated to these. The adoption of the French standard pitch is becoming every year more general. The French standard pitch has not yet been introduced into the Austrian military bands.

Further Correspondence.

SWEDEN.

The following has been furnished by the Royal Musical Academy of Stockholm:—

(Translation.)

"As far back as May 20th, 1856, the following circular was sent from Paris to various countries:—

"'It is known that all lyric theatres, musical conservatoires, and musical societies have a different musical pitch, often varying even in the same orchestra. Thus the tuning-fork of the Paris opera is said to be, in a scientific publication, half a tone higher than it was in 1823. Owing to this, the works of the older composers lose their character, which fate will soon be shared by more recent ones. Singers also, in changing stage and pitch, are placed in an awkward position, and injure their voices by this tendency to raise the musical pitch. This uncertainty is equally disadvantageous to manufacturers of musical instruments.

"'It is, therefore, highly desirable that a general tuning-fork, with a fixed number of vibrations, be adopted, to serve as a universal rule for the musical pitch in every country.'

"Two years later, a committee was formed in Paris, consisting of eleven persons, amongst whom was Berlioz, Halevy, Meyerbeer, Rossini, &c. The following was stated at some of the meetings of the committee:—That Tavart and Cagniard, as well as Latour, have agreed that a tuning-fork giving the note A makes 440 single or 880 double vibrations in a second.

"'If we go back to the 18th century, during the latter years of the reign of Louis XIV., the rule for A in the orchestra was 810 double vibrators per second (fixed from the year 1699 to 1755). Now the A is 894 vibrations at the Opera in Paris. Thus we see that, from the year 1715 to 1853, an increase of nearly a whole tone has taken place.

"'This increase, although progressive, has to a large extent taken place in the present century, and more rapidly during the last twenty years.

"'The trial by Scheibler, in 1834, showed the musical pitch at the Opera in Paris to be 867, and at the Conservatoire 870 double vibrations per second. According to Dr Lissajou's communication, the musical pitch at Berlin in 1857, was 896; that of San Carlo, at Naples, 889; and that of La Scala, at Milan 903; that of the Stockholm Opera being 880 double vibrations per second.

"'The committee came to the following conclusions:—A so-called normal tuning fork was prepared, which tuned in A, should make 870 vibrations in a second, at a temperature of + 15° centigrade.

"The Parisian authorities agreed to this proposal on Feb. 9th, 1859. The normal tuning-fork which is to act as a guide both in Paris and in the departments, is kept at the Conservatoire Imperiale in Paris.

"By the care of Mr. L. Palmstedt, the Musical Academy has received from one of its members, Dr. Lissajous, a handsome copy of the tuning-fork mentioned above. Now that the Academy has received instruments from the celebrated manufactory of Godefroy, in Paris, the orchestra of the 'Kouvertoriet' is tuned to the normal tuning-fork.

"As soon as the Academy has had time to find out whether wind instruments made according to elder construction can be altered to reach the same musical pitch as the normal tuning-fork, as well as the cost of such alteration, taking for granted that the expense will be less than the purchase of new ones, the Academy will probably send a petition to his Majesty, humbly requesting the adoption of the normal tuning-fork over the whole country."

Secretary of the Royal Musical Academy.

ST. PETERSBURG.

(Translation.)

SIR,—By a letter of the 12th February, 1869, your Excellency sought the assistance of the Minister of Foreign Affairs in obtaining information, requested by the Society of Arts of London, in reference to the musical pitch in use in Russia.

The Imperial Government applied to the competent authorities, and I have the honour to inform your Excellency that, in accordance with the terms of a decree sanctioned by his Majesty the Emperor, dated 5th April, 1862, contained in a ukase of the 30th of May of the same year, the French normal pitch has been established throughout the empire of Russia. This pitch is obligatory in the Imperial Chapel, the Imperial theatres, regimental bands, and in every establishment, whether under the crown or of a private character, where there are orchestras or choirs, and in which music and singing are taught. It is also obligatory on all makers of instruments.

I have the honour to transmit a tuning-fork in use in Russia, which has been furnished by the Director of the Imperial Theatres.—Accept, &c., (Signed) WESTMANN.

His Excellency Sir Andrew Buchanan.

NILSSON.

ANOTHER AMERICAN CRITICISM.

We have heard Miss Nilsson but once, so far, and will briefly state our own impressions of her singing. She is a great singer, although in many particulars we have heard those who are superior to her, some in one way and some in another. But she combines enough of superior qualities to make her one of the greatest and most popular of vocalists. She has a voice, a soul, good taste, and good judgment, which are great possessions. Her voice is beautiful, pure and lovely. Such purity is seldom heard. To all this she adds a high degree of cultivation and native refinement. She sings with expression, yet it is an expression that excites admiration rather than serious feeling. She does not sing to the heart so much as some others do. She is prepossessing, graceful, and winning, and these help to show off her other qualities to good advantage. Even in the concert-room she shows the actress—perhaps a little too much. She has brilliancy, but less than Carlotta Patti and some others. She has force and intensity, but less than Grisi, Sontag, and others. She sings from both heart and head and to both. We infer that she is a woman of large mind and originality of conception, and presume that her greatest powers are displayed only on the operatic stage; and we hope Mr. Strakosch will, before long, give us the opportunity to hear and see her there. Upon the whole, Miss Nilsson has many elements of greatness, and it is seldom we are permitted to enjoy the singing of an artist who is so thoroughly satisfying. We have sat in cool judgment, and written dispassionately of the merits of the new artist, leaving it for the sensational reporters to indulge more profusely in rhetoric and panegyric.—New York Musical Review.

OPENING OF A NEW ORGAN AT BRACEWELL HALL.

(From a Correspondent.)

Before giving your readers an account of this proceeding, a word about Bracewell Hall (Yorkshire), which has been in the course of erection during the past three years, may be interesting.

It is a plain, but noble looking, structure, consisting, on the ground floor, of drawing room, dining room, note-room, and the large music room (in which the organ is placed), being 62 feet long, 25 feet wide, and 30 feet high. Nothing can be finer than the view of the organ, as you approach it from the dining room, rising, as it does, to the very roof, and occupying the whole breadth of the western end. The pipes in the front towers of the noble looking case, of Gothic style, are made of pure tin, having the appearance of burnished silver. The room has three large and lofty windows to the south, the centre one being a bay window. In the middle on the north side is the fire-place, surrounded with an oak cornice, most elaborately carved, with a scene thereon from Shakspere, of Falstaff and Henry V., and over it is a stained window, representing Shakspere as reading one of his plays to Queen Elizabeth.

We had heard much of this organ, which has excited no little curiosity in the musical world, having cost upwards of £3,000, and our expectations were in consequence raised to the highest pitch. But when we heard its different parts displayed in succession, on Saturday evening, and some of the best music played thereon by Dr. Spark, of Leeds, in his most effective and brilliant style, our expectations were more than realised. Nothing could exceed the richness and variety of its tones, their sweetness and power.

The company, consisting of a select party of the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Hopwood, listened with admiration and delight to this skilful exhibition of its capabilities. Nor did the interest in it flag in the least. Dr. Spark kept it up on Sunday evening by playing some choice pieces of sacred music, and on Monday evening by an equally choice selection of classical organ music. The combination of sacred and classical music, when played with taste and skill on an instrument of such compass and excellence, produced an effect which has rarely been experienced, and could not easily be surpassed.

The mechanism and general construction of the instrument (built expressly for John Turner Hopwood, Esq., by Cavaillé-Coll, of Paris) are altogether of the most unique description, all the material employed being of the very best kind, whilst the artistic finish of every part, each point of detail, etc., cannot be excelled, if equalled. No doubt a visit to this extraordinary chamber organ will be a source of attraction to all who take any interest in the matter. Assuredly there is not a finer specimen of organ building to be found, at present, in England.

We subjoin, for the information of your readers, a description of the organ. The instrument has three claviers, or manuals, and a complete pedal organ and 17 pedales de combinaisons.

COLOGNE.—Herr Ferdinand Hiller has composed a new violoncello concerto, which was to be played by Herr Grützmacher at the Gewandhaus Concert, Leipzig, on the 10th instant.

MUSIC IN LEEDS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. Archibald Ramsden of this town has undertaken to continue Mr. Hallé's orchestral concerts, which the former promoters have relinquished on account of their unremunerative result. The first concert of the season came off on the 2nd inst., the band playing Beethoven's Symphony (No. 1), in C major, and the overtures to Guillaume Tell, Mireille, and Sirène, besides the ballets and ballet to Rosamunde by Schubert. The large room in the Leeds Town Hall is perhaps one of the handsomest in the kingdom, but by far too lofty for musical purposes. However beautifully the orchestra may play, the effect is entirely spoiled, by vibrations and echoes which the vast arched ceiling. Besides, the deep booming of the big bell in the tower over head, in a key generally at variance with that of the orchestra, creates some merriment amongst the public and more agony amongst musical folks.

Mr. Sims Reeves was to be the vocalist, but in his absence through illness Miss Katherine Poyntz helped Mr. Ramsden out of his difficulty, and met with a very flattering reception. We were very much pleased to notice a vast improvement in this young lady's singing since last winter. Her voice is becoming more full and round, and rang through the great hall with such power and freshness that it was quite a pleasure to hear it. Her intonation is nearly faultless. By saying nearly we mean that Miss P. must not omit to continue to study this part of her art.

Mr. Carrodus's high gave us variations on Beethoven's Last Waltz * for the flute, which he performed so well that the applause continued for ten minutes, preventing the concert from being proceeded with, till Mr. Hallé addressed the audience, requesting them not to insist on an encore, the artist being too tired to accede to it. Though last not least, we have to name Mr. Hallé's beautiful playing of Mendelssohn's Serenade and Rondo piciozo, with orchestra, and of Schubert's Impromptu in F minor. We hope the spirited entrepreneur of these concerts, of which we are to have three more during the winter, will be encouraged by good houses and by a pecuniary success.

GAIETY THEATRE.

The very successful run of the present entertainment at this house is largely due to the masterfully increased attractions of Zampa. Mr. Santley was as much the Mr. Santley of world-wide repute on the first night of performance as now; and so far, no difference is observable; but in all other respects, a second hearing has shown nothing but improvement. The orchestra for example, does its work with far greater precision, and if we mistake not, has been made more complete. It is to be hoped that the management will go even further in this direction, and equip with all needful means and appliances so important an auxiliary. Little fault can now be found with the chorus, which does its work smoothly and efficiently; while the principal artists, at home with the characters they have to sustain, give small occasion for adverse criticism. Joining these facts to those of Zampa's romantic story and Herold's pleasant music there is no reason for surprise at the crowds which nightly fill the prettiest theatre in London. We attach no common importance to the success of Mr. Hollingshead's essay at opera in English. It proves this much beyond a doubt—that well-chosen works, adequately performed, are sure of a public recognition; and that a manager with spirit and sound judgment may reckon upon a steady support. Mr. Hollingshead will, if he be wise, go on as he has begun; and having nothing to do with English ballad operas and the like (played out, long ago), will present works at least as good as Zampa, of which, in the repertory of opéra comique, there is no lack. Why not, for example, Ivy Auber under contribution and run—for a "run" would be inevitable—Lestocq or Le Cheval de Bronze?

LINZ.—A youth named Felix Modl, student at the Gymnasium, or High School, has written and scored a mass, which was lately performed at the parish church. It excited general admiration.

STUTTGARDT.—Herr Juline Stockhausen no longer belongs to the Royal Opera. He applied for four months' leave of absence to fulfil an engagement in London, but it was refused. He then sent in his resignation, which was accepted.

KÖNIGSBERG.—The grand vocal and instrumental concert given by the Verein der Liederfreunde, for the benefit of wounded German soldiers, was not very numerously attended. Alluding to this fact, a German contemporary observes, that "the weather was certainly unfavourable, and it is well known that the patriotism of certain people does not extend so far as to make them brave a few drops of rain; they leave that to the gallant fellows who get wounded for their sake." Among the full choruses sung and vehemently applauded were "Heil dir, Germania," by Hermes; Weber's well-known battle songs: "Ad Arma vocal Patria," by Gervais; "Bücher ain Rhein," by Reisiger; and "Das Deutsche Schwert," by Schubert.

* Which happens to be Schubert's, just as Weber's "Last Waltz" happens to be Reisiger's.—A.S.S.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS,

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1870-71.

DIRECTOR—MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

THE Director begs to announce that the Thirteenth Season of the Monday Popular Concerts will commence on Monday Evening, November 14, and that the Performances will take place as follows, viz.:—

1870. MONDAY, November 14; MONDAY, November 21; MONDAY, November 28; MONDAY, December 5; MONDAY, December 12; MONDAY, December 19.

1871. MONDAY, January 9; MONDAY, January 16; MONDAY, January 23; MONDAY, January 30; MONDAY, February 6; MONDAY, February 13; MONDAY, February 20; MONDAY, February 27; MONDAY, March 6; MONDAY, March 13.

Morning Performances will be given (Seven) on Saturdays, January 28, February 4, 11, 18, 25, March 4 and 11 (1871).

THE BEETHOVEN CONCERTS.

THE present year being the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, the Director has thought that it would be a fitting tribute of respect to the memory of that immortal genius to confine the programmes before Christmas exclusively to Selections from his Instrumental and Vocal Works. Every concert, until the end of the year, will therefore be a Beethoven Concert. In the course of the series, the SIX Quartets, Op. 18; the Three Quartets (Razoumovsky), Op. 59; the Quartet, No. 10 (E flat); the Five Trios for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; and as many of the Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violin, Pianoforte and Violoncello, and Pianoforte alone, as can be comprised within the limits of eight programmes, will be given. The Vocal Music will in all instances be selected from the Chamber Songs, with Pianoforte Accompaniment.

PROGRAMME OF FIRST CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 14TH, 1870.

To Commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

PART I.

SONG, "Know'st thou the land"—Mdlle. CLARA DOSIA ..... Beethoven.

QUARTET, in G major, Op. 18, No. 2, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello—Madame NORMAN-NERUDA, MM. L. RIES, ZERBINI, and PIATTI ..... Beethoven.

Conductor ..... Mr. BENEDICT.

Bob Stalls, 3s.; Balcony, 3s.; Admission, 1s. Tickets to be obtained of Mr. Austin, 28, Piccadilly; Messrs. Mitchell & Ollivier, Old Bond Street; Lambern Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; Keith, Prowse, & Co., 48, Cheapside; Hays, Royal Exchange Buildings; and of Chappell & Co., 50, New Bond Street.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NEMO.—Yes;—a great German is very great; but a small German is very small. And this emphatically applies to German musicians.

DR. BOLE.—The verses are by Mr. Shirley Brooks—a lyric poet, if there ever was one.

DILETTANTE.—Mdlle. Angri sang first at the Royal Italian Opera (Arsace)—then at Her Majesty's Theatre.

BARDOLX.—Yes;—a halfpenny serial, called Chatterbox, was published in 1866 in Paternoster Row (W. Mackintosh).

POSTIPEX FOUDACHES.—The word "per stige" has long been adopted in the English language;—not so the word "furore" (for which we are most grateful). Of course, they are "copyright."

YANKEE DILETTANTE.—We have the article in our possession, and extract, for the information of our correspondent, that part of it which concerns his inquiry:—

"The 17th Saengerfest was held in Cincinnati during the month of June. Although these Saengerfestivals are purely German in their origin; although the music is executed by Germans, and that which is performed is German music; although the German beverage abounded to the exclusion of the stronger and viler drinks of whisky and brandy; although the hall was built in the German quarter of Cincinnati, called "Over the Rhine," being separated from the more American portion of the city by a canal, the festival had, nevertheless, somewhat of a national character. The interest manifested by the native born citizens of Cincinnati in the success of the festival was astonishing, and very gratifying to the Germans. The influence of such festivals upon the social and musical condition of a city or country is greater than appears at first glance. There was a time when jealousies existed between the native born and the adopted citizens of this country. These feelings have, however, died away. The war has brought both classes closer together, and if there yet exists a doubt in the minds of some that the foreigner can or will not love this, his adopted country, we would simply point to the many battle fields, where the German and American are covered with the same sod. Of all foreigners, the German seems to have obtained the purest, and hence the most lasting influence upon the affairs of this country. America and Germany have closed ranks and clasped hands to stand together and support each other, not only in the love for free government, but also for the cultivation of the arts, and among them the oft-neglected art of providing proper amusement. We cannot sanction all the modes of enjoyment as cultivated by the Germans; neither do we believe that Americans have sufficient pleasures. The one dreams and plays perhaps too much: and surely the other does too little of it. Hence, we rejoice to see Germans joined by Americans, since both, as we hope, will be benefited."

AMATEUR PIANIST.—The testimonial of the late Mr. Moscheles, addressed to Mr. Heilbron, in reference to the talent of his daughter, Sophie, then a child, was as follows:—

"MR. HEILBRON,—SIR,—After hearing your little girl, I have no hesitation in saying that she has so much talent as to warrant a belief that she will become an excellent player, provided you can let her have excellent tuition for the next few years.—Obediently yours, J. MOSCHELES."

It was dated, "London, July 27th, 1866."

FANATICO is wholly wrong. The performance took place at the Royal Italian Opera, on May 27th, 1867, and the article was as follows:—

"Last night Mdlle. Adelina Patti, having recovered from her indisposition, reappeared in her favourite part of Rosina, and was welcomed with the genuine heartiness that never fails to greet her. 'Una Voce' and the duet with Figaro in Act 1, the bolero of Verdi in the Lesson scene, and the English ballad of 'Home, sweet home,' which Mdlle. Patti is now accustomed to introduce when (which is invariably the case) called upon for another song, were received with the accustomed enthusiasm. Signor Mario was Almaviva; Signor Cotogni, Figaro; Signor Ciampi, Bartolo; and Signor Tagliafico, Basilio. M. Sainton presided in the orchestra."

So that "Fanatico" has lost his bet. We are glad of it. If he can't appreciate Adelina Patti he can't appreciate genius.

MARRIAGE.

On October 31st, at St. Marylebone Church, NORA, eldest daughter of the late DESMOND RYAN, Esq., to SIGNOR PIUTTI, of Langham Street, Regent Street.

ERRATUM.—In last week's No., speaking of the Italian opera performances in Birmingham, and Mdlle. di Murska—for "historically and socially," read "histrionically and vocally."

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1870.

WE have been honoured with the following singular communication:—

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—In reply to your editorial observations on the life of Balfe from the Liverpool Porcupine, where you place W. Sterndale Bennett equal, or above Balfe—please take the trouble to read:—

"Musikalische Zeitung; editor, Friedrich Chrysander—No. 17, Leipsic; 28 April, 1869; page 135. London: (Costa praesidi)."

You will find W. Sterndale Bennett pointed out, not only as a weak composer, but also as a weak conductor; and my opinion is, that Bennett is not worthy to undo the shoe-strings of Balfe. This is everybody's opinion in France, and you would do right to give publicity to it in your valuable paper.—I remain, Sir, yours truly,

A. PASDELOUP.

8, Thurlow Square, Brompton,
9*th Nov*, 1870.

We insert the above without hesitation. If this M. Pasdeloup be the M. Pasdeloup of the Cirque Napoléon, we are not astonished at the nonsense to which he has given utterance. As to Herr Chrysander, he presents only one more instance of the astounding ignorance of the majority of foreigners, Germans included, about musical matters in England. We thought that to surpass the ignorance of M. Fétis was impossible; but Herr Chryeander beats the laborious Belgian smatterer into fits. We shall be compelled at last to fall back upon M. Infelix Clement!—As for "everybody's opinion in France" upon English music, the worth of that may be best estimated by those who know that in France Hérold is placed above Auber, and Halévy close to Meyerbeer. Further than this, we make bold to say that the music of Sterndale Bennett (more shame to French amateurs!) is utterly unknown in France. We quite agree with M. Pasdeloup that "Bennett is not worthy to undo the shoe strings of Balfe;" but that he is worthy some better office may be gathered from a testimonial given to our illustrious musician by no less a man than Mendelssohn, more than a quarter of a century since, when Bennett was candidate for the Edinburgh University Musical Chair. Let M. Pasdeloup read this testimonial, and then go and join his brother Parisians in the Garde Mobile; for, to judge him by his letter, he would be likely to handle the chassepot more discreetly than he handles the stylum of a musical Aristarchus. Here is Mendelssohn's opinion of Bennett:—

"Berlin, December 17, 1843.

"My Dear Friend,—I hear that you have proclaimed yourself a candidate for the musical professorship at Edinburgh, and that a testimonial which I might send you could possibly be of use to you with the authorities at the University. Now, while I think of writing such a testimonial for you, I feel proud and ashamed at the same time—proud, because I think of all the honour you have done to your art, your country, and yourself, and because it is on such a brother artist that I am to give an opinion; and ashamed, because I have always followed your career, your compositions, your successes, with so true an interest, that I feel as if it was my own cause, and as if I was myself the candidate for such a place. But there is one point of view from which I might still be excused to give an opinion; while all good and true musicians are unanimous about the subject, perhaps the Council of the University might like to know what we German people think of you, how we consider you; and, then, I may tell them, that if the prejudice which formerly prevailed in this country against the musical talent of your country has now subsided, it is chiefly owing to your compositions—to your personal residence in Germany. Your overtures, your concertos, your vocal and instrumental compositions are reckoned, by our best and severest authorities, among the first standard works of the present musical period. The public feel never tired in listening, while the musicians feel never tired of performing your compositions; and since they took root in the minds of true amateurs my countrymen became aware that music is the same in England as in Germany and everywhere; and so, by your successes here, you destroyed that prejudice which hardly could ever have destroyed but a true genius. This is a service you have done to English as well as German musicians, and I am sure that your countrymen will not acknowledge it less readily than mine have done. Shall I still add that the science in your works is as great as the thoughts are elegant and tasteful; that we consider your performance on the pianoforte as masterly as your conducting of an orchestra; and that all this is the general judgment of the musicians here, as well as my own personal, sincere opinion. Let me only add that I wish you success from my whole heart, and that I shall be truly happy to hear that you have met with it. Always yours sincerely and truly,

"Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

"To W. Sterndale Bennett, Esq."

We are aware that Richard Wagner, not Mendelssohn, is the Apollo after M. Pasdeloup's own heart; but in England there are not a few who think Wagner (to copy the phraseology of M. Pasdeloup) unworthy "to untie the shoe-strings of" Mendelssohn; and we rejoice to be among the number.

And yet, no:—on second thoughts, the whole thing is a joke. Either somebody has been mystifying M. Pasdeloup, or somebody has been forging M. Pasdeloup's signature. We very much doubt whether M. Pasdeloup ever heard a single note of Bennett's music. Certainly he has never introduced a note of it at his popular concerts in the Cirque; and, talking of "weak conductors," by the way, this is, perhaps, a good thing for Bennett and his music.

"Everybody's opinion in France" is delicious!—seeing that, as nobody in France knows anything about Bennett's music, there are no conceivable grounds upon which to build a French opinion. M Pasdeloup (if we are really dealing with the veritable M. Pasdeloup) had better get at once into a balloon, and, should chance favour his passage, help M. Gambetta to govern France, through the powerful agency of "hoax."

By the bye, may we politely ask M. Pasdeloup if he wears shoe-strings? We remember well, that poor, dear old Balfe (for whose memory we entertain as profound a respect as can possibly M. Pasdeloup) never did; and we are equally confident that W. S. Bennett doesn't. But, to conclude—after all this pother; what does it signify? The Liverpool Porcupine speaks of Balfe, as "the only British musician who has achieved a European reputation;" to which the Editor of the Musical World, in a footnote, rejoins—"Nonsense! What of Sterndale Bennett?" No comparisons are made; and, indeed, under the circumstances, comparisons would be absurd. The two men moved in different spheres. Which of the two moved in the higher sphere is simply a matter of opinion.

ANOTHER GERMAN INVASION.

A CORRESPONDENT has been good enough to send us an advertisement, cut from the Glasgow Herald, having reference to certain projected concerts of the "Scottish Orchestral Society." This society, let us premise, has a very aristocratic air about it, being patronized by dukes, earls, lords, and ladies, to an extent which does one good to see. Its concerts, moreover, are on a large scale; an orchestra of fifty-two performers, and eminent solo vocalists and instrumentalists being engaged to produce the greatest works of the greatest masters. So far every music-lover has reason to rejoice in the existence of the "Scottish Orchestral Society," and to wish it length of days, with much prosperity. But one feature in connection with its doings is by no means so satisfactory. The letter of our correspondent states that for several years past orchestral concerts have been given by the Glasgow Abstainers' Union, at which about fifty native artists have had engagements peculiarly acceptable during the winter months. The scheme of the "Scottish Orchestral Society" is in opposition to these concerts; and, appalled by the formidable organization of their rivals, the "Abstainers," have abandoned the field. So far, well and good. If the "Scottish Orchestral Society" imagines it can do the work of concert-giving better than the Abstainers' Union, by all means let the trial be made. But—and here is the grievance—the society has gone to Germany for its orchestra, and brought over a little army of Tentonic fiddlers and trumpeters, who may be depended upon, henceforth, to make Glasgow their own. The result is that the fifty native artists, including such eminent performers as Messrs. Carrodus, Ratcliffe, and Howell, junr., are ousted from a legitimate position and sent adrift to do as they can, while the triumphant foreigner takes possession. Under certain circumstances we can easily imagine there would be no harm even in this. If, for example, the English players were bad and the Germans good, the former could not reasonably grumble. But where, as in this case, native talent is, to say the least, equal to that imported from abroad, preference for the latter is a very shabby and unpatriotic act. The Society's apologists may, perhaps, urge that the Germans being content with less remuneration, are a cheap lot. This is very likely to be true; but cheapness is not the highest good. A higher is secured, for instance, when the cultivation and enjoyment of art are associated with the encouragement of native ability, and the opening to it a prospect of adequate remuneration. The "Scottish Orchestral Society," looking with national thrift, to every "sixpence," prefers to get its enjoyment on the lowest possible terms, and if that which is cheap turn out to be also that which is nasty, we shall not grieve.

Thaddeus Egg.

Laibach.—Here as elsewhere, the centenary of Beethoven's birth will be celebrated by a festival. A committee has been already formed of members of the Philharmonic Society to adopt and carry out the necessary arrangements. The festival is to last two days.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE world little knows, and perhaps does not sufficiently care, how many concerts are given in and about London on one single morning during the dog-days. Why the period supposed to be peculiarly favourable to the development of canine madness should also be the season par excellence of melomania, and whether any occult relations exist between hydrophobia and the passionate cultivation of the science of sweet sounds we will not inquire. But the fact is certain that the hottest day is nearly always one of the greatest concert-giving days of the year.

"IT is curious to reflect"—writes a correspondent—"how many works are now thought good enough for the Philharmonic which when they were first brought out were looked upon by the members of this association of musical conservatives as the productions either of clever heretics or of trivial fools. Rossini was regarded with horror, Meyerbeer with indignation, Auber (if they were consistent at all) with pity, Verdi with disgust. Yet each of these unfortunate composers has of late years been occasionally represented at the Philharmonic concerts. Times change, and the Philharmonic directors change with them. They have been going ahead, however, a little too fast, and it is a pleasure to have to warn them for once of their perilous impetuosity."

Under the heading of "Condition of Affairs at the Grand Opera," we read the following, in a New York paper :—

"The secession of MAX MARETZEK left the Operahouse without a musical director. Carlo Patti, who was engaged as first violinist and chorus master, is now conductor of the orchestra. Immediately after the fiasco with Maretzek, M. Adolph Birgfeld was telegraphed for, and arrived a day or two later from Washington. On arriving at the Grand Operahouse he desired, as a preliminary to all business conferences, that he should be paid half a week's salary which was due him from a former season. This being arranged, M. Birgfeld declined to have anything to do with opera-bouffe.

Nothing could possibly be better.

WE must again direct attention, and that in the most conspicuous way, to the manner of observing the centenary of Beethoven's birth at the Crystal Palace. In all probability not a few of the great master's worshippers looked for, and would have been more pleased by, a pompous festival, like that which, next year, will do honour to Handel. We have no desire to underrate the importance and value of such a ceremony, nevertheless, we cherish a strong conviction that the Sydenham managers have chosen a better, because more useful, course. The concerts now being given every Saturday afford an almost complete exposition of Beethoven's genius as a writer of orchestral music. Their plan may not be without flaw, and we have already indicated the desirableness of performing the master's concertos according to the method under which his symphonies are given. But such imperfections, apart—they are but as spots on the sun—there can be no doubt of the unique interest and value belonging to a series of concerts, which brings the sublime orchestral productions of Beethoven into one group, enabling us to see them, as it were at a glance, and to estimate their comparative worth, not less than to admire, as it should be admired, the colossal genius of the greatest among musicians.

THE destruction of the Theatre Royal at Dresden by fire gave rise, as our readers may remember, to two actions against the Magdeburg Fire Insurance Company. One was brought by the authorities of the Exchequer, who gained the day. The other was brought by the dignitaries known collectively as the Royal House Ministry, who had insured the scenery, furniture, etc., for thirty thousand thalers. Judgment has been delivered at Leipsic against the Ministry, who are, moreover, condemned to pay the costs. The decision was based upon Act 79 of the Laws of 1661. The judge certainly went far enough back for his authorities. We should not wonder if the Ministry thought he went a little too far."

CASSEL.—Herr Mannsfeldt, who will give a series of concerts this winter, with his band, in the Orangerieschloss, has concluded a three years' engagement to give concerts in St. Petersburgh. The engagement commences on the 16th of April, 1871.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette" Nov. 5.)

The director of the Monday Popular Concerts has issued his prospectus for the season 1870-1. Its contents are full of interest for musical amateurs. Remembering that the birth of Beethoven took place a century ago, Mr. Arthur Chappell has shaped his programmes in accordance with that fact; and, in the wish to pay due honour to the great composer, goes even beyond Mr. Manns and his spiritual adviser, "G." at the Crystal Palace. No Music but Beethoven's is to be introduced at any of the concerts before Christmas. Not only the instrumental but the vocal selections will be derived exclusively from that source. Happily. Beethoven's genius was inexhaustible; and what distinguishes him from all his predecessors, contemporaries, and followers is that no two of his works resemble each other in anything but in the excellence which more or less pervades them all. Less popular as emphatically to the "chamber" pieces—the quartets, trios, sonatas &c.—as to the wonderful symphonies for orchestra.

That very much may be compressed within the limits of eight programmes, on the scale of those to which the public is accustomed at St. James's Hall, need hardly be said. Out of the seventeen string quartets, for instance, Mr. Chappell is enabled to promise the first ten; while to these he adds the two string quintets, the five pianoforte trios, and a goodly number of pianoforte sonatas, both solo and accompanied. The later quartets, including the (erroneously) so-called "Posthumous," are wisely kept apart for Herr Joachim, who comes after Christmas, and whose conception of those very extraordinary productions is as profound as his mastery of the technical difficulties they present is unparalleled.

Among the artists announced to perform at the first eight concerts is the accomplished lady-violinist, Mdme. Norman Neruda, who, in leading the earlier quartets of Beethoven a year since, showed no less proficiency than she had previously exhibited in the comparatively easier task of leading the quartets of Haydn and Mozart. When Mdme. Neruda does not play, Herr Ludwig Straus resigns the viola, of which he is so practised a master, to Signor Zerbini (who is by no means to be despised), Herr Straus himself taking the violin from the hands of the fair Scandinavian. So that the quartets will still be well cared for. Even more welcome is the announcement that Signor Piatti—facile princeps—is to hold the post of violoncellist at every concert, from now till April, 1871. The pianists before Christmas are Mr. Hallé, Herr Ernst Pauer, and Mdme. Arabella Goddard—each and all thoroughly well seasoned in the music of Beethoven. Herr Stockhausen, Mr. Sims Reeves, and (every one hopes) Miss Edith Wynne, are to be the singers.

The exclusively Beethoven programmes only count for the present year, 1870; and doubtless the 17th of December, the sublime tone poet's natal day, will bring with it special attractions. After Christmas—although, of course, Beethoven is to have his due share (which means that of the traditionary "lion")—Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Dussek, Mendelssohn, Weber, and others are to have their portion as of old. All we can suggest to Mr. Chappell, with a view to further enhancing the interest of his very interesting programmes, is a more diligent search into those rich stores of music, ancient and modern, by judicious selections from which the vocal department of his concerts might be made in some degree to rival the instrumental.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Beethoven contributions to this day's concert are the Pastoral Symphony, and the pianoforte concerto No. 2 (in B flat), to be played by Mr. Franklin Taylor. The overtures are Die Zauberflote and Meeresstille, each in its way a masterpiece. The singers are Mdlle. Pauline Canari (from the Paris Italian Opera—poor thing!), and Mr. Vernon Rigby.

COLLEGE OF MUSICIANS (SHAFTESBURY HALL).—At the last monthly term meeting, on Thursday, 3rd November, Mr. Alfred Carder read a paper on the "Present Position of the Native Artist;" and Mr. Alfred Molson read a paper on "Handel contrasted with Mendelssohn." An interesting selection of music was performed by members of the College, and the College choir, including selections from Handel and Mendelssohn; part songs, &c. Mrs. Mullen and Miss Haite presided at the pianoforte.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

On Monday a musical and literary entertainment was given in the Hall, recently erected at the Bow Railway Station, to a crowded audience. The artists were Miss Amy Weddle, pianist, and Messrs. E. J. Aming and W. F. Taunton. Miss Amy Weddle was enthusiastically encored in both solos, as also in a duet (with her sister Bertha).

Mrs. John Macfarren gave a pianoforte vocal recital last Tuesday, November 8th, at the St. Barnabas School-rooms, Wandsworth Road, the performance being one of a series for the benefit of the schools and other charities of the district. The programme gave great delight to a large audience. Mrs. John Macfarren bowed her acknowledgments to the unanimous applause which greeted her playing of Brissac's Fantasia, "Scotia," and accepted the vociferous encore of Walter Macfarren's third Tarantella. Miss Jessie Royd contributed to the success of the evening by her bright and animated singing, and was called upon to repeat no less than three songs. She gave Mozart's "Vedrai carino" charmingly, and her rendering of G. A. Macfarren's ballad, "The Golden Heart," gave general satisfaction.

Brixton.—The Subscription Orchestral Concerts of the Amateur Musical Society, for nearly fourteen years so prominent a feature in the musical annals of this remote suburb, were resumed on the 2nd inst., under auspicious circumstances. A gaily-dressed assemblage filled the elegant building (Gresham Road), in which the concerts are held, and an admirably-arranged programme appeared to give unqualified gratification. The orchestra, now more than 40 strong, contributed the "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn, the overture to Der Freischütz, the "Grand March" from Meyerbeer's Prophète, and a selection from La Figlia del Reggimento, each being rendered with care and accuracy. The symphony in particular was played with a refinement seldom observable in the efforts of amateurs. The programme also included De Beriot's First Violin Concerto, with orchestral accompaniment, played very creditably by Master Parker, a promising pupil of the eminent conductor, Mr. H. Weist Hill. The vocalists were Miss Banks, who sang "La Gitana" (E. Land), and "The faithful Echo" (Gana), both charmingly, and in response to an encore of the latter, the Scotch ballad, "There's nae luck;" Mr. E. Cotte, who succeeded fairly in the "Cujus Animam," and two of Dibdin's old ballads; and Mr. Rotton, who gave Schubert's "Wanderer," and a scena by Mr. Barnett, both effectively. Mr. John Harrison was the piano accompanist, as of yore.—W. H. P.

Lecture Hall, Deptford.—A concert was given on Monday last for the benefit of Mr. Leonard Walker who has good reason to be satisfied with the result. Mr. Walker was assisted by Madame Marie Stocken, Messrs. H. Lee Mallall, Gordon Hall, Frederick and Miss Marion. Madame Stocken sang "The faithful Echo" by Gana with so much brilliancy that an encore was the result. She also sang "I know a song" by Benedict, with a like result. Miss Marion, who made her first appearance, sang "The Weaver" by Kate L. Ward, and was encored. This young lady, a pupil of Mr. Walker, possesses a good contralto voice, and with further study will be an acquisition to the concert room. Mr. Walker sang "Largo al Factotum" (encored, substituting "Non più andrai"), "Miss Rampell" (encored), the "Troubadour" with Madame Stocken and Miss Marion, and Fioranelli's "Singing Lesson" with Madame Stocken. The last was rendered with so much humour that an uproarious encore was the result. Dr. and Messrs. Lloyd and A. Lloyd (amateurs) sang "I Naviganti" remarkably well; Dr. Lloyd also sang "La donna mobile" efficiently, and Mr. A. Lloyd gave "The Knight's Vigil." Mr. Hall's rendering of "The Thorn" was much admired and encored; Mr. Owen sang "Her charming smile" and "Speed on, my Bark;" Mr. W. G. Clements gave a reading of "The Raven," by Poe, with great feeling, and his imitations of various actors were very clever; the latter he had to repeat. The Lela Dramatic Club performed the second scene from Mr. Morton Killick's Don Quixote, causing great amusement. Mr. H. V. Lewis contributed two solos on the piano, and accompanied the vocal music efficiently.

The Presbyterian Synod, after a stormy meeting lately, voted in favour of allowing organs to be used in their churches. One old Scotch clergyman said: "He should rather expect the blessing of God in connection with the use of bagpipes."

Vienna.—M. Offenbach is shortly expected. It is confidently asserted that he intends settling here altogether, and establishing a theatre on the model of the Bouffes Parisiens. As he could not obtain, it is said, the Theater an der Wien, he intends erecting a new theatre on purpose.—Herr Proch has had the Franz-Joseph Order bestowed on him. After being a Capellmeister at the Imperial Operahouse for more than thirty years, he has left that establishment to take the direction of the orchestra at the Burg-Theater.

THE DECLINE OF ITALIAN OPERA.

(From the "New York Evening Post.")

The last season of Italian opera really worthy of the name given in this city, was that under Maretzek, at the Academy of Music a few years ago, when Zucchi, Sulzer, Mazzoleni and Bellini were in the troupe. This brilliant campaign recalled to mind the days of Grisi and Mario, of Bosio and Steffanone, and of Salvi and Marini. At the Astor Place Operahouse and at Castle Garden there were performances which have never since been surpassed. It is true that we have had since then individual representations of striking merit. Madame Lagrange has shown her superb lyric talent, and Miss Kellogg has delighted us with personations which possessed an ineffable charm; but for a thoroughly well-appointed opera troupe the memory will have to go back a long number of years.

It is worthy of note that the records of Italian opera in London show a similar experience. Italian opera there is now simply a setting for one or two "stars," and when they—or she, for of late Mdlle. Nilsson has proved the only available attraction—were absent from the scene the house was deserted. Next season opera will be given at only one of the London theatres, instead of at two as heretofore.

The theory advanced by the London critics to account for the decline of Italian opera is, that the rich old families which hitherto supported it no longer take an interest in this fascinating amusement, while the nouveaux riches and the middle classes, without the musical culture which would lead them to love music for its own sake, can only be attracted by some noted name. Why the "old families" have lost their love for opera the critics do not attempt to explain. So ancient philosophers were once content to say that the earth rested on the back of an enormous turtle, without speculating as to the support of the latter.

An experienced operatic impresario in this city lately said that the opera troupes which shed such lustre on the past annals of the lyric stage in this country would cost three to four times as much now as they did in years gone by; and even were the funds forthcoming they could not be engaged, for the simple reason that such great artists no longer exist. This is decidedly a gloomy view to take of the matter, but it emanates from one who speaks with authority. Indeed, between the lack of singers, the spread of the pernicious star system, and the indifference of the public, it may well be feared that opera of all kinds—for England herself cannot even support one regular English opera troupe—will soon be numbered among the lost arts.

NOTICE TO MUSIC PUBLISHERS AND VENDORS OF MUSIC IN AUSTRALIA, &c.

The undersigned music publishers, and proprietors of musical copyright, of London, finding, notwithstanding former prosecutions for piracy in Melbourne, that unprincipled tradesmen continue to unlawfully republish their copyright works, to the great detriment of their property, have determined to bring offenders against the law before the judicial authorities; for which purpose Mr. Wilkie (of the firm of Wilkie, Webster, & Allan, music sellers of Melbourne) has been invested with a power of attorney to act for them with certified copies of entries at Stationers' Hall. And he has been instructed to offer a reward of five pounds, upon the conviction of any person who shall republish, or import from America or elsewhere, for sale or hire, any pirated copies of their copyright works. The Act of 5 and 6 of Victoria, cap. 45, enacts that no person except the proprietor of copyright shall be allowed to either republish any copyright works, or import pirated copies into the British dominions for sale or hire, under penalties of £10 and double the value of each copy, and the forfeiture of all copies and plates from which such works are unlawfully reprinted. And that all persons having in their possession for sale or hire, such unlawfully printed copies, or reprinting the melodies or words of songs, for sale in books or periodicals, without the written consent of the proprietors are liable to the same penalties. Also that the performance of any copyright, drama, or dramatic musical compositions, or any portion thereof, without the written consent of the proprietors, is an infringement of the law of copyright, which law extends to all the "British dominions" for the term of 42 years from the first publication of any work published in Great Britain, which is the exclusive property of an English author and his assigns. This notice is also applicable to itinerant troupes of musical and dramatic performers, who may unlawfully print, or sell pirated copies of copyright works on their tours through the British Colonies.

PROVINCIAL.

BRIGHTON.—The Guardian says:—

"On Friday Messrs. R. Potts & Co. enabled a fashionable audience to enjoy a violin and pianoforte recital by Mdme. Norman-Neruda and Mr. Charles Hallé. The programme included Grand Sonata (pianoforte) in G, Op. 29. No. 1—Beethoven; Fantasia Chromatica and Fugue—Bach; Adagio and Rondo, in B flat—Dussek; and Grand Sonata, piano and violin, in E flat—Beethoven. We need not dwell upon the finished way in which this programme was gone through. The arrangements of the concert were admirably carried out.

KEIGHLEY.—The subjoined is from the Keighley News of November 5th:—

"A grand concert was given, in the hall of the new Mechanics' Institute, by the members of the Anemoic Union, under the direction of Mr. Lazarus. The members of the Union were supported by Mdme. Thaddeus Wells and Mrs. Lincoy-Naylon, vocalists. The instrumental performers were Messrs. Nicholson (flute), Lazarus (clarionet), Barret (oboe), T. E. Mann (horn), and J. F. Hutchings. The entertainment was very successful. There was a large audience.

DUBLIN.—In the Irish Times of November 9th we read as subjoined:—

"At the fashionable morning concert of the Misses Glover, under the patronage of the Countess Spencer, the following was the programme:—Selections from Professor Glover's Cantata, Tara—Herald's March, Druid's Song. Scena, 'David before Saul,' Bordese. Solo harp—Irish Airs, A. W. Glover. Duet, 'Io Vivo e Tamo,' Campana. Concerto—Pianoforte, Mendelssohn. Part II.—Scena, 'Don Basilio,' Il Barbiere di Seviglia, Rosini. Duet—Harp and Piano, Traviata, E. Glover. Ballad, 'My mother bids me bind my hair,' Haydn. Canzonetta, 'La Bella Sorentina,' Nauman. Finale—Galop, 'Skeddaddle,' J. W. Glover.

BRECON.—We learn the following from the Brecon County Times:—

"A concert was given here on the 6th of October, at which Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. Jno. William§, and Mr. Brandon appeared, assisted by Mr. Frost, harpist, and Mr. Lawrence, accompanist. The appearance of Miss Wynne created great interest; and in 'Angels ever bright and fair,' she confirmed her high reputation. The rendering of 'Comfort ye,' and 'Every valley,' by Mr. Jno. Williams exhibited careful training, the first being given with great expression. Mr. Brandon sang Gounod's 'Nazareth' in admirable style. A special feature was the duet from William Tell, 'Tutto apprendi,' in which the high C was given with clearness and apparent ease by Mr. Jno. Williams. Mr. Frost contributed three pieces, one of which, 'Sounds from Home,' (by Aptommas) was loudly encored; and Miss Wynne's 'Bells of Aberdovey,' shared a similar fate. 'The Ash Grove,' given by Mr. Williams, also elicted an encore. The concert was one of the best given in Brecon for some years."

MALVERN.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The Philharmonic, a society, formed out of the materials of the old Choral Society, gave their first concert on Monday, at Mr. Haynes' Concert Hall. The programme opened with a selection from Macbeth; the choruses being evenly rendered, and the bass solos taken by Mr. J. R. Inglis, who sung with efficiency. Several glees were well rendered by members and friends of the society. The Rev. A. Sewell conducted, and also favored the audience with several solos, which he sang with spirit. The orchestra comprised the well-known violinist, Mr. F. Spray; Messrs. Elgar Brothers, violinists; and Mr. Brook (contra bass), of Worcester. Mr. T. Lockett, of Malvern, also gave his valuable aid as violinist, as did Mr. F. V. Norris, the violinist. Miss and Master Neath, of Worcester, took part in the concert; the latter singing some solos with much taste. Since the formation of the society in January last, the Messiah and Macbeth have been regularly rehearsed, and the society intend, at their next concert, to give selections from the former work.

"On Friday evening 'The Anemoic Union,' under the direction of the great clarionetist, Mr. Lazarus, with Madame Thaddeus Wells (vocalist) and Mr. W. Shakespeare (pianist), gave a successful concert at Mr. W. Haynes' Concert Hall. The performances were listened to with attention by a large and fashionable audience. 'Gratias Agimus,' sung with much sweetness, and effectively accompanied by the clarionet obbligato of Mr. Lazarus, was deservedly encored; as was also the old English song, 'Come, Lasses and Lads.' For the latter, the lady vocalist substituted 'Comin' thro' the Rye,' which was not rendered so effectively as the romance, 'When the gentle eve' (Weber), or the aria, with flute obbligato by Mr. Nicholson, 'La Favourite' (Tulou). The quartet from Norma gave each of the instrumentalists—Messrs. Nicholson (flute), Barret (oboe), Lazarus (clarionet), T. E. Mann (horn), and Hutchins (bassoon)—full scope to display their powers, and their playing was much admired. The pianoforte solo, Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, by Mendelssohn, was executed with taste and cleverness, which elicited loud applause. The audience were apparently highly delighted; and it is hoped that Mr. Haynes will ere long, again provide so excellent a concert. The Tyrolese Singers are announced to perform here on Saturday and Monday next."

MANCHESTER.—Apropos of the last Gentlemen's Concert the Examiner and Times has the following:—

"The first overture, Fidelio, is a work, which invariably delights all, at least when played as it was last night. Schumann's B flat Symphony may still be considered a novelty in Manchester, but as the first important orchestral work of a composer whose claims have been so hotly contested, it will always have special interest. The work generally is not characterised by original thought and an abundant flow of charming melody, but the construction is not so complicated as in some of the later works of this composer. The first movement well sustains the tone of triumphant majesty with which it opens, and we remember no work of Schumann in which the gloom and mysteriousness which so often prevail in orchestral compositions is so rarely felt. The last movement, for the most part a happy and exuberant; it is a decided reminder of a musical subject not generally considered classical. Mr. Horton Allison, the solo pianist of the evening, is a local artist of whose pianoforte recitals we have more than once had occasion to speak favourably. His selection of Mendelssohn's Serenade, &c., was judicious, for although it is familiar to a Manchester audience by irreproachable performances, it is, nevertheless, well calculated for the display of Mr. Allison's best powers, and his neatness, fluent execution, and crisp touch were very much admired."

WEYMOUTH.—The following is abridged from the Southern Times of October 29:—

"The effort made by Herr Van Heddegham to introduce into Weymouth a taste for music of a high standard had not so pro-perous a commencement as the object deserved. The first concert at the Royal Hotel, on Thursday evening last, was not well attended. We hope, however, that the discouraging outset will not induce an abandonment of the enterprise. The public have been too long accustomed to meretricious amusement in the shape of music to be suddenly convinced of the error of their ways, and they must undergo an education in the pure and true school of music before they can be induced to adjure the abominations of 'Bones and the Banjo.' We believe there is in every community a sufficient number of those whose souls are attuned to sweet sounds of a sterling kind, and we venture to hope that if Herr Van Heddegham will only persevere he will in time wean the Weymouthians from the worship of "false gods," and bring them over to a liking for what is the real truth in the faith of music. Those who were absent on Thursday were deprived of, and those who were present enjoyed, a treat of no ordinary character. The concerted pieces played by Herr Van Heddegham (violin), Mr. Corri (violoncello), and Mr. Thorne (piano) were in themselves an evening's enjoyment. These were a trio by Hummel, Gonnod's 'Meditation' on Bach's first prelude, one of Beethoven's trios, a quartette by Spohr, Beethoven's sonata in E flat, by Van Heddegham and Mr. Thorne. Some glees were excellently sung by Messrs. Board, Pretty, Rogers, and Crocker."

GOOD MEN OF THE STAGE.

There are certain received types of human character which, on the stage, are invariably arrayed on the side of virtue. We do not mean that their virtue is necessarily of the most rigorous kind. They may indulge in a sort of vague libertinage with regard to the fair sex; they may be somewhat given to drink; and, as paymasters, they may be bad in the extreme. But they would become living contradictions if they were vindictive, malicious, mean, or oppressive. However deeply they may get into debt, they must never be fraudulent; and, though they may rudely salute every woman who crosses their path, they must never seduce.

At the head of the virtuous persons, representing a somewhat vague code of ethics, we should certainly place the Irish peasant; and if he is also a rebel this is rather a feather in his cap. Outside the walls of a theatre, the English, as a rule, are not particularly enamoured of Milesian insurgency; nor can Feniamism be considered popular beyond its own sphere. Nevertheless, the most loyal Cockney seated in the pit hopes, from the bottom of his soul, that the rebellious Irish peasant will be able to outwit his persecutors, the redcoats; nor is any grief occasioned if these are massacred to a man. A certain age, when Hibernian insurrections were unknown to the stage, the Irishman was welcome as a funny fellow, with his heart in the right place, whose taste for whisky found sympathisers among the gin-drinkers of the gallery, and who flourished his shillelagh with a dexterity that appeared miraculous to a people not acquainted with any weapon but the fist, and who, when he knocked down his friend, performed the feat with the utmost good-humour. Thus firmly established as a theatrical "pet," he could not lose his popularity through a little twist in his politics, which, while it endows him with a risky sort of patriotism, does not in the least alter the essential attributes which belonged to him when he was one of the harmless Teagues and Paddies of another day. He is still the friend of the oppressed, he still talks a brogue which is perfectly intelligible to the populace of London (vastly puzzled when Mr. Tom Taylor tries to make them familiar with the language of Cumberland), and he never saves his money. A stage Irishman, who steadily keeps an account at a post-office savings bank would be a mere abomination, whereas a British workman displaying his prudence in the same manner would be applauded for his economy and self-denial. Some of the audiences present at the performance of dramas founded on Irish rebellion must have been rather puzzled by the appearance of the Irish spy who looks something like a contradictio in adjecto. But the utmost is done to relieve their embarrassment. They are made to see that he is not intended for the Milesian proper, and he always has at his side a dazzling peasant of the right sort who throws him as much as possible into the shade.

Less fortunate than the Irishman are two other "pets," the British sailor and the semi-sentimental country lad. While the first has stood an unrivalled amount of wear and tear and is still fresh as ever, the other two, though morally approved, have like many other worthy folks, laid themselves open to a charge of "boredom." Still both are necessarily good. It is the duty of the British sailor to rescue females in distress and to fling his quid into the eye of the dishonest lawyer or other villain, and he, too, has the virtue of never leaving his money. It is sad for him that he and the clown have lost their joint monopoly of the hornpipe, and that this is now one of the favourite dances with those young ladies in glistening tunics who so highly season our burlesques; for he thus not only loses one of his distinctive marks, but he comes into unequal competition with the fair sex. The fact is, his popularity was in a great measure the result of the brilliant naval victories that distinguished this country during the revolutionary wars, and would probably be as great as ever were national enthusiasm aroused by similar causes. Congreve, who wrote Love for Love when the navy was less conspicuous, made his sailor Ben a mere vulgar brute, without more claim to sympathy than the rest of his very unsympathetic dramatis personæ.

The country boy may still command admiration when he defends the honour of his sister against the base attempts of an aristocratic libertine: for there is still a popular superstition to the effect that all young females of the humbler class, especially those born in the provinces, are in the first instance of sublimished virtue, and that the whole of the "unfortunate" sisterhood are manufactured in the streets, or grandly canter in Rotten Row, would have been the wives of good, honest, hard working men had it not been for the villany of some seducer, high of birth, or at least rich of pocket. But the country boy's flowered waistcoat has faded, and if still worn, has an doubtful look; and though he may yet assert his right to look a lord in the face, it is felt that he is no longer a proper representative of democracy, and that this is rather to be sought under the fustian jacket than under the smock frock. The old country lad was a poor relation of the porcelain shepherd, and we do not believe in the phases of humanity recorded by Dresden china.

In ordinary well-fitted English theatres, with the exception of the very few which may be considered exclusively fashionable, the majority of the audience is necessarily of the lower class; and to the lower class the "good men" above described unquestionably belong. We therefore lay it down as a general principle that the sympathies of the theatrical public are essentially democratic. But let a plot be pushed back to the time of our own Civil Wars, and an exceptional case immediately arises. The Cavalier, aristocratic though he be, is admired; the Puritan, with all his democracy, is detested. However sound the politics of the latter, he is armed to the teeth against the "amusements of the people," and is therefore an offensive or ridiculous object to people taking their amusement. The theatrical and anti-theatrical factions are arrayed against each other, and the democrats of the gallery feels that if he is a Republican he is still more a man who loves to "enjoy himself," and, for the nonce, the link is broken which connects him with his Nonconforming neighbour, though they will both poll for the same candidate on the occasion of the next election.

MUSIC A MEANS OF CULTURE.

By J. S. Dwight.

Think what unconscious culture, what refining influence, the people of a city might breathe in with the common breath of life from concerts in the open air, from military bands, and, better still, from civic bands, if only our king and lord, the people aforesaid, in its corporate capacity, would make enlightened provision for those things, and institute a competent commission, or commissioner, a "Philodrate, master of the revels," of real taste and judgment to see to it that the bands be good ones, the programmes of a kind to elevate and civilize, and not demoralize by brutal beat of everlasting brass: and that the répertoire be made up of models of enduring beauty, instead of specimens of every foolish reigning fashion in its turn. Such an office should be of high honour, of careful appointment, and safe tenure, like a judgship.

Think what revival of the best enthusiasm, what enriching of the inner man's resources, what a lift to thought and feeling, may be given, has been given, by great festivals of music, and even "great jubilees," could their ambition be a little sobered, and all the clap-trap and extravagance left out.

Think, above all, how much of the best kind of culture, though it be unfinishable, undemonstrative, a silent absorption, as it were, through all the pores and into every finest spiritual fibre, may be found in the stated series of concerts of the highest order, where to listen well is to take part, and where every person present both in body and in soul "assists," in the French sense of the word. All that is necessary to this is, that, besides rich material, there shall be a pure, artistic spirit, pervading the whole concert; the programme ought to be an art-work in itself, wit; nothing miscellaneous left out: it, being not enough that it should contain fine things; it should contain them so placed that they shall not jostle one another, each obliterating the impression of the last, and that their spell shall not be broken by bringing them into incongruous contiguity with things of so irreconcilable spirit that one can carry home no clear impression of the concert as a whole.

But of the good influence of music in the more popular and public way the half is not told, so long as we have not hinted how much fitly chosen music may do, has done, though too seldom, as an element in public celebrations of great events in human progress, in commemorations of great men, or in aid of noble charities. On such occasions its chief efficiency depends upon significant, appropriate selections to be played or sung; upon the close affinity or correspondence of each strain of music, both with the spirit of the hour and with whatever spoken thought or ceremony it may prepare or follow; a word, upon a certain artistic unity of programme, of which it catches by quick sympathy the key-note, dictates in some way the order, moulds all into symmetry, tenderly guards throughout the unbroken continuity of meaning, and secures as frame and background to the whole. Skill should indeed be called in at the first inception of the plot as the most sympathetic, subtly appreciative, suggestive confidante; and when it comes to the fulfilment, her's is the part of chief interpreter, as well as of disposer of all minds to the right mood of expectation and the right impression afterwards. Commonly we are quite differently. We call in music upon such occasions, not as an equal, a coworking intelligence, but rather as king's jester, to supply a little idle recreation in the pauses. We employ a band of instruments, mostly military, to discourse to the crowding throngs, out-doors, or what not, selected without any regime or reason, and so readily break the spell and rob the hour of character and meaning. Art would reform this. Art knows nothing miscellaneous.

We are not quite without examples of the better way; our Boston Music Hall, within a few years, has been witness to a few which might be followed. Who that was present will forget that welcome to our noble Lincoln's Proclamation of Emancipation on that first of January, when Emerson first read his thrilling "Boston Hymn" of liberty and justice; and when music, furnishing first the dark prelude, in allusion to the days of bondage and of hope deferred, through the overture to Egmont and that exciting number from "The Hymn of Praise," in which to the anxiously repeated question, "Will the night soon pass?" the clear soprano, like a stream of sunshine, startles with the cry, "The night is departing!" and the glorious crescendo of the chorus floods the world with light and carries all before it in a blaze of high-pitched harmony and trumpets,—then proceeded in the lofty vein of heroism and of holy triumph, by making heard, in such significant connection (not to name all), the glorious Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; the chorus from Elijah, full of comfort to the "sad sufferers," "He watching over Israel," Handel's Hallelujah; and finally the patriotic "sun-burst" of the Overture to William Tell?

Think, too, of the part that music bore the day we listened to the eulogy of our good Governor. How the organ whispered peace in those sweet strains of the touching chorus, sung at the tomb of the Saviour, of Bach's Passion Music; and how the mournful effect of that grandest expression of a people's grief, bereft of a true hero, the Funeral March from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, was tempered by the chorus, full of comfort, from St Paul, "Happy and blest are they who have endured;" then by the heavenly Amen, reassuring and uplifting, from the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, and then, to sum up all in one grand lesson, the strong, confiding choral, harmonized by Bach, "What God does, surely is well done!"

Think, too, how music lent new meaning and new beauty to that commemoration, of a great man of science, when our Agassiz paid noble tribute to the life and labours of his great friend and teacher, Humboldt; how the music and the spoken word shed light upon each other, how Mozart's chorus of the Priests of old sung of the consecration of the noble youth to Truth, wherever she might lead him, and how the wondrous overture to The Magic Flute, and the first movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, by their fascinating hint of the perpetual pursuit of unity, through all the labyrinthine windings of variety, fitly prepared and followed discourse of which that was the very theme. How out of all these ways of popular exposure to the influence of good music, as well as from private, even solitary communion with its master spirit, comes much valuable culture, not in the sense of musical or any other knowledge, technical and special; not a direct conscious culture, as such, of the memory or of the reasoning faculties, not scholarship, perhaps, nor ease and elegance of manners nor address, not force of will nor quickness of decision; but, nevertheless, a culture moulding us insensibly, a sort of atmospheric culture, weighing gently upon each and all, like wholesome air, expanding the chest, warming the heart, putting the nerves in tune, disposing to unconscious courtesy and kindness, prompting each to fill his place cheerfully and unobstructively, forgetting self in the harmonious whole, weaving a sympathetic bond, making us all feel like happy, trustful children free and not afraid

We may learn something from our German fellow-citizens in illustration of this important chapter in the art of life. We, as a people, seem somehow to have lacked this art. We count prosperity like anxious bond-slaves, fearing to call a moment of our lives our own, fearing to live, in our unceasing, feverish pursuit of the mere means of living. We are enterprising to a fault, we go ahead faster than others, but it is by a centaur-like contrivance, letting a large part of our real vital, human self run down into the lower animal or the machine that carries us. Why, O "live Yankee," O proud Westerner, why waste your life in rivalling a steam-engine? Man makes himself a mere machine for generating or accumulating power, and all for what? And with what a solemn, sanctimonious, lean, hard-favoured way he does it often! With what a quasi-religious and self-righteous tone he quotes his business maxims. How he amalgamates unworldly orthodoxy with the most secular showman's cant in the advertising of his wares. How he practically confounds religion with his own self-love, as generalized into prudential maxims.

We esteem ourselves the freest people on this planet; yet we have perhaps as little real freedom as any other; for we are the slaves of our own feverish enterprise, and of a barren theory of discipline, which would fain make us virtuous to a fault through abstinence from very life. We are afraid to give ourselves up to the free and happy instincts of our nature. All that is not pursuit of advancement of some good, conventional, approved way of business or politics, or fashion, or intellectual reputation, or professed religion, we count waste. We lack genialità; nor do we, as a people, understand the meaning of the word. We ought to learn it practically of our Germans. It comes of the same root with the word genius. Genius is the spontaneous principle; it is free and happy in its work; it is artist and not drudge; its whole activity is reconciliation of the heartiest pleasure with the purest loyalty to conscience, with the most holy, universal, and desinterested ends. Genius, as Beethoven gloriously illustrates in his Choral Symphony (indeed, in all his symphonies), finds the key-note and solution of the problem of the highest state in "Joy," taking his text from Schiller's Hymn. Now all men have genialness, in the sense that we call Shakspeare, Mozart, Raphael, men of genius, but all should be partakers of this spontaneous, free, and happy method of genius; all should live childlike, genial lives, and not wear all the time the consequential livery of their unrelaxing business, nor the badge of party and profession in every line and feature of their faces.

The genial, childlike faculty of social enjoyment, this happy art of life, is just what our countrymen may learn from the social "Liedertafel" and the summer singing-festivals of which the Germans are so fond. There is no element of national character which we so much need; and there is no class of citizens whom we should be more glad to adopt and own than those who set us such examples. So far as it is a matter of culture, it is through Art chiefly that the desiderated genial era must be ushered in. The Germans have the sentiment of art, the feeling of the beautiful in art, and consequently in nature, more developed than we have. Above all, music offers itself as the most available, most popular, most influential of the fine arts,—music, which is the art and language of the feelings, the sentiments, the spiritual instincts of the soul, and so becomes a universal language, tending to unite and blend and harmonize all who may come within its sphere.

A correspondent, who signs himself "Anteater," asks us what has become of "Mr. A. S. Sullivan's brilliant and characteristic overture to Marmion."

"De conkrekation vill pleshe to sing the von dousanth and two'th psalm," said a Dutch parson (in Canada) as he gave out the morning hymn.—"There are not so many in the book," responded the chorister.—"Vell, den, pleshe sing so many as tare pe."

We read in the New York Herald of October 24th that the professional friends of Mr. Howard Glover, the celebrated English composer, librettist, and musical critic, are about to tender him a complimentary benefit. Mr. Howard Glover is the author of several successful English operas and other large musical works; while as a critic his invariable advocacy of the highest order of art is as well known here, where he has resided for some time, as it is in England. Mr. Howard Glover's claims to public sympathy and support are unquestionable, and we trust the forthcoming benefit may prove a sub tantial success.

Mdlle. Marie Krebs, well known in this country, has been earning golden opinions by her pianoforte performances at the concerts of Christine Nilsson in New York. She seems to have completely eclipsed both Mdlle. Aldé Topp and Mdlle. Anna Mehlig—and no wonder, if there be judges of "pianism" in the States.

Mrs. Francis Talfourd is again actively engaged in organising a concert for the benefit of the "Alexandra Homes," Margate. Mrs. Talfourd has already obtained by the same means, aid to the amount of £100 for this excellent charity, and more than that amount for other charities, in whose welfare the sympathy of this esteemed lady is enlisted.

The N. Y. World says that the National anthem, with the cannon accentuation of the Jubilee, may be rendered thus;

'Tis the star-spangled boom banner,
O long may it smash wave,
O'er the land of the bang free,
And the home of the rip brave.

Mr. J. C. Hammond recently presented an organ to the Congregational Church of Sheffield, Connecticut. At its dedication the following astonishing verse was sung by a full congregation:—

Praise be to Him who lives above;
He shows His kindness and His love;
Uses mankind His word to preach,
Reached forth His hand—touched J. C. H.;
Caused him to give, in willing mood,
His organ to the friends of God.

The clever little xylophonist, Master Bonnay, was once to have played a solo on the instrument of his adoption; but, Master Bonnay being prevented by illness, M. Faure, as if in deprecation of that bewfangled invention, sang the air from Joconde, "Mais on revient toujours à ses premiers amours." Certainly there are few instruments to which we would not gladly return after hearing the xylophone. Nevertheless, Master Bonnay was a distinguished virtuoso in his way, and we can bear witness to the fact that by tapping with two pieces of wood on several other pieces of wood he succeeded, at other concerts, in rousing the audience to something like enthusiasm.

BIRTH OF HYMNS.—The Chicago Advance treats thus of "The Birth of Hymns:"

"Of all Watts' hymns we can trace the origin of very few. And yet he was clearly one whose lyrics were the outgrowth of his life. After he rejected by the beautiful but capricious, if not coquettish Miss Linger, who told him that she loved the jewel but could not admire the casket, he uttered his resignation and heavenly consolation in the hymn:—

'How vain are all things here below!'

in which, among other manifest allusions, occur the lines:—

'The fondness of a creature's love,
How strong it strikes the sense.'"

Extensive alterations have been carried out at Christ Church, Oxford, during the long vacation. The interior of the Cathedral has been in great part restored, notably the east end, where two Norman windows, as near reproductions of the originals as possible, have replaced the former Gothic window. The screen separating the Latten Chapel from the choir and northern transept has been removed—by which the Norman pillars are seen to great advantage. It is proposed to restore the exterior when funds are forthcoming. Mr. Gilbert Scott, R.A., is the architect. The Cathedral is now open. The walls of Tom Quad. which, in some places, showed signs of decay, have been renewed with fresh stone; while the common room, treasurer's office, &c., under the hall, have also undergone repairs.

The Lyons papers tell a good story. The bed-chambers of two wealthy gentlemen, are adjacent, and thin partitions divide them. One tenant spends his nights at his club-house, never returning before half-past five in the morning. His neighbour rises at six, and sits down at once to his piano, which he does not quit until dinner-time. The former complained to the Commissary of Police, who laughed in his face, and told him to keep better hours. As he had a lease for six years he could not change his apartment. He thought of sending a challenge to his neighbour; his neighbour was paralysed in his lower limbs. He had his walls lined with thick hair mattresses; still "sharps" penetrated into his room. He made his servants take a hammer and rap against the wall. His neighbour waited until he was tired, and then began to play. He then brought a large hand-organ which was sadly out of tune, and had a turnspit, which would turn eight days without being wound up, fitted to the organ. The turnspit was put in motion, after it and the organ had been placed next the chamber-wall. The piano-player bore the organ for nineteen hours; at the end of that time he sent a letter of truce. He was told the club-hunter had gone out of town, and wouldn't be back for a week. The pianist sold his lease. The organ is still going!

"Mdlle. Christine Nilsson," say the New York Herald of Oct. 24, "was received by the public of the other cities in which she sang with the same enthusiasm and delight as by the people of New York. Many croaked continously over the magnitude of Strakosch's enterprise, and wrote Jeremiads on it as a financial failure. They also hinted mysteriously at some wonderful critic who was lying somewhere in the provinces with some magic compound of musical chemistry which, when applied to Nilsson's voice, should leave the Swedish nightingale tuneless forever. This prestidigitateur of the press was to discover some alarming quality in her voice which escaped the vigilance and critical acumen of Paris, London, and New York. But they were disappointed. Nilsson sang in Philadelphia and Baltimore to houses rivalling those of New York. She appears at Steinway Hall this and Wednesday evening, and at a matinée on Saturday. The troupe remains the same:—Miss Cary, Brignoli, Vieuxtemps, and Verger, with the addition of Mdlle. Marie Krebs, a young pianiste lately arrived from Europe, and one of whom the press there universally speak in very high terms."

Half a league, half a league, half a league rearward,
Right through the mire and dirt,
Much to its beauty hurt,
Dragged the rich silken skirt,
Half a league rearward.

Half a peck, half a peck, half a peck fully—
Hirsute and woolly,
Into the liquid air—
Rose up the pile of hair,
From other heads sundered.
Nobly astraddle it,
Rode the brave bonnet—
Rode, though it wondered.
Curls to the right of it,
Curls to the left of it,
Curls to the rear of it,
Curls that were plundered.

What though men shout, "Oh, fie!
Fortune you have squandered;"
Their's not to make reply,
Their's but to dress or die—
"Charge!" in the shop they cry,
"Charge by the hundred."

In this manner, the two branches of musical art took np their positions, at a very early period, in bold contrast opposite each other. The young sprightly thing, like a high-spirited foal, broke through the hedge which surrounded it, and sought subsistence in the great flowery meads, under God's beautiful blue heaven, with the beaming sun and the twinkling stars, while its mother in vain called it back again to the carefully enclosed pasture. The fruitless summons was followed by the complete exile of the wild child; suchlike new things no longer existed for the teachers of music; they lay beyond the boundaries of art, and the true artist could not trouble himself about them. The teachers cared not for the fact that the wild child, on its new road through life, fell, gradually, into quieter ways; that, little by little, it drew up its own rules, and found a host of enthusiastic admirers. The mere act of directing their blinking eyes to the successes achieved in the noise and bustle of the world was abomination for the masters, and they endeavoured, therefore, to cherish in the breasts of their scholars the same contempt that existed in their own, though, it is true, their efforts had no permanent effect on those in whose soul there lurked the heavenly spark; for, in the long run, a talented pupil leaped over the barrier, and tried his strength, too, in the prohibited strains and forms. With those, indeed, who did not proceed beyond the point to which they were led by the nose, the efforts of the teachers were crowned with the greatest success; such pupils kept carefully to the course pointed out to them, and continued to despise every other. They did not try any road but their own, because they wanted the power and consequently the desire to do so, and if one of them really did rise so high as to make the attempt he fell plump upon his nose, and—his teacher was right. In a certain sense, too, the teacher seemed really right, for even a talented pupil generally did fail, at his first attempts, on his nose; his wings possessed, perhaps, the strength to venture on soaring into the regions of the Unknown; but practice had not enabled them to regulate their flight, and thus result had been nought. Such was the result of deserting the ground of true art—the teacher was indeed right.

Not merely for decennisms, no, for centuries, did composers and teachers of this one-sided kind hold their ground; and we need not go far to find some specimens of the above art at the present day. A third sister-art has, in course of time, separated from the parent stem; instrumental music has put forth the most splendid blossoms—no matter! With the same short-sightedness as ever, the teachers still shut their eyes to everything which goes beyond the art of the "reiner Satz,"† as it is called. With the same Argus glance as ever they keep watch to see that no pupil makes any sign of disregarding the narrow limits around him, and of importing his own individual feeling into the forms of art. They still leave the development of individuality to the individual himself, and he has gone through the whole school, and, in their opinion, is armed against all the attacks of spurious art. According to them, church-music alone is something complete—something that has been complete for centuries—and its forms are so firmly fixed, framed in conformity with such irrefragable laws, and so sanctified, as it were, by length of time and by the place appropriated to the execution of them, that any attack on them must be branded as a transgression, and every attempt to go beyond them a crime. As lately as last winter, at a concert considered by all present as unusually good, we saw a celebrated teacher of music tolerate—though with some shaking of the head—Mendelssohn; but, at the first sounds of a grand pianoforte concerto by Schumann, he got up and most hastily left the temple. We are inclined to believe that the old gentleman has a great many genial specimens of such spurious art, composed by himself, locked up in his desk, and we believe that it will some day be related that he burned them all before his death, so that the world might never hear anything about such rubbish; but this shutting one's self up from all organic development of art must be designated destructive one-sidedness. It is this one-sidedness which makes no kinds of alluvance for artistic individuality, which wants everything to be tarred with one brush, everything to be made in the same mould.

And mere mould-work, nothing else, is the result of these men's school. Church music has been for centuries something completed—a fact evident from the compositions of these men's pupils, which might just as well have been written centuries ago. The number of them—composers and compositions—is large, but the number of original ideas in them almost zero; everything has been employed before; the same turns, the same arrangement; we have heard it all before, only we cannot at once say where and when—mould-work, which does not advance art one single step, and, to speak mildly, racks the hearer with its dreariness. What would be said of a poet who wanted to sing to us in the style of past centuries, and, moreover, without a new or original idea? That which we require from the word-poet, namely, artistic individuality, we require even more decidedly from the tone-poet. It is, therefore, the duty of those who teach music now-a-days to pay especial attention to the intellectual peculiarity of their pupils, and to measure exactly by it beforehand the course of development which the efforts of the pupils will take.

We will now proceed to jot down some observations tending to throw a light upon this side of the question, and append to them our remarks

II.

Genius is innate, and cannot be given to anyone. The sentiment is perfectly correct. But it would be false to insist on concluding therefrom: you must possess genius to begin with, if you are ever to become anything; if you do possess it, everything else will follow of itself; the teacher can do nothing more than impart the rudiments, and lay the foundation-stone for the future edifice; the edifice itself is your own concern, etc.

This would be tantamount to excluding all who did not possess genius.

But who does possess genius?

This is a question by no means easy to answer. In our opinion, too, it is pretty well an idle one. Friedemann Bach was a genius, from whom even his great father expected great things, but he went to ruin both as a man and as an artist. His brother Philip Emanuel was, on the contrary, simply a talented, industrious man; yet in him art found a sturdy support. The word genius is, however, employed in a very confused manner. If by the term genius is meant a man of such high intellectual strength that, in the particular sphere of his labours, he produces something not only prominent but extraordinary and unusual, Geniuses are, probably, very rare. Yet this is, now-a-days, the generally accepted expression for the above idea. If we go back, however, to the original sense of the word—the sense usual among the ancients—from the Latin: genius, synonymous with the Greek: dæmon—the word signified merely an intelligent being, a higher kind of power, as it were, forming a medium between divine and human nature. And this would correspond pretty well to our customary notion of genius.

We shall, therefore, do best if we here leave altogether out of consideration the notion of genius. Many a man at the outset of his career promises to be a genius, but, in the end, we find that he does very little, that he realizes none of the hopes that were built on him, and that, among thousands tolerably good like himself, he is gradually lost in the crowd. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that many men of really eminent minds grow by degrees more and more lax in their efforts until their life ends by being what is known as a mistake.

Let us here pause, and consider what proper guidance, what school, or training, can do to prevent such results.

We are not speaking here of the scholastic standard, or, to express it better, that branch of instruction, such as is given to children in conservatories, and other musical establishments. Art is something for which an individual must possess certain aptitudes, and, for this reason, be it parenthetically remarked, we attach very little importance to mass-instruction. General intellectual qualities are, it is true, found in every healthy individual, and, consequently, every child can be got to learn, that is, to learn in proportion to the strength and the natural gifts with which he is endowed, for according to quantity and composition the intellectual capabilities of every individual soon become, from outward impressions, different from what they at first were. To one person God has given five talents, or even more, and to another, only two; but no man is quite without talent. A man may, however, very well be without musical talent, or, at least, possess it in so trifling a degree, that it is not worth while developing. Now it is the proper treatment of this natural aptitude which concerns the system of mass-instruction, a subject to which we may return another time.

NATIONAL STANDARD THEATRE.

The Middlesex magistrates having refused to renew the dancing license for the Alhambra Palace, a ballet announced for production at that establishment on the 24th ult., entitled Stella, the Queen of the Stars, and composed by M. Holtzer, has been transferred to the theatre in Shoreditch, where it is executed nightly with all the attractions that picturesque dress and spirited dancing can supply. The piece is divided into two tableaux, one a forest in Greece and the other the harem. A scène d'entrainement by Mdlle. Pitteri, and a tambourine dance by the ladies of the ballet, elicits much applause. Bayadères, Greeks, peasants, pirates, slaves, and the suite of a Pasha also appear, all attired with tastefulness. There is, however, a part that may be removed with advantage—the by-play which occurs between Stella and Ali Bajon in the last scene. With this exception the ballet may be commended.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The thirteenth series of these instructive and thoroughly healthy entertainments began on Monday night, at St. James's Hall, which was absolutely thronged in every part.

In consequence of the year 1870 being the centenary of the birth of Beethoven, Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, the intelligent and enterprising director of the Monday Popular Concerts has thought it both expedient and appropriate to devote his programmes, up to the end of the year, exclusively to selections from the works of the greatest of all instrumental composers—king of chamber music as he is king of orchestral music. No other writings present such an inexhaustible variety as those of Beethoven; and, indeed, Mr. Chappell might easily, and without in any way discontenting his very critical audience, not merely devote the programmes before Christmas, but also the programmes after Christmas, to the famous Bonn musician. We should add that the vocal as well as the instrumental pieces are, without exception, to be derived from the same source.

The programme of Monday night, chiefly selected from the earlier compositions, produced before the fascinating influence of Haydn and Mozart—of Mozart more especially—had been wholly got rid of by the man destined afterwards to push the art to its furthest possible limits—may be cited in extenso, as a fair specimen of the kind of entertainment in store during what remains to us of the year 1870:

PART I.

Quartet, in F major, Op. 18, No. 1, strings	...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven
Song, "Penitence"	...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven
Sonata, in E flat, Op. 7, pianoforte alone	...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven

PART II.

Sonata, in F major, Op. 5, No. 1, pianoforte and violoncello	...	...	Beethoven
Song, "Know'st thou the land?"	...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven
Quartet, in G major, Op. 18, No. 2, strings	...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven

Perhaps it would have been better to reverse the order of the quartets—the one in F (really "No. 3," and not "No. 1") being much more elaborate than the one in G. On the other hand, some may argue that it is most advisable to keep the lightest and gayest piece for the end of a concert, and point to the always lively impression created when the last piece in a Monday Popular programme happens to be one of the delightful quartets or trios of "Papa Haydn." Anyhow, place them as we may, both the "F" and "G" are right welcome. Not to go into details, for which just now we cannot afford the requisite space, the adagio affetuoso in D minor of the quartet first named is the origin of those highly-impassioned movements of which Beethoven subsequently gave so many admirable examples to the world—and notably not a few in the self-same key; while the finale of the quartet in G is one of the earliest proofs of how its composer could write in the style of Mozart, and equal that great master at his best. The pianoforte sonata is the first among the immortal "32" in which Beethoven appears entirely, or almost entirely, himself—in other words, resembling nothing which the art had known before him. The rondo of this sonata (a chef d'œuvre, be it understood, from beginning to end) is built upon a melody that haunts the ear long after it is heard, tormenting it much in the same manner as that bit of sun-light which some poet said would for ever keep dancing in his eyes. The sonata in F, for pianoforte and violoncello, though full of beauties, can hardly, we think, be placed in the same high rank as the other pieces. Admirably written as it is, for both instruments, it shows less invention than is generally to be found in Beethoven, and has by no means the same well-sustained interest which we are accustomed to look for in him. Both the songs introduced in Monday night's programme are models; and, in particular, "Know'st thou the Land?" (Goethe)—of which, if we may believe, Madame Bettina von Arnim, Beethoven himself was so extravagantly enamoured.

Having thus discussed the programme piece by piece, the performance may be briefly dismissed. None can have forgotten with what "silvery" tone, with what pure and unaffected expression, Madame Norman-Neruda had already played the quartets of Haydn and Mozart, together with some of the earlier ones of Beethoven. All the qualities which have been extolled in this lady's style and execution were fully apparent on Monday night. Madame Neruda, on reaching the platform, was greeted with real enthusiasm, and speedily showed herself well deserving the honour. Nothing could be more refined than her playing throughout. How admirably she was supported in the two quartets by those steady and conscientious artists, Herr L. Ries and M. Zerbini (second violin and tenor), and, above all, by Signor Piatti (violoncello), may easily be imagined. It is difficult to say to which quartet the audience awarded the preference, so attentively were both listened to, and so loud and general was the applause that followed movement after movement of each. Mr. Charles Hallé played his very best—and what that best is, we all know—alike in the solo sonata, which won for him a "recall," and in the sonata with violoncello in which the style and execution of Signor Piatti were, as usual, incomparable. This last performance was, perhaps, the most brilliant success of the evening. Both players were unanimously called for at the end. The songs were very charmingly given by Mdlle. Clara Doria, who seems steadily advancing in her art, and were accompanied by Mr. Benedict on the pianoforte as only Mr. Benedict can accompany. The concert was altogether attractive, and the majority of the crowded audience remained for the last note of the last quartet.

LONDON AND AMERICAN THEATRES.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I do not think that the replies to Mr. Boucicault's letter in reference to English and American theatres are at all just to that gentleman. I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Boucicault, but as an American, and one thoroughly conversant with the theatres in America, I wish to state what I know to be facts. Mr. Boucicault is correct in many statements. I have before me a file of recent American playbills and theatrical advertisements. The leading theatres in the principal cities in the United States charge for the best seats 1 dollar 50 cents, next 1 dollar, then 50 cents, that is 6s., 4s., 2s. That is the very highest price. Many of the leading theatres only charge for the best seats 1 dollar, or four shillings English money. The second class, or variety theatres, charge 75 cents, 50 cents, and 25 cents. That is the tariff in the chief cities, such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, &c. In the large interior towns, such as Buffalo, the prices are less. These prices, at a first glance, do not seem any lower than the leading theatres charge here: but it must be taken into consideration that the charge for a ticket in America covers everything. There are no fees, either for booking, programme, or any other execution. But the most important view, and one that seems to have been entirely overlooked in this controversy, is the relative value that theatrical prices of admission bear to other things. Everything else in America is at double what you would pay for the same article here, and even more. An ordinary suit of clothes in New York, and made by a good tailor to order, costs 75 dollars, or nearly £15; a first-class suit 100 dollars, or nearly £20; a good silk hat 10 dollars, and everything in proportion—kid gloves two dollars and a half and three dollars a pair (that is, ten and twelve shillings), board, at a first-class hotel four dollars a day, and at some five. Now, considering these facts I maintain that the charges for admission to American theatres are much cheaper than the prices charged here. As regards Mr. Boucicault's other statements, such as the high prices paid to artists and the fortunes accumulated by the principal managers, they are perfectly correct. Nearly all of the principal managers are men of wealth. As to the artists who have made a fortune, their name is Legion.

I have a file of American playbills and advertisements at my office, which I should be happy to show any person doubting the truth of this letter.—Apologizing for the length of the above, I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,

H. LESLIE,
299, Strand. Lessee, Opéra Comique.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

DEAR SIR,—Can you or any of your readers kindly give me the notes of the "Muezzin's call to prayer;" which is, I understand, proclaimed from the towers of the mosques in eastern countries at sunset, by the Imaans or priests? I believe there is a set phrase which is universally chanted, and I am interested and present in obtaining the correct passage, in the key in which it is usually sung; with, indeed, any other particulars relative to the custom which you may be able to give me.

Pray pardon me for encroaching so far on your valuable space, but I do not know how otherwise to obtain the information I wish, and I dare say the subject may not be without interest to several of your musical readers.—Yours very faithfully, H. B.

Let "H. B." consult the cantata by Felicien David, entitled Le Desert. There he will find the "Muezzin."

COPENHAGEN.—At the Theatre Royal, Les Dragons de Villars has proved a failure, though Mdlle. Anna Anderson was greatly admired as the heroine.

BERLIN.—In honour of the centenary of Beethoven's birth, the members of the Musical Union, will give an extraordinary concert on the 29th inst., when the programme will include the following works:—Egmont Overture; a prologue written for the occasion; Songs of Beethoven, by Mdme. Wilt, of the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna; chorus from Christus am Oelberge, and the Ninth Symphony.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Since our last notice of the proceedings at this house various operas have been given, the most interesting of them selected from Mr. Mapleson's own repertory, at the late Her Majesty's Theatre and the Italian Opera, Drury Lane. The house has been crowded on every occasion, without exception, and if more crowded on one night than on another it has been generally when a so-called "classical" opera has been presented. Up to this time there has been no such uniformly successful winter season of Italian Opera.

In consequence of the departure of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska for her winter's engagement at Moscow, Il Flauto Magico, to the sincere regret of amateurs of genuine music, could only be given once. The more is the pity. The lovers of Italian opera par sang, however, were speedily satisfied to their hearts content by excellent performances of two of their most cherished works, which came in immediate succession after Il Flauto Magico. These were Lucrezia Borgia and Il Trovatore. In each Mdlle. Tietjens appeared, and both as the Lucrezia of Donizetti, and the Leonora of Verdi, showed herself still the unrivalled lyric tragedian of the day—legitimate successor in short of Giulia Grisi. In the first opera her chief companions were Madame Trebelli-Bettini who since Alboni retired from the stage has made the part of Maffeo Orsini, with its popular brindisi, "Il segreto per esser felice," her own; Signor Fancelli, a tenor engaged by Mr. Gye about three years since, who then made a fair impression, and who now, in the musical Germans, exhibited a tenuous sweetness which won him the applause of a large majority of the audience; and Signor Cotogni, who though, perhaps, dramatically overweighted in the character of Duke Alfonso, which Signor Ronconi, still vividly remembered, made it as difficult for any one who came after him to assume, sang the music carefully and well. In the Trovatore Mdlle. Tietjens was associated with Mdlle. Scalchi, whose Azucena is too well known to need description; Signor Cotogni, with whose Count Luna the operatic public is no less familiar; and Signor Vizzani, the new tenor introduced by Messrs. Gye and Mapleson last summer, whose Manrico, if unequal, displayed good qualities and justified strong hopes for the future. Signor Arditi, who received a warm and unanimous greeting on taking his place in the orchestra, conducted the performance of Lucrezia Borgia, Signor Bevignani that of Il Trovatore. Both operas were heartily enjoyed, and the only animadversion which it is superfluous to enumerate in detail, created the accustomed impression.

The opera next in order was Weber's Oberon, according to the arrangement of Mr. Benedict, Weber's pupil, the production of which ten years ago by Mr. E. T. Smith, at Her Majesty's Theatre, Mr. Benedict himself conducting the performance, constituted one of the musical topics of the hour. Oberon, thus transfigured, or, in justice to Mr. Benedict, let us say, thus filled up, with accompanied recitatives and additions, the former exclusively built upon themes from the music, efficient if rather cadenced, adopted from other works by Weber, and especially Euryanthe, has frequently been heard since, and always with delight, but was now heard for the first time at Mr. Gye's theatre. On the other hand the character and merits of Oberon have been so frequently commented upon in these columns that little further remains for us to do than to endeavour it in the present, and to chronicle in general terms the impression made by what on the whole was an extremely good performance. That Signor Arditi held the baton was only what might have been expected, seeing that from 1863, when the opera in its present form was revived by Mr. Mapleson, at Her Majesty's Theatre, he has conducted it on every occasion, and may be said to know the score by heart. The splendid overture, very finely executed by the band (leader, Mr. Viotti Collins), at once aroused the audience, who encored it with unanimity. And here it may at once be added that the orchestra was efficient from beginning to end, and that the music for the chorus was for the most part well executed.

The principal characters were assigned to Mdlle. Tietjens (Reiza), Madame Trebelli-Bettini (Fatima), Mdlle. Scalchi (Puck), Signori Fancelli, Bettini, and Cotogni (Sir Huon, Oberon, and Scherasmin)—the subordinate parts of Babekan and the Caliph devolving upon Signors Tagliafico and Caravoglio. Mdlle. Tietjens played Reiza in 1860, again at the revival in 1863, and has (happily) played it ever since. The German stage has, in all probability, never found a more admirable representative for the character. Those who are old enough to remember the original production of the opera, in 1826, at old Covent Garden Theatre, for which theatre, when Mr. Charles Kemble was director, it was expressly composed by Weber, to the English libretto of Mr. Planché, may be able to draw comparisons between the Reiza of Miss Paton and the Reiza of Mdlle. Tietjens; but those who are not old enough can hardly be otherwise than satisfied with its actual representative. To speak of nothing else, the grand vocal declamation of Mdlle. Tietjens, in the scena chiefly known by its original title of "Ocean, thou mighty monster," is enough to stamp her performance as one of quite exceptional excellence; but happily all the rest is to match. How charmingly Madame Trebelli sings the music of Fatima need not be told. Never has she sung it better than now; never have the quaintly characteristic airs been known as "A lonely Arab Maid," and "Oh Araby, dear Araby" (both nightly encored), been more thoroughly enjoyed; and never has "On the banks of sweet Garonne" (again to quote the English title), the melodious duet with Sherasmin, a part extremely well played by Signor Cotogni, been heard to more advantage. Signor Fancelli can boast neither the stentorian voice of Signor Mongini nor the artistic refinement of Mr. Sims Reeves, his immediate predecessors in the character of Sir Huon—nevertheless, he declaims the laborious scena, "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight," composed expressly for Braham, the original, with evident purpose, and enters into the spirit of the music if he has not entirely the power to give adequate expression to it. Signor Bettini, as Oberon, sings the air at first destined for Sir Huon, but put aside for the longer and much inferior scene to which reference has just been made, as carefully and well as on former occasions; and Mdlle. Bauermeister gives the beautiful song of the Mermaid ("Oh, 'tis pleasant to float") with unaffected and graceful simplicity. Not the least effective feature in this performance of Oberon is "Over the dark blue waters"—the stirring quartet at the end of Act 2, for Huon, Sherasmin, Reiza, and Fatima, which, admirably sung by Signora Fancelli and Cotogni, Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Trebelli, was encored with unanimity at the first performance. In this characteristically Weberian inspiration, as in the air now given to Oberon, some of the most striking points of the overture are reproduced. No new scenery has been painted for Oberon; but such scenery as was found disposable in the theatre has been ingeniously made use of; and though occasionally some anachronisms are observable, there is little cause for grumbling. And, after all, the winter season is not the regular season; nor do Il Flauto Magico, Oberon, &c., form part of the repertory of the new Covent Garden Theatre, opened by Mr. Gye in 1858.

To Oberon succeeded the Barbiere of Rossini, which we are as much tired of calling "the perennial" as we are tired of calling Il Trovatore "the impressible." The only novelty in this performance was the first appearance of Mdlle. Léon Duval, from the Paris Théâtre Lyrique. Mdlle. Duval, whose voice is French, and whose style is French, has unquestionable ability. She will understands, as any French woman should do who knows her Beaumarchais, the character of Don Bartolo a ward, and shows real intelligence in her acting. She sings, moreover, the famous soliloquy of Rosina, "Una voce poco fa," with real brilliancy, although overloading it with ornaments not always in good keeping. The same criticism may apply to the duet with Figaro, "Dunque io son." In the Lesson scene Mdlle. Duval introduced the waltz of Venzano, which the late Madame Gassier and the late Madame Bosio once made so popular, giving it with such fluency and spirit that the audience called for it again, and it was accordingly repeated. In short the new lady (who was heard in a concerted concerta in the summer) made a agreeable impression in her next essay (as Marguerite, in Faust) will be looked forward to with interest. About the Figaro of Signor Cotogni, the Bartolo of Signor Ciampi, the Basilio of Signor Tagliafico, and last and best, the Almaviva of Signor Gardoni, it is necessary to say more than that they presented their usual characteristics. The performance was conducted by Signor Bevignani.

It almost suffices to say in a line that Don Giovanni followed, as a matter of course, and that as a matter of course Fidelio succeeded Don Giovanni. Mdlle. Titiens' fine masterpieces of the two most astounding German operas, the winter series of performances would hardly be complete. There was nothing new in the cast of Mozart's great work, although Zerlina was played by a contralto—Madame Trebelli-Bettini. That Madame Trebelli-Bettini is one of the most accomplished of living artists every amateur knows, just as every amateur knows that no contralto can possibly give the music of Zerlina with the desired effect. That Madame Trebelli acted the character with intelligence, and sang the music with artistic expression, may easily be credited; but that she must be pitched a tone lower to better advantage in passages to be played in the repertory is incontestable. About the Don Giovanni of Signor Cotogni, the Leporello of Signor Ciampi, the Commandatore of Signor Foli (who, by the way, for reasons unknown, was non tacentus in the scene of the cemetery, whereby the harmony of the statute was unheard), the Masetto of Signor Tagliafico, the Donna Elvira of Madame Sinico, the Don Ottavio of Signor Bettini and the (magnificent) Donna Anna of Mdlle Tietjens, not a word could be written that has not already been written more than once. On the whole, the performance was one of more than average merit. There were the customary encores for "Là ci darem" (Madame Trebelli and Signor Cotogni), "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai carino" (Madame Trebelli), and the trio of Masks, "Protegga il giusto cielo" (Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Sinico, and Signor Bettini). Signor Arditi conducted; and the orchestral accompaniments, as well as the admirable overture were finely played throughout.

The opera on Saturday night was Fidelio, which filled the house to the ceiling. In some respects the performance left much to desire. The overture (the great Leonora, No. 3) was capitally played under Signor Arditi's vigilant guidance, and all that the orchestra had to do was well done; but the chorus, especially in the superb scene of the prisoners, was scarcely up to the mark. Mdlle. Tietjens, too, the greatness of whose Fidelio has long been acknowledged by us, was apparently somewhat fatigued, and in more than one place by no means quite herself. Her execution of the grand scena, however, even including the touching invocation to "Hope," could hardly be surpassed. We were not quite satisfied with the Rocco of Signor Antonucci, and were altogether dissatisfied with the Pizzaro of Signor Caravoglia. The Jacquino of Signor Randolini was more than respectable, the Florestan of Signor Gardoni excellent as usual, and the Marcellina of Madame Sinico irreproachable. Signor Tagliafico sang the part of the Minister in the last scene. On another occasion it would be advisable to intrust Signor Cotogni with the character of Pizarro. Mr. Santley can sing it, as we all know; and why not Signor Cotogni? True it is a boat part, and a baritone must, so to say, "stretch a point" to do it justice; but it is also a part of such vital importance that in the hands of any but a thoroughly competent artist one or two of the finest scenes of the opera run the risk of being spoiled. The audience, however, seemingly in excellent humour on Saturday night, listened to the wonderful music of Beethoven with delight, and were frequent and liberal in their applause.

We understand that it is the intention of Mr. Mapleson, except in rare instances, to give no opera more than once during the short series. If so, this will be one of the most interesting series of performances of the kind on record. The exception hitherto has been Oberon, which, already given twice, is announced for a third time on Saturday. The other operas played this week have been the Barbiere, substituted for Le Nozze, in consequence of the illness of Signor Caravaglia, who was to play the Count (Monday); Semiramide (Tuesday), and Faust—for Mdlle. Léon Duval—(Thursday). Meanwhile the superb Medea of Cherubini (which we are entirely to Mdlle. Tietjens) is in preparation; and a morning performance of the Huguenots is announced.

ST. PETER.

The amount of mis-statement put forth by, and on behalf of, Mr. Benedict, renders it necessary for me once more to return to his transactions and assertions in regard to St. Peter.

I distinctly deny that the subject of my oratorio was suggested by him to me.—It had been before me so long ago as the year 1846; when Elijah appeared. Then, when we were in Birmingham together, Mendelssohn did me the honour to invite me to work with, and for him; mentioning the paucity of scriptural subjects. I answered, as I was till his letters were published) of his settled objection to the subject. I thought of St. Peter and made studies towards the arrangement of the story, previous to submitting my attempt to him. This was never done. When I saw him the year after, at Interlaken, his mind was bent on opera. He had already, moreover, entertained the subject of Christus;—so that our talk was of an opera based on Shakspere's Winter's Tale,—and not of a third oratorio. I destroyed the original studies for St. Peter I had made, ere going to Switzerland in 1847, only last year—1869.

Subsequently, Mr. Benedict applied to me to provide him with an oratorio book for Norwich. I naturally reverted to St. Peter, and again went over the story to the best of my ability. He professed himself entirely satisfied and delighted; but according to his manner of working, after keeping it by him for some years, he declared himself too busy to undertake, for the moment a task of such importance, to which he was anxious to devote his best energies,—and entreated me to write a cantata in the mean time; adding, that many circumstances rendered him averse to risking any more extensive serious production at Norwich.—It would seem from this that so far he had trust in my capacity. The work arranged by me for him was the Legend of St. Cecilia.

Early in last year (1869) Mr. Benedict received a commission to prepare an oratorio for this year's Birmingham Festival; and my book of St. Peter having been submitted to the committee, was handed over to him to compose.—At the risk of being tedious, I must insist that I arranged my plans for the year with reference to a commission which I felt to be one of no usual interest; that I returned to town early in October, expressly to be in readiness—three weeks, it now appears, after Mr. Benedict had begun his portion of the labour. This I can prove by the following note from a witness, whose testimony I suppose Mr. Benedict will not dispute—namely himself:—

"November 13, 1869.—I was delighted to see your writing once more, and shall certainly avail myself of your permission to call upon you early in the week. The oratorio is progressing, though not so fast as I thought; and the task, if not quite beyond my power, will certainly require my utmost energy to be completed by the end of April."

I wrote to Mr. Benedict on the 15th of November—after an interview with him, which I will leave him to describe—I did not receive any reply till the 12th of January. In the interim, as will be seen, the Concordance (alias another person, who has confessed in print to the fact) had been called in—without the slightest reference to myself (I was, indeed, totally unaware of the fact till the week before the Birmingham Festival), and St. Peter was sold. On hearing in January of the sale, and also that the oratorio, words and music, had been shown to others, but not to myself, I wrote a letter of strong remonstrance, to which the following is the reply:—

"I wanted to complete the first scene of the oratorio before submitting it to you and my dear friend Costa, and hope you can manage to see me on Sunday morning. . . . . I cannot prevent idle rumours flying about. Not a human soul has heard a note of the music of my oratorio, except two old friends, to whom I played the beginning of one chorus and a fragment of the overture, which is not even written down. . . . . With regard to alterations, such as I may require for musical purposes, I hope you will give me full liberty of introducing them, of course subject to your approval; but I cannot promise a slavish and implicit submission to the selection of the words, now could you in justice demand it."

It will be observed that the above passage only refers to words; not to the structure of the story. In the MS. libretto which had remained in Mr. Benedict's hands, long accepted and again approved by him, I had expressly provided, as can be easily proved, for retrenchment and alteration; and, in fact, returned to London to be at hand for the purpose. It was natural that after a work, in part mine, had been thus disposed of, I should decline any further participation in a transaction so contemptuous, not to say insulting, to myself. From a subsequent letter dated January 20th, 1870, I offer the following corroboration of what I have stated—the witness being again Mr. Benedict:—

"I accepted your libretto" (N.B.—The libretto was entrusted to Mr. Benedict, by the Birmingham Committee, as a commission).—" which, on reading, I liked very much, and which, at first, did not strike me as quite beyond my musical powers. When, after the Norwich Festival" (in September, 1869), " which gave me an immense deal of trouble, and after the acceptance of the Oratorio by the Birmingham Committee " (in March, 1869)," I went to work with a will, I found several difficulties, which I was anxious you should rectify, so as to adapt the situations and words to my very limited capabilities. On calling upon you, and hearing you positively and emphatically assert verbally what you had already done by letter, that on re-examining carefully your libretto, you had come to the conclusion that it could not be improved, and that not a word should be changed, though some might be omitted, I endeavoured to enter into your views; but my attempts were not successful. . . . I had no alternative, unless I gave up the work altogether, than to make the changes to the best of my abilities, submitting them, when in a complete and tangible form" (i.e. after the work had been disgraced of, already cooked by and of the Concordance borrowed from a contemporary journal) " to your revision, alteration, or rejection."

Another, and to me the most distasteful word, remains to be said. My oratorio-book is in three acts. For each of these I was to receive £25, I believe, with a reservation of some right over published words; but this is a fact of small consequence. On perceiving that Mr. Benedict was literally writing " from hand to mouth," and aware that by the division of the subject made, each act had its own scene and its own character, in some sort complete within itself, I proposed to the musician to set only the two first parts for the Birmingham Festival; the third to be added subsequently; this, of course, to be distinctly announced and explained. It is stated in print that I received £75 for my work. I did not. On this matter the public shall hear a witness in my behalf—once more Mr. Benedict:—

"I am most anxious also to discharge the balance of my debt; the sum agreed upon, so far as I recollect, being £50, of which, I believe, you received half the amount, and the remainder of which I beg to enclose."

So that, having, to suit Mr. Benedict's confessed incapacity, allowed him to adjourn the completion of an entire work—by his own showing, accepted with admiration—I was paid by a sum representing two-thirds of the sum agreed on for my labour.

I state the above facts in no vindictive spirit. Resentment and Contempt cannot dwell together. On the contrary, on leaving the subject—not to return to it, be the event what it may—I am whimsically reminded, by the spasms of those who have injured me of the immortal anecdote of the Lady and her Lapdog, told by Horace Walpole. The small animal fastened his teeth on the heel of one of the lady's (possible, too, the dog's) acquaintances.—" Poor dear!" cried the sympathizing Dowager, " won't it make my dog sick?"

HENRY F. CHORLEY.

CHRISTINE NILSSON AT PHILADELPHIA.

(From the "Philadelphia Age," Oct. 24.)

Mdlle. Nilsson rounded up her present visit to this city, by a matinée at the Academy of Music, on Saturday, which was both brilliant and profitable. The audience was largely composed of ladies, and gay and varied costumes added to the interest of the occasion. Mdlle. Nilsson sang with her usual force and feeling, and was most cordially applauded. She visited this city, a stranger, known only by her reputation. She leaves it a universal favourite. Four concerts and a matinée were given in this city. The following are the detailed and aggregate receipts:—

The next appearance of Mdlle. Nilsson is in Boston, where she gives three concerts. Then she returns to New York. After a brief engagement in that city, she re-appears in Philadelphia in concert and oratorio.

THE ATHENÆUM AND THE LATE MICHAEL BALFE.

(From the "Sunday Times.")

Under this heading a correspondent has sent us some pertinent remarks, to which we willingly give insertion. He says:—

"The Athenæum of October 29th promised 'a detailed account of Mr. Balfe's life and works;' and the Athenæum of to-day (November 5th) furnishes the promised article, with the signature of Mr. Chorley. It would appear that a 'spontaneous genius' for melody was the characteristic of Balfe as a musician and the secret of his success. If this be true, Mr. Chorley is not just to the talent of the deceased when he says—'In Balfe's case the charm has been wound up for a considerable period past.' Beethoven said of Schubert, whom he esteemed as a song writer, that 'he had a spark of the divine fire;' and if spontaneity and genius appear but in a ballad they impart a vitality that does not readily expire. Hence we submit that Balfe's charm is not yet 'wound up,' nor all 'his music passed out of hearing and sympathy. What Mr. Chorley calls 'the paltry ballad, to be sung by Mr. Templeton, Mr. Phillips, or Mr. Harrison,' was in truth the 'spark of divine fire,' in which the vitality of Balfe's operatic work resided. The famous ballad, sung by Phillips in The Siege of Rochelle, still retains its melodious charm. The mutineer's song in The Rose of Castile, which its clever 'whip' accompaniment, along with the famous Laughing Trio guaranteed success to the work. It is curious that so experienced a chronicler as Mr. Chorley has omitted even to mention the most popular and successful of all Balfe's operas, The Bohemian Girl, the triumph and profits of which were in no degree dependent upon orchestral writing or concerted music, but notably on the melodious charm of two or three ballads, the well worn tenor melodies especially. The Bohemian Girl, be it remembered, was translated for classical Germany, and produced there. Most cordially do we endorse all that Mr. Chorley says about the 'flowers of sense and speech' that distinguished 'England's lyric poet' of that period—Mr. Bunn. But the quality of Mr. Bunn's poetry and the quality of Balfe's ballad-melody were two very different things. Mr. Chorley has also forgotten The Puritan's Daughter, which contains more than one charming ballad, a part-song with clever and effective writing in it, and a rollicking wine song (sung by Harrison), which is void of all British mannerism and full of character and vitality. While, therefore, we cannot but agree with Mr. Chorley in all that he says about the influence of such a writer as Balfe in hindering rather than helping the progress of operatic art, let us freely acknowledge Balfe's possession of the gift of genius—that 'spark divine,' how small soever, which gave him the power of conferring upon thousands a large amount of innocent and refining pleasure. "W.

"November 9th, 1870."

From our correspondent's standpoint, Mr. Chorley's article on the recently-deceased musician calls for the above criticism, and no more. But, looked at from another point of view, it is open to comment of quite another sort—such as, we will venture to say, every man of delicacy and good taste has made upon it. The mourners for Mr. Balfe had not dried their tears when Mr. Chorley thought fit to rush into the Athenæum with his cruel remarks. We say "cruel," because whatever gives unnecessary pain deserves to be so branded. There was no need to dance upon the freshly-laid turf of poor Balfe's grave, as Mr. Chorley has done. Truth, supposing Mr. Chorley its advocate in this instance, can wait, and, if the ex-critic of the Athenæum lets it alone, will assert itself in due time, without calling upon anybody to shock the moral sense of the community in the (indecent) style of Mr. Chorley. As regards the libretti to which Balfe set music, we agree with our correspondent that Mr. Chorley's reference to them was perfectly gratuitous. No doubt they were bad; and that the examples brought forward can only be matched by passages from the works of another lyric poet, who once wrote:—

> "'Tis very unpleasant for folk who prowl
> To shoot at a pheasant and kill an owl."

But Mr. Chorley's animadversions were, we say again, wholly beside the mark; unless, indeed, their object was to insinuate that if Mr. Balfe had gone to Mr. Chorley for his books the result would have been something very different.

Zamiel's Owl has come back to town again (last from Brightholmstone), and hopes that his singular (not to say peculiar) good Peters is well and flourishing; and that there yet remaineth of that fluid of Xeres in the darksome recesses of the abyss where the adventures of "Sir Palmerin" are not to be found. Likewise the herbaceous product of Havana. "Are not Habana and Xeres (rivers of Damascus) better than all the waters of Israel?"

MUSIC AT LEIPSIC.

(From a Correspondent.)

Mad. Clara Schumann appeared at the first Soirée of Chamber Music here, when she played the pianoforte part of Beethoven's Grand Trio in B flat major, Op. 97, and the Humoreske of her husband. Herr David played a Largo and Chaconne, by Leclair, and, with Herren Röntgen, Hermann, Thümer, and Hegar, Mozart's G minor Quintet for Stringed Instruments. The Choir of the Cathedral, Berlin, sang at the charitable concert, given by Professor Carl Riedel, and produced a very great sensation; they sang compositions by Palestrina, Durante, Lotti, Franck, Bach, Mendelssohn, and Mozart. The members of Riedel's Verein, gave Bach's cantata, Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott. Herr Hegar, leader of the Gewandhaus orchestra, performed a Sarabande by Bach, and Mdlle. Klanwell, sang Franck's song, "Sei nur Still."—The following was the programme of the fourth Gewandhaus Concert. First Part: "Hamlet," a concert overture, (Gade; Concert Air, Mendelssohn (Mad. Peschka-Leutner); Concerto for Violin, in G major, No. 11, Louis Spohr (Herr Dragonier Krancevic, from Vienna); Scena and Aria from Euryanthe, C. M. V. Weber (Mad. Peschka-Leutner); Entr'acte from Rosamunde, F. Schubert.—Second Part: Symphony No. 3, A minor, Mendelssohn. As our readers will perceive, in conformity with the pious custom of playing at the Gewandhaus concert, which takes place at the beginning of November, only works by Mendelssohn, or of those intellectually related to him, the programme was restricted to compositions by masters of the present century. Mendelsohn died, as we know, on the 4th November, and the members of the orchestra appeared urged on by the recollection of the sad event, to perform the lamented master's Symphony with even greater care, and greater effect than usual. Herr Krancevic did not make a very profound impression by the manner in which he executed Spohr's Violin Concerto. The Singacademie gave, on the 6th inst., a performance of Spohr's oratorio, Der Fall Babylons. The series of concerts announced by the Euterpe Association have been suspended this season for want of support. G. W. M.

NILSSON IN THE STATES.

We take the following from a Brooklyn (New York) paper, called the Pleasure Seeker, Oct. 27:—

"The excitement of anticipation which has pervaded fashionable circles for months past culminated when Christine Nilsson made her first appearance in America, at Steinway Hall. There has been no such demonstrations of enthusiasm in the metropolis since the furore created by the advent of Jenny Lind at Castle Garden years ago. Mdlle. Nilsson might, with propriety, quote Cæsar's memorable dispatch: 'Veni! Vidi! Vici!' for her success was a conquest on every occasion of her appearance. Steinway's commodious hall has been crowded to excess, and overflowed into the smaller hall, with a mass of enthusiastic music lovers, who desired to do honour to the fair young Swede, and welcome her in a befittingly hospitable manner. The audiences have been composed of the best class of our citizens, and were such as would cause any performer to feel proud of their power of attraction. The concerts given last week have all proved equally grand, attractive, and enjoyable. The opportunities of hearing this great artist and the gala-day who accompany them are becoming extremely limited. Mdlle. Nilsson will make her appearance at the Brooklyn Academy on Thursday evening, Oct. 27, and Wednesday, Nov. 2, in two grand concerts."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Permit me, through your pages, to contradict a rumour that the series of Orchestral Concerts in Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Although these concerts have not hitherto been a financial success, I do not yet intend to abandon the enterprise. On the contrary, I hope to be able to carry on a similar series next year, with greater energy, and with, I trust, more satisfactory commercial results.—I am yours faithfully, WILLIAM HEA.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1870-71.

DIRECTOR—MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

THE Director begs to announce that the Thirteenth Season of the Monday Popular Concerts will commence on Monday Evening, November 14, and that the Performances will take place as follows, viz.:—

1870. MONDAY, November 14; MONDAY, November 21; MONDAY, November 28; MONDAY, December 5; MONDAY, December 12; MONDAY, December 19.

1871. MONDAY, January 9; MONDAY, January 16; MONDAY, January 23; MONDAY, January 30; MONDAY, February 6; MONDAY, February 13; MONDAY, February 20; MONDAY, February 27; MONDAY, March 6; MONDAY, March 13.

Morning Performances will be given (Seven) on Saturdays, January 28, February 4, 11, 18, 25, March 4 and 11 (1871).

THE BEETHOVEN CONCERTS.

THE present year being the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, the Director has thought that it would be a fitting tribute of respect to the memory of that immortal genius to confine the programmes before Christmas exclusively to Selections from his Instrumental and Vocal Works. Every concert, until the end of the year, will therefore be a Beethoven Concert. In the course of the series, the Six Quartets, Op. 18; the Three Quartets (Rasoumowsky), Op. 59; the Quartet, No. 10 (E flat); the Five Trios for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; and as many of the Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violin, Pianoforte and Violoncello, and Pianoforte alone, as can be comprised within the limits of eight programmes, will be given. The Vocal Music will in all instances be selected from the Chamber Songs, with Pianoforte Accompaniment.

PROGRAMME OF SECOND CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 21ST, 1870.

To Commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

PART I.

QUARTET, in D major, Op. 18, No. 3, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello—Madame NORMAN-NERUDA, MM. L. RIES, ZERBINI, and PIATTI .. .. Beethoven.

SONGS, "Liederkreis"—Herr STOCKHAUSEN .. .. Beethoven.

SONATA, in D major, Op. 10, No. 3, for Pianoforte alone—Mr. CHARLES HALLE .. .. Beethoven.

PART II.

TRIO, in E flat, Op. 1, No. 1, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello—Mr. CHARLES HALLE, Madame NORMAN-NERUDA, and Signor PIATTI Beethoven.

SONGS, { "Wonne der Wehmuth" } —Herr STOCKHAUSEN .. .. Beethoven.
{ "Neue Liebe, neues Leben" }

QUARTET, in C minor, Op. 18, No. 4, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello—Madame NORMAN-NERUDA, MM. L. RIES, ZERBINI, and PIATTI .. .. Beethoven.

Conductor .. .. Mr. ZERBINI.

Sofa Stalls, 5s.; Balcony, 3s.; Admission, 1s. Tickets to be obtained of Mr. Austin, 28, Piccadilly; Messrs. Mitchell & Ollivier, Old Bond Street; Lamborn Cock & Co., 63, New Bond Street; Keith, Prowse & Co., 48, Cheapside; Hays, Royal Exchange Buildings; and of Chappell & Co., 50, New Bond Street.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. T. (Belgate)—Next week.

PIANISTA.—The "Sonate Melancolique," by the late Ignace Moscheles, is in F sharp minor. It consists wholly of the single movement of which "Pianista" speaks. There was never any other.

PONTIFEX FOURACRES.—Certainly. What was printed "per stige" in our last week's "Notices to Correspondents" should have been prestige. The word has long been adopted in the English vocabulary.

SPEX.—In the first version of Fidelio, the great overture to Leonora was included. When the curtain was raised, the opening piece was Marcellina's song in C minor. The duet between Jacquino and Marcellina was composed for the revival, in 1814, to follow the new overture in E. The idea of Nottebohm's, that the first of the three overtures in C having been composed after the two others in the same key, is too absurd to entertain for one instant.

DR. BOLUS.—Read for yourself, and own you have lost your wager, if not your self-conceit:—

> "For he who does not tremble at the sword,
> Who quails not with his head upon the block,
> Turn but a jest against him, loses heart:
> The shafts of wit slip through the stoutest mail;
> There is no man alive who can live down
> The unextinguishable laughter of mankind."

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1870.

THE genial influences of an English May produce a singular effect upon operatic artists. Everybody knows that May is the "month of flowers;" a month to be personified by all that is beautiful, and to be addressed by poets, in some such strain as this:—

> "For thee, sweet month, the groves green liv'ries wear,
> If not the first, the fairest of the year;
> For thee the Graces lead the dancing hours;
> And Nature's ready pencil paints the flowers."

On this subject one knows not when to stop quoting poetry. How charming a picture have we here:—

> "Led by the jocund train of vernal hours
> And vernal airs, sprose the gentle May;
> Blushing she rose, and blushing rose the flowers
> That sprang spontaneous in her genial ray.
> Her locks with heaven's ambrosial dews were bright,
> And amerous zephyrs fluttered on her breast,
> With every shifting gleam of morning light
> The colours shifted of her rainbow vest."

Reading this, we begin to weave a fancy fabric, warp and woof of which are bright with many hues. We have visions of Maypoles, sunshine, flowers, and a light-clad public in the highest state of bodily health and animal spirits. Meanwhile a cutting wind, nights of frost, and a pervading tendency to sneeze may represent actual facts. These things are the prose of May, to compensate for which Nature has endowed poets with vivid imagination, and the faculty of ignoring what is, in favour of what should be. There is no greater sham under the sun than an English May, and he who trusts to it had better make his account with flannels, hot baths, and gruel.

Operatic artists, we fear, place too much confidence in the geniality of our pet month. They are used to rely upon the favour of climatic (stage) influences, and, they encounter the fury of (stage) elements in the lightest of attire; so that we do not wonder when "bounteous May" presents them with a real catarrh. The consequence, however, is very awkward, as operatic experiences have too frequently shown. Managerial schemes are upset; an expectant public is disappointed; and that want of confidence ensues which, more than anything else, does harm to enterprises depending on wide-spread interest and sympathy.

Although the foregoing lines are written in mid-November, the observations they set forth and the conclusions to which they inevitably lead refer just as clearly and philosophically to the "moneth of lusty May," as though they had been written between April and June. We are not quite, perhaps, so simple as a certain correspondent, who signs himself "May-bug," may imagine. He is, doubtless, a clever fellow in his way; but we decline to entertain his malice by printing his letter, and beg to refer him to Godwin's Essay on Sepulchres, where he will find matter upon which to speculate—honestly if he can, but if not, in a manner more congenial to him.

T. E.

HERR ERNST PAUER is giving an interesting series of lectures on the Clavecin and the Pianoforte, in the Lecture Theatre of the South Kensington Museum. The first took place on Wednesday morning last. We shall take an early opportunity of referring to these instructive lectures at length.

MDLLE. SESSI, "of the long and golden locks," is engaged by Mr. Mapleson for six performances during the short series now in progress. She commences on Tuesday, with Lucia di Lammermoor. Mr. Mapleson is conducting his campaign with wonderful spirit, and well deserves success.

[I am glad to resume my translations of these interesting papers with an article apropos to the performance of the "Four overtures to Fidelio," at the Crystal Palace on Saturday Oct. 29th.—G. GROVE.]

It is usually believed that the Overture published as Beethoven's Opus 138 was written in the year 1805, and formed the first in the series of the "Overtures to Leonora." This, however, is irreconcileable with certain facts which I will endeavour to lay before the reader.

It will be necessary, in the first place, to examine the materials upon which the ordinary belief in this matter is based.

No autograph score of the Overture is known to exist. All that we at present possess is an ancient MS. copy of the score and orchestral parts, both of which have been examined and corrected by Beethoven himself. There is no note on either of the date of the composition, but the first violin part bears the following title:—

Ouverture in C
Charakteristische
Overture
Violino 1mo

The words "Ouverture" and "Violino 1mo" are by the copyist. The others "in C," "Charakteristische Overture," have been afterwards added by Beethoven. Both score and parts were purchased by Tobias Haslinger, at the sale of Beethoven's effects in November, 1827, and are at present in the possession of the firm of Haslinger, at Vienna. The Leipsic Allegemeine Musikalische Zeitung for 1828 (p. 111) contains a statement to the effect that Haslinger had bought a packet labelled "Dances and Marches, &c.," at some absurdly low price, and that the packet was found to contain the score and parts of an unknown Grand Characteristic Overture, which, according to the recollections of Schuppanzigh, had been tried over by the composer,—as, indeed, was evident from its containing his own corrections in red pencil. Early in 1828 Haslinger announced the approaching appearance of the work in the Munich Musikzeitung as "Grosse charakteristische Ouverture, 138 werk," a title which agrees in all essential respects with Beethoven's own inscription already quoted. The work, however, as we shall see, eventually appeared under another title.

The first performance of the Overture after its discovery was at a Concert of Bernhard Romberg's at Vienna, on Feb. 7th, 1828, the report of which in the Leipsic Allegemeine Musik Zeitung for 1828 (p. 225), speaks of the "great interest excited by Beethoven's last Overture, in MS., from his Remains." The same thing is repeated in the Vienna Theater Zeitung for 1828 (pages 68 and 82), while in the Sammler for Feb. 28th, 1828, we find: "At this Concert an Overture was given, from Beethoven's Remains, a work which, to judge from its quiet character, belongs to his early period." The second performance took place on the 13th of the following March at one of the Concerts Spirituels, in the programme of which it is announced as "Grosse Charakteristische Overture von Beethoven (MS.)." Other reports may be found in the Leipsic Allegemeine Musik Zeitung, 1828 (p. 296); the Berlin Musik Zeitung, 1828 (p. 216); and the Vienna Theater Zeitung, 1828 (p. 151).

It is evident from the foregoing that up to March 1828 nothing was known of the date at which the Overture was composed; nor is anything said to lead to the conclusion that it was recognized as belonging to Leonora. It was published, however, in the year 1832 or 1833, by Haslinger, under the title, "Ouverture in C, componirt im Jahr 1805 zur Oper Leonore," &c., and in the first edition of Schindler's Biography, (1840) p. 58, (compare the 3rd edition I. 127, II. 42), it is mentioned as the first of the four Overtures to Leonore, and as therefore composed before the so-called "No. 2," which was played when the Opera was first put on the boards, in 1805. With these notices, in so far as they give 1805 for the date of composition, all later statements agree; and they evidently form the foundation of the belief mentioned at the outset of these remarks.

I have, now, however, to mention a fact which has made its appearance during my examination of a large collection of Beethoven's Sketches, and is in direct opposition to the ordinary assumption.

On the upper* side of a leaf of Sketches are found the following fragments belonging to the second and third movements of the C Minor Symphony:—

* From the German of Herr Nottebohm.

* This is evident, from the marks of the binding of the volume to which the leaf originally belonged, which leave no doubt as to which was the upper and which the under side of the leaf.

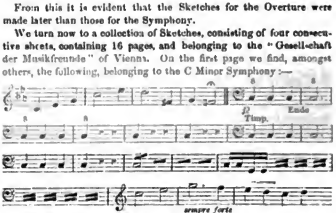
Digitized by Google

Turning over the leaf, we find the top staves of the second page occupied with the following passage from the transition to the Finale of the same Symphony :—

and this again is immediately followed by a passage belonging to the Overture, Op. 138 :—

From this it is evident that the Sketches for the Overture were made later than those for the Symphony.

We turn now to a collection of Sketches, consisting of four consecutive sheets, containing 16 pages, and belonging to the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde" of Vienna. On the first page we find, amongst others, the following, belonging to the C Minor Symphony :—



On the second page are Sketches for the Overture, extending connectedly through 12 pages, of which the following quotations will give an idea :—

These again are followed by a Sketch for the first movement of the Violoncello Sonata, Op. 69.

Digitized by Google

From the contents and relative positions of the above quotations, it is evident that the Overture was begun when the C Minor Symphony was near its close, and that it was completely sketched when the Violoncello Sonata was first taken in hand.

The time at which the Overture was commenced would be more exactly ascertainable if we knew when the Symphony was either finished or near its completion. On this point, however, we have as yet no exact information. The original MS. does not exhibit any date. Schindler's first edition (p. 63) states that the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Symphonies were written in 1806, 7, and 8; but the third edition, says that the C Minor was written at Heiligenstadt, where Beethoven was residing in the year 1808. Little reliance, however, can be placed on Schindler's statements. Thayer (Chron. Verzeichniss, p. 74) also gives 1808 as the date of composition, but with a note of interrogation. The list appended to the contract with Clementi, and dated the 20th of April, 1807, does not mention the Symphony at all, from which it is fair to infer that it was not at that time ready. The earliest date on which we can absolutely rely is the 22nd December, 1808, the day of the first performance of the Symphony; and this, therefore, limits the period of composition on one side. On the other side there are the following limitations. We can safely say that the Fifth Symphony was composed after the Fourth. Now, we know from the autograph that the Fourth was composed in 1806. It is, therefore, plain that neither the Fifth Symphony nor the Overture can have been written earlier than 1806, so that the date of the latter is thus limited to somewhere in 1806, 7, or 8. But if the contract with Clementi may be taken as evidence, we can come still closer, and say that both Symphony and Overture were composed some time between April 1807, and December 1808.

The Violoncello Sonata being written after the Overture, is of no assistance in the enquiry. Although published in 1809, it was most probably ready in January, 1808, if not sooner.

THE Beethoven contributions to the Crystal Palace Concert of to-day are the Symphony in A (No. 7), and the Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in E flat (No. 5), the pianist being Madame Arabella Goddard.

VIENNA.—Baron von Münch, Bellinghausen, has definitively resigned the direction of the Imperial Theatres. Up to the present time, no successor has been appointed.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE Tanzpresse of Vienna gives a curious extract from the Court regulations of the Hofburg for the year 1624, on the etiquette to be observed by officers invited to the royal table. The regulation begins by stating that usually officers behave under such circumstances "with great politeness and good breeding, like true and worthy cavaliers; but that the Emperor thinks it necessary to issue the following directions for the use of inexperienced cadets:—1. Officers should come to the palace handsomely dressed, "and not enter the room in a half-drunken state." 2. When they are at table "they should not rock about on their chairs, nor sit back and stretch out their legs." 3. They should not "drink after each mouthful, as by so doing they will very soon get drunk; nor drink more than half a glass at a time; and before drinking they should wipe their lips and moustachios." 4. They should not put their hands in the dishes nor throw bones under the table. 5. They should not "lick their fingers nor spit on the plate; nor wipe their noses with their napkins; nor drink so brutally as to fall off their chairs."

To Shirley Brooks, Esq.

ONE would think that the members of the corps de ballet were not the best qualified to adjudge a question of orthography, especially when the one accused of bad spelling was a French Academician; nevertheless messieurs les danseurs once gave judgment on an etymological dispute between Jules Janin, of the Débats, a recently-elected member of the French Academy—one therefore of the forty guardians of the French language—and Alberic Second, editor of the Entr'acte. Janin, in an article on Mdlle. Bozzachi, the young ballet dancer at the French Opera, made use of the word "tiqueté," which denotes, in the language of the foyer, a certain movement of the feet. Second maintained that he should have written "tacqueté," and entreated Perrin, director of the Opera, to take the sense of the corps on this question. The dancers were accordingly "assembled in their comitia," and proceeded to record the votes. Taglioni presided, and when the urns were opened there were found 287 in favour of "tacqueté," and not one for "tiqueté." The academician stood corrected. Ne sutor ultra crepidam.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society begins on the 25th, with Juda Maccabæus, after which some novel features will, in due time, invite attention. Among these is a special concert, in honour of, Beethoven, to take place on the eve of the hundredth anniversary of his birthday, the programme comprising the Mass in C, and the Mount of Olives. This will be welcome to the many who have felt anxious lest the centenary should pass without adequate notice. Certain novelties are promised, but no particulars are given, and an announcement is made of co-operation with the Crystal Palace, in view of another Handel Festival, to which the Sacred Harmonic subscribers are promised free admission. One more feature in the prospectus is connected with that egregious building at South Kensington, called the Royal Albert Hall. The society will give concerts within its ample space during May and June next, to one of which, at least, the happy subscribers will be passed free. There only remains to add that Sir Michael Costa, reports to the contrary notwithstanding, will conduct the performances of the Sacred Harmonic Society on all occasions, as usual.

MOST of the Vienna papers have lately been occupying themselves a good deal with Herr Richard Wagner, who, it appears, has been suffering very badly from a nervous complaint. He is better now, and is working away at the third part of his Nibelungen Trilogy. Herr Ründworth is preparing the pianoforte arrangement of the second part, Siegfried. According to the papers, the report that Herr Wagner intends himself to conduct the entire Trilogy at Munich, in 1872, is false, because it is his firm resolve never to set foot in the place again; besides, he has found some other capital, of far greater importance, for his "model performances," though, as yet, he has not informed his friends and admirers what capital it is. Can it be Berlin? Quien sabe?

An admirable concert has just been given at St. Lawrence-on-Sea Thanet, in aid of the Fund for the Sick and Wounded French and German Soldiers. The artists were "amateurs," but they performed like amatores of music, wherein many of them are well-known proficients. We could gladly have been there. Gladly, too, could we have heard that unsurpassed mistress of elocution, Mrs. Keeley, deliver the following address by our respected accomplice, Mr. Shirley Brooks; for in that lady, and in very few other ladies of the drama, resideth the art of delivering—with completeness, grace, and force—the language which an author furnisheth.

One flourish on a trumpet! On a drum
One thundering herald of proud words to come!
Ne drum! No trumpet! Music "takes a rest."
Well, on the wheels, perhaps, 'tis for the best.

Yes, for although the theme those words (Points to plenard with "Sick and Wounded") supply
Might leave no heart untouched, no eyelid dry,
This is, I think, no place, and this no time,
To weave a crimson thread in links of rhyme;
Needless to harrow you with hideous things,
Whose sickening picture every morning brings,
Till woman's fortitude and manhood's pride,
Alike e'er mastered, throw the page aside.
We meet for pleasure. Needless to explain
Our pleasure's offerings go in aid of pain.
Fair Charity hath worked her charm—you've come—
That charmer's voice, at least, may now be dumb.
For sacred use she bears away your gold,
Nor need her mournful tale again be told.

But yet, methinks, an explanation's due
To one who's absent, to myself, and you.
He, when desired to write for me to-day,
Asked me (politely) what I wished to say;
Said if I liked sensational appeals,
And big words tumbling on each other's heels,
His best were at my service—he had store—
If I aspired to talk of battle roar;
The cannon's earthquake shout, the demon shell;
The thundering charge, the close, the combat yell,
"And all the current of a heady fight;"
And the worse terrors of the after sight ——
I smote his table with a downright blow,
And most emphatically answered, "No!"
A place for all things— such do not belong
To places where we meet for smile and song.

And yet some little quarrel should be rife,
(For without quarrel where's the fun of life?)
Suppose we pick a very tiny crow
With one who crows enough; I mean, you know,
Music, spoiled darling of the poets. She
To whom great bards and small ones bend the knee,
She (says a line oft into service pressed)
"Has mighty charms to soothe the savage breast,"
I hope she has. But when fierce music comes,
Her mad pulse beating in her maddening drums,
When her war-trumpets give their fiery crash,
And her clashed cymbals bid the sabres clash,
Her soothing system for the savage 'beast'
Is homœopathy, to say the least.

But she shall make amends, at least to-night,
And help to comfort those she stirred to fight.
"Music may be the food of Love," it's true,
(That's a mild diet, twixt myself and you),
But food she shall be, or she shall supply,
Where Hate's and victims in their anguish lie.
Our Love goes forth to search where sorrow hides,
And Music feeds the store that Love divides.
Thus with your leave the resolution stands,
"That we be cheerful."

Now! the show of hands.
Carried, nem. con. (I hope that Latin's right)
My mission's done; to all a kind good night.

We take the following from a Philadelphia paper:—

"The dress worn by Mdlle. Nilsson at her first concert was said to be one of the most exquisite toilettes ever seen in this country. It was a white gros-grain silk, with long skirt, trimmed with flounces of lace, looped over at each side with vines of morning glories. Her hair was dressed very simply, and ornamented with a single morning glory, with a diamond humming bird and butterfly lighting on the flower. Necklace of pearls and diamonds, and heavy gold bracelets set with diamonds, completed this beautiful toilette. She is noted, it is said, all over Europe for her taste in dress."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Royal Academy of Music.—The most recent "Public Rehearsal" of the students was strictly "classical," the works of Handel, Mozart, and Mendelssohn being drawn upon for the exhibition of the young artists' abilities. The progress made in the vocal department within a short space of time was shown in the correct and conscientious way with which the fragments from Mendelssohn's unfinished oratorio, Christus, were given. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Rebecca Jewell, Messrs. Guy, Wadmore, and Parry, who did themselves infinite credit. Praise must also be awarded to the members of the chorus, for the manner in which they executed the parts allotted to them. The other vocal pieces were Mozart's "Al desio" (Le Nozze di Figaro), sung by Miss Pocklington; the recit. and aria from the same opera, "Hai già vinta la causa, ma ingrato" by Mr. Parry; Mozart's "Kyrie," in D minor (chorus—first performance in England); and Mendelssohn's duet with chorus, "I waited for the Lord" (Lobgesang), the solo singers being Miss Andrews and Miss Maudsley (Westmorland scholar). There were two pianoforte solos, viz., Hummel's Rondo in A, carefully played by Miss Martin, and Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor, dashed off with immense spirit by Miss Baglehole, who was warmly applauded. The concert was admirably conducted by Mr. John Hullah. The next "Public Rehearsal" is announced for Thursday evening, the 24th inst.

PROVINCIAL.

Cheltenham.—The Chronicle, of November 15, contains a notice of Miss Marian Buell's concert, from which we abridge the following:—

"Where all is excellent it were invidious to select; but we may be allowed to record our enjoyment of the (MS.) sonata by Miss Hoelle. It was her own composition, and the various movements met with deserved applause. Neither should Herr Pollitzer or M. Paque, both instrumentalists of high capacity, be dismissed without praise. The solo for viola, La Favorita (violin), by the former, and Don Giovanni, by the latter (violoncello), were particularly well received. Last, not least, it is our pleasing duty to notice the abilities displayed by the Misses Doria. Two solos were allotted to each, and after 'Come per me sereno' (Bellini), Mdlle. Clara was recalled. She also sung 'The Mermaid's Song' (Barnett). We were charmed with the feeling displayed by Mdlle. Rosamunda in the 'Nameless Grave on the Battle Field'—touching at any time, but made the more so by her exquisite enunciation. Herr Wagner presided, in his accustomed able manner, at the pianoforte—one of Broadwood's, supplied by Mr. Finlayson of this town."

Nottingham.—We copy with pleasure from a local paper the following:—

"A series of four popular concerts of classical music are announced to be given in November and December, 1870, January and February, 1871, at the Mechanics' Large Hall, on a plan similar to that of the celebrated Monday Popular Concerts, held in St. James's Hall, London. The quartets are to be played by Mr. Henry Farmer (first violin), Mr. H. Leverton (second violin), Mr. Myers (viola), and Mr. T. L. Selby (violoncello). Madame Arabella Goddard, Miss Butler, Mr. J. Farmer, jun., &c., are engaged to play in the course of the series; and a vocalist of eminence will appear at each concert. The concerts are under the entire direction of Mr. Henry Farmer, who has already done so much to make genuine music acceptable in Nottingham. The first concert is announced for the evening of November 28th; and this year being the centenary of the birth of Beethoven, the programme will be selected entirely from his works."

Every one who wishes well to good music will wish success to Mr. Henry Farmer.

Munich.—Herr Theobald Böhm, formerly a member of the orchestra of the Royal Opera, and well known throughout the world of music as composer, virtuoso, and the inventor of the flute bearing his name, lately celebrated his "Golden Wedding," as the Germans call it; in other words, the fiftieth anniversary of his marriage. This musical Nestor is in excellent health.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The 38th annual meeting of this society was held in the Minor Hall, Exeter Hall, on Wednesday evening. Mr. Daniel Hill having been called to the chair, the hon. secretary, Mr. Thomas Brewer, read the report for the past year. As the ordinary proceedings of the society have from time to time received prominent notice by the public press, such topics, which naturally occupied a large part of the report, need not be here repeated. A proposed Handel Festival, on the magnificent scale of former years, at the Crystal Palace in June next, and some concerts of sacred music at the Royal Albert Hall, now in process of completion at Kensington, in May and June, were referred to. The report contained a feeling reference to the recent loss the society has sustained by the death of Mr. J. N. Harrison, president of the society from its commencement, and that of Mr. R. K. Bowley, one of the oldest members of the society, and of late years its treasurer. The vacancies so occasioned were filled by the election of Mr. Thomas Brewer, the society's honorary secretary from its first formation in 1832, to be president, and Mr. Daniel Hill, for many years past honorary superintendant of the society's soprano chorus, to be treasurer. The post of honorary secretary thus vacated was filled by the election of Mr. J. F. Puttick.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I hope you will think the subject of this letter to be of sufficient importance for a small space to be devoted to it in your influential columns. The organ-grinding nuisance has been a long-standing grievance in this city. It is one, however, which is more acutely felt by some than others. In the crowded thoroughfares the discordant drone of these loud-tongued instruments is more or less drowned by the noise of the carriage traffic. Those who are absent from home during the greater part of the day are only partially subjected to it. It is something less annoying to those who have no particular occupation, or who live in spacious houses in wide streets; but to those who, like myself, inhabit houses of humble dimensions, in narrow and quiet streets, and whose occupation is a literary one, the nuisance is quite unbearable.

The most exquisite music, perfectly performed, if it were inflicted upon you with intolerable regularity every day, and at all hours of the day, whether you liked it or not, would become odious and unbearable. What must be the nervedepressing groaning of barrel-organs forced upon you with such remorseless persistency that, from 9 o'clock in the morning until 11 in the evening, not an hour of your existence can be considered safe. The law, it is true, provides a remedy. But the remedy is almost as painful as the grievance. Tapping at your window, beckoning, are of no use. You must sally forth from your house, run the gauntlet of street gamins, flirty tenants of the areas, mothers of very large broods of young children, &c., and walk quiet up to your man. And what is worse still, you cannot rid yourself of the reflection that you may possibly be depriving him of a halfpenny or a penny of his earnings. To make it up to him yourself, as I have often done, is to invite the nuisance you are trying to rid yourself of. If the man refuses to leave, matters are still worse. You must fetch a policeman; with the two you must walk to the police-office. You must sign the charge yourself, attend the next day at the court, kick your heels about there the greater part of the day, to depart with the melancholy satisfaction of having brought punishment upon a poor fellow whom you would rather succour and relieve. But it would appear from the letter, a copy of which I subjoin, that henceforth we are to be permitted to have recourse even to that. We are threatened with the Italian knife, and, for the future, we are to be forced to listen to the horrible sounds produced by these gentry as often and as long as they please under the penalty of assassination.

The following is a copy of a letter which I received yesterday evening:—

"The Gentelmin

" . . . . . .

"by fulham road.

"You bad man. You went starve poor organ playrs One will pay you for it. Dark night me watch, no fight, me get one knife. Look out, me warn you."

If this, then, is to be an Englishman's alternative, living in his own house, in his own country, to submit to the organ nuisance for the rest of his life, or to be assassinated, one will scarcely know which to chose. Yours, &c.,

Nov. 13. AN ENGLISHMAN.

"The extreme ignorance of amateurs of music generally is a great danger to music." This was one of the sayings of Petipace of Winchelsea, who did not tire of repeating it.

AUGSBURGH.—Two performances were lately given of Herr Schachner's oratorio, Israel's Heimkehr, which was not unfavorably received. The soprano part was sung by the Countess Gatterburg, of Salzburgh, who has taken an immense liking for the work, and made up her mind to procure the recognition in Germany of its merits. It is entirely owing to her exertions, we are informed by a German contemporary, that Israel's Heimkehr has already been performed within a short period at Vienna, Salzburgh, and Kremsmunster.

WAIFS.

Madame Arabella Goddard has returned to London.

At the first meeting of the York Choral Union Mr. Barnby's Rebekah was performed, conducted by the composer, with Misses Edith Wynne and J. Elton, Messrs. Cummings and Maybrick.

The New York Herald, of Oct. 29, states that Mdlle. Christine Nilsson's last appearance in the "Empire City," was to be on the Monday following (Oct. 31), at an evening concert.

Mr. Horton C. Allison, of the Conservatoire of Leipsic, formerly pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes, has just completed a new concerto for the pianoforte, which is highly praised by musical connoisseurs in Manchester, where Mr. Allison is now located.

Three entirely musical scores have been found at Milan, amongst the old papers of a family of the name of Castelli. The scores, which are autograph, are—La Secchia Rapita, by Zingarelli, performed at La Scala in 1793; Un pazzo ne fa cento, by Mayr, performed in 1793; and La Fortuna Combinazione, composed by Bloca.

Mr. Cowen's new cantata, The Rose Maiden, is announced for performance at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening next. The principal vocalists, together with the orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera, are engaged for the occasion, so that a performance of more than ordinary excellence is anticipated.

A "grand evening concert" is announced to take place in St. James's Hall, on Thursday next, in aid of the Refugee's Benevolent Fund. The concert is under distinguished patronage. The mere fact that Madame Viardot is one of the singers, and M. Gounod one of the conductors, ought to make the concert attractive.

Miss Annie Louise Cary—contralto or mezzo soprano—who will be remembered last season both at the Royal Italian Opera and the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, has been winning golden opinions in America, as one of the most attractive members of the Nilsson troop. Miss Cary is herself an American, and her compatriots are justly proud of her.

The Musical Committee of the Society of Arts have recommended to the Commissioners of the International Exhibition of 1871 to permit professors having systems of teaching music to illustrate them by lectures or performances. Although musical instruments as a class will not be exhibited in 1871, pianoforte manufacturers will have the opportunity at some subsequent exhibition to submit to the Committee of Selection for Class 10 (educational works and appliances) such instruments as are adapted for school use.

The unanimity in which the American press continues to praise Madame Seebach seems to indicate that a tragic actress has at length appeared. One of the least gushing of her critics likens her performance of Adrienne Lecouvreur to that of Rachel, and adds, after employing such words as "infinite pathos" and "prodigious power"—"the American stage has never witnessed an impersonation in which fervour, force, and grace were more harmoniously blended."

A result of the inter-ference of the magistrates with the performances at the Alhambra has been a revulsion of popular feeling on behalf of ballets in theatres. At no time during the present reign or the preceding, has ballet enjoyed an amount of favour equal to that now accorded it in London and the country. At the Standard Theatre the Alhambra ballet has been produced with complete success, while the nymphs who aroused police disapproval and magisterial inter-ference found a home at the Globe. Surely if interference is needed it should be comprehensive, and have no appearance of favour.

A curious incident is related by the Daily Chronicle as having occurred in the Town Hall, Newcastle-upon-Tyne:—

"A special request was made by one of the visitors that the great tenor would sing 'The Last Rose of Summer.' Mr. Reeves willingly consented, and Mr. Rea undertook to play the accompaniment. The first two verses were magnificently given, and so far all was well, but a hitch occurred at the beginning of the last verse, which for some time the audience were at a loss to comprehend. The fact was that Mr. Reeves had forgotten the words of the verse, and for the moment could not recall them to memory. In answer to a whispered interrogation, Mr. Rea could only reply that he, too, had forgotten the concluding words of the song, and a similar appeal passed round to the nearest members of the orchestra was likewise fruitless in obtaining the services of a prompter. Under the circumstances only one course was left. Mr. Reeves bowed and retired, amidst the wonderment of the puzzled audience. Worst of all, no sooner had the great tenor reached the foot of the stairs leading from the platform, than the words which so stubbornly refused to come at the call of memory when urgently invoked a few seconds previously, returned unbidden with verbal accuracy. But it was too late! Mr. Reeves did not return."

Our advertising columns announce a memoir of the late M. W. Balfe, by Mr. H. J. St. Leger. Many anecdotes will be introduced, and we have no doubt that as Mr. St. Leger was for thirty-six years on terms of intimacy with our popular dramatic composer, his memoir will be acceptable to many who are interested in matters connected with English opera.

THE "ROYAL" EDITION

OF

STANDARD OPERAS,

FOR VOICE AND PIANOFORTE.

EDITED BY

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

The wide-spread popularity which of late years has existed for the masterpieces of the Lyrical Drama, has suggested to Messrs. BOOSEY the expediency of publishing a popular edition of the chief Operas at present holding the stage.

Under the title of The "Royal" Edition of Standard Operas, Messrs. BOOSEY propose issuing, at fortnightly intervals, the complete Pianoforte scores, with words, of the chief Operatic Works of the day, in a form at once compendious, elegant, and moderate in price. The Musical text, given in all its integrity, and including in many cases whole pieces usually omitted, will be thoroughly and carefully revised by Mr. ARTHUR SULLIVAN, with whom will be associated Mr. JOSIAH PITTMAN. The words will be in Italian (that being the recognized language of the lyrical drama throughout the world), together with a carefully executed English version, printed under the Italian text. To meet every demand on the part of the public, it is intended to issue extra editions of the most important French and German Operas, with words in their original language, in addition to the versions now publishing in Italian and English. These will be announced hereafter. The unaccompanied recitatives which occur in the older Operas will be given, for the convenience of the public, in the form of dialogue, in both languages.

This Edition will be printed from a new fount of type, of remarkable clearness, on the finest paper; thus, the convenient size and completeness of this edition will serve not only for study at the Pianoforte, but will effectually supersede the libretti used in the theatres, enabling the auditor to follow the representation of an Opera in the manner that has been so popular at the performances of Oratorios.

The Operas will be published in volumes, Super-Royal 8vo, containing from 200 to 270 pages, price Half-a-Crown each; also elegantly bound in crimson cloth, gilt lettered, and gilt edges, 4s. each.

The Operas will appear in the following order:—

November	1st	Mozart's DON GIOVANNI.
„	15th	Beethoven's FIDELIO.
	(This Edition will include the FOUR Overtures.
December	1st	Rossini's IL BARBIERE.
„	15th	Bellini's LA SONNAMBULA.
January	1st	Flotow's MARTHA.
„	15th	Verdi's IL TROVATORE.

The "Royal" Edition will include all the principal acting Operas, the titles of which will be announced in future Advertisements.

Subscribers' names will be received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers in the United Kingdom, or by the Publishers,

ST. PETER, MR. CHORLEY, AND MR. BENEDICT.

(From the "Orchestra.")

In the unfortunate dispute between Messrs. Benedict and Chorley, the latter gentleman has now delivered his ultimatum. Affixing his signature to a couple of columns of re-statement in the Athenæum, he takes leave of the subject, "not to return to it, be the pretext what it may." It is a pity that these gentlemen have continued to establish a serious quarrel upon a comparatively unimportant matter. Half-an-hour's conversation might have prevented all their letter-writing; and we trust that we have now seen really the last epistle. Still, in Mr. Chorley's ultimatum we should look for so concise and eloquent a summing-up of damaging facts against his opponent, that there is really nothing more to be said. We are sorry to say we do not find it. There is a mass of cumbrous phraseology, which requires to be read and re-read, and looked at sideways, and then grammatically disintegrated, in order to get at its meaning. When the meaning is discovered (which is not always the case) it amounts to what we had understood before. Mr. Chorley corroborates Mr. Benedict's statements with four exceptions. These are:—

I. The subject of St. Peter (Mr. Chorley maintains) was not suggested by Mr. Benedict, but by himself, Mr. Chorley.—II. That it was the Birmingham Committee who handed over the libretto of St. Peter to Mr. Benedict, ordering him to write the music.—III. That the sum agreed for the three acts of Mr. Chorley's libretto was 75*l.*, not 50*l.*—IV. That Mr. Chorley has only received two-thirds of this stipulated amount.

Of these four points at issue, the first is unimportant. Whether Mr. Benedict first thought of St. Peter, or whether Mr. Chorley first advised him to do it, is of very little consequence. It can hardly be considered an original idea, seeing that Mendelssohn had composed St. Paul, and had also thought of composing St. Peter. The two saints are historically bracketed on a score of occasions, and churches are dedicated to them conjointly. They are associated in a common proverb; they are, in fact, as complementary to each other as Moses and Aaron, as Elijah and Elisha, as Ruth and Naomi. Mr. Chorley says he had talked the subject over with Mendelssohn in 1846. Now, a self-suggestive idea which has been carried about for twenty-four years, and offered to more persons than one, can hardly be said to be anybody's exclusive property. The first point, therefore, is of very little consequence. The second is more important, inasmuch as it places the Birmingham Committee in an autocratic light, and equally places Mr. Benedict in the light of a needy composer, anxious for a job. It assumes that the Committee took Mr. Chorley's manuscripts at first hand, and ordered Mr. Benedict to set it; as who should say, "Here, you musician—just make some music to this, and look sharp!" Mr. Chorley implies this off-hand conduct on behalf of the committee, if he does not absolutely state it in words. And the deduction of his argument is that Mr. Benedict had no choice but to comply with the Birmingham order—to set that libretto, and set nothing else. "My book of St. Peter having been submitted to the committee, was handed over to him to compose." Again: "The libretto was entrusted to Mr. Benedict by the Birmingham Committee, as a commission." This assertion, if it means anything, means that Mr. Benedict had no selection of subject or matter. Now, we are loth to believe any such thing; indeed we find it almost impossible to believe that Mr. Benedict would submit to arbitrary treatment like this. How could the Birmingham Committee tell what might suit a musician? How could they order a composer in Mr. Benedict's position to set a specified libretto, will he, nill he? An oratorio is not like a coat, which the customer may have cut out in any fashion he pleases. And a West-End tailor will even refuse to make a bizarre coat. Is Mr. Benedict less an artist than Mr. Poole?

"The book of St. Peter was submitted to the Birmingham Committee," says Mr. Chorley. By whom was it submitted? He does not state: he uses the vague passive voice. If Mr. Chorley submitted the book, and the Birmingham Committee accepted it, and handed it on, then Mr. Chorley's case is so far complete. But if it was Mr. Benedict who sent the book to Birmingham, and received it back from Birmingham as approved, then the case breaks down. In that event Mr. Benedict is simply placed in the position of one who has changed his mind with respect to the words he is trying to set; and the authority of the Birmingham Committee disappears. They are reduced to the level of sanctioners of any version which the composer chooses to accept. So much for the second point.

Point three is one on which there is no documentary evidence. Mr. Benedict says 50*l.* was the price; Mr. Chorley says 75*l.*; but neither has the bargain in writing. Moral, for dearest friends when collaborating:—Put your bargain into black and white; a dozen years may make a wonderful difference in friendship. Point four is a sort of rider to Point three. Mr. Benedict, years after the bargain, sent a cheque for 25*l.*, to Mr. Chorley. This, he now says, was an over-payment by mistake, as he had already paid 50*l.* "Not at all," says Mr. Chorley; "it was the second half of the fifty;" and he quotes Mr. Benedict's letter to that effect. "My letter was written under a mistaken impression," says Mr. Benedict. "Oh dear no, it wasn't," says Mr. Chorley: "here it is down in writing." So far Mr. Chorley has the legal pull. "And you owe me another 25*l.* balance of the 75*l.*" says Mr. Chorley. Moral, to dearest friends who have monetary transactions:—Always take receipts, or else preserve your old cheque-books. A curious side-issue suggests itself here. If that autocratic Birmingham Committee treated with Mr. Chorley for the libretto, and "entrusted" Mr. Benedict with the setting of it, as a commission, how is it they did not pay Mr. Chorley? Was the cashing-up also "entrusted" to Mr. Benedict, as a commission? We admire the Birmingham Committee's lordly mode of procedure. They order Mr. Benedict to set certain words, and they also order him to pay for them. This—sequitur, we owe Mr. Chorley's statement—is patronizing art at a cheap rate.

The above points mark the divergence of Mr. Chorley's story from Mr. Benedict's story. On other points the twain seem to agree, so far as facts are concerned. We say seem to agree; for it is impossible to gather a comprehensive view from the ultimatum—so involved and irrelevant is it. It is full of unimportant statements like the following:—

"At the risk of being tedious, I must insist that I arranged my plans for the year (namely 1869) with reference to a commission which I felt to be one of no inconsiderable interest; that I returned in good early in October, expressly to be in readiness—three weeks, it now appears, after Mr. Benedict had begun his portion of the labour. This I can prove by the following note," &c., &c.

What does it matter? Even though Mr. Chorley thought his share in the work of imperial interest, and returned to town by express, and took a house on the banks of the Thames, expecting to see that river catch fire forthwith—what has that to do with the question at issue? It only shows what exaggerated notions people may form about their own importance in society. We wonder if Handel's librettist went about town in a similar state of excitement when the Messiah was getting under way! Who thinks of Handel's librettist now? Supposing St. Peter turns out a second Messiah a hundred years hence, who will think of the compiler of its texts?

Besides the irrelevancy of the ultimatum, and the curious glimpse it gives us of the author's self-esteem, it is rendered foggy by incomprehensible metaphor. For instance the writer says that he "perceived Mr. Benedict was literally writing 'from hand to mouth.'" What does this mean? We know what is meant by living from hand to mouth; the phrase is applied to a poor man who is compelled to devour his income as fast as he makes it. But how can you write from hand to mouth? Does Mr. Chorley mean that Mr. Benedict ate his manuscripts as fast as he wrote them out? Or that he said them as they were completed in order to get his daily bread? Nay; for it was a consecutive work, and could not be hawked about town in separate portions. If Mr. Chorley had said that the composer was writing from hand to brain, there would be some glimmering of sense: it would mean that he had set the libretto piecemeal, as he received it. But if this be the meaning, it conveys no reproach to the composer, but rather to the librettist, who should have sent in his book complete. Here is the conclusion:—

"I state the above facts in no vindictive spirit. Resentment and Contempt cannot dwell together. On the contrary, on leaving the subject—not to return to it, be the pretext what it may—I am whimsically reminded, by the spasms of those who have injured me, of the immortal anecdote of the Lady and her Lapdog, told by Horace Walpole. The small animal fastened his teeth on the heel of one of the lady's (possibly, too, the dog's) acquaintances 'Poor dear!' cried the sympathizing Dowager; 'I won't it make my dog sick.'"

A very good story. But where, please, is the application? Which is the figurative lady, and which the dog? Has Mr. Chorley bitten Mr. Benedict, and made himself sick, or is it Mr. Chorley whose flavour turns the stomach? We ask for information; because, in either case, Mr. Chorley does not apply to himself a flattering parable. He confesses either to be sick himself, or the cause of sickness in others. We dismiss this ultimatum, as probably the last word to be said on the St. Peter libretto by either side. The statement concludes, appropriately enough, in a Novembrian haze. "Resentment and Contempt," says Mr. Chorley, "cannot dwell together." But Contempt and Fog may.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The interest attaching to the revival of Semiramide, on Tuesday week, was due almost entirely to recollections of its performance at her Majesty's Opera (Dury Lane) in 1868, and on previous occasions, when the dramatic embodiment of the Queen of Mdlle. Tietjens, and the admirable singing of Madame Trebelli (Arsace) made so lively a sensation. We shall not now enter upon a criticism of Rossini's work. Enough that, though the latest example of its composer's Italian style, it is one which he subsequently left far behind, and that, with all its wealth of melody, and charm of effect, it belongs to a school which, for good or avil, has nearly lost its hold upon public favour. The distinguishing features of Mdlle. Tietjens's Semiramide must be fresh in the recollection of all who have observed them; it being impossible to forget either the tragic power which ranks the part with her Norma and Medea, or the passionate expression which invests with grandeur music in itself often trivial. These characteristics were as obvious as ever during the performance under notice; and the gifted artist was rewarded by enthusiastic applause, which culminated after a more than usually brilliant rendering of "Bel' raggio." Madame Trebelli's Arsace worthily accompanied the Semiramide we have just praised, all the music of the part, especially "In si barbara," being sung with that refinement of style and beauty of voice so distinctive of the French contralto. Signor Foli did his best as Assur—a rôle unfamiliar to him; Signor Bettini was a careful Idreno; and the music of Oroe was impressively given by Signor Antonucci. Signor Bevignani conducted.

Faust, on Thursday week, introduced a new Marguerite, in Mdlle. Léon-Duval, the lady of whose début as Rosina, in Il Barbiere, it was our agreeable duty to speak with favour. From the heroine of Rossini's lightsome opera to that of Gounod's tragic masterpiece was a venturesome step; the latter demanding higher qualities than ability to execute a promscious intrigante, and to sing "Una voce poco fa." The result, however, went some way towards justifying the effort. Mdlle. Duval may not have placed before her audience a Marguerite to be remembered for its individuality, or for the finish of its details; but she embodied the character with intelligence sufficient to ensure respect, and sang the music with more than average success. Bearing in mind the artists who had preceded her in the same part on the same stage, this result is by no means one to be despised. The other characters were sustained in a manner more or less familiar. Mdlle. Scalchi, an efficient Siebel, obtained an encore for "Parlatele d'Amor;" and Mdlle. Bauermeister sang the music of Marta better than she looked Marta's age. Signor Vizzani did his best with the music of Faust, not without success, especially in "Salve dimora;" Signor Cotogni was an excellent Valentine; and, as Mephistopheles, Signor Foli displayed those ideas of a demon temper which were so noticeable last season in Robert le Diable. The conductor was Signor Arditi, under whose direction the orchestral accompaniments went admirably.

The ever-fresh melodies of Verdi, and the fame of Mdlle. Tietjens' priestess, drew a crowded house on Monday last. No lapse of time on the one hand, and no familiarity on the other, seems able to diminish the attraction of Bellini's opera. It may owe somewhat—in the case of Mdlle. Tietjens it owes much—to the special powers of rarely-gifted artists; but "Norma always has been, still is, and, presumably, always will be, a charm in itself. The music is emphatically adequate to the effect, for no work abounds more in that which has been called the "soul of music"—tune. Monday's performance was one of average merit. Mdlle. Tietjens evidently struggled against an indisposition which affected her voice, but indomitable energy carried her through; and, dramatically her performance was as grand as ever. Its more prominent features need not be enlarged upon for the hundredth time. Enough that, from first to last, the audience recognized an impersonation which will live in the history of the lyric stage. Madame Sinico was once more an Adalgisa with whom little, if any, fault could be found; and her co operation with Mdlle. Tietjens in the popular duet at the commencement of Act 2, largely helped to secure a double recall. Signor Fancelli, as the Roman lover, displayed to their full extent those qualities which have won him the favour he enjoys, and sang throughout with praiseworthy care. That he did not invest the part with interest can hardly be termed a fault. The character is essentially contemptible; and contemptible it must remain, no matter who may be its representative. Signor Antonucci gave the music of Oroveso with all needful dignity, and, in the final scene, not without a touch of pathos well becoming the situation. The remaining and subordinate parts were efficiently sustained by Mdlle. Bauermeister and Mr. Wilford Morgan. Signor Bevignani presided over an orchestra not entirely faultless.

Tuesday Lucia was given for the first appearance of Mdlle. Sessi. On Thursday the opera was Le Nozze di Figaro. To-night, Semiramide (second time)

THADDEUS EGO.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite.—The Civil Service Gazette remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Each packet is labelled: JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists, London. Also makers of Epps's Cocoaine, a very thin evening beverage.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

A concert was given in this hall on Wednesday evening week under Mr. Henry Leslie's direction, the chief feature of the programme being Rossini's Messe Solennelle, a work which those who do not sympathize with the cold reception it has had in England must have been glad to hear. The Mass was given under circumstances specially advantageous. Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Bettini, and Signor Foli were the soloists. The chorus consisted of Mr. Leslie's admirable choir, and the accompaniments were played by Mr. J. G. Calcott, Mr. John C. Ward, and Mdlle. Jansen upon the instruments—piano, harmonium, and harp—for which the composer originally wrote. With such arrangements, it can hardly be necessary to state that an excellent performance took place; one, moreover, adapted to impress the audience much more favourably than those which first introduced the work to England. Not to dwell upon each number, we may mention that a great effect was made by Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Trebelli in the "Qui tollis," both ladies singing to perfection; that the elaborate "Cum Sancto" was much applauded; that Madame Trebelli's rendering of the "O Salutaris" elicited a deserved encore; that a like honour fell to Mdlle. Tietjens for a delivery of the beautiful "Crucifixus," which was absolutely faultless; and that a strong disposition was shown to insist upon a repetition of the "Sanctus." All these were real successes; and, being so, were significant of the favour that awaits the Messe Solennelle when, by appearing more often in concert programmes, it becomes better known. The choruses were admirably sung, and the whole performance showed careful preparation. In the second part were several pieces made familiar by Mr. Leslie's choir; the conductor's own "Troubadour," and Reay's "Dawn of Day," for examples. But the gem of the selection was Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer;" solo by Mdlle. Tietjens. This was magnificently sung and magnificently received. The remaining pieces being of the old concert-giving order, there will be no remark. They were given more or less well by Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Salvi (who calls herself a tenor, but isn't one), Signor Foli, and Signor Cotogni.

The Messiah is announced for the 30th inst., with a band and principals from the Royal Italian Opera.

LONDON AND AMERICAN THEATRES.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—The letter of Mr. Leslie in your issue of last week, establishes beyond all further controversy the fact that the prices of admission to the theatres of America are what I stated them to be. I now send you, herein enclosed, the play-bills of the Broadway Theatre and Burton's Theatre. These two establishments represent the Drury Lane and the Princess's of New York, at the period previous to the war. You will perceive that Mr. Forest was playing at the Broadway Theatre, where the prices are stated two shillings and one shilling. At Burton's Theatre, the prices, you will see, are two shillings to every part of the theatre; orchestra stalls—of which there were about forty—three shillings. As I did not fail to observe in my former letter, this scale of prices was apparently, but not really, raised when the war raised the money value of all commodities. Your correspondents plead that actors in America are no better off now with £20 a week than they were formerly with £10 a week, because the price of everything is double what it used to be. They fail to perceive that American managers, at four shillings and six shillings admission, are likewise no better off than they used to be when the prices were two shillings and three. Having thus, with Mr. Leslie's able assistance, produced in court documentary evidence, extending over eighteen years past, I leave the bandying of words. The question will shortly be settled by the opening of a commodious theatre in London, where the performances will be second to none, and the accommodation for the public superior to any. The price of admission will be two shillings to all parts of the house.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

Nov. 19th. DION BOUCICAULT.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—The Magic Horn and the Magic Flute—Mozart and Weber.

CURIOUS (?)—Oberon (!) written by Planché and Weber for Covent Garden.—BISTOP (!) producing, as fairy tale, Aladdin, at Drury Lane (!)

An libretto, Oberon, just as fantastic and incongruous as the Zauberflöte.

Oberon (!)—Ha of the Midsummer Night's Dream, who consorts with Theseus—now with Charlemagne (!) and Haroun al Raschid—and Benedict!!!!!!—Yours,

A MADMAN.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

That the fact of the present year being the centenary of Beethoven's birth should exercise more or less influence upon the arrangements for the Monday Popular Concerts between now and Christmas was to be expected. Conscious of how very large a share in the success of these admirable entertainments is due to the greatest and most gifted of composers, the director, Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, has announced that every one of the programmes up to the end of the year shall be exclusively devoted to his works, vocal as well as instrumental, the vocal music (very judiciously) to be in all instances selected from the chamber songs, with pianoforte accompaniment, so that everything shall be heard precisely as Beethoven himself bequeathed it to the art, and not through the medium of arrangements which are not Beethoven's. Two concerts have already been given in St. James's Hall, the second of which took place on Monday night. On each occasion the audience was enormously large—a sign that the plan is acceptable no less to regular subscribers than to the general public which does not patronize the aristocratic and fashionable stalls, but flocks to the orchestra, balconies, gallery, and shilling area.

At the first concert the instrumental pieces were as follows:—

Quartet in F, Op. 18, No. 1	...	...	...	...	...	...	Strings.
Sonata in E flat, Op. 7	...	...	...	...	...	...	Pianoforte alone.
Sonata in F, Op. 5, No. 1	...	...	...	...	...	...	Pianoforte and violoncello.
Quartet in G, Op. 18, No. 2	...	...	...	...	...	...	Strings.

The songs were the Busslied, known in English as "Penitence," and the romance of Goethe's Mignon—"Know'st thou the Land?" Thus it will be seen that in the instrumental part of the selections it is intended to advance, as far as may be practicable, by progressive stages—an excellent idea, inasmuch as it enables the audience to follow step by step the progress of a genius whose extraordinary development is one of the most interesting phenomena in art-history. Each of the four instrumental pieces—quartets and sonatas—has been frequently dwelt upon in these columns, and we may simply add that a more vigorous example of Beethoven's early period than the quartet in F, or a more graceful and spontaneous one than the quartet in G (both belonging to the set of six quartets dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz) could not be named; that the pianoforte sonata shows how soon the composer felt strong enough to think independently, and how abundant were his resources; and that the sonata for pianoforte and violoncello is the first of two composed in 1796, inscribed to Frederick William II., King of Prussia commencing with a phrase double the length of ordinary phrases, at a time when Beethoven himself had yet to show by so many striking examples how, with strict regard to melodic effect and beauty, the laws of rhythm might be extended. Both the songs, which have as frequently been commented upon as the quartets and sonatas, were written at a later period—the first (one of a set of six to poetry by Gellert) in 1803, the last (Goethe's) in 1810.

At the second concert (on Monday night) the instrumental pieces were as subjoined:—

Quartet in D, Op. 18, No. 3	...	...	...	...	...	...	Strings.
Sonata in D, Op. 10, No. 3	...	...	...	...	...	...	Pianoforte alone.
Trio in E flat, Op. 1, No. 1	...	...	...	...	...	...	Pianoforte, violin, and violoncello.
Quartet in C minor, Op. 18, No. 4	...	...	...	...	...	...	Strings.

The songs were the "Liederkreis," "Wonne der Wehmuth," and "Neue Liebe, neues Leben." Both quartets, belonging to the same early set of six, written when Beethoven—who, it may be observed, was by no means as precocious as Mozart, before, and Mendelssohn after him—had just attained his 30th year, are happily as well known to those who frequent the Monday Popular Concerts as the quartets in F and G just referred to. The one in D, said, on tolerably good authority, to have been really the first that was completed, if not the first that was projected, is perhaps the most melodious and graceful, as the one in C minor, which sets off with a phrase the very quintessence of Mozart, is in a great measure the most impassioned of them all. The finale of each, it should be said, stands apart from the rest. The trio, Beethoven's earliest public composition of importance—which Haydn is said to have preferred to the trio in C minor, Beethoven's own favourite—was the precursor of the quartets by eight or nine years. Well might high hopes be raised from such a beginning. The pianoforte sonata, composed in 1797-8, the finest, as well as the most original of the set of three, Op. 10, dedicated to the Countess Browne, though preceding the six quartets by three years, may be pronounced more boldly independent, from one end to the other, than any one of them, and contains an adagio, in the same key as the adagio affettuoso appassionato of the quartet in F, certainly equalling, if not excelling, that in pathetic expression. The songs at this concert were again of a later date—"Neue Liebe, neues Leben" ("Herz mein Herz"), to the text of Goethe, having been composed in 1810 "Wonne der Wehmuth," also one of three songs to Goethe's poetry, in 1811; and the Liederkreis ("An die ferne Geliebte"—a poem by Jeitteles) the most perfectly beautiful of all the vocal chamber compositions of Beethoven still later—in 1816. This last may be looked upon as six songs in one, telling a connected story, like the "Schöne Müllerin" of Schubert, though, happily, not too long to be sung, as it were, in a breath.

Two more varied or more interesting programmes, circumstances taken into consideration, could hardly have been devised. That the executive ability brought to bear upon the music would be fully equal to the task imposed, might have been taken for granted. In this particular the Monday Popular Concerts have never failed. They began well, in 1859, and have kept up to the same standard of excellence ever since. The quartet is now represented by Madame Norman-Neruda, who made so favourable an impression last year (first violin); Herr L. Ries, second violin ever since the concerts were first set on foot; Signor Zerbini, a thorough master of his instrument (viola); and Signor Piatti (violoncello). Mr. Charles Hallé, to name whom will suffice, was pianist at both concerts. Madame Neruda is playing now with the same irreproachable execution, pure style, and unaffected sentiment which last year won for her so many ardent admirers; and we may point especially to her reading of the slow movement of the quartet in D, as something wholly without blemish and beyond criticism. The violoncello of Signor Piatti—to praise whom would be superfluous, seeing that by unanimous consent he is admitted facile princeps—is as usual, of quite as much importance to the solidity of the quartet as the first violin itself. Both quartets on Monday night were received with enthusiastic applause, followed by calls for the performers. Mr. Hallé, who, perhaps, never played the Sonata in D, which he has so often played in public, with more finished accuracy, was similarly complimented, being twice called to the conclusion. The singer at the first concert was Mdlle. Clara Doria, who threw much expression into "Know'st thou the Land?" and, moreover, is evidently making progress. On Monday night the vocal music was intrusted to Herr Jules Stockhausen, who has now for years held, and held deservedly, the position of first bass-baritone in all Germany. The Liederkreis was doubtless written for a higher voice than that of Herr Stockhausen, and suffered in some degree by the inevitable transposition; but Herr Stockhausen gave more than one passage in it with such fervour of expression that he roused the feelings of his hearers just as much as though he had been singing the whole precisely as Beethoven himself conceived it. As much may be said of the other two songs—especially "Herz mein Herz," which could hardly have been delivered with more genuine feeling. In short the impression left by Herr Stockhausen upon the audience was that they had been listening to a true and earnest artist. At the first concert Mr. Benedict was the accompanist; on Monday night the duty devolved upon Signor Zerbini, who acquitted himself admirably in the Liederkreis, the pianoforte part of which is by no means easy. The entire concert passed off well; and the great majority of the audience remained for the last note of the quartet which brought it to an end.

At the third concert, on Monday next, we are promised the remaining two quartets of Op. 18 (Nos. 5 and 6); the Sonata with the "Funeral March," to be played by Madame Arabella Goddard; and the Sonata in A minor, Op. 23, with violin, intrusted to the same pianist and Madame Norman-Neruda, who have never before appeared in public together. Herr Stockhausen is again to be the singer.

Miss Minnie Hauck is singing with great applause at the Vienna Opera. The other day her name appeared on the programme of a concert given for the benefit of a free hospital, when she was received it is said, with "indescribable enthusiasm."

Martin for Westminster.

There should be a representative of music on the London School Board.

Mr. G. W. Martin is the only musical candidate.

Therefore Mr. G. W. Martin should be elected.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily Telegraph" Nov. 21.)

Commemorations at the Crystal Palace usually aim to be, like the building itself, vast and imposing; but the Beethoven Commemoration which has been going on for eight weeks, and will continue for some weeks to come, has a higher object in view. No happier thought could have occurred to the managers than that of observing the centenary of the great musician's birth by presenting in regular order his greatest orchestral and choral works. By such means the memory of Beethoven is best honoured, since by such means a due appreciation of his genius is best promoted. Happily for the public the resources of the Crystal Palace are equal to the demands of the most ambitious programme. The orchestra is generally acknowledged—with least reserve by those best able to judge—as of unique excellence, every member being a master of his instrument and his art; while in Mr. Manns it possesses a conductor who, tested by results, stands second to none. No wonder, then, that up to the present the Beethoven scheme has been worked out with eminent success, and to the satisfaction of an audience in all respects competent to judge of what is good. At the concerts previous to that of last Saturday, Beethoven was represented by one or more of the following works:—Symphonies I. to VI.; Pianoforte Concertos II., III., and IV., respectively played by Mr. Franklin Taylor, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, and Mr. Charles Hallé; the Mass in C, the four overtures to Fidelio, that to Prometheus and the overture in C (Op. 124). This splendid group of masterpieces is evidence enough as to the fashion in which the Crystal Palace managers are acquitting themselves of their self-imposed and honourable task. It need hardly be said that the programmes have contained much besides the works just named, and not a little worthy of association with them. This, however, we must pass in favour of last Saturday's concert, which was distinguished by more than one feature of particular interest.

The programme—though excelled, perhaps, by that which contained the fifth symphony and the four overtures to Fidelio—was second to none other of its predecessors. It included only two of Beethoven's works, but these were the Symphony in A (No. 7), and the Pianoforte Concerto in E flat (No. 5), both compositions belonging to the noblest period of the master's career, and illustrating the finest development of his genius. After No. 5—undoubtedly the most popular of the "glorious Nine"—and the descriptive "Pastorale," the Seventh Symphony has the greatest hold upon general regard. Few connoisseurs will complain of this as an undue preference, because no other work, save those mentioned, combines in an equal degree Beethoven's striking individuality with a form of expression which is attractive and intelligible. Elsewhere we have an individuality more pronounced or less developed—in either case the happy balance so characteristic of the Seventh Symphony being disturbed. On no former occasion, perhaps, has this astonishing composition produced a greater effect than on Saturday. It was executed with a carefulness beyond all praise, not a point being lost, nor a single indication of the "score" being overlooked. Taking into account the efficiency of each performer, it may easily be imagined what a rich treat the audience enjoyed, and how enthusiastic was the expression of their thanks. The Concerto in E flat stands even higher among its class than the symphony in A. In this department of Beethoven's labour, every one must acknowledge the progressiveness which, in others, many honestly fail to see. The Fifth Concerto was the master's last, and by far his best. In reference to it we go all the way with the enthusiastic annotator of the Crystal Palace programmes, who says the work has "a mien and front like that of Juno," and who compares it with the Venus of Milo, or Milton's most tender and sorrowful Lycidas. Undoubtedly it may stand side by side with any human conception, whether goddess, statue, or poem, because equal to any in dignity and charm. The work was fortunate in its general rendering—most fortunate in having, as soloist, Madame Arabella Goddard. Our English pianist's reception, on making her first appearance for the season, was hearty; but the valediction of her audience, after she had held them entranced by a splendid performance, was enthusiastic. The reservation for Madame Goddard of the greatest among concertos needed no more complete justification than this, because the difficulties of the work are as well known as inability to meet them must always be obvious. To say that Madame Goddard played with unerring accuracy, and with a command over gradations of tone suggesting delicate machinery which must do its work, rather than fingers which may fail, is to state half the truth. There was evident throughout an intellectual grasp of the subject—and what a subject to grasp!—which lifted the performance into the highest class of artistic achievements, and stamped it as a great and noteworthy effort. In recalling Madame Goddard, amid unanimous applause, the audience discharged a duty owing to themselves not less than to the gifted performer. We must pass very briefly over the rest of the programme. The overtures to Abu Hassan, and Alfonso, and Entrel'ac, which respectively began and ended the concert, were well played; Mdlle. Leon Duval made a success in "Delfraggio" and Venzano's "Valse;" and Mr. Nordblom sang "Il mio tesoro" quite as effectively as he sang Meyerbeer's "Fisher Maiden."

ST. PETER.

(From the "Athenæum.")

I beg to enclose you three cheques, vouching for the amount, £75, paid by me to Mr. Chorley, which Mr. Chorley denies having received. I also enclose you two letters from the Birmingham Festival Committee; one requesting to know the subject of the Oratorio proposed to them by me, together with its title; the other acknowledging the receipt of the libretto from me. I have been accused of misrepresenting these transactions; but when Mr. Chorley has satisfied himself, by examination of the enclosed documents, that he has been under a misapprehension, I am led to presume that he will, as a gentleman, withdraw and apologise for the terms applied to me whose word has never until now been called in question, and who feels deeply pained to be obliged thus publicly to support its integrity.

I hereby solemnly declare that the original agreement with Mr. Chorley was, that £50 should be paid for his entire work, and that the surplus £25, which I paid him by cheque on the 20th of January last, which he accepted, and sent in his own name for the Birmingham Hospital (though, in his letter, as we have been informed, he declared he would send it "anonymously") was entirely on account; on my part, the fact of my having already paid him the second instalment of £25 having escaped my memory. I will give Mr. Chorley the credit of believing that the fact had escaped his memory as well as mine; and this, notwithstanding the tone of his letter to the Athenæum of November 12, in which he dares, in reference to me, to use the word "contempt."

Were this not a case in which my honour is concerned, I should not have troubled you again in a matter which has already unduly occupied your valuable space, more especially since Mr. Chorley has not refuted one single statement in the letter which you did me the favour to publish on October 29; but, under the circumstances, I must demand of you, as an act of justice, to allow me to set myself right in the estimation of your readers; and as I have documents to establish the truth of every word I have advanced, I appeal to your known impartiality to publish this letter in your next issue. After this, I shall not trouble you again; for should Mr. Chorley proceed further in the matter, I would seek for redress elsewhere. JULES BENEDICT.

2, Manchester Square, Nov. 15, 1870.

[We cannot publish any more letters on this question; but, in justice to Mr. Chorley, we must state that the earliest of the three cheques forwarded to us by Mr. Benedict is drawn in favour of Mr. Chorley or bearer, and is not endorsed by Mr. Chorley; it bears the date of April 23, 1868.—Athenæum.]

SZEGSZARD.—The Abbate Franz Liszt's birth-day has just been celebrated with a great deal of enthusiasm. On the evening previous to the eventful day, the citizens, with some eighty or a hundred fancy lanterns, gave the maestro a serenade, when Herr Franz Schüner made a speech, in which he stated that the warmest wish of the ten thousand inhabitants forming the population of the town was that Liszt would for the future remain permanently in his native country. The Abbate, with great emotion, thanked the crowd from his window, and then hurried to the piano in order, as he said, to contribute something personal to the proceedings. The piece selected for the purpose was Mosonyi's "Festklange," which the Abbate played with his pupil, Sipos. During the performance the market place was illuminated with red, white, and green Bengal fire. There was afterwards a concert, followed by a banquet, in the "Grosses Gasthaus." Herr Remenyi played pieces by Chopin and Abranyi, as likewise his own "Republikeském"; Sipos chose Liszt's "Rhapsodies"; and the Countess Jemima, the Transcription from Lohengrin. One hundred and twenty persons sat down to table. The chairman, in proposing the first toast, said that, more patria, he raised his glass to the King, but this time to the king of music. This toast received with enthusiastic "eljen," was followed by many more, the congratulatory telegrams sent from all quarters being read aloud between the toasts. The banquet was followed by a ball. On the next day Baron Augusz gave a grand dinner party. On the table before each guest was a copy of an ode written by Dr. Ludwig Gajasy, "To Liszt." On this occasion the Abbate himself proposed the first toast, by drinking to his friends and native land.

THE PRODIGAL SON AT GLASGOW.

(Abridged from the "Glasgow Herald," Nov. 17th.)

The enthusiastic greeting awarded to Mr. Sullivan, by an audience crowding the City Hall in every part, must have assured him that his name is well known and his compositions appreciated in Glasgow. Mr. Sullivan deserved the reception, and, although that reception must be in great part attributed to the prestige derived from the works he has already written, we feel satisfied it was intended in part as earnest of what he is yet to produce. It is matter of regret that one so gifted does not give us more. May we suggest to him an oratorio for our Choral Union, of whose singing we understand he has expressed himself in terms of admiration. Were he to undertake such a task, he might depend upon an enthusiastic study and a splendid performance.

Those who heard the above-mentioned performance of the Prodigal Son and had also the good fortune to be present last evening, when the oratorio was produced in Glasgow for the first time with orchestral accompaniments, must have felt how great an additional charm these accompaniments gave. Indeed, in no point does Mr. Sullivan shew greater strength than in his instrumentation. The music of this work stands the test of frequent repetition; it, therefore, is worthy a place in the catalogue of good and noble music, and its author is entitled to take his position in the foremost rank of composers.

The solo vocalists last night were Miss Edith Wynne, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Stockhausen. Miss Wynne interpreted the music allotted to her with much grace and intelligence. Her singing of "O that then had'st hearkened," was marked by refined sentiment and feeling, and produced a deep impression. Mdlle. Drasdil was not less successful; indeed, her rendering of "Love not the world" was one of the features of the performance.

The chief part of the work, however, so far as solos are concerned, fell to Mr. Reeves; and, notwithstanding the apology made for him on account of his hoarseness, we can scarcely speak in too high terms of the manner in which he acquitted himself. The tenor music was written for him, and only when sung by him are its beauties fully revealed. In the solo with chorus, "Let us eat and drink," Mr. Reeves created a great impression by his manner of declaiming the command, "Fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink." He entered fully into the spirit of the wild and glorious movement, and so identified himself with the situation, that one felt that he at least was determined for the moment to banish any thought of the bitter ending, "To-morrow we die." Perhaps the feature of the evening was Mr. Reeves' "I will arise." In this the composer has produced a page of sacred music most exalted and pure. It is extremely simple; indeed, in its simplicity lies its attraction. By a few touches Mr. Sullivan has illustrated a highly religious sentiment in a manner seldom equalled. The scena is exactly suited to Mr. Reeves' exceptional powers. It was, in truth, the repentent outpouring of "a broken heart and a contrite spirit."

Herr Stockhausen was entitled to claim indulgence, on account of its being his first appearance in English oratorio. Happily, he did not require any. He was thoroughly successful. "My son, attend to my words," was sung with the true devotional expression. In the duet, "And he arose," he shared the honours with Mr. Reeves; whilst in the quartet his firm tones were of the greatest service.

The chorus was in splendid force, inspired by the presence of the composer. From first to last it was as near perfection as one could imagine. "O that men would praise the Lord," was remarkable for earnest, careful interpretation; and the skill and energy displayed in this and other numbers were such as amply to atone for occasional unsteadiness.

If the German orchestra was not as perfect as we were led to expect—its principal fault being a tendency to coarseness, indulgence must be extended.

We were glad to have another opportunity of hearing Mr. Lambeth's cantata, "By the waters of Babylon" is now established as a favourite in Glasgow. Repeated performances in no way detract from the pleasure derived in listening to this composition. Last evening's splendid performance was due to the talent and good-will of all concerned; soloists, chorus, and orchestra, used their best endeavours to give a proper interpretation of our townsman's beautiful setting of a psalm so well suited to music. Mr. Lambeth must feel gratified at the renewed success of his cantata, and that amongst the good things contained in the programme it held such an important position. The solos were sung by Misses Wynne and Drasdil, Mr. Wallace, and Herr Stockhausen.

It is matter of regret that care was not taken in Edinburgh to forward the band-parts of Mr. Sullivan's overture, In Memoriam; its omission was a great disappointment to Mr. Sullivan's friends. The pleasure, we hope, is only postponed. Mr. Charles Ferguson presided efficiently at the organ, and Mr. Sullivan conducted several of the numbers in the second part, at the request of Mr. Lambeth.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

At Mr. Aguilar's performance last week, a large audience listened with attention to the following programme:—

Overture in C, Arethuse (Melody), Wayes (Caprice Etude)—Aguilar; Funeral March (Chopin); L'Invitation pour la Valse (Weber), Miss Grace Aguilar; La Perveneche (Gounod); Etude (Inbinstein); Sonata quasi, Fantasia in C sharp minor, the Moonlight—Beethoven; Lieder ohne Worte (Mendelssohn); Fantasia on Moni in Egitto (Thalberg), Miss Grace Aguilar; Idyll, Romanza (Aguilar); Dream Dance (Aguilar); War March, piano duet (Aguilar.)

The Matfair Choral Society gave an evening concert on Friday last, the 18th inst., conducted by W. Williams, Esq. The Society mustered in large force, and sang with good spirit. The first part contained choruses from Samson, Messiah and Judas; and Mr. Bishenden sang "Thus saith the Lord," "But who may abide," and "Arm, arm, ye brave," in his well-known style, accompanied by a large and efficient band, led by Mr. Gaskin. The second part contained Birch's operetta, Robin Hood; Mr. C. J. Bishenden taking the part of Little John; Mr. Phillbey, Robin Hood; and Miss Harrison, Maid Marian. The principal vocalists gave great satisfaction to a numerous audience, several of the solos in the operetta being encored.

Monthly Popular Concerts.—The second of Mr. Ridley Prentice's admirably conducted Chamber Concerts took place last week, and attracted nearly as numerous an audience as its predecessor. The idea of giving a series of local musical performances of a purely classical nature is bold; and, in carrying it into effect with energy and fidelity, Mr. Prentice deserves the hearty support of lovers of high classic music, who will be gratified to know that the experiment has so far succeeded. The programme was made up of Mozart's Trio in E flat (No. 7), for pianoforte, clarionet, and viola; Weber's Duo Concertante, in the same key, for pianoforte and clarionet; Mozart's Fantasia and Fugue in C, for piano; and Beethoven's Quintet in E flat (Op. 16), for pianoforte, clarionet, oboe, horn, and bassoon. With the exception, in the interpretation of these pieces, were associated Messrs. Lazarus, Barnett, Barrett, Hutchins, and C. Harper—the mention of whose names makes it superfluous to say that the performances were in all respects admirable. The songs were entrusted to Miss Julia Elton and Mr. Hall, the former of whom received a warm encore in "Ben e Ridicolo," the latter a like compliment in Gounod's "Ave Maria." The concert, from beginning to end was an undeniable success, and gave thorough satisfaction. In commemoration of the Beethoven Centenary, the programme of the next concert, in December, will be made up from the works of that great master.—W. H. I'.

GAIETY THEATRE.

Herold's Zampa was abandoned on Saturday last for Charles Dibdin's popular ballad opera, The Waterman, which, with Mr. Santley as Tom Tug, here becomes endowed with fresh attractions. The charming simplicity of the story presents a marked contrast to the wild plot of the lyrical drama it has displaced. The Waterman, with the elder Bannister as the gallant hero of the "First of August," was brought out at the Haymarket as far back as the summer of 1774; but though nearly a century has elapsed since the date of its production, the piece needs no modification to suit the changed condition of society. The smoothly-written songs are models of versification in their way. The dramatic force and simple pathos thrown by Mr. Santley into "The Jolly Young Waterman," and "Farewell, my trim-built Wherry," could hardly have been exceeded by any of his predecessors. David Garrick's stirring effusion of "Hearts of Oak" is introduced with excellent effect, and a verse of "Rule, Britannia" at the end further enables the audience to demonstrate their entire sympathy with the patriotic energy of the vocalist. The delight of a crowded house was manifested with enthusiasm, and Mr. Santley was enforced to repeat almost every song.

Music.—Mdlle. Shefsky, who has been engaged at the especial desire of the King, made her first appearance here, as Fricx, in Herr Wagner's Walkure. She possesses considerable talent as an actress, but her voice is somewhat of a nondescript kind. It is too low for a high soprano; too circumscribed in compass for a mezzo-soprano; and too high for a contralto. During the performance the King sent her a splendid bouquet, and the assurance of his complete satisfaction with her efforts. Mendelssohn's Erste Walpurgismacht has not proved a success in the form of a stage piece, despite the magnificence of the mise-en-scena. It is the almost unanimous opinion that this work, intended only for the concert-room, will always fail to produce anything like its legitimate effect behind the foot-lights.

BEETHOVENIANA.—No. IX.*

THE arguments already drawn from the sketches are corroborated in other quarters. In the Journal des Luxus und der Moden of January, 1808, is the following communication from Vienna:—"I have much pleasure in informing you that Beethoven has just finished a Mass, which is to be executed at Prince Esterhazy's on the Festival of the Virgin. Fidelio will very shortly be brought out in Prague, with a new Overture. The Fourth Symphony is in the press," &c., &c. The Mass referred to is that in C, Opus 86, which was sung for the first time at Eisenstadt on the 13th of September, 1807; but which was not quite completed in the preceding July, as may be seen from the letters communicated by Mr. Pohl to the Grenzboten, 1868, No. 46. It follows, therefore, that the letter just quoted must have been written between July and the beginning of September. That by the "new Overture" is meant that in C major "Opus 138," is evident from the following considerations. Seyfried, in the appendix to his book of Beethoven Studies, published in 1832, after speaking of the success of Fidelio in 1806, says—"For the Prague Theatre Beethoven wrote a new and less difficult Overture, which Haslinger purchased at the auction, and will probably publish before long"—to which remark Haslinger adds—"The Overture is already engraved in score and parts, and will be published in the course of this year (1832) in various arrangements.

The story is now perfectly clear. The German opera in Prague was to have opened in the beginning of May, with Fidelio (or Leonora), for which Beethoven was to write a short and easy Overture, in place of the long and difficult one with which his opera had been given in Vienna the year before; and it is this Overture that was published as Opus 138. Being thus composed in the year 1807, it is not the first but the third of the Leonora overtures; and that hitherto known as No. 2 (1805) is the first, and No. 3 (1806) the second. The fourth in E major remains in its old position, although, as we shall presently see, it was nearly being No. 5.

It is difficult to understand how Haslinger, being aware, as he was, of Seyfried's statement, should, on the title page of his edition have named 1805 as the year of the composition of the Overture. One way, however, there is of accounting for this. At the time the Overture was printed only two overtures to Leonora were known. Thus in the Vienna Allgemeine musikalische Anzeiger of March 17th, 1831 (Haslinger's own publication) we read—"At the third Concert Spirituel, on the 10th inst., Beethoven's rarely-performed overture to Leonora (afterwards called Fidelio) was played. Beethoven is known to have superseded this work by another, as being too long for dramatic effect, and too hard for an ordinary orchestra." The Vienna Theaterzeitung for 1831 speaks at page 135 of the same concert, and praises the execution of the concluding presto of the overture—"a piece in which it is hard indeed to make the violins go well," &c. The Allgemeine musik. Anzeiger of April 21st, 1831, says—"We have reason to believe that at the approaching performance of Fidelio at the Court Theatre the two Overtures will be given alternately;" and on the 12th of April, 1832, "at the performance of Fidelio for Madame Fischer-Achten's benefit —the Overture was that originally composed for the opera, but afterwards laid aside on account of its immense difficulty." There can be no doubt that the two Overtures mentioned in these extracts are the great one in C major of 1806, and the 4th in E major of 1814. Now it must have been known that Beethoven wrote more than two Leonora overtures, and that the opera was produced in 1805 with a different overture to that played at its reappearance in 1805. But still, at that time, very little can have been known of the 1805 overture (the actual first), beyond its bare existence, or indeed until its performance at Leipsic in 1840 and its publication in 1842 as "No. 2." And as the occurrence of the passage from Florestan's air in the overture Opus 138 fixed it as one of the Leonora overtures, so the assumption was easy that it was the 1805 one, and in this way the addition of that date to the title of Haslinger's edition may be explained.

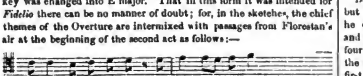
Of the existence of the Prague overture Schindler had no knowledge; he has assumed Haslinger's date as correct, and, as far as I know, he was the first to arrange the four overtures in the chronological order in which they are at present generally accepted; but it must not be overlooked that neither he nor Haslinger has given us anything in confirmation of the assumed date of Opus 138, and all efforts have hitherto proved unavailing to discover its source, or to find any authority which should in any way corroborate its accuracy. In fact the date is one which never has been, nor can be sustained, and which rests entirely upon itself.

Schindler's farther statement has anything but a probable sound. His words (i. 127, ii. 42 and 43) are as follows:—"The Overture was hardly finished before Beethoven's confidence began to be shaken in it. His friends were of the same opinion. A rehearsal with a small orchestra was arranged at Prince Lichnowsky's, at which the work, as a whole, was found unsuitable for a prelude to the opera. Neither in ideas, style, or character, did it suit the taste of the tribunal, and it was therefore laid aside." One cannot resist asking who it was that constituted this musical tribunal to which Beethoven submitted himself; and, indeed, who ever heard of his submitting himself to such judgment. The utmost that can be true in the whole history is that the Overture was rehearsed at Prince Lichnowsky's, and that Beethoven himself discovered imperfections in it and decided on altering them; and this falls in with other considerations which shall now be mentioned, and which it is hardly necessary to say will (like the foregoing) be in direct opposition to Schindler's statements.

In the MS. copy of the Overture mentioned at the outset of these remarks, there are many alterations in Beethoven's hand, made at a later date, probably in the year 1814, when he undertook the final revision of his opera. Some of these alterations are only indicated, and not thoroughly carried out, and in every case the original reading is legible. The appearance of the MS. shows conclusively that it cannot have been a copy made for the press or considered as complete for publication, a fact directly at variance with Schindler's assertion (ii. 42), that Beethoven in the year 1833 was meditating the immediate publication of the Overture "Op. 138," which had been in the hands of Steiner & Co. for several years—an assertion which is as incorrect as another of his statements (i. 127), that the firm of Steiner & Co. had already (that is to say, in 1805) acquired the copyright of the Overture, Steiner's firm not having come into existence until the year 1815. But to proceed. Some of the alterations can be read in two ways, and therefore would only puzzle the engraver and lead to mistakes in the publication. In the editions of Haslinger and Breitkopf all the intelligible and available alterations have been included.*

But this was not all. When he was preparing the opera for its third appearance, in 1814, he took the Overture in hand and entirely remodelled it. The principal themes were retained, but the key was changed into E major. That in this form it was intended for Fidelio there can be no manner of doubt; for, in the sketches, the chief themes of the Overture are intermixed with passages from Florestan's air at the beginning of the second act as follows:—



* It may be interesting here to draw attention to the principal of these corrections in the Introduction, bars 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, which Beethoven has altered and shortened by a whole bar.

Beethoven, however, did not carry these intentions into practice, but wrote instead the well-known Overture in E major. Had he done so we should probably have had five overtures to Leonora, and the Overture of 1807 would have been regarded as the forerunner of a fourth in 1814, just as that of 1805 (the real No. 1) is now regarded as the parent of that of 1806. It seems probable that when Beethoven first thought of an entire revision of the overture Op. 138 he put it before him in its original form and key, made a few alterations, and added the title "Characteristic Overture." The question now remains. If, according to the ordinary belief, the Overture Op. 138 was composed in 1805 and was the actual first of the Leonora overtures, is it explicable, is it possible to believe that, at the final revision of his opera, in the year 1814, he should have gone back to a work from which he was separated by so enormous a gap as the two great Overtures in C major?

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In Mr. R. Reece's burlesqued Stranger, at the Royalty, two actors, not very familiar to the London public, become conspicuous—namely, Mr. A. Bishop, who represents the enamoured Baron Steinfort with a comic extravagance of gesture that reminds one of Mr. Dewar; and Mr. A. Wood, who, with grim humour, plays the Stranger himself. Why that unhappy misanthrope is dressed up into the semblance of a well-known statesman we do not conceive; but we suppose that all is right in burlesques. Mrs. Reece's treatment of the most noted of fair penitents rises far above the level of ordinary burlesque, and though she has to execute those choreographic accessories which belong to grotesque drama, she imparts to the character something like the spirit of genuine comedy. Dressed with the most scrupulous neatness, and usually retiring in her manner, the travestied Mrs. Haller is a coquette as well as a prude, not at all displeased at the impression she has made on Baron Steinfort, and not seriously terrified by the Stranger. She is, in fact, a sly hypocrite, wearing a mask that every moment is on the point of dropping off; and her novels attribute, unknown to Kotzebue, are indicated with extreme delicacy and much playful humour by Miss Hodson. Necessarily there are situations in the burlesque where the delineation of character ceases, and Mrs. Haller, like the other personages, becomes merely a singing, dancing figure; but even amid the wildest outbreaks of grotesque absurdity the young directress shows a disposition to tone down the caricature she embodies.

Musical criticism in the United States seems to demand manifold qualifications. At all events it embraces considerable knowledge of millinery and dressmaking, as well as facility in pen-and-ink-sketching. Here is Mdlle. Nilsson as she stood on the Boston platform:—

"The Swedish artist is a truly beautiful woman; a blonde, fair as a lily, elegant and dignified in every movement and of a charming presence. Her pure, open features are familiar to us from her portraits; which, however, do not do justice to the intellectual expression of her features. She was exquisitely dressed in a rich white silk, made with a corset train. The front of the under-skirt was trimmed with a deep flounce, with a puffing at the head. The train was similarly ornamented. The overskirt was very long, and was much looped at each of the front and side breadths. The back reached nearly to the top of the trimmings on the underskirt. A puffing of tulle passed completely around the over-skirt, edged with deep point lace. Down each side of the skirt extended long wreaths of convolvulus flowers and leaves. The body was cut low, and folds of tulle were put around berthe fashion, round the neck, with a bunch of convolvulus on the left shoulder. An elegant necklace was festooned around the throat, from which drooped pendants of diamonds and pearls. The hair was carelessly dressed in loose bands and curls, and a group of the same flowers that ornamented the dress drooped over the left shoulder, and was fastened to the hair by an elegant diamond cluster. Diamonds glistened from the ears, and the arms were clasped by heavy gold bracelets. As Nilsson stood before the audience, she seemed a beautiful model of simple purity, in exquisite harmony with the liquid melody of her voice. She looked as she sang, and in each was delightful."

Judging from a criticism in the Glasgow Herald, the German orchestra recently imported by the great Scotch town is proving itself of the cheap and nasty sort. We are glad of it, and trust the nastiness may become still more evident. Meanwhile the deposed English artists, and others, will rejoice over the following wail from the North:—

"The German orchestra was not quite so success-ful last evening. It seemed as if its members were, so to speak, travelling through unknown regions. The woods, on the whole, are very good, the first flute exceptionally so; the clarionets and bassoons are quite satisfactory, whilst the brasses, more especially the trombone, are unusually fine. Unfortunately the horn players are using instruments with valves—an innovation which Berlioz, one of the greatest conductors who ever lived, peremptorily refused to admit into his orchestra, as it is simply impossible to get from them true emphasis or accent. It is more unfortunate still, however, that the strings are the weakest point in this band. There is a great want of sonority and resonance amongst them principally caused by the inferior class of violins used. Indeed the inferiority of all the instruments tells powerfully against the capabilities of the performers—as, for example, in the case of the flute above referred to, which is very deficient in tone compared with what we usually hear in this country."

It is reported that Herr Joseph Joachim intends resigning his position as director of the Royal High School of Music at Berlin. So much the worse for the Royal High School, if the report be true.

Quid Teh?—The New York Herald, in speaking of Miss Annie Cary's appearance at the Nilsson Concerts, says:—

"This lady has greatly improved by her absence, not only in the culture of her voice, but in her personal appearance. As she came on the stage last evening amid a storm of applause, she wore a simple and stylish dress, but one extremely tasteful and becoming. The simplicity of her toilet added another charm to the many which she possesses."

We have omitted an elaborate description of Miss Cary's dress, but we call the attention of Mr. Punch to what remains (the immediate attention).

NILSSON.

Another American Criticism.

The concert was in every respect a brilliant success. Expectation was now wrought to its highest pitch. No. 4 upon the programme was to introduce the great star of the evening. Her entrance from the ante-room to the platform was the occasion of a most hearty and enthusiastic and prolonged welcome. Every eye was eager to scan the songstress who had won the most pronounced honours, both in Europe and America. On walked a tall, graceful, slender woman, with sunny face and angelic countenance, self-possessed, and yet as modest as modesty could be. Winning all eyes and hearts by her simplicity and naturalness. The Swedish syren of song was here. She gazed upon the audience diffidently, and soon broke forth in Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair." This composition, itself a gem of melody, but of a severely classical style, was given in a manner that held the breath of all listeners. The pure, limpid, liquid-like voice compassed the measures of Handel in a manner that was beautiful in the extreme. In point of mere execution it may have been equalled on the same platform, but we question if, on the whole, it was ever waved forth with so delicious a vocal richness. Nilsson's voice, we may here state, is a true soprano sfogato, clear as the mountain stream and as bright as the morning light. Its sympathetic quality was especially manifest in this performance, but its golden affluence was left for a later effort in the evening. She was greeted with general and prolonged applause; and on returning to repeat the aria was presented with a basket of exquisite flowers, followed by a huge pyramid of the same, which was placed upon a table where it remained during the evening. Bignonli then sung "M' lasperi, which he makes all his own. It always greets the ear like a sweet benediction, and it was never better than now. The first part of the programme closed with the scena e rondo from Lucia, by Nilsson. In this performance she displayed a more elaborate execution and a finer technic than in the severe composition of Handel. In it the perfect purity of her voice, its evenness and freedom from flaw, its absolute smoothness, were more demonstrated. The performance elicited the utmost enthusiasm, and Nilsson retired with a capitulated audience at her willing feet. Next came the real triumph of the evening—the caratina, "Ah fors 'a lui," by Nilsson. We have already recorded her triumph with the trying Handel. With the brilliant Verdi she was brilliant indeed. In this she fairly revelled in song; in this she uttered her divine art in no uncertain sounds; in this she established her claim to the high empyrean of song. Her executive faculties were exhibited in marvellous light; but this was not the charm of the performance. It was in the quality of positive sweetness—nectarian melody as it were—that won upon the ear. The range of her voice was here displayed to a remarkable degree, sweeping with ease, fulness and celerity from the lowest to the highest notes. Its flexibility, power, smoothness and culture were simply enchanting. She united the brilliancy of Carlotta Patti and Lagrange, with the mellowness and musical beauty of Parepa, and every note was withal so fresh and pure, that it fell upon the ear like a spray of diamonds. It was quite natural, if not, inevitable, that this gem of vocal oratory should inspire the audience with delight, and this sentiment broke out so emphatically, as to recall her twice to the platform. At the first she sang a Swedish ballad, novel in construction, but deliciously tender and sweet; and at the second, the English ballad, "Old Folks at Home," which she gave with equal idiomatic and vocal purity. Nilsson retired from the platform with full four thousand hands echoing their gladsome tidings from walls to ceiling. Her triumph was very complete. As an artist and a woman, she had the audience in her own way. Gifted by nature to a very rare extent; cultivated carefully and conscientiously; with a temperament and intellect which makes her the medium and exponent of the divine art of song, it is no wonder that in Boston, which judges and appreciates merit at its value, she has made her golden work. Fest, rich, rare. The Star of the North shines with a lustre that is no less real than beautiful. The secret of the charm is in the supremity of the artist and the loveliness of the woman. These united, explain why it is that the public everywhere hasten to pay their homage. Genius is never so omnipotent as when embodied in beauty, goodness, modesty, and nature. Nilsson is its embodiment. Let us be thankful that she speaks so lovingly to her kind.

PROVINCIAL.

York.—A correspondent writes thus:—

"The York Choral Union gave, on Thursday evening, the 10th inst., a most successful performance of Mr. Joseph Barnby's cantata, Rebekah. The high reputation this work has already gained, coupled with the fact that Mr. Barnby is a native of this city, caused a more than usual interest to be felt in the concert. The solo artists were Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Julia Elton, Messrs Cumming and Maybrick. The applause was enthusiastic, and Mr. Barnby, who acted as conductor of his work, frequently bowed his acknowledgments to the auditory. The second part of the concert was of a miscellaneous character, the principal feature being the excellent part-singing of the vocal members of the society, conducted by Mr. R. Burton of Leeds. The concert was a lengthy one, owing to several pieces being re-demanded."

Brighton.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"Fraulein Mehlhorn's matinée musicale took place at the Pavilion, when she was assisted by Mdlle. Mithonowska, Mr. Lazarus, Herren Sjoden, Hammer, Lassere, and Van Eyken. Signor Li alli conducted.—Mr. Bellew has given the last of his series of 'Readings' in the Dome Assembly Rooms, which were crowded on the occasion, although no inconvenience was felt, owing to the capital 'seating arrangements,' which were entrusted to Messrs. Lyon and Hall of Warwick Mansion. Mr. Thorne (late organist of Chichester Cathedral) has given a pianoforte recital at the Pavilion, assisted by Miss Goode as vocalist. Herr Sjoden's morning concert is announced for next week, and many other musical arrangements are on the tapis."

Malvern.—The Malvern News says:—

"On Saturday the Royal Tyrolese Singers gave a morning concert at Mr. W. Haynes's Concert-room, and an evening concert on Monday, both of which were largely attended. The singers appeared in their national costume, and sang their most popular songs, duets, quartets, &c., with brilliant illustrations of the jodl music and mountain echoes. The tenor singing of Herr Meickl, and the solo performance on the zither by Professor Carl Fntig, deserve particular commendation. The performance altogether were thoroughly appreciated.—The first concert of the Philharmonic Society came off in the Concert-hall on Monday evening, under the conductorship of the Rev. A. Sewell.

Dublin.—In the Irish Times, of November 21, we read:—

"At the concert (last of the series), on Saturday, by the Misses Glover, under the patronage of the Countess Spencer, the following was the programme:—Selections from Professor Glover's Cantata, Tara—Herold's 'Marie;' Ballet Music; Benedict and Choral Dance; Solo, harp, Irish airs, Alvars; Duet, 'As it fell upon a day,' Bishop; Scena, 'David before Saul,' Bordesi; Ballad, 'The Pet Linnet,' J. W. Glover; Trio, 'La mia Dorabella,' Mozart. Part second—Solo piano, Concerto in E flat, Beethoven; Aria Marli, Gounod; Duet, harp and pianoforte, 'Erin,' E. Glover; Ballad, 'The Matin Bell,' J. W. Glover; Glee, 'The Bells of St. Michael's,' Knyvett; Galop, 'Skedaddle,' J. W. Glover."

Lewes.—We read in the Sussex Express:—

"On Thur day, November 17th, Mrs. John Macfarren, the celebrated pianist, assisted by Miss Annie Sinclair and Miss Lucie Hann, gave a musical entertainment at the New Lecture Hall. The performance of Mrs. Macfarren was of her usual brilliant character. The singing of the other ladies was of a high order, and the evening's entertainment was thoroughly enjoyed."

Chatham.—The Chatham News says, with reference to Mrs. John Macfarren's concert:—

"On Tuesday, November 15th, the members of the Institute enjoyed one of the best concerts ever placed before them. It was simply delightful, from beginning to end. The vocalists were Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Lucie Hann, and Signor Bellini; the pianiste was Mrs. Macfarren, whose rendering of the minuet and rondo from Beethoven's Pastoral Sonata was a real treat. Miss Annie Sinclair gave the scena, 'Softly Sighs,' with equal skill and sweetness, and won an encore. Miss Lucie Hann's 'Way was I looking out?' was also deservedly repeated. Signor Bellini was encored in an aria buffa. The concert went off well, and must long linger in the memories of those who had the privilege to hear it."

Glasgow.—Mr. Sims Reeves took part in a recent performance of the Messiah at the City Hall, and his singing is thus commented on by the Star:—

"The slight hoarseness under which Mr. Reeves laboured on Wednesday appeared to have altogether vanished last night, for we have never heard him sing with greater sweetness or with more refined and perfect finish. His rendering of the recitative, 'Comfort ye' was touching and powerful at the same time. There is no composition extant with which the great tenor's fame and name is so closely identified as the Messiah. As an interpreter of Handel's music in general he has never been equalled; but in the Messiah he is peculiarly at home, and, therefore, it is not surprising that one who is at all times, under what conditions soever he may be placed, incomparably above all his contemporaries, should have carried off the lion's share of the honours last evening. The breath of the audience was held in suspense while the singer essayed his wonderfully dignified and pathetic rendition of the soul-stirring numbers with which he was entrusted, and it is no small compliment to the other vocalists to say that they were listened to with something more than patience afterwards."

REVIEWS.

The King William March, introducing "I'm a Prussian." Composed by Alfred F. Mullen. [London: J. Williams.]

We have nothing to say for this result of the war; and even King William himself would scarcely take it as a success.

The Lord of Lorne Lancers. By Dan Godfrey. [London: Chappell & Co.]

A very easy arrangement of certain well-known Scottish tunes; the first being, appropriately enough, "Argyle is my name," the last (Mr. Dan Godfrey must be a wag), "The Campbells are coming." A portrait of the lucky North Briton, after whom the set is called, adorns the title-page, together with certain heraldic and emblematic devices of interest in connection with the forthcoming alliance.

Gavotte en Re: Extraits des Sonatas de Violoncello (6ème Suite), de John Sebastian Bach. Transcrite pour piano, par D. Brocca. [London: W. Czerny.]

A charmingly quaint piece of music is here rescued from the oblivion of Bach's violoncello sonatas and made generally accessible. The arrangement has been dictated by the true spirit of the theme, and few, we imagine, who have any taste for the now antiquated style of such works will be other than delighted with it. As a contributor to their store of favourite pieces, Mr. Brocca deserves the thanks of all who love the works of the older masters.

Sweet Birdie, Mine. Song, written and composed by Alfred B. Allen. [London: Rooney & Co.]

The words of this song are above the average in point of merit, especially as, while sentimental enough, they keep clear of all nonsense lying outside the bounds of poetic licence. Mr. Allen is not less good as a composer than as a verse maker. His melody possesses character and distinctiveness, while his accompaniments show unobtrusive good taste. The song before us (in A flat major) is adapted for a soprano or tenor voice, and may, for the reasons above stated, claim a share of attention during the coming season.

She Sang to her Harp. Song, written and composed by Alfred B. Allen. [London: R. Cocks & Co.]

A lady sitting on a tomb in an old abbey chanting dirges over her lost love, to the accompaniment of a harp, dying at her post, and being buried with the instrument upon her breast, does not present a very cheerful picture. Mr. Allen, however, goes a great way to recommend it by the appropriateness of his music. In this song the accompaniment is an important feature, and requires to be carefully dealt with. When so treated, both the significance and effect of the work are materially enhanced. Key, A flat major; voice, soprano or tenor.

Les Etincelles. Valse Brillante pour Piano, par Berthold Tours. [Londres: W. Czerny.]

There are several features in this valse which remove it out of the common order. Its construction shows not wilfully unsuccessful efforts to attain an originality which the form of such a work renders difficult. The themes are pleasing and graceful, and their handling is effective.

Gemma is: Paraphrase on "The Watch on the Rhine" and "Martin Luther's Hymn," for the Pianoforte. By Berthold Tours. [London: W. Czerny.]

"Strange ones among the prophets," and it is not more surprising to find Mr. Berthold Tours among the paraphrasers. Even less to be wondered at is the fact that he does his paraphrasing well; though, at first sight, there seems little connection between "The Rhine Watch" and "Martin Luther's Hymn." The latter, however, is not the chorale, usually known by the great Reformer's name, but the one commonly sung to a paraphrase of "God is our refuge and strength," and introduced by Mendelssohn into his Reformation Symphony, as well as by Meyerbeer into Les Huguenots. The connection of sacred and secular themes has an odd effect which would, doubtless, meet the approval of his Prussian Majesty, after the pattern of whose telegraphic despatches it seems to have been concocted. The piece, though showy and effective, is not difficult.

Triumphal March for the Pianoforte. Composed by T. M. Mudie. [London: Cramer & Co.]

Triumphs naturally suggest triumphant music, and we have here one of many efforts to celebrate the doings of the war now raging. Mr. Mudie is discreetly neutral, and, though success has been pretty nearly all on one side, there is nothing in his "March" to prevent its application to the other, should our Gallic neighbours win the victories for which they hope and work. The reader will infer that Mr. Mudie has made use of original themes, and not drawn upon the common storehouse of patriotic songs. It is even so; the result being a showy, brilliant, and effective march, with the true, exultant ring in it; and, at the same time, possessing more genuine merit than belongs to nineteenths of modern productions of the sort. The work is not difficult; and we commend it to amateurs generally, as in all respects worthy of notice.

On the March. Descriptive Piece, introducing German and French National Melodies, for the Pianoforte. By Alfred F. Mullen. [London: Williams.]

We have tried to discover what this "descriptive piece" describes, but without success. It opens with "troops upon the march"—nationality not stated; then comes the "Marseillaise," next the "German Fatherland," next the Bavarian advance to a march of Tannhäuser, next the Prussian Guard march up, after which "Partant pour la Syrie" is heard, followed by six bars representing somebody's "Advance to the Rhine." The "Rhine Watch," and the Prussian national hymn, conclude what, though a puzzle of design, is, just now, an interesting group of popular airs. The arrangement is for four hands.

The Musical Bijou: Christmas Number. [London: Metzler & Co.]

The Christmas number of this very cheap publication contains a selection of dance music, to name the items of which will suffice. They are:—Musgrave's "Early Love" waltz; Blamphin's "Fire Bell" galop; Godfrey's "Beggars' Opera" quadrille; Label's "Stolen Kisses" waltz; Minasi's "Juvenile" lancers; and Marriott's "Uhlan" quadrille. Sixpence for the lot.

WAIFS.

Mr. B. Webster appears this evening at the Princess's Theatre.

We are glad to state that the health of Miss Herbert and Mr. Falconer are improving.

The subject of Mr. Augustus Harris's forthcoming pantomime is the Sleeping Beauty.

The Christmas piece at the Globe, by Mr. F. C. Burnand, is founded on the tale of The White Cat.

There are theatrical and musical performances in Paris twice a week, always given for the benefit of the wounded, or of persons ruined by the war.

M. Ernest Comus (from Paris) announces a series of matinées, under the title of Stances de Magic Rose.

This evening a new drama, by Dion Boucicault, will be produced at the Holborn Theatre.

Mr. Brinley Richards' March, composed for the Carmarthenshire Volunteers, by request of the Earl of Cawdor, was rehearsed last week by the Band of the Grenadier Guards, under the direction of Mr. D. Godfrey, and met with warm approval.

An old and popular favourite, Miss Poole (Mrs. Bacon) announces a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Wednesday, the 7th of December. All success attend her!

Dr. W. Spark, of Leeds, has been placed on the list of candidates for the Leeds School Board, but has declined to go to the poll, owing to his numerous professional engagements.

A new musical society, called the "Scarborough Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society," held its first meeting on the 4th inst. It already numbers 60 members. Dr. R. Sloman is the conductor.

Mr. Brinley Richards has brought out an edition of Handel's Concerto for the Welsh Harp, mentioned in Sir John Hawkin's History of Music as having been composed for the famous harpen Powell. The Concerto were played some time ago by Herr Sjöden at the concert of Welsh music, given by Lady Llanover, at her residence, under the direction of Mr. Brinley Richards.

On Saturday last, at a meeting of the committee of the recent monster concert, held in the Plymouth Citadel, Mr. William Winterbottom, bandmaster, Royal Marines, was presented with an address, on vellum, enclosed in a hand-some gilded frame, and elaborately finished. The design, one of Mr. T. Woolcombe's (Devonport), was executed with artistic skill by Mr. T. W. Good, ornamental writer, &c., Fore street, Devonport. The border consists of a Moorish arch, supported on columns of a similar design, in the spandrils of which are the monograms of the hospitals; the whole surrounded by an outer border of chaste and elaborate design.

In a ballet performed at Berlin one scene represents Paris, whence Gambetta and others are escaping in a balloon. A Prussian soldier shoots at the balloon and brings it down.

At a musical soirée at Balmoral, a few evenings since, a new ballad, "The Parted," composed by Mr John Barnett, was sung by the Princess Louise, with great feeling, to the delight of Her Majesty and a distinguished party. The Marquis of Lorne sang M. Gounod's romance for tenor voice, "The Empress of my soul."

Mr. W. Parkinson, who has been singing in Liverpool for Mr. Sims Reeves, is thus spoken of by the Daily Post:—

"Mr. W. Parkinson was the Francis Osbaldiston of the evening. The qualities of his voice—and it is a singer that must be judged—are very well known in Liverpool from his recent appearance here with the English Opera Company; and, though the music allotted to him in Rob Roy is not such as to display them in their whole strength, yet enough was manifest to secure him hearty applause, and an encore in the Macgregor ballad, which he gave with a vigorous accentuation and richness of tone."

The musical performance for the inauguration of the Hall of Arts and Science, on the 1st of May, next year, will be under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, who will compose a work for the occasion—something in the shape of ode, or cantata. The "largest organ in the world" will be heard at this ceremonial. It is proposed to secure the services of several military bands from the Continent. The Sacred Harmonic Society will give evening performances of oratorio on the grandest scale.

A Paris letter states that the grand Opéra re-opened its doors on the evening of the 6th. The entertainment was simply a concert. Five or six of the principal artists excepted, all have fled. Among those who remain are M.M. Villaret, Baron, Gaspard, Devoyod, Ponsard, and Bosquin, Mesdames Gueymard and Husson. The receipts of the first night were devoted to the relief of the victims at Chatsandon. The theatre was crowded. The concert, which began at eight o'clock, ended at a quarter to eleven. Extracts from Alceste, Guillaume Tell, and Les Huguenots, with Le Chant du Départ, were given.

The Beethoven contributions to the Crystal Palace concert of this day are the music composed for the Ruins of Athens, and the violin concerto, played by Madame Norman-Neruda, Mad. Sinico, Herr Stockhausen, and Mr. Patey are the singers. The last piece in the programme (one of the best yet offered) is Mendelssohn's splendid overture, The Hebrides.

Odessa.—The German dramatic company has come to grief. A very short time sufficed to prove the enterprise a failure. The unfortunate artists are left in a state of abject destitution. The Italian operatic company, on the contrary, have been coining money, ever since the 23rd September, with Meyerbeer's Dinorah, though that opera is far from being performed in first-rate style.

Favour-on-the-Maine.—The second Museums-Concert took place on the 4th inst. In remembrance of Mendelssohn, who died on the same day, 1847, the first half of the programme was entirely made up of that master's compositions. These were: the Fourth Symphony in A major; the air, "Es ist genug," from Elijah; and the Concerto for Violin. They were all enthusiastically received by the audience. The second part was opened by Herr Stägemann, from the Royal Opera, Hanover, who sung two romances by Herr Brahms, to words from Heck's Magelone, which he afterwards followed up by two songs of Schumann's. Herr Brahms' romances created anything but a favourable impression. The concert wound up with an excellent performance of Beethoven's Overture, Op. 115.

Leipsic.—The members of the Singacademie recently gave a performance of Spohr's oratorio, Der Fall Babylons. The solo music was confided to Mdlle. Bosse, Herren v. Milde, Hertsch, and Dr. Gunz.—Herr Fr. Grützmacher, from Dresden, appeared at the fifth Gewandhaus Concert, on which occasion he performed a new Violoncello Concerto by Herr Ferdinand, and took part with Herren Hegar, Riedel, and Pester, in Lachner's Serenade for four violoncellos. He was much applauded. Mdlle. Schenerich, from the Ducal Theatre, Brunswick, sang the scene and air from Der Freischütz, the air, "Mein glaubiges Herze," by Bach, and songs by Mendelssohn and Kirchner. The orchestra performed the "Genoveva Overture," of Schumann, and the Symphony in F major, of Beethoven.

MUSIC RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

Robert Cocks & Co.—"Clasen in dice"; "Hearts of Oak"; "Come your ranning"; and "Roast Beef of Old England," arranged for the pianoforte by Frank Walpole. "Allegro and Allegro molto vivace"; "Adieu to A flat" and "Andante in E flat," from Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Quartet, arranged in piano 4 to 2 by Johann Müller.

Hopwood & Crew.—"The Scout"; "Eyes"; "Evening bringeth thy heart back to Love"; "Weep not, O Rose"; Bessy's Mistake" and "Speak to me"—songs, by F. Campana.

Cassell, Petter, & Galpin.—"The Child's Book of Song and Praise," Part 1.

HAMLET.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"
SUNG BY
MR. SANTLEY.
Price 4s.

"In a song entitled 'O Wine' come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

"I FLY LIKE A BIRD," sung by Miss Ferrari, and "THE ARBUTUS," sung by Miss Anyon, two of the most beautiful of HARRY SMART'S new songs, are published, 3s. each, by DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street (sent free by post for 19 stamps each).

"MARINELLA,"
CANZONE.
Parole del SIGNOR CIABATTA.
Musica di ALBERTO RANDEGGER.
Price 4s.

"This canzone is written throughout with Signor Randegger's unfailing fluency and grace. The melody is really charming, while not a few devices of accompaniment are used which, besides giving piquancy to the song, show once more the composer's ingenuity and his constant desire to obtain that variety which accompaniments, as a rule, so sadly lack. We recommend 'Marinella' to all lovers of Italian music."—Sunday Times.

NOVELLO'S
OCTAVO EDITION OF OPERAS.

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER, & Co. beg to announce that, in accordance with the notice in the August number of the Musical Times, they are now preparing Handbooks of the Standard Operas (to be issued monthly), printed in the same size and shape as their octavo Oratorios, under the editorship of Madame Macfarren, and at a price but little above that of the ordinary "Book of Words."

These works will be printed in vocal score, with a Pianoforte accompaniment, in which the principal points of the score will be indicated, so that the audience may be enabled to follow the instrumental as well as the vocal parts of an opera.

When the composer has set the dialogue to recitative, the same will be included in this edition, when he has intended portions of the drama to be spoken, such passages will be printed in their proper place.

An English translation, written by Madame Macfarren, will be printed together with the original words, whether German, French, or Italian. This plan has been adopted since, although the latter language is conventionally associated with operatic music, accepted Italian versions often depart widely from the sense of the original; moreover, the syllabic arrangement is frequently so much changed as materially to alter the phrasing. The sole aim of the editor's translation being to follow the original as closely as possible in all respects, no other translation could be printed beside it without causing troublesome discrepancies in the distribution of notes.

The composer's directions for phrasing and expression will be strictly adhered to, on the authority of the best accredited scores, and all interpolations, omissions, and alterations of these will be rejected. In this respect the present edition will be unique among those that have hitherto appeared in this country.

The price of each Opera, sewed in paper cover, will be 2s. 6d.; or, bound in scarlet cloth, 4s.

BEETHOVEN'S "FIDELIO," with German and English words, will be published on December 1, and will be followed, on January 1, by AUBER'S "FRA DIAVOLO," with French and English words, or MOZART'S "DON GIOVANNI," with Italian and English words.

Specimen Pages may be had gratis of the Publishers.

Subscribers' Names will be received by the Publishers, or by all Music and Booksellers in the kingdom.

Art is something for which certain aptitudes must be given to every Individual, and, in consequence, Instruction, in its leading features, must always be individual and addressed to persons separately. But Individuality consists really only in the difference in musical proclivities, and, therefore, one of the first necessities in instruction is to take these peculiarities into consideration. That it is difficult for everyone to become everything is as evident with respect to instruction as it is with respect to all other things. Difficult is the pedagogical task of becoming intimately acquainted with the inward peculiarity of the pupil and working upon him in virtue of this knowledge.—Now in just the same proportion that instruction opens up to the pupil's mind one compartment after another, awakens the pupil inwardly more and more, renders him active and leads him on, does it announce its own goodness and right to be taken as a model. That such instruction is rare, arid that consequently real teachers are so too, are facts which do not admit of a doubt.

We consider, therefore, that a principal requirement of the present theory of art is that, contrary to the former theory, it should clearly recognize, and endeavour to develop, the Individuality of each separate pupil. Of course, the master cannot teach the pupils individually, but he must not leave it disregarded, or actually suppress it on purpose, in obedience to a regular plan. The new theory of art and the old have this in common, that every pupil, whether he be a genius, as it is called, or not, must receive a thoroughly good rudimentary course of instruction, without which no further development, either general or individual, is possible. But the great difference consists in the fact that the master of the present day has to take for his goal the complete Independence of his pupil, and must not trust to a happy chance, or to Genius, for making something of him. To reach this goal is not an impossibility.

In instruction, one step is raised upon, is developed out of, the other, and the pupil must stop at each one till he has completely assimilated it. Many a fault is committed at this stage of the process. It often happens that the pupil passes more rapidly over one step than over another, considering the former not so important; but this is a fault for which he has always to pay eventually, though perhaps not for a long time. Many things that we blame as defects in him are primarily caused by this practice of neglecting certain details, for he has never afterwards found either time or inclination to fill up the gap. If he happens, in the composition, to come upon such a point, he endeavours to avoid it as a noli me tangere, or to go round it as artistically as possible. Yes, that is his weak point, people say, as though to excuse him. "There are many such gaps in the course of study, but there is at each plenty of opportunity for the teacher to recognize the individual peculiarities of the pupil, and regulate by them the general foundation which absolutely must be laid. This rudimentary knowledge should be, to a certain extent, the background from which the individual stamp of the pupil should stand boldly forth. Before, however, the pupil has reached the last steps in his progress, his peculiarities, under such a system of proper guidance, have been so shaped that he at length comes to a consciousness of them, and it is then that, on his side, first begins the mastery over the building-materials of his art; it is then that his teacher can first open his eyes to the byeways which lead from the only right road; it is then that he can, for the first time, be looked upon as a genuine disciple of art, as knowing what he wants, as being able to discuss with another what is agreeable to his individuality and what not; and such a young disciple of art will not regard the last touches which his master gives him, or which he gives himself, as a final preparation, and docking-out for certain finite artistic objects, but, as a serious ordeal, a piece of self-examination, a weighing of all the resources which God has placed in him, and which he, by toiling and working, has endeavoured to develop. Such cases are, unfortunately, not frequent. Is it the intelligent teachers or the intelligent pupils who are the rarities? Some persons will say the former, and others the latter. If we consider the matter objectively, with a due consideration of the great mass of musical students who go through the course year by year, we cannot entirely absolve from blame either masters or pupils.

The pupils seldom bring with them the energy required by the seriousness of the subject of study, being very apt to regard as a pedant a master who obstinately insists upon his own narrow-minded views, and allows his pupils no freedom. In addition to their regular subjects, they study, in consequence, others, which perhaps run directly counter to the former, and which they then unfortunately too often look upon as those of most importance. They neglect in this manner the theory of art, properly so called, and take the principal thing very easily, the final result being that they are deficient in this point and deficient in that. The fact is, the pedant was not capable of understanding their geniality. They were not properly appreciated, and others—in their opinions, slow-minded dolts—were preferred to them. Whatever these gentlemen at last bring forth in the shape of melodic and harmonic impossibilities, of formless monstrosities, &c., is the overflowing of pure genius. Individuals of this kind reach the culminating point of their repulsive proceedings when they receive recognition from some one or other, and such recognition may be obtained cheaply enough. It strikes us that when such unenergetic geniuses are lost, art is not much the worse off.

But it is not seldom that the masters, also, are found wanting. They are very often really pedants who neglect to give the pupil at the right time, at the fitting instant, a space of freedom, to let him, so to speak, take a breath of fresh air, when the atmosphere of the school has become somewhat oppressive. By the master's neglecting to take advantage of these opportunities, many an undoubtedly talented pupil has been gradually driven by his inward impulses into bye-ways, which, with mutual concessions, he would not have pursued. On the other hand, many teachers remain in a very narrow field—which we will call, without more ado, the field of counterpoint. Whatever lies without it is bad; any advance beyond Palestrina, Bach, or Handel, is a reprehensible innovation; nothing save what moves in the forms and according to the views of those composers is regarded as duly sanctioned. We are not acquainted with this peculiar class of teachers from the first part of the present article. We will merely now add that their pupils generally look down with immense self-conceit, and sovereign contempt, on every thing else. It is not astonishing that, from coming across such people, many a person grows tired of the study of music, as a dry, soulless occupation, and perfects nothing himself to be but a bit of amateur taleot, which produces him only cheap laurels, It is true, but laorels which are more quickly and abundantly gathered than the others.

In whatever light we look at the subject, everyone seeks in the study of art only that for which he cares; he wants to realize at some future time, his ideas, and his dreams; and hence the principal aim of the present school is: to induce and, as far as possible, develop artistic individuality upon the basis of a general observance of musical rules. Independence of the pupil, and perfect consciousness of his own weaknesses and strong points are the objects the school must seek to attain; only independent artists, knowing and criticizing most sharply themselves, are real artists, or, as Lessing says, are worth as much again as they otherwise would be.

There is great danger for the teacher in his obtaining a really talented pupil. He is very apt to take things too easily with him. The pupil comprehends quickly and correctly; the course of instruction is more a breathing-space springing from step to step than an organic development of excellent capabilities; there is never any resting-spot, never any retirement of the pupil within himself. Arrogance and self-conceit easily take the place of scholarlike modesty, and drive before them industry and perseverance; whenever they make their appearance, all efforts are thrown away. In such cases a teacher's influence can seldom bring the pupil back to the right path and open his eyes. As a rule, every vestige of self-criticism has vanished, while self-infatuation and self-adoration have taken its place. But in self-criticism, too, there may be for the teacher a great danger of another kind. It is very possible that pupils who have learnt to think and distinguish for themselves may, instead of becoming talented musicians, be educated into talented hair-splitters, who will never do anything as musicians, but, by everlastingly criticizing and picking holes in their own productions, gradually engender a profound doubt of themselves. In our opinion, such pupils are the worst off of any; the teachers have with them a greater responsibility than with any one else, for, in their case, from the fact of their making corrections, and finishing with, of their work, there follows doubt—from doubt, a feeling of want of talent—and then they have already commenced an existence really sacrificed.

Yes, the post of a teacher of the art of music is truly no easy one, and there are few masters who understand their task, in the full acceptation of the word, performing it faithfully and conscientiously. But they are the very ones who will confess we are right in directing attention to an evil which weighs heavily, very heavily, in the scale, and to which many of the facts discussed in the foregoing lines may be traced. We allude to the education—non-musical—frequently so exceedingly defective, which pupils possess when placed under their masters. The teacher of music is expected to educate his pupil into a thinking artist; though he must, of course, exercise him most in thinking musically, we ask whence, in the name of fortune are the thoughts to come, when both scholastic as well as social education has been neglected, and when the poor teacher has often to take the greatest trouble to be comprehended only by the human being in his pupil, to say nothing of the artist. As far as regards many pupils with whom we have had the honour of becoming acquainted, we have commiserated not art for their accession to it as members, but the teacher to whom had fallen the sad task of enabling these artistic lights to display their brilliancy. Any master who really wishes to do his duty honourably, as regards his mission and as regards art, should always cry to the parents of such pupils: "Let the youths, as human beings, first seriously learn something at school, and then bring them back to me."

In such pupils it would probably be difficult to discover, or to develop, artistic individuality. They will be best off under masters who condemn individual development, and make their pupils indulge only in worn-out flourishes and antiquated tirades, which generally finish them.

Enough of this!

We finally repeat that every one desires to see only his own ideas and his own dreams realised, when he enters the temple of art, for the purpose of being received into the number of those who shall at some future time fill the priestly office. The principal aim of the present school is, therefore, to induce, and, as far as possible, develop, artistic individuality on the basis of a general observance of musical laws.

MDLLE. NILSSON IN BOSTON.

(From the "Boston Post.")

The Scandinavians of Boston and vicinity, with others, united last evening in tendering to Mdlle. Nilsson a grand ovation upon her arrival in our city. As it was announced that the distinguished lady would in all probability arrive in Boston about 5 o'clock, a large number of people were gathered in and around the Boston and Albany depôt, all anxious to catch a glimpse of the Swedish songstress.

About 5 o'clock the train rolled into the depôt, and as might have been expected, a great rush was made for the cars, but owing to the admirable police arrangements, only the committee, were permitted to go within several feet of the car in which Mdlle. Nilsson was. No demonstration took place in the depôt, and soon after the arrival of the train Mdlle. Nilsson, accompanied by one or two other ladies and the Chairman of the Committee of the Arrangements entered carriages and were taken to the Revere House. The apartments occupied by Mdlle. Nilsson are on the west side of the building, and are the same once as were used by Jenny Lind during her stay in Boston.

About the hour of 7 o'clock hundreds of people were gathered in the vicinity of Court and Tremont streets, all anxiously waiting to witness the grand demonstration which was announced to proceed from the Scandinavian headquarters on Hanover Street. As the various societies which were to compose the procession did not arrive until some time after 8 o'clock, the crowd naturally did not diminish, but kept rapidly increasing until there could not have been less than ten thousand people gathered in the above locality, and nearly the same number in the vicinity of the Revere House. At 9 o'clock, the Scandinavian Charitable Society, who intended to take part in the demonstration, assembled in front of their hall in Hanover Street, and with Chinese lanterns and transparencies, with born mottoes of welcome to Christine Nilsson, the Scandinavian coat-of-arms, and the musical emblems, and shortly afterwards took up their line of march for the Revere House, under the Chief Marshalship of Chas. Thuline, Esq., assisted by eight other gentlemen.

Shortly before the arrival of the procession, Mdlle. Nilsson appeared in the drawing-rooms, leaning upon the arm of G. Lootz, Esq., the acting Swedish Consul at this port. She was then formally introduced to a few ladies and gentlemen whose acquaintance she had previously formed in Europe. After which she took a seat at one of the windows and looked, evidently, with astonishment, at the multitude which had come to honour her.

Christine Nilsson is of medium height, with a full round face, large blue and expressive eyes, and that light or blonde hair which is so peculiar to her countrywomen, and is possessed of just such pleasing features as would naturally cause even her own sex to say that she was "really pretty." Her dress was dark blue satin, pointed, and trimmed with folds of velvet of the same hue. Her hair, which is as heretofore stated, was divested of all those superfluous additions which Dame Fashion compels the gentler sex to adorn themselves with—was simply done up in braids and puffs—and if ever the truth of the old saying, that "beauty unadorned is adorned the most," seemed true, it was when we beheld the simple, yet elegant manner in which her hair was arranged.

The procession having arrived at the Revere House and halted, the bands performed a few Swedish airs, after which a beautiful serenade was rendered by a picked choir of Nilsson's countrymen, which undoubtedly was greatly appreciated by her. At the conclusion of the singing, thirty young ladies entered the drawing-room and were formally introduced by Mr. Thuline, each of the young ladies presenting an elegant bouquet to Mdlle. Nilsson. After the reception of the young ladies, the doors were open to all those who wished to enter and pay their respects to Christine. An address welcoming Mdlle. Nilsson to Boston was delivered in the Swedish language by Mr. Loots; and was replied to by the lady in a few words, the eyes seeming to convey words of hearty thanks which the lips could not utter. After these formalities had been concluded she stepped on to the balcony and was received by the thousands outside with intense and prolonged applause. After bowing her thanks to the assembly, Mdlle. Nilsson retired to her apartments, to seek the repose which she so much needed after the fatigues of the journey from New York and the exciting scenes of the day.

The procession then reformed and marched from the square through Mount Vernon, Charles, Park, Winter, Washington, and up School Street, and halted at the residence of Mayor Shurtleff, where a serenade was tendered that gentleman, after which the Chief Marshal explained in a few words to his Honour the cause of the demonstration. The Mayor returned his thanks to the throng, and expressed himself highly pleased with the doings of the pageant, and was delighted to know that all had been conducted with such a strict regard for the laws. Three cheers were then given by the assembly for the Mayor; after which the procession took the line of march for their headquarters, in Hanover Street, where it was dismissed, all greatly pleased with the event of the evening.

(From the "Boston Post," Nov. 2.)

The sale of tickets for the Nilsson concerts began yesterday at the office in Music Hall, at 8 a.m. The crowd present at that hour was very large and urgent. Many took position in line as early as half-past nine o'clock Sunday evening. At the opening of the window the sensation was lively, and the season tickets were disposed of in speedy time. The fact that at 11 a.m. 10,000 dollars worth of tickets had been sold, is a fact to which comments will add no emphasis. Of course, speculators were present, but it is not believed they succeeded to any considerable extent in their purchases. In fact, the arrangements are ingeniously such as will hardly allow these virtues to fatten on the public. Mr. Strakosch and his able managers intend, if possible to give the public the fairest possible opportunity to procure tickets. It is pleasant to state that the sale yesterday was quiet, heavy, hopeful; and also fully equal to any day in which the great maiden of song has appeared. A considerable part of the house was taken up by the season purchasers. To-day the seats for single concerts are to be offered; and, of course, the balance will be absorbed in a lively manner. The desire of the public to witness Nilsson may be characterised as intense. Boston will stand by her a pressing compliment in any city in America, and she will sing to no more appreciative audiences. The evenings of the concerts are Friday and Saturday of this week, and Monday and Tuesday of next week, and the matinée on the afternoon of Saturday, the 12th of November. Mdlle. Nilsson's assistants are Miss Annie Louise Cary, Signor Brignoli, Signor Verger, Mr. H. Vieuxtemps, an orchestra under the direction of Max. Maretzek, and Signor Bosoni as accompanist. At the opening concert, Mdlle. Nilsson will sing "Angels ever bright and fair," from Handel's Theodora, and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's opera of Hamlet. It may be safely predicted that on Friday evening, Nilsson will sing to an audience that for numbers and appreciation she has not witnessed since reaching America. The tickets sold yesterday are our held by very best citizens.

MICHAEL MOSONYI.

This celebrated national Hungarian composer died at Pesth, after a fortnight's illness, aged 56, on the 31st October. He was born at Wieselburg, and was intended to be a printer. He was apprenticed as such in Pressburg. When a child, however, he received some slight instructions in music, to which art he afterwards devoted himself entirely. By indefatigable exertions, and a most energetic will, he obtained a high and lasting reputation as a composer among his countrymen. He confined himself mostly to works of a national character, and has left several operas of this nature, which were never published or performed. The Abbate Franz Liszt has sent Cornel Abranyi, the following letter on Mosonyi's death:—

"My dear friend Mosonyi's death has plunged my heart in grief. I regret him on account, also, of the music of Hungary, for which he was one of the noblest, most courageous, and worthiest representatives. We might feel proud of accompanying him step by step on the right road. His name, it is true, is not as well known and appreciated abroad as it deserves to be, but Glory does not trouble himself much this, and was not, perhaps, sufficiently interested in his own reputation, actuated as much by wisdom as by contempt for the dubious and common means necessary for establishing that reputation there, means which were repugnant to the high character of his mind. To felt what respect was due to him, and regarded as true fame only that achieved by a conscious perseverance in what is good and beautiful. Let us honour his memory, while striving to render fruitful his example, and the lesson he has taught us. Many of his compositions deserve to be more extensively and better known than they are; others—still in manuscript—especially his last great dramatic work, Almos, will, I hope, soon make their way far and wide. We will have some chat about them ere long in Pesth. To-day, I would merely share with a friend like you, my dear Abranyi, my sorrow at the loss we have sustained.—Yours, most truly, Fs. Liszt, Szegszard, 2nd November."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The thirty-ninth season of this admirable institution, which has done as much for good music of the class to which its efforts are exclusively devoted (the highest class of all) as the Philharmonic Society, its senior by some 30 years, with Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven as pioneers, has done for purely orchestral music, commenced on Friday night, and drew together a densely thronged audience, in Exeter Hall, the only building—to the discredit (as has been frequently remarked) of the biggest, wealthiest, most populous, and by no means least musical capital city in the world—available in London for performances on so large a scale. The "nearly 700," vocal and instrumental, were in their usual place; and, happily, Sir Michael Costa, who has been attached to the Sacred Harmonic Society ever since 1848, was in his. As he walked up the platform towards the conductor's desk, the orchestral chief par excellence received an enthusiastic greeting.

The work selected for the occasion was Judas Maccabæus, Handel's 12th English oratorio, which, though frequently described as "the Jewish Oratorio," in consequence of its referring to the exploits of one of the mightiest of Israelite captains, was really composed—like Gluck's Anglo-Italian opera, La Caduta de'Giganti (the Fall of the Giants)—to celebrate the Duke of Cumberland's victory over the Pretender, at the battle of Culloden, in 1746, and was first performed at Covent Garden in April 1747. After the Messiah and Israel in Egypt, without excepting even Samson, for which Handel is said to have entertained as great an esteem as for the great Christian musical epic itself, Judas Maccabæus, owing to reasons that have been frequently discussed and, therefore, need not be discussed again, is the most popular of those oratorios set to English texts, which he put forth, one after another, with such astonishing fecundity. It mattered little to Handel what were the literary pretensions of the words he had to set, providing only that the characters and incidents were such as to excite his vivid imagination; otherwise he would never have wedded to immortal music such absolute rubbish as was submitted to him, from him to time, by "the learned and Rev. Dr. Thomas Morell," with others of that genus. But here we are trenching on well trodden ground. A word or two about a performance which was, in many respects, first-rate, is all that is essential.

To musicians, and to musical amateurs of acquirement, the great interest of Judas Maccabæus, as of other oratorios by Handel, is mainly centered in the choruses. In this department the score of Judas is marvellously rich. From "Mourn, ye afflicted children!" that touching elegy on the death of Mattathias, the Jewish hero's father, with which the oratorio begins, to "Rejoice, O Judah!" its joyful and triumphal climax, the interest of the work may be said to be sustained without flagging, in spite of the now somewhat antiquated recitatives and the many not always very exciting airs and duets, in which the solo singers more or less complacently disport themselves. These choruses were almost uniformly well executed. Among them (but that they have been so often cited we might cite them nearly all) most prominently conspicuous were, "Hear us, O Lord!" at the termination of Part I.—which Mendelssohn has been twitted with having borne in mind while writing the noble chorus, "Oh, how great are the depths," in St. Paul; "Fall'n is the Foe," at the opening, and "We never will bow down," at the conclusion of Part II., in grandeur and solemnity unsurpassed even by Handel—the first as unsalutorately as the last is elaborately magnificent; "For Sion lamentation make," and "Ah! wretched Israel!"—unequalled models of pathetic expression; "Tune your harp"—which, brief as it is, in jubilant spirit stands almost alone; and, last not least, the famous trio, semi-chorus, and full chorus, "See, the conquering hero comes"—which first appeared in Joshua—English oratorio, No. 14—a miracle of effect, wrought out of the simplest conceivable materials. These, one and all, were given with an emphasis and precision which left little, if indeed anything, to criticise. In fact, the choral singing of the Sacred Harmonic Society, to judge by the performance of Friday night, preserves its high standard, although here and there some insignificant shortcomings might have been pointed out.

The solo singing, if not altogether up to the mark of the choral singing, offered much to command. Madame Vanaini (from the Royal Italian Opera), upon whom devolved the chief soprano part, was rather nervous at the commencement; and this somewhat marred what would otherwise have been a very fair rendering of "From mighty kings;" but in Part III. she seemed to have recovered the mastership command of her resources; and by far her most effective display was in the florid air, "So shall the lute and harp awake," which she gave with ready fluency and considerable point. Miss Vinta (a young Englishwoman, in spite of her assumed name), to whom the other soprano music was confided, made the most decided "hit" of the evening, in the exquisitely tuneful "Wise men flattering"—one of Handel's last compositions, intended originally to be interpolated in his oratorio, Belshazzar. We could scarcely desire to hear this well-known air more gracefully and artistically delivered, and were not at all surprised at the unanimous applause with which it was greeted by the audience. Another marked and thoroughly merited success was obtained in the contralto air, "Father of Heavan" (Part III.), by Madame Patey-Whytock, whose singing was excellent all through, and who is rapidly attaining the highest place in her profession. That Mr. Vernon Rigby would give all his study to the florid air, "How vain is man," and all his undaunted energy to "Sound an alarm," might have been taken for granted by those who have watched the career of that zealous and rising tenor; and as easily will it be credited that Signor Foli would do all that was needed for the bass music—especially in the declamatory recitative and air, "Call forth thy powers." Simon was the brother of Judas; and Signor Foli showed himself a worthy brother of Mr. Rigby—arcades ambo. In the little he had to sing, Mr. Montem Smith, as usual, proved himself a thoroughly well-trained musician.

The additional accompaniments on Friday night were those composed years ago by Sir Michael Costa, who has never conducted with more energy and at the same time with more of that unfailing judgment for which he is pre-eminently distinguished. Mr. James Coward presided, with his accustomed ability, at the organ. The hall, as we have hinted, was crowded in every part—inconveniently so, indeed.

The Sacred Harmonic Society, following suit with the Crystal Palace and Monday Popular Concerts, will give the First Mass and Mount of Olives on the 16th of December, the eve of Beethoven's birthday. Of course, the Christmas performances of the Messiah occur in due order.

PRESENTATION TO MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY.

The members of the Alto Chorus of the Sacred Harmonic Society have presented Madame Sainton-Dolby with the following address, written on vellum, illuminated, and framed:—

"Presented to Madame Sainton-Dolby by the Alto Chorus of the Sacred Harmonic Society, in testimony of their admiration of her talents as an artist, their estimation of the virtues which distinguish her private life, and the regret which they feel at her retirement from the public exercise of a profession she has so greatly adorned during the many years of her connection with this Society."

The deputation consisted of Miss Armstrong, Miss Libbie Cons, Mr. Husk, and Mr. F. W. Willcocks. Mr. Husk presented the testimonial, which was most artistically designed and executed by Miss Cons, with an appropriate speech, which was feelingly responded to by Madame Sainton-Dolby. We can well understand the emotion shown by Madame Sainton-Dolby at the spontaneous feeling which dictated the offer of this elegant gift from members of that society from whose public performances she has been so rarely absent, and which, we have reason to know, she regards with the greatest regard and affection.—George Dolby's Circular.

THE MESSIAH.

Christmas is not yet within three weeks of us, but, Christmas performances of the "sacred oratorio" have already begun. The first took place in St. James's Hall last Wednesday; Mr. Henry Leslie conducting, his magnificent choir rendering the choruses, and the solos receiving excellent treatment at the hands of Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. Nordblom, and Signor Foli. Particulars of the performance are unnecessary. Enough, that the audience (a large one), was thoroughly satisfied, and had good reason to be so.

LEIPSIC.—The members of Riedel's Verein lately gave a performance of Beethoven's Mass Solemnis.—Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger is to be produced at the Stadt-theatre very shortly.

THE ROSE MAIDEN.

Mr. Frederic H. Cowen's new cantata, The Rose Maiden, was produced at St. James's Hall on Wednesday last, with a result highly encouraging to the young composer. The work demonstrates that its author is as well able to command popular approval as, when the production of a symphony is in question, he shows himself competent to earn the respectful notice of connoisseurs. At the outset, however, we would caution Mr. Cowen against interpreting too favourably the applause showered upon him by his latest audience. Youth is apt to be a genuine and to think that little remains to do when but little has been achieved. Our youthful composer has begun well, but he has only begun. The subject of The Rose Maiden is taken from the German, and has been thus authoritatively set forth :—

"The Queen of the Flower Fairies, weary of a life of unbroken calm, prays of the newly-returned Spring that he will bestow upon her also the gift of love that he bestows upon man. He warns her of the risk she runs, but finally yields to her entreaties by changing her, while she sleeps, into the form of a beautiful girl. Under the name of Roseblossom she wanders through the world to find the love that she seeks, and meets with a girl who, having been betrayed and deserted by her lover, loses her senses and dies broken-hearted. But, undeterred from her search, Roseblossom becomes the wife of a forester, with whom she lives for a time in such perfect happiness that she cannot survive his death. The elves bewail the fate of their Queen, and course love as fatal to peace and happiness."

The moral of this story is unchallengeable if not very pleasant; and the parable through which it is conveyed has the merit of combining fancy and grace in happy proportions. Whether the details of the latter adapt it for musical treatment is a question we will give the reader means to decide for himself by laying them before him as far as is necessary. The poem (adapted by Mr. H. E. Francillon) opens with a chorus, "Green vale and vine-clad mountain," descriptive of the earth in winter, after which the Flower Queen offers her prayer, "Oh! hear, then king of beauty," to the returning Spring. In a recitative and duet the Spring warns her of the certain consequences attending the realisation of her desire to love, but the entreaty is again renewed, and finally granted, in a recitative, "Love, then, thy peace for ever." The two characters separate after a duet, "Soon as the mountain summits," the Spring retiring from the scene for good. A narrator next takes up the story, relating how the change sought by the Flower Queen was effected, the appearance of the newly-created mortal being extolled in a chorus, "A maid more beautiful than May." After this another dramatic episode begins. Roseblossom bids a joyful farewell to her late kindred, "Bloom on, bloom on, my roses;" and a chorus, "Mid the waving rose trees," brings upon the scene a "gardener's daughter," who waits for the lover that will never come. Roseblossom accosts her and learns the cause of grief; but the "gardener's daughter" is demented, and replies in a scena of the sort to which Hamlet, Lucia, Faust and many another opera have contributed examples. The Flower Fairies then by means of a chorus, "O earth-born sorrow that is not ours," endeavour to console her, on exemption from liability to such a fate, and a trio, "Has thou wandered in the forest?" holds up nature as the remedy for restless and unsatisfied humanity. The narrator next tells in the air, "The sleep of even folds field and cot," how Roseblossom looks from her cottage window out into the night, waiting for the "coming man," who comes at last in the shape of a fore-ter. The two sing a duet expressive of mutual pleasure; and we then learn how Roseblossom spends the night dreaming of the Forester, while the Forester gathers flowers for Roseblossom. The Fairies of the Flowers tell the latter in a chorus, "For him we speak, fair sister," how much she is beloved; and another duet, "Yes I will be thy Rosebud," puts matter on the most satisfactory footing. A bridal chorus, "'Tis the wedding morning," follows, after which an elaborate solo, "Where gloomy pine-trees rustle," draws a contrast between the peace of the Forester's cottage and the turmoil of nature. Then comes the narrator with a sad story. The husband is killed in the woods by an outlaw's gun, the wife dies of a broken heart and her old elfin companions strew green garlands over her grave singing in chorus "Farewell sleep thou lightly." A solo and chorus, "Yea, e'en as die the roses," bring the work to an end, and "improve the occasion" by declaring that God's roses would be too lovely "were they without a thorn."

It will be gathered from these particulars that the book is a mixture of drama and narrative, with but one character—that of "Roseblossom"—adapted to excite any interest. Round that central figure others come and go like shadows, none staying long enough to draw forth our sympathy. Roseblossom, however, is adequate to the responsibility cast upon her, and engages so much attention that we care little for anything else. The main fault of the libretto, as we think, is that it wants, not variety, but contrast. Variety, as need scarcely be said, is abundant, both scenes and characters constantly shifting, but the colour is too uniform; and we long for something to break its placid monotony. Hence the satisfaction given by the scena of the "Gardener's daughter," the wedding chorus, and the descriptive solo, "Where gloomy pine-trees rustle." We will not describe these as oases in a desert, because the surroundings are far from repulsive, rather are they pleasant hills breaking the dead level of a fertile plain. The scope of the libretto being thus limited, it will be understood that Mr. Cowen had no easy task before him when he strived to clothe it in a musical dress. That he has succeeded far enough to sustain the attention of an audience from beginning to end is a result upon which he may be congratulated.

Those who have heard Mr. Cowen's symphony in C minor will be ready to assume that he shines most in the orchestral department of his cantata. Such is the fact, at all events. The accompaniments to both songs and choruses are tasteful, fertile in device, and charmingly scored. Mr. Cowen fills in his pages with a liberal hand, but one or two cases excepted, he never confuses or overcrowds, while the right effect is invariably presented in a manner which forces one to observe that it is the right effect. The cantata is full of examples worthy to be quoted did space permit. We must, however, be content to put the fact on record, as indicating pretty forcibly where lies one element of Mr. Cowen's strength. Similar evidence is supplied by the many passages where Mr. Cowen gets the orchestra alone, and works it with a freedom and power indicative of no ordinary ability. In this department of the cantata are several proofs of careful design which ought not to be passed over. The melody of the introduction, for example, is made use of as suggesting the evil mixed with the good to which the Flower Queen aspired. It re-appears when the "gardener's daughter" sings her pitiful, touching song of fancied joy; is again heard while Roseblossom dreams of her lover, and yet again when the elves chant their farewell over the grave. The effect, in each case, is all that can be desired. Another happy use of repetition occurs in the air which describes the grief of Roseblossom at the sight of her mortal husband. In the theme of an Andante sung by the "gardener's daughter" being employed with felicitous propriety as an obbligato accompaniment for the first violin. These, and other points of a like character, are worthy of note and encouragement. In writing the airs Mr. Cowen has been content to follow ordinary models, both in rhythm and subject, carefully avoiding anything new and startling. Indeed, we cannot but think either that the young composer shrank from giving his invention full liberty, or that he deliberately sought to please popular taste in the readiest way. If the latter was the case, Mr. Cowen's object has undoubtedly been secured; anyhow, it remains for us to hope that some future work will exhibit in full the composer's unquestionable inventiveness. The choruses, like the airs, are judiciously kept down to a certain level of simplicity and effect; but, also like the airs, they are pleasing so far as they go. We may instance as among the best, "Green vale, and vine-clad mountain," the marriage chorus, "Bridal bells are ringing;" and that of the elves, "Farewell, sleep thou lightly." In the whole, the cantata is a most noteworthy for the happy use made in it of the orchestra; while as a work adapted for popularity it must be considered a decided success.

Little space is left in which to describe the performance. The soloists, Middle. Tietjens Madame Patey, Mr. Norbiom, and Herr Stockhausen, did more or less (the ladies more rather than less) justice to their parts; the orchestra was excellent, but the chorus left somewhat to desire. Mr. Cowen conducted in person, and was warmly applauded both before and after the performance. THADDEUS EGG.

LONDON GREGORIAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—I shall be obliged if you will allow me to lay before your readers a short account of the adjourned meeting at 11, Burleigh Street, on Wednesday evening last. The meeting was not very largely attended, but we trust, as the Association has now been started, Churchmen will not fail to send in their names, both as honorary and working members. The choirs represented at the meeting included those of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge; St. Paul's, Lorrimore; St. Lawrence, Jewry; St. Augustine's, South Kensington; St. James's, Hatcham; St. Mark's, Lewisham; St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate; St. Michael and All Angels'—Mission, Stepney, with others.

The objects of the Association are to promote strictly the study of Gregorian Church music, by holding meetings wherever practicable, and in so doing be the means of drawing together, in a closer bond of union, all those who rejoice to hear and use the old tones as in bygone days. We have purposely laid aside the idea of this being an expensive society, in order to obtain a large number of members of both classes, active and honorary. I shall be glad to receive the names of any desiring to join us, or to answer any questions. I am, yours faithfully, WILLIAM L. LATHER, Hon. Sec. pro tem.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

(From an occasional Correspondent.)

What with casual concerts, the Triennial Festival, and the Italian Opera, Birmingham has so largely discounted the opportunities of her regular musical season that up to a few days since the prospects of her accustomed purveyors of musical entertainment looked anything but cheerful. The Festival Choral Society, in particular, had already reaped such abundant laurels in connection with the great musical event of the year, that it seemed impossible their regular harvest should not fall short. Happily, the public capacity for good music is not a very arbitrary measure, and the large and high class attendance at the opening concert of the Festival Choral Society's new season, which took place in the Town Hall, on Thursday week, shews that Birmingham musiclovers are resolved not to let their autumn indulgence seriously curtail their winter enjoyments.

The programme was of a composite character, comprising Mr J. F. Barnett's Paradise and the Peri (which achieved such a decided popular success at the last Birmingham Festival), with Mendelssohn's Lorley and First Walpurgis Night. The executive resources consisted of the band and chorus of the society—over 300 strong—under the conduct of Mr. Stockley, with Madame Vanzini, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli as vocal principals. Mr. Stimpson, as usual, was the organist. Mr. Barnett's cantata was so fully noticed in the Musical World on the occasion of its first production that it would be superfluous to expatiate on its merits, which, indeed, lie sufficiently near the surface for all who hear to appreciate. And there is even less need to describe such established classics as the lyric fragment which followed Mr. Barnett's work and the cantata which Mendelssohn built upon Goethe's legendary poem.

Although the Festival performance of Paradise and the Peri was in some respects more perfect than that of Thursday week, when the choral and orchestral resources were necessarily on a more limited scale, it may fairly be doubted if Mr. Barnett's music was heard to such advantage on the first as on the second occasion. Its light and simple graces are not so well adapted to a large orchestral combination as music of a stronger texture. The principal vocal part devolved on Madame Vanzini, whose sweet, fresh, flexible, brilliant voice, graceful and engaging manners, and unflagging spirit seem to be exactly adapted to Mr. Barnett's conception of the Peri, and her success was unequivocal.

Nothing could be finer in feeling or more finished in execution than Madame Vanzini's singing of the air, "Sleep, said the Peri," in which the spirit apostrophizes the dead form of the devoted maiden who sacrificed her life to love. In the duet for soprano and tenor, with chorus, 'Oh, let me only breathe the air,' Madame Vanzini produced an equal effect; but her crowning effort was in the finale, "Joy for ever," in which she earned enthusiastic applause. Madame Patey, as "the Holy Angel who was keeping the Gates of Light," sang with her wonted earnestness, and even more than her accustomed power and beauty of voice, especially excelling in the arietta, "O Nymph of a fair but erring line." Mr. Vernon Rigby, in the principal tenor part, was wanting neither in spirit nor voice. His singing of the air, "Oh, if there be on this earthly sphere," was less remarkable for refinement than for vocal charm, and its success in proportion. Signor Foli gave the principal bass music, and, especially, the air, "Bless'd be the tear of soul-felt penitence," in such a manner as to win him flattering applause. The unaccompanied chorus, "She wept," was encored—the only piece which won this distinction, though many deserved it. The band, while vastly improved, is still wanting in precision. The chorus, as may be supposed, was thoroughly at home.

In the finale to Loreley, Madame Vanzini, as Leonora, excited the genuine enthusiasm of her hearers. The choral and instrumental parts were admirably rendered; and the instrumental passages were executed with remarkable spirit. In the finale, when Leonora casts her wedding-ring into the Rhine, Madame Vanzini displayed a power which fairly electrified the audience, who twice recalled her to the platform. So marked, indeed was her success, that the committee lost no time in securing her services for the Messiah, which is to be given on the 20th inst.

About the Walpurgis Night, which brought the entertainment to an end, it is only necessary to say that the principals were Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli, all of whom acquitted themselves with great skill and spirit. The band and chorus, under Mr. Stockley's direction, left little to be desired.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

There is little to say of the concert on behalf of the French Refugee Fund, which took place on the 24th ult. A number of excellent artists appeared, among them Mdme. Viardot Garcia, Mdme. Culloton, Miss Megan Watts, M. Faure, Mr. Nordlihom, M. Hammer, Mr. Charles Gounod, Signor Bettini, and Mr. Benedict. The programme contained a somewhat curious mixture of classical and popular works, all of which were more or less well performed, and more or less well received.

VIENNA.—M. Offenbach has arrived, with the intention of making a prolonged stay.—The programme at the first Philharmonic Concert contained: Overture to Oberon Eckbert, Rudorff: Beethoven's Concerto in G major (Herr Epstein); Overture to Euryanthe (Weber); and E flat major Symphony, Schumann.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The following programme was gone through in a satisfactory manner at the students' concert, given on Thursday evening, the 24th ult.:—

Trio, "The Glow worm" (H. Smart), Miss Pocklington, Miss Fanny Williams, and Miss Etherington; Capriccio, in F, Op. 34, pianoforte (Moscheles), Miss Jessie Lee; Air, "Honour and arms," Samson (Handel), Mr. Insull; Allegro Moderato, from sonata in A flat, Op. 39, pianoforte (Weber), Miss Salmon; Duet, "Saper vorrei se m'ami" (Haydn), Miss Frith and Miss Goode; Fantasia, in C, pianoforte (Schubert), Mr. Dockerr; Song, "The Charmer," Fruhlingslied (Mendelssohn), Miss Mandsley, Westmorland scholar; Sonata, in D, for two pianofortes (Mozart), Miss C. Gardner and Miss Burleigh; Glee, "Nymphs of the Forest" (Horsley), Mr. Perry, Mr. Ingelbi, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Lucas; Prelude and Fugue, in D, pianoforte J. S. Bach), Mr. Beazley; Aria, "Lento il piè" (Mozart), Miss Rebecca Jewell; Allegro Brillante, for two performers on the pianoforte (Mendelssohn), Miss Newman and Miss Taylor; Aria, "Evening song" (Abend-Empfindung) (Mozart), Miss Pocklington; Allegro giustoso in E, No. 2 from a set of six studies (W. S. Bennett), Allegretto, in D flat, No. 2, from Pezzi di Brovura (Cipriani Potter), Cannonet, in A flat, "Welcome" (G. A. Macfarren), Mdlle. Dépras; Duet, "Zuleika and Hassan" (Mendelssohn), Miss Lambert and Mr. Gay; Allegro con Fuoco (Volkslied), No. 3, Book 8, and Allegro Grazioso, No. 6, Book 5, Lieder ohne Worte (Mendelssohn), Miss Bath; Madrigal, "In pride of May" (Weelkes, 1608). Accompanists, Miss Bairnsfather and Mr. Kemp.

The next public rehearsal is announced for Tuesday morning, December 13, when the first and second parts of J. S. Bach's Christmas Oratorio is to be performed for the first time in this country.

THE ROYAL EDITION OF OPERAS.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

Under this title Messrs. Boosey & Co. have projected a new edition, at an uncommonly reasonable price, of those operas, ancient and modern, which are chiefly indebted for their popularity to the Italian lyric stage. Two out of a list of some fifty operas announced as in preparation, to appear without cut at intervals of a fortnight, are before us. The form is not merely convenient for general purposes, but such as to render the edition available for theatres, and especially serviceable to those who may be desirous of knowing more about what they are listening to than can be gathered from a programme supplied with musical examples. It has for some time become a habit among amateurs to follow the performances of symphonies, overtures, quartets, sonatas, &c., score in hand; and that the appreciation is materially assisted, perhaps also the enjoyment enhanced, by such adventitious aid, is scarcely to be disputed. Cheap hand-book oratorios have long been in use, and their influence is unquestionably for good. We can see no reason why opera, the most generally popular of all musical entertainments, should not be equally benefited by similar means. At all events the "Royal Edition of Operas" is calculated to supply the want. The disposition of each work is for voices, with pianoforte accompaniment, which, it will be readily understood, is more convenient, not alone because more portable, but because easier to read, than a full orchestral score. That the arrangements may be depended upon for scrupulous exactness, the name of the editor, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and that of his associate, Mr. Josiah Pittman, are a sufficient warrant. These gentlemen are to supply entirely the entire edition. The operas already published are Don Giovanni and Fidelio. The Barbiere di Siviglia and the Sonnambula are next on hand.

St. PETERSBURGH.—At the Russian Operahouse, the first opera of a young composer, by name Affanasieff, is in rehearsal; the same is true of Meyerbeer's Prophète, with Mdlle. Lwrowsky as Fides.—At the Italian Opera, the artists newly engaged for this season have appeared in due course, but only two, Mdme. Sass and Signor Cord, have proved anything like a favourable impression.

SALZBURG.—The first concert of the Mozarteum was highly successful. The band fully sustained its reputation as one of the best in Germany, and, under the conductorship of Herr Bach, performed in brilliant style Meindels-ohn's overture, Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt. Mdlle. Riegein played Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat major. Herr Staroushek, a member of the band, played C. M. von Weber's Clarinet Concerto; and Herr Sevcik Paganini's Adagio and "Glockchenrondo." The vocalist was Mdlle. Trousil.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite.—The Civil Service Gazette remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Each packet is labelled JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London. Also makers of Epps's Cannoline, a very thin evening beverage.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1870-71.

DIRECTOR—MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

THE BEETHOVEN CONCERTS.

THE present year being the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, the Director has thought that it would be a fitting tribute of respect to the memory of that immortal genius to confine the programmes before Christmas exclusively to Selections from his Instrumental and Vocal Works. Every concert, until the end of the year, will therefore be a Beethoven Concert. In the course of the series, the Six Quartets, Op. 18; the Three Quartets (Rasoumowsky), Op. 59; the Quartet, No. 10 (E flat); the Five Trios for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; and as many of the Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violin, Pianoforte and Violoncello, and Pianoforte alone, as can be comprised within the limits of eight programmes, will be given. The Vocal Music will in all instances be selected from the Chamber Songs, with Pianoforte Accompaniment.

PROGRAMME OF FOURTH CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 5TH, 1870.

To Commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

PART I.

QUINTET, in C major, Op. 29, for two Violins, two Violas, and Violoncello—MM. SIVORI, L. RIES, ZERBINI, HAWE, and PIATTI .. .. Beethoven.

SONGS, { "Ich lieb-e dich" / "Mit einem grünbluhten Band" } —Herr STOCKHAUSEN .. Beethoven.
{ "Kennst du das Land" }

PASTORAL SONATA, in D major, Op. 28, for Pianoforte alone—Madame ARABELLA GODDARD .. .. Beethoven.

PART II.

SONATA, in G minor, Op. 5, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Violoncello—Madame Arabella Goddard and Signor PIATTI.. .. .. .. Beethoven.

SCOTCH SONGS { "The Maid of Isla" / "The sweetest lad was Jamie," } With Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello Accompaniments by Herr STOCKHAUSEN, accompanied by MM. ZERBINI, STRAUS, and PIATTI. Beethoven.

TRIO, in G major, Op. 1, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello—Madame ARABELLA GODDARD, MM. STRAUS, and PIATTI .. Beethoven.

Conductor .. .. .. Mr. BENEDICT.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE FIFTH CONCERT OF THE THIRTEENTH SEASON

WILL TAKE PLACE ON

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 10th, 1870.

To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

QUARTET, in F major, Op. 59, No. 1, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello—MM. STRAUS, L. RIES, ZERBINI, and PIATTI .. .. Beethoven.

SONGS, { "Das Blümchen Wunderhold" / "Mignonette" / "Mailied" } —Herr STOCKHAUSEN .. Beethoven.

SONATA, in G major, Op. 29, for Pianoforte alone—Madame ARABELLA GODDARD .. .. Beethoven.

N.B.—The Entrance to the Orchestra will, in future, be by the door in Piccadilly Place only.

DEATHS.

On the 27th ult., at his residence, 32 Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park, ADOLFO ANGELICO GOTOFREDO FERRARI, aged 63.

On the 28th ult., Mr. MILLS, Music Publisher, of New Bond Street, aged 72.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DR. TEUX is right in one instance, but wrong in the other. He is right in saying that the Sonate Mélancholique of the late Herr Moscheles is the key of F sharp minor, but wrong in saying that it was written in four movements. There was never but the one movement which is published in the German edition. It is a long movement, as Dr. Thin must know if he has tried it over; and no doubt the complete sonata was thus conceived by the revered master.

SIGMA THE GOBBLER.—In one respect our correspondent is not quite incorrect; but he has overlooked the fact that Haydn outlived Mozart many years, and that Mozart never heard the Creation. Beethoven did, it is true; but Beethoven was not the composer of Don Giovanni, and had nothing whatever to do with the Requiem. So much for "Snorr the Gobbler."

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1870.

DEFEAT OF MR. CHORLEY.

THE controversy between the author of the libretto of St. Peter (unsettable version) and the composer of that oratorio has ended. Mr. Chorley fired his last shot in the Athenæum of Saturday fortnight, and declared that nothing should ever make him discharge another. Mr. Benedict retorted in the Athenæum of Saturday week, and, having no longer an opponent, perforce sheathed his sword; but with a significant intimation that if Mr. Chorley wants more fighting at any future time he can have it. As the contingency is not likely to arise, we may consider the matter ended, and take a final retrospect before consigning it to the limbo of forgotten feuds.

That Mr. Chorley has been beaten at all points is the first impression made by a review of the controversy. We are not a bit surprised at the result, seeing that it was forcknown to all acquainted with the facts of the case. Neither are we pained one tittle, seeing that justice is satisfied. Mr. Chorley, who must have read his Bible when concocting Biblical libretti, ought to have remembered the hypothetical king who, making war with ten thousand men, had to meet an enemy furnished with twenty thousand. The veteran journalist was even worse off than that unhappy monarch. He waged war with fancies against facts, and the facts have beaten him. He made a public matter of a private (and imaginary) grievance, and has been "hoist with his own petard." He entered upon the struggle with the arrogant confidence of one who discounts victory, and has rushed into the arms of defeat. In the name of Justice, who would have it otherwise?

We advise our readers to contrast Mr. Chorley's first letter to the Athenæum with his last, and mark the difference. In one the writer appears as a deeply injured man, the victim of an unscrupulous colleague's ill-treatment. In the other he is seen trying to defend wrongful assumptions, and wriggling out of false positions, with but slight chance of success. One after another the props upon which he originally rested his case have been knocked away, by the evidence brought forward in Mr. Benedict's calm and gentlemanly letters; and now, the whole card-fabric lies in the mud, even the builder washing his hands and leaving it there, as too much soiled for further manipulation. Rarely has the right, when challenged by the wrong, more thoroughly vindicated itself.

We will not tire the reader by going over once more all the points of a controversy so miserable in its origin and object; but there are certain conclusions which, as the absolute facts evolved out of much fuss and pother, ought to be stated.

I. Mr. Benedict bought and paid for Mr. Chorley's libretto, twelve years ago.

II. Mr. Benedict was not satisfied with the book.

III. Mr. Chorley's version of St. Peter was not accepted by the Birmingham Committee; nor was it, on Mr. Chorley's recommendation, entrusted to Mr Benedict to compose.

IV. Mr. Chorley refused to make certain alterations desired by the composer. These facts established, there is an end of Mr. Chorley as far as concerns the controversy.

Everybody remembers the hero of Chevy Chace, respecting whom it is said:—

> "For Witherington I needs must wail,
> As one in doleful dumps,
> For when his legs were smitten off
> He fought upon his stumps."

Mr. Chorley has not even the resource of the unfortunate Border warrior. Not a stump remains to him; and the sword drawn, as by a fore-ordained conqueror, is sheathed in impotence.

If we refer to the matter of the disputed £25, it is only to express surprise that the Editor of the Athenæum, naturally anxious to help out an old contributor, should have laid stress on the fact that a cheque, payable to bearer, was not endorsed by Mr. Chorley. The evidence is worth absolutely nothing, because, as is everywhere known (save at the Athenæum office), cheques payable to bearer require no endorsement; while the insinuation of the Editor, to use the words of a contemporary, is "insufferable," and has since been energetically repelled.

One word more. Mr. Chorley, having unnecessarily dragged Sir M. Costa and the late Charles Dickens into the controversy, has finished by taking a greater name in vain. He must needs tell us of Mendelssohn—of "original studies," with a view to supplying the illustrious composer with a libretto; and of a journey to Interlaken, with the "original studies" in his pocket. On first reading this, we partially reconciled ourselves to the master's death, because it seemed as though he had actually been "taken from the evil to come." Second thoughts, however, brought a change. We remembered that the composer of Elijah was fastidious; and, therefore, safe.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

MR. ARTHUR CHAPPELL, by his preserving efforts, seems at length to have taught a vast section of the public that there is one pleasure to be found in a largely-developed instrumental piece of what is termed "classical music," which cannot be derived from brief effusions, however great their attractions of melody or harmony. It is the charm of the sonata, or quartet, for instance, as a whole, wherein we recognize constant variety, emanating from one fertile conception, which the patrons of the Monday Popular Concerts are now beginning to appreciate at its just value. They are evidently interested by the symmetry and coherence of the various subordinate forms, employed as subtle servitors to one great plan, in the master-pieces of chamber music; they look with confident pleasure to the recurrence of certain themes or phrases, and expectantly await with curiosity some novel treatment of ideas already heard and admired. Here, then, is a thoroughly musical audience; and we need scarcely dwell upon the inevitable inference, that executants must feel more at home, and consequently perform with greater abandon and enjoyment, when moved by such magnetic sympathy, and cheered by such responsive geniality.

The last concert was no exception to the rule. Indeed, it may be described rather as additional evidence of the rule's absoluteness; for not only was the programme thoroughly "classical," consisting exclusively of works by Beethoven, but there was likewise a thronged attendance; and, mirabile dictu—despite the weather, which might reasonably have been expected to damp the "genial ardour" of anybody's soul—audience no less than executants—seemed to enjoy the performances—particularly remarkable features in which were the magnificent playing of Madame Goddard of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26), the last movement of which, rendered to absolute perfection, was unanimously encored, and the scarcely less irreproachable performance of the Sonata in A minor, for pianoforte and violin, by the same lady, associated with Madame Neruda.

Let those who suppose music to be a mere meaningless exhibition of emotion, who fancy that human beings sing and play as boys are said to whistle, "for want of thought," visit the Monday Popular Concerts, and learn that music in its loftiest manifestations is animated by the same spirit and regulated by the same principles which vivify and govern all intellectual exhibitions of art; that it has power to awaken the noblest feelings, to sound the very depths of the human heart, with tones of adoration, heroism, joy, grief, love, or despair, and is amenable to all those laws of form and symmetrical design which alone render the greatest triumphs of the poet, painter, and sculptor, classical. Is it too much to say that the soul is moved, the senses flattered, imagination and fancy excited, and reason gratified by those productions of the greatest composers where art and science are so happily commingled?

And if those who "came to scoff," or, perhaps, to sleep, on the comfortable St. James's Hall sofas, have gradually been awakened to the consciousness of a new enjoyment, and led to respect as well as admire the authors of those master-pieces to which Mr. Arthur Chappell devotes his programmes, has not a great deal been gained for the social and artistic status of musicians in this country, and even more for the taste and sentiment of a public still, perhaps, a trifle too incredulous respecting the psychological influences of Polyhymnia's art?

ADOLFO FERRARI.

One of the most highly esteemed members of the musical profession has passed away from among us. Signor Ferrari died on Sunday afternoon, at the age of sixty-three. No one who had the pleasure and advantage of knowing him will hear this intelligence without deep regret. Few among our resident professors were so universally popular as Signor Ferrari, his buoyant and joyous nature winning him friends in every circle. Signor Ferrari was a member of the Philharmonic Society (of which he was frequently elected director), and also of the Royal Society of Musicians. As a professor of singing he occupied the first rank. No class at the Royal Academy of Music was more sought for than his; and, as a mark of respect to his memory, the directors closed the doors of that institution yesterday—the day appointed for the funeral, at which most of them were anxious to be present. In Signor Ferrari the profession has lost an earnest, able, and hard-working member, and society an honest and true-hearted man.

THE Beethoven pieces at the Crystal Palace concert of to-day are the Overture to Egmont; the Pianoforte Concerto, No. 1 (in C), to be played by Herr Pauer; the Symphony No. 8 (in F); and the "Liederkreis," to be sung by Mr. Sims Reeves.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

GREAT are the amenities of New York musical journalism, for proof of which we take the following extract out of Watson's Art Journal:—

"'Jerry Popkins' (by changing the first letter of this patronymic we get the name of a well known organist and professor), the penny whistler and the prize fraud upon the musical public, is a member of the Lotus Club; but how he came to be admitted among gentlemen is something to be wondered at. Still, he is there, although he is very carefully avoided, as one would avoid anything nasty that lies in the path. True to his dirty instincts, he is just that bird which "fouls its own nest," for he devotes the greater part of the Five Points sheet he publishes to libelling the members of the Lotus brotherhood. Jeremy Didler Popkins—especially Didler in an Orpheon sense—is unfit to associate with gentlemen; and his persistent and gross attacks upon its members, are sufficient cause for the Lotus Club to expel him the body. If they have a care for their reputation they will do so promptly."

THE able and intelligent Berlin correspondent of the Daily Telegraph makes the following reference to Herr Joachim, in one of his recent letters:—

"Herr Joachim has resigned his position of Professor here. In all musical circles in Berlin the most profound regret is expressed at this resolution. Herr Joachim has devoted himself heart and soul to the task, and has in the short time during which he has fulfilled the duties of Professor encouraged to a marvellous extent the cultivation of the art of which he is the greatest living exponent. His exertions have been thoroughly and very generally appreciated—hence the demonstration made at a quartet concert, two days ago, in token of the universal approval of Professor Joachim, and of the universal sorrow caused by his resignation. There are many in England who will not share in that sorrow, for there are many who think he is better employed in himself interpreting Beethoven than in teaching the best interpretation to others less gifted. Herr Joachim is to go to Russia at the beginning of next year for some six weeks, and at the end of that time he will again be heard at your admirable Monday Popular Concerts."

THE Association for Sacred Music at St. Karl's, Vienna, celebrated its forty-fifth anniversary on Sunday, the 20th of November, when they performed, in memory of L. van Beethoven, that composer's Mass in C. One Sunday in 1826, Beethoven, accompanied by Herr Graf, the pianoforte maker, came into the choir at St. Karl's during high mass. The "regens chori" was the present director of the choir, Herr T. Rupprecht, who bowed to his illustrious visitor, directly he perceived him. A message was sent to Herr Rupprecht, saying that Beethoven wished to speak with him. When mass was over, Beethoven, Graf, and Rupprecht walked down by the Technikergebäude, and Beethoven asked Rupprecht to give him the Latin words of the "Te Deum," and mark the places where the tempo is changed, as, for example, at "Salvum fac Regem." Beethoven said he intended composing a grand "Te Deum," to be performed in the Augustiner Church, and at the passages marked, a cannon was always to be discharged on the glacis. Rupprecht complied with Beethoven's wish in the course of the same day. Beethoven never carried out his intention, however, as he died in 1827; it is not known whether he ever even begun the "Te Deum."

THE nuisance of organ grinding has again evoked letters from sufferers, and one has written to say that he has been threatened with assassination for interference. The grievance is intensified at this time of year, organists having returned from sea-side tours renovated for a winter campaign. There has been, also, an addition to our tormentors in the Italian bagpipe blowers, who make more aggravating music than their brethren, the Scotch. In brigand costume these parade under our windows, discharging discords that jarr every nerve, and expel every thought, leaving in the mind a craving for vengeance. The organs are constructed of more powerful qualities, in order to compel surrender from an unwilling listener in a more peremptory style than usual. Let people, vexed beyond endurance, strictly forbid servants to encourage the performers. Domestics are in the habit of humming and dancing to the organs, and while the master is waiving off the Savoyard from the parlour, Mary Jane is ogling him from the area, or smiling at him from nursery windows. It seems hard that restrictions should be placed upon strollers, with their booths, while vagabonds, with organs and bagpipes, are permitted to distract us. It is hard to refer to this matter without a smile, but the subject has a serious aspect demanding as much attention as the licensing of theatrical go-carts.

AMONG the papers of a well-known historian, lately deceased, there has been found, at Schwerin, a thickish broad octavo manuscript volume, in good condition, with Latin and German hymns set to music, and presented by the first celebrated Saxon Capellmeister, Johann Walther, in 1530, to his friend, Martin Luther. This fact is proved, beyond a doubt, by a memorandum, in the great Reformer's own hand, and the orthography of the time, on the title page. The memorandum runs as follows:—"Hat myr vereehret meyn guter Freind Herr Johann Walther Componist Musica zu Torgaw. 1530. Dem Gott gnade.—Martinus Luther." ("Presented to me by my good friend, Herr Johann Walther, musical composer, Torgau, 1530, for whom may God have grace.—Martinus Luther.") The present owner of this manuscript treasure has submitted it to Herr Kade, musical director, with a view to its publication. Among the hymns contained in the collection are the two great features of the Lutheran hymn book, "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott," and "Vater unser im Himmelreich."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE Metropolitan Lecture Hall was crowded on the 24th ult., at a grand evening concert given by Mr. Howard (pupil of Mr. Bishenden). The programme was gone through in a highly satisfactory manner, the principal vocalists being Miss Nellie Kean, Miss Nora Somerville, and Mdlle. Vernon (another pupil of Mr. Bishenden), Messrs Kentchen, Turner, Howard, and C. J. Bishenden, bass; Herr Waldkirch, Boylance, and Mdlle. V. Nehrgnez assisted at the pianoforte. Mr. Bishenden was encored three times in the "Marseillaise," and twice in a French war song. The other artists were effective in their respective solos.

A CONCERT was given at the Greyhound Hotel, Richmond, on Tuesday, before an audience of nearly 500. Mr. B. Mansell Ramsey conducted, and the artists performed their parts with credit. Amongst them were Mdlle. Emilie Blanche, Miss Rosaline Smart, Messrs F. Childerstone and Reeves, vocalists; and Mr. Ellis Roberts, harpist. The unwieldy room has seldom been the scene of more hearty applause than that which greeted the performances of the solo pianist, Miss Amy Weddle, who gave Kontski's Souvenir de Faust, and Wille Pape's Irish Diamonds.

COLLEGE OF MUSICIANS, SHAFTESBURY HALL, CITY.—The first of a series of chamber concerts was given on November 26th. Hummel's trio, in E flat, and Beethoven's trio, in G, each for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, were excellently rendered by Messrs. Alfred Carder, Mann, and Goodwin. Mr. Goodwin also played Gounod's "Meditation." "Crudel perche" (Nozze di Figaro), was sung by Miss M. St. Aubyn and Mr. E. Carder, and encored, as was Kücken's song, "Day's brightest splendour," sung by Miss Cole. Miss Amy Linnington, Messrs. Albert James and E. Carder, sang several solos. Some partsongs, including Mendelssohn's "Awake the starry midnight hour," Pinsuti's "In this hour of softened splendour," Hatton's "The Indian Maid," &c., were well rendered by a select choir under the conductorship of Mr. Alfred Carder.

THE ALHAMBRA.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—A statement having had publicity given to it by several influential journals to the effect that the performance of the Hanlon Brothers had been discontinued at the Alhambra in consequence of representations made by the Commissioners of Police, I beg to say that no communication on that subject has been received by yours obediently. F. STRANGE.

27, Leicester Square, Nov. 23.

MR. F. H. COWEN'S admirable Symphony in C minor is to be given on Thursday next, the 6th inst., at the Philharmonic Concert, Liverpool, under the direction of its gifted young composer.

MR. BENEDICT AND MR. CHORLEY.—In our last number we remarked that the cheque for £25, dated April 23rd, 1858, which was forwarded to us by Mr. Benedict, was drawn in favour of Mr. Chorley or bearer, and was not indorsed by Mr. Chorley. Mr. Benedict has since shown us that the cheque was passed by a friend of Mr. Chorley's through Messrs. Coutts's Bank.—Athenæum.

PROVINCIAL.

PETERSFIELD.—A concert appointed sends us the following:—

"A chamber concert was given under the direction of Mr. Nicholas Mori, on the 23rd ult., being the third of a series, in aid of the distressed English in Paris. The programme was classical, opening with Mozart's Quartet in F, No. 27, for oboe and strings, well played by Mr. Gratian Cooke, Mr. N. Mori, the Hon. Sydney Skiffington, and the Rev. G. L. Blake. Beethoven's romance in G for violin and pianoforte was confided to Miss Nichols and Mr. Mori, who also joined in the same composer's serenade trio in D. Miss Nichols played one of Handel's Suites for pianoforte with much success, and was loudly applauded; as were Dr. Leachman and the Rev. G. L. Blake, in all their songs. The latter is both a good singer and an excellent violoncellist. Haydn's "Surprise," given in excellent style by a small but efficient orchestra, closed the concert, which was a perfect success.

LIVERPOOL.—The Mercury of November 23rd, speaks thus of a Philharmonic Concert in honour of Beethoven:—

"Doing honour to the 'Michael Angelo of music,' the Philharmonic Society last evening devoted the whole programme to the works of Beethoven. The selection of music was varied and excellent. The instrumental items included the C minor Symphony, the Egmont, Leonora, and Fidelio overtures, the 'Choral Fantasia,' the 'Moonlight Sonata,' with the Ruins of Athens march and chorus. The vocal selections were entrusted to Mrs. Weldon and Mr. Vernon Rigby. The symphony, of course, was the leading item, and each movement was listened to with marked attention and manifest delight. The orchestra brought real enthusiasm to their work, and the result did credit both to executants and conductor. The almost symphonic overtures received a very faithful interpretation. Perhaps the most pleasing portion of the programme was the 'Choral Fantasia'—so quaint and piquant in some parts, and broad, vigorous, and melodious in others. Madame Arabella Goddard's performance of the introductory adagio was a model of refinement and intelligence, while the orchestra and chorus were quite at home with the work which fell to their lot. The 'Moonlight Sonata' had been frequently performed by Madame Goddard, and therefore it is only necessary to say that she played it with that poetic sympathy and brilliant manipulation which formerly marked her performance. Mrs. Weldon failed to create anything like a favourable impression. The recitative and air from Euryanthe ('Ah! horch, hear me,' and 'Oh my heart'), Adelaide, and 'The Call of the Quail,' were Mr. Vernon Rigby's solos, sung in his usual style. Mr. Benedict's labours were arduous, but he proved himself fully equal to all requirements.

EDINBURGH.—We take the following from a lengthy account, in the Scotsman, of the opening of the renovated organ in St. Paul's Episcopal Church:—

"Professor Oakeley presided at the organ. The choir was augmented by a few outsiders, all picked voices. The music of the hymns was taken from Hymns Ancient and Modern, except the metrical Hundredth Psalm, in which an arrangement by Mr. Oakeley of the Old Hundredth was substituted. The whole music in both services was of post-Reformation date, except two Lutheran chorales and the already mentioned Old Hundred. The chants were selected to demonstrate that the best Anglican chants may be sung in unison as well as in harmony. There has been during the last few years a very prevalent idea that only Gregorian chants can be sung with effect in unison; but this was entirely disproved on this occasion. The Psalm for the Morning was sung to a chant by Dr. Stephen Elvey, in which the singing of the choir was good, and the management of the accompaniment by Mr. Oakeley remarkable. The Te Deum was arranged to a quadruple chant by Mr. Oakeley. A very beautiful anthem, also by Mr. Oakeley, 'O Praise the Lord, all ye Nations,' was introduced in the Morning Service. The music of the hymn after the sermon in the afternoon was also by Mr. Oakeley. The anthem in the afternoon was by Kent from 1 Chronicles xxix. 10—13. The voluntaries were as follows:—In the morning:—Introductory—Andante, Lefébure Wely; 'Ave verum,' Mozart. Concluding—the so-called 'St. Ann's' Fugue in E flat major, Bach; 'Hallelujah Chorus,' from Mount of Olives, Beethoven. In the afternoon:—Introductory—Prelude, Brosig; Andante Grasioso, H. Smart. Concluding—Prelude and Fugue in G minor, Bach; 'Hallelujah Chorus,' Messiah, Handel. The organ was originally built by Schnetzler in 1774 for the Episcopal Church in the Cowgate, of which the present St. Paul's is the successor. It had at first but two rows of keys, Great organ GG to E, and Swell to fiddle G. When removed to the present church, a Choir organ by Bruce was added, and the Swell carried down to D. Since 1838 Messrs. Hamilton have been entrusted with the charge of the organ, and the alterations and improvements now made, comprising a number of new and beautiful stops, have been affected by them in accordance with a plan by Professor Oakeley. The stops are now forty in number, besides eight couplers."

NOTTINGHAM.—The Daily Express of Tuesday last contained the following:—

"The musical public of Nottingham are indebted to Mr. H. Farmer for the introduction of an entertainment which has flourished through thirteen seasons in London, and has always been regarded as particularly instructive, healthy, and agreeable. The current season in the metropolis commenced only a few weeks ago; and we observe that the caterer for our local bill of fare has followed the example of Mr. A. S. Chappell, and arranged a selection from the works of Beethoven exclusively. The undertaking is experimental, and the appearance of the large hall of the Mechanics' Institution last evening was hardly such as to encourage hopes of immediate success, though the subscription places were well filled. The following was the programme:—

"Trio, in G (Op. 1, No. 2), for piano, violin, and violoncello, Beethoven (Miss Butler, Mr. Henry Farmer, and Mr. Selby). Song, 'Penitence,' Beethoven (Miss Annie Hall). Sonata, in A (Op. 47) (dedicated to Kreutzer), for piano and violin, Beethoven (Miss Butler and Mr. Henry Farmer). Song, 'In Questa Tomba,' Beethoven (Miss Annie Hall). Quartet, in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4), for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Beethoven (Mr. Henry Farmer, Mr. Leverton, Mr. Myers, and Mr. Selby). Song, 'Know'st thou the Land,' Beethoven (Miss Annie Hall). Quartet, in E flat (Op. 16), for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, Beethoven (Miss Butler, Mr. Henry Farmer, Mr. Myers, and Mr. Selby).

It will be seen that the various pieces were in good hands. The pianist displayed to advantage her very considerable powers; her reading being well phrased, her articulation distinct, and her tone quite enough to consort with the other instruments. Mr. Farmer's first violin was admirable, especially in the Sonata, in A, and the quartet in C minor. Indeed the ensemble of the latter was so good as to make it the piece of the evening. The vocalist, Miss Annie Hall, possesses a voice of fair range."

THE GERMAN RHINE.

At the present moment there is a revived interest in Nikolaus Becker's "German Rhine" with the reply to it by Alfred de Musset and the following translation of them may be acceptable:—

It never shall be France's, The free, the German Rhine, Tho' raven-like she glances And croaks her foul design.	So long as, sentry keeping, The rocks its margin stud; So long as spires are steeping Their image in its flood;
So long as calmly gliding It wears its mantle green, So long as our dividing Its mirrored wave is seen.	It never shall be France's, The free, the German Rhine, So long as festive dances Its lover-groups combine;
It never shall be France's, The free, the German Rhine, So long as youth enhances His fervour with its wine.	So long as angler bringeth Its lusty trout to shore, So long as minstrel singeth Its praise from door to door.

It never shall be France's,
The free, the German Rhine,
Until its broad expanse is
Its last defender's shrine.

REPLY.

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
It has served our wassail bowls to fill.
Can singing its praise from door to door
Efface the hoof-prints, legible still,
Of our cavalry charge that bathed its left bank in your gore?

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
On its breast the wound still gapeth wide,
Which conquering Condé made, when he tore
Thro' its mantle of green to the farther side;
Where once the sire has ridden, shall the son not ride once more

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
Of your German virtues what remains
When across its flood our legions pour
And the Empire over-clouds your plains?
When all your men have fallen, have ye other men in store?

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
If ye your annals would fain forget,
Your daughters remember the days of yore,
And wish the Frenchmen among them yet,
For whom your vintage white they were always blithe to pour.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

THE "ROSE MAIDEN."

In the course of a long article on Mr. Cowen's new cantata, the Daily Telegraph says:—

"With reference to Mr. Cowen's general treatment of the subject, it must be granted that he has made the most of his opportunities for contrast. There, as already intimated, are few; consisting mainly of the songs for the 'gardener's daughter,' the wedding chorus, and the baritone air wherein the tumult of nature and the peace of a loving home are set against each other. As the story moves on elsewhere, with a placid sameness which must have sorely tested the composer's ingenuity, the actual variety imparted is creditable in no slight degree. Looking more closely at Mr. Cowen's music, we find it divided into two portions, each so distinctive that one might fancy two composers had been at work. The orchestra is written for throughout, with a free, bold hand guided by fine taste and admirable invention; while in the vocal department, Mr. Cowen seems to have determined upon the gain of an easy popularity, rather than upon giving full play to his undoubted powers. If this be an error it is but one of judgment, and neither throws discredit upon the composer's ability, nor affects the opinion of those who, having what he can do, find that he has not done all he might. But, to repeat in other words what has been said before, the orchestral part of the Rose Maiden demands almost unqualified praise. Thoughtful and happy design, effective colouring, and well-sustained interest are merits lying on the surface. From many points deserving notice we can only select a few. The introduction has for its chief theme a tranquil and plaintive melody, forming the central idea of the whole. As representative of the sorrow which waits upon all earthly joy—for so we interpret it—this melody again and again reappears with increasing suggestiveness, and at happily-chosen times. We hear it when the demented maiden rejoices at the fancied coming of her swain; when Roseblossom dreams of the forester she loves; and when the elves chaunt their farewell over her grave. Other applications of the same device are not wanting. Who, for example, the sorrow of Rosebloom on account of her dead husband is described, a violin obligato repeats the theme of the song wherein the 'gardener's daughter' imagines the corpse of her lover is before her. In short Mr. Cowen has happily used a means of effect which requires to be employed with great discretion. The scoring of his accompaniments, throughout, is full—here and there, perhaps a little more full than necessary—but at the same time, it is clear in its details and obvious in its meaning. The young composer, while never at a loss for appropriate forms, shows a marked preference for that which—to quote the most familiar example—Mendelssohn has employed in 'Happy and blest are they' (St. Paul.) We refer to the constant repetition of a brief semi-quaver phrase. This device is employed—for 'muted' violins—in the pretty chorus, "Mid the waving rose trees;' in a portion of the tenor air, 'The sleep of even;' and notably in the baritone solo, 'When the rain trees rustle;' a transfer of the figure from bass strings to violins, at the point where the peace of home is contrasted with the turmoil of nature, being one of Mr. Cowen's most felicitous strokes. Another point to be commended is that produced by occasional piano passes for trombones, such as occur in the chorus, 'O earth-born sorrow;' where, also, an effective and novel use is made of the grosse caisse. It would be easy to cite many more features in the orchestration of the Rose Maiden; but we must be content to point out only the admirable character of its interludes. Mr. Cowen appears at his best when relieved of the burden of his movements, and there are not a few passages worthy the composer of the symphony to which reference has already been made. It is only necessary to quote in proof the prelude to the scena of the 'gardener's daughter;' to the air descriptive of Rosebloom's waiting for her coming love; and to the elfin chorus, 'Farewell, sleep thou lightly;' the last being quite Mendelssohnian in its lightness and grace. With regard to the airs and duets, it is at once obvious that the sameness of the story has affected a result which Mr. Cowen on his part appears to have kept down to a certain level. They are written with almost uniform smoothness, and the melodies are such as the popular ear receives with gratitude; but lack of contrast cannot help making itself felt, even under such circumstances. In the style and treatment of his choruses Mr. Cowen is careful to be in harmony with the style and treatment of his solos. They are simply constructed upon themes which are pleasant if not novel, and their effect arises naturally from the use of familiar means rather than from any special efforts. Among the best examples are 'Green vale, and vine-clad mountains,' the wedding chorus, and the introduction to the chorus of elves, 'What sounds there so softly.' Not to prolong these remarks, we may dismiss Mr. Cowen's latest work with the observation that it will assuredly increase his popularity, and thus attain its apparent object."

DRESDEN.—Preparations are being made at the Theatre Royal to celebrate with due solemnity the centenary of Beethoven's birth. At the request of the management, Herr Julius Rodenberg has written a "Festspiel" with choruses, Das Erwachen der Kunst, for the occasion. —A report was circulated lately that Herr Tschatschek was about to take his farewell, at least from the Royal Operahouse here, in the part of Ivanhoe, on the 23rd November. This report, as the event has proved, was inexact. In the first place, Herr Tschatschek's engagement does not expire till the 31st inst., and, in the next, nothing has yet been decided as to the when and where of his last appearance.

MUSIC IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. Charles H. Jarvis has announced six soirées, commencing Novembe 19. This is the ninth year of Mr. Jarvis's pleasant re unions, which have always been very successful. Mr. Jarvis is assisted by Mr. Kopta, violinist, and Mr. Hennig, violoncellist.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn is giving a series of six pianoforte matinées, at which many new and important works will be produced. He is assisted by Mr. Hennig, violoncellist, and Mr. Stoll, violinist. The instrumental pieces are interspersed with vocal music, Mrs. Sautan assisting at the first matinée.

It is said that the old Germania Band will give a series of concerts this winter under the direction of Carl Sentz. New life will be infused into the organization, and a selection of fine works will be performed.

Mr. H. Cross has been elected conductor by the "Abt Society," an organization consisting of twenty able singers.

A military band, led by Mark Hassler, numbering sixty pieces, with an extra drum corps, will shortly commence a series of concerts. This band stands in such high favour with the Philadelphians, that a movement is on foot to raise 6,000 dollars to supply it with uniforms.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

The Harvard Association commenced its concerts on November the 3rd, under the direction of Carl Zerrahn. The initial concert was one of a series of three to be given in commemoration of the Centennial Anniversary of Beethoven's birth.

The Centennial Anniversary of the birth of Beethoven affords Boston a three days' festival, which will be divided among various associations. On the 15th of December, the second Beethoven concert of Harvard Association will take place. On the 16th, the Handel and Haydn Society, under the direction of Carl Zerrahn, will perform Beethoven's Choral (9th) Symphony. Various associations and individual artists will give concerts on the 17th, including the Parker Club, The Cœlia Society, etc. The memory of Beethoven will thus be appropriately honoured.

Charlotte Cushman, who has just arrived from abroad, in a failing state of health, has made still further donations to the Boston Music Hall. Some time since she gave busts of Beethoven, Mozart, and Palestrina; to these she has now added the busts of Gluck and Mendelssohn. They are beautiful works of art, reflecting great credit upon the Danish sculptor, Wilhelm Mathieu.

Mr. Eugene Thayer is the conductor of the Boston Choral Union, as association which promises to become an important addition to the musics strength of that city. It commenced its regular rehearsals last month.

Mr. Gilmore is not dead; naither is he asleep. His great International Jubilee continues to be the leading thought of his active brain. It cannot be given next spring, the disturbed state of Europe being a sufficient reason for postponement. Previous to the Prussian-French war, Mr. Gilmore had intercourse with the leading European representatives at Washington, and received from them the most cordial assurances that they would use all their influence to forward his grand and comprehensive design. The Jubilee is, therefore, only in abeyance until peace prepares Europe for this stupendous musical idea.

Gilmore's History of the Great Peace Jubilee is positively to be out in December.

Ernest Perabo gave his second matinée, at HorticulturalHall, on the 11th ult.

In the local paper, El Siglo, we read highly flattering accounts of the wonderful singing of Madlle. Carlotta Patti (sister of the famous Adelina Patti) at Montevideo. "No es una mujer, es un ruisenor"—says the enthusiastic writer of the musical feuilleton in that esteemed journal. We can well understand that Carlotta Patti has astonished musical amateurs in those distant regions. "There is a magic in the name of Patti!" In short, a Patti must mean, more or less, a nightingale.

FLORENCE.—The centenary of Beethoven's birth was piously celebrated on the 14th, 21st, and 26th ult., by three concerts, at which the executants were Herr Hans von Bulow (piano), Signor Giovacchino (violin), and Signor Jefte Sboiei (violoncello), and the programmes, arranged according to the composer's three periods. First Evening —Trio, in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; Sonata, in F major, Op. 24, for Pianoforte and Violin; Sonata, quasi Fantasia, in E flat major, Op. 27, No. 3, for Pianoforte; and Sonata, in G minor, Op. 5, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Violoncello. Second Evening—Sonata, in A major, Op. 69, for Pianoforte and Violoncello; Sonata Appassionata, in F minor, Op. 57; Trio, in E flat major, Op. 70, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; Sonata, in A minor, Op. 47, for Pianoforte and Violin. Third Evening—Sonata, in G major, Op. 96, for Pianoforte and Violin; Sonata, in D major, Op. 102, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Violoncello; Sonata, in C minor, Op. 111, for Pianoforte; Trio, in B flat major, Op. 97, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello.

MUSIC A MEANS OF CULTURE.

By J. S. Dwight.

2. Such civilising, educating power has music for society at large. Now in the finer sense of culture, such as we look for in more private and select "society," as it is called, music in the salon, in the small chamber concert, where congenial spirits are assembled in its name,—good music of course,—does it not create a finer sphere of social sympathy and courtesy?—does it not better mould the tone and manners from within than any imitative "fashion" from without? What society, upon the whole, is quite so sweet, so satisfactory, so refined, as the best musical society, if only Mozart, Mendelssohn, Franz, Chopin, set the tone! The finer the kind of music heard or made together, the better the society. This bond of union only reaches the few; coarser, meaner, more prosaic natures are not drawn to it. Wealth and fashion may not dictate who shall be of it. Here congenial spirits meet in a way once free, happy and instructive, meet with an object which insures "society;" whereas so-called society, as such, is often aimless, vague, unedifying and fatiguing, for the want of any subject-matter. Here one gets ideas of beauty which are not mere arbitrary fashions, ugly often to the eye of taste. Here you may escape vulgarity by a way not vulgar in itself, like that of fashion, which makes wealth and family and means of dress its passports. Here you can be as certain as any place, by the soul's right, not wronging any one; here learn gentle manners, and the quiet ease and courtesy with which cultivated people move, without in the same process learning insincerity.

Of course the same remarks apply to similar sincere reunions in the name of any other art,—or poetry. But music is the most social of them all, even if each listener find nothing set down to his part (or even hers!) but taste.

3. We have fancied ourselves entering a musical house together, but we must leave it with no time to make report, or picture out the scene. Now could we only enter the chamber, the inner sanctum, the private inner life of a thoroughly musical person, one who is wont to live in music! could we know him in his solitude! (You can only know him in yourself, unless he be a poet and creator in his art and bequeath himself in that form, in his works, for any who know how to read).

If the best of all society is musical society, we go further and say: The sweetest of all solitude is when one is alone with music. One gets the best of music, the sincerest part, when he is alone. Our poet-philosopher has told us to secure solitude at any cost; there is nothing which we can so ill afford to do without. It is a great vice of our society, that it provides for and disposes so little solitude, ignoring the fact that often there is more loneliness in company than out of it. Now to a musical person, in the mood of it, in the sweet hours by himself, comes music as the nearest friend, nearer and dearer than ever before, and he soon finds that he was in such good company. I doubt if symphony of Beethoven, opera of Mozart, Passion Music of Bach, was ever so enjoyed or felt in grandest public rendering, as one may feel it while he recalls its outline by himself at his piano (even if he be a slow and bungling reader, and must get it out piecemeal). I doubt if such an one can carry home from the performance, in presence of the applauding crowd, nearly so much as he may take to it from such inward, private preparation.

Are you alone?—what spirits you can summon up to fill the vacancy, and people it with life and love and beauty! Take down the volume of Sonatas; the arrangement of the great Symphony, the recorded reveries of Chopin, the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, or even the chorales, with the harmony of Bach, in which the four parts blend their several individual melodies together in such loving service of the whole, that the plain people's tune becomes a germ unfolding into endless wealth and beauty of meaning and you have the very essence of all prayer and praise and gratitude, as if you were a worshipper in the ideal church. Nothing like music, then, to banish the besmirching ghost of ennui. It lends secret sympathy, relief, expression, to all one's moods, loves, longings, sorrows; comes nearer to the soul, or to the secret wound, than any friend or healing sunshine from without. It nourishes and feeds the hidden springs of hope and love and faith; renews the old conviction of life's spring-time,—that the world is ruled by love, that God is good, that beauty is a divine end of life, and not a snare and an illusion. It floods out of sight the unsightly, muddy grounds of life's petty anxious, doubting moments, and makes immortality a present fact, lived in and realized. It locks the door against the outer world of discords, contradictions, importunities, beneath the noises of a sect so richly occupied; lets "Fate knock at the door" (as Beethoven said in explanation of his symphony)—Fate and the pursuing Furies—and even welcomes them, and turns them into gracious goddesses, —Eumenides!

Music in this way is a marvellous elixir to keep off old age. Youth returns in solitary hours with Beethoven and Mozart. Touching the chords of the Moonlight Sonata, the old man is once more a lover: with the andante of the Pastoral Symphony, he loiters by the shady brookside hand in hand with his fresh heart's first angel. You are past the sentimental age, yet you can weep alone in music,—not weep exactly, but find outlet more expressive and more worthy of your manly faith.

A great grief comes, an inconsolable bereavement, an humiliating, paralyzing reverse, a blow of Fate giving the lie to your best plans and bringing your best powers into discredit with yourself, then you are best prepared and best entitled to receive the secret visitations of these tuneful goddesses and muses.

> "Who never ate his bread in tears,
> " He knows you not, ye heavenly powers."

So sings the German poet. It is the want of inward, deep experience, it is innocence of sorrow and of trial, more than the lack of any special cultivation of musical taste or knowledge, that debars many people—naturally most young people, and all who are what we call shallow natures—from the feeling and enjoyment of many of the truest, deepest, and most heavenly of all the works of music. Take the Passion Music of Bach, for instance; if you can sit down alone at your piano and decipher strains and pieces of it when you need such music, you shall find that in its quiet quaintness, its sincerity and tenderness, its abstinence from all striving for effect, it speaks to you and entwines itself about your heart, like the sweetest, deepest verses in the Bible, when "the soul muses till the fire burns."

Such a panacea is this art for loneliness. But sometimes, too, it may intensify the sense of loneliness, only for more heavenly relief at last. Think of the deep composer, of lonely, sad Beethoven, wreaking his pain upon expression in those impatient chords and modulations, putting his sorrows into sonatas, and wringing triumph always out of all! Look at him as he was then morose, they say, and lonely and tormented; look where he is now, as the whole world knows him, feels him, seeks him for its joy and inspiration,—and who can doubt of immortality?

Now in such private solace, in such solitary joys, is there not culture? Can one rise from such communings with the good spirits of the tone-world, and go out, without new peace, new faith, new hope, and good-will in his soul? Its goods forth in the spirit of reconciliation and of patience, however much he may hate the wrong he sees about him, or however little he accepts authorities and creeds that make war on his freedom. The man who has tasted such life, and courted it till he has become acclimated in it, whether he be of this party or that, or none at all, whether he be believer or "heretic," conservative or radical, follower of Christ by name or "Free Religionist," belongs to the harmonic and ancinted body-guard of peace, fraternity, goodwill; his instincts all have caught the rhythm of that holy march; the good genius leads, he has but to follow cheerfully and humbly. For somehow the minute fibres, the infinitesimal atoms of his being, have got magnetised, as it were, into a loyal, positive direction toward the polar-star of unity; he has grown attuned to a believing, loving mood, just as the body of a violin, the walls of a music-hall, by much music-making, become gradually seasoned into smooth vibration.

WAIFS.

M. Maurice Strakosch has returned to London from Brussels.

Early in the new year the Royal Court Theatre, in Sloane Square, will be opened as a place of fashionable entertainment.

The "Stop" most grateful to impartial hearers on, while certain organs (who shall be nameless), are playing, is the dead stop. (This is not from Punch.)

Mr. Buckault's drama, Jessibel, will be immediately produced at the Holborn Theatre. Mr. H. Neville and Miss K. Rodgers will have prominent characters in it.

The opening of the Lyceum Theatre with an Opera Buffa Company (Limited) is announced. Signor Butteshi's opera, Ali Baba, is promised for the first night.

Watts composed 697 hymns, and Wesley 600. About a tenth of them live, and are sung in every Christian church where the English language is used.

Rondel's ("Petite!") Messe Solennelle is about to be performed at St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Henry Leslie, with Madame Alboni, Comtesse de Pepoli, in the contralto part.

Mr. Barnby's Rebekah is being rehearsed by the Kensington Sacred Harmonic Society and also by the Trinity Choral Society, both under the conductorship of Mr. Albert Lowe.

Mrs. Francis Talfourd's concert, for the benefit of the funds of the Alexandra Homes, Margate, is announced for Monday evening. The accomplished tenor, Signor Gardoni, has generously given his services.

The execution of the monument to be erected to Gluck in his native place, Weidenwang, in the Upper Palatinate, has been confided to Herr Conrad Knoll. The monument will consist of a colossal bust.

The Great Triennial Handel Festival, to be held in the ensuing year at the Crystal Palace, will be on the same scale as on former occasions, the orchestra numbering upwards of four thousand executants, under the conductorship of Sir Michael Costa. The rehearsal will take place on Friday the 16th June, and the three performances on the following Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

The Concerts of Ancient Music will enter upon their second season early in the coming year, with the same patron, patronesses, and directors. Mr. Barnby and Mr. E. J. Hopkins remain conductor and organist, Lord Wm. Lennox as hon. secretary, and Mr. Ward as secretary. The four concerts promise to be as before.

The Committee of the Royal Academy of Music intend, at the Christmas examination of 1870, to give a valuable violin as prize to the most meritorious student who has been pupil in the Institution during the three preceding terms, the Committee reserving the right of withholding the gift, should sufficient talent not be exhibited.

The Musical Committee of the Society of Arts met on Monday, the 21st November, Seymour Teulon, Esq., Vice-Chairman of the Council, in the chair. The Committee had under consideration a reference from the Council with regard to the establishment of a National Training School for Music.

Appreciation of the power of sound reaches one of its highest points in the love of music found in persons who, when deprived of sight, enter without distraction into the beauty and intricacies of sound. There need to be a blind asylum at Liverpool, famous for the singing of its inmates, who, with all the concentration of the senses, enjoyed their own music. Some excellent organists have been blind. Music must be a genuine treat to the blind. We can easily imagine the fancy where, with a blind person listens to some touching melody, or full rich harmony.—X.

The following letter has been addressed to the editor of our respected contemporary, the Musical Times :—

SIR,—In reading the Musical Times for 1859 the other day, I observed a statement that a statue to Mendelssohn had been completed and that an application had been made to Her Majesty for the erection in St. James's Park. Can you or any of your readers inform me what has been done towards its erection in the Park or elsewhere? If it has not been done I think some steps should be taken to have it inaugurated in some public place—say, in the proposed gardens on the Victoria Embankment. I also observed another paragraph as to a proposed collection amongst the musical world for the erection of a College to be called the "Handel College." I should also be glad to know if it was ever set on foot; if so, the amount collected, and what is being or has been done with it. I should be most happy to forward my subscription for such a purpose.—Yours truly, TITUS. B. GUY.

A statute on musical degrees has passed through the Congregation of the University of Oxford, and will become law unless thrown out of Convocation. It requires two public examinations for the degree of Mus. Bac., one in October, the next in Easter or Trinity. The exercise need not be sent in until after the candidate has past the first examination, and has then to be approved by the Professor, the Choragus, and the third examiner. When this statute was promulgated, November 15th, two amendments (in Latin) were proposed by the Rev. T. Hatch (St. Mary Hall), the other by Dr. Stainer (Magd.). Mr. Hatch's amendment was to compel candidates for musical degrees to reside three years in Oxford, and pass the examinations for a degree in Arts. Dr. Stainer's amendment was to constitute the first examination "in four-part harmony and counterpoint," and the second "in five-part counterpoint, instrumentation, history of music, and the construction of works by masters from time to time to be named by the Professor." These amendments were discussed on November 22, in Congregation. Dr. Stainer (Magd. Coll.), Professor H. Smith (Balioll), and Rev. T. Vere-Bayne (Ch. Ch.) spoke in opposition to Mr. Hatch's amendment, which was negatived by 42 to 4. Dr. Stainer's amendment was carried without division. Mr. Hatch's amendment would have virtually closed Oxford degrees against professional musicians, few of whom can spare the time to pass three years in Oxford.

The Asiatic has no ear and no soul for music. Like other savages and children, he loves a noise, and plays on shrill pipes—on the tarabucca, or the tara or tamborine, and a sharp, one-stringed fiddle or rabab. "Of course, in your first Oriental day," says an Eastern traveller, "you will decline no invitation; but you will grow gradually deaf to all entreaties to friends or dragomen to sally forth and hear music. You will remind them that you did not come to the East to go to Bedlam. The absence of music is not strange, for silence is natural to the East and the tropics. When sitting quietly at home in mid-summer, sweeping ever onward in the glowing heat, we at length reach the tropics in the fixed fervour of a July noon. The day is rapt, the birds and wind are still, and the morning sun glares silence on the world. The Orient is that primeval and perpetual noon, that the very heat explains to you the voluptuous elaboration of its architecture, the brilliancy of its costume, the picturesqueness of its life. But no Mozart was needed to sow Persian gardens with roses breathing love and beauty; no Beethoven to build Himalayas; no Rossini to sparkle and sing with the birds and streams. Those realities are there of which the composers are the poets to Western imaginations. In the East you see and feel music, but hear it never, except in the rich and flowing, deep and solemn chant of the surpliced novitiates—the priests, monks, nuns, and friars, who carry music wherever the sublime beauties of the Christian religion are introduced.—X.

REVIEWS.

Look at home: A National Song, written by P. T. SULLIVAN, Esq., composed by WILLIAM WILSON. [London: Weippert & Co.]

THE object of this song is a timely one, and will command the sympathy of not a few. It depreciates the lavish aid to foreigners which has been the latest craze of the benevolent public, and bids the charitably disposed to look at the want and misery which lie at their own doors and have greater claims. The music is appropriately simple and vigorous; it is, moreover, such as the car readily catches and retains, essential qualities if that which aspires to be "natio nal."

SIX SONGS,

WITH GERMAN WORDS,

The English Translation and Music by

AMY COYNE,

Price 4s. each.

"MISS AMY COYNE'S GERMAN SONGS.—It may be a relief to many of our musical readers, tired of the eternal 'Watch on the Rhine,' from the sad scenes which the famous German war-song recalls, to turn to a charming set of lieder typical of the love chansons which have now so sad an interest attached to them, sung, as they are throughout Vaterland, by fair mourners whose loved ones have found a last home in France. The six songs before us have that one rare quality which the poet longed for: appropriately sung, these compositions are low

'As zephyr, telling secrets to his rose;'

while the poem are of so lyrical a nature that they at once recommend themselves to anyone who (to continue the quotation) can say—

'for with my mind I listen,
And when the leaves of sound are shed upon it.
If there's no music, 'tis a misery gone.'

Miss Amy Coyne, a daughter of the late Mr. Stirling Coyne, is the composer of three sweet lieder; and she has also translated from the German the felicitous words with which the music is well harmonized. Six in number, their titles are—'Farewell for Ever,' 'Fidelity,' 'Parted,' 'The Request,' 'The Voice of Spring,' and 'Evening Sounds,' which last has a delightful Mendelssohnian ring about it. Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, are the publishers of these exquisite songs, and also of Miss Amy Coyne's latest composition, 'Maddalena,' a sparkling serenade which we had the pleasure of noticing favourably when it was first sung by Mr. W. H. Cummings, and which fully sustains the rising reputation of the talented young composer."—Penny Illustrated Paper.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"

SUNG BY

MR. SANTLEY.

Price 4s.

"In a song entitled 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mdlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

DEJAZET AND DRAMATIC EXPOSITION.

The question whether the needs of the dramatist produce the actor, or those of the actor the dramatist, is about as interesting in itself and as capable of solution as the well-known puzzle of the physiologist, whether the egg precedes the chicken or the chicken the egg, or a metaphysical inquiry concerning which the minds of some young ladies are greatly exercised — whether kissing comes from liking or liking from kissing. For purposes of art, however, it may be assumed that the actor comes after the dramatist as his interpreter and illustrator. The theory which dedicates all dramatic entertainments from pantomime, would, of course, point to a contrary conclusion. But, putting on one side these barren speculations, we may safely assume that in essentials the dramatist is the creator, and the actor his expositor. When, as is not seldom the case, the dramatist is one of the master minds of the universe, the task of the actor is strictly defined. Under such considerable circumstances he must be overpass the limits assigned him by his author. No difficult task this, of course, seeing how huge a bulk he has ordinarily to inflate in order to present a reasonable idea of the figure designed by the poet. No toleration whatever would be accorded those who endeavoured intentionally and consciously to overstep the boundaries of the characters of Shakspere and Goethe. But in the case of subordinate writers affairs are different. Not seldom the individuality of the actor is more potent, more eccentric, more prevailing than that of the dramatist, who is compelled to write up to his mouthpiece, and become, as it were, the interpreter of his interpreter. This habit has of late days become increasingly prevalent. So large an increase of theatres as has of late been witnessed, unless accompanied by some discovery of new actors, some historionic California, drives a certain percentage of houses to depend for attractions upon the popularity of one star actor, rather than upon the merits of an adequate and a well-balanced company. When such a state of things prevail the production of masterpieces of the drama next to impossible, and the object of the manager becomes to provide pieces calculated to display in most favourable light the execution, ability or eccentricity of the "star." Of late many pieces in which rough and powerful pathos was overlaid by homely humour succeeded each other at the Olympic while the management had Mr. Robson on its boards, and how many times did Mr. Alfred Wigan appear as the hero of dramas in which the language of the situation was supposed to be increased by the broken English of the principal exponent? We could of course multiply ad nauseam instances of the kind. An actor now, indeed, feels almost aggrieved at being asked to form an item in the cast of an important piece, and waits for his opportunity of forming the whole of a piece ambitious drams. We wonder how many actors there are in London at the present moment who have not somewhere at hand dramas written especially for them, and offering them the opportunity of showing the public the range of their unsuspected abilities. Not many, we fancy. Fortunately, however, such opportunities are seldom offered except in the case of actors of signal ability, and the mediocrity who will have the stage to himself is forced to invest the earnings of a lifetime in an attempt to be his own manager, and generally ends by being his own public also. In cases, however, wherein executive ability is distinct and high little can be advanced against the practice of writing a piece for an actor. We have many actors who would add comparatively little to the general strength of a company, and who yet are almost a host or a company in themselves. Some of our most popular comedians would make a poor show in a subordinate character in a classic piece, and are yet capable of amusing in the class of parts written expressly for them, in which we are accustomed to see them.

Of actors of this class Mdlle. Déjazet is the type and ideal. During a career which is now the longest of any living actor—if it is not, indeed, the longest on record, Mdlle. Déjazet has appeared in comparatively few good or important pieces. From the commencement of her career to the present time—which is far, apparently, from its close—she has played generally in works written to suit her special and admirable talent. No living actress has been the heroine (or hero) of so many successful plays, or so few plays that will be remembered after her death, except in connection with herself. The talents of Mdlle. Déjazet, early announced but gradually developed, are exactly of the kind that suits light comedy in a small theatre. She is in this respect and in some others, like our own Marie Wilton. On a small stage she is admirable; in a large theatre, and with imposing surroundings, we should scarcely care to see her. It may be doubted even whether as Cherubin, the one classic part for which she seems made, Mdlle. Déjazet would be at home on the boards of the Français or any theatre of first-rate size and importance. In such houses as the Variétés, the Palais Royal, or the house re-christened after herself, she is unsurpassable. Marvellous exactitude, delicacy, and finish of execution constitute the secret of her success. She has in fact, few natural gifts for the stage. Her diminutive figure tells against her rather than in her favour, and her voice is poor in quality and at times false in note. Such, however, are the purity and finish of her execution that she is not only the daintiest of actresses in certain characters but is regarded as being without exception the best renderer of vaudeville couplets in France.

From her earliest years Mdlle. Déjazet seems to have been destined to the position she fills. She was a "star" almost before she had ceased to be a baby. First at the Théâtre du Jardin des Capucines, and subsequently at the two théâtres des Jeunes Élèves, situated in the Rue de Bondy and in the Rue de Thionville, since named Rue Danphine, Mdlle. Déjazet displayed her infant airs and graces. From the house last named she was carried off to play at the Vaudeville, the rôle of the Fée Nabote in the Belle au Bois Dormant. Here she obtained a marked triumph, and half the Parisian managers bid for the juvenile celebrity. Suffering health, however, which sent Mdlle. Virginie into the country, was the cause of the rupture of her relations with the Vaudeville, which took place in 1817. Four years later she appeared at the Gymnase, and played in several pieces. Here it was she first assumed the male costume in which her principal triumphs have been won. The marriage of the Duc de Berry with the Princess Caroline of Naples was the cause of the Gymnase taking for a time the title of the Théâtre de Madame, a title it bore while associated with the most marked success of Madame Déjazet and of M. Scribe, who, for the theatre, and to a great extent for the actor, composed his Théâtre de Madame. For a while Madame Déjazet divided with Leontine Fay the honours of the prosperous Madame, appearing in Les Deux Cottejeurs, La Petite Sœur, and the delightful comedy, one of the best of Scribe's early works, Le Plus Beau Jour de la Vie. This house she left in consequence of difficulties caused by the presence of her associates and rivals, Leontine Fay and Jenny Vertpré, carrying with her to the Théâtre des Nouveautes her growing fame and a measure of her good fortune. Here it was that her impersonation of the little Corporal in Bonaparte à Brienne raised her popularity to the height. As Henri IV. en Famile, and Henri V., she was only less successful. During her appearance at the Palais Royal, however, the climax of her reputation was reached. At the Palais Royal, to which she went in 1832, it was that she played Vert-Vert, Frétillon, Richelieu, in the piece in which she has appeared during the last week, and a host of similar characters. Twelve years she remained at this house, which she quitted for the Variétés. Here she re-produced the Premières Armes de Richelieu next to Bonaparte à Brienne, her favourite piece, and she played, for the first time, in Gentil Bernard, Le Moulin à Paroles, and Le Marquis de Lauzun. Her subsequent career need not be traced at any length. After a long tour in France and a visit to London, she returned to the Gaité, played at the Variétés in 1855 Le Sergent Frederic, and in 1859 took the Théâtre des Folies Nouvelles on which she bestowed her name. In the following year she obtained her first success in this house in M. Garat of Sardou. In 1862 Les Pr's Saint Gervais obtained a success recalling the most brilliant successes of this actress. This was followed two years later by the Degel of M. Sardou, which had a reception nearly as favourable.

Other pieces in which at the Déjazet Mdlle. Déjazet has been seen to advantage are Les Premières Armes de Figaro, L'Argent et L'Amour, La Douairière de Brionne, P'tit Fils, p'ti Mignon, the Grain de Sable, Lantara, and M. de Belle Isle. In all these pieces, in all the characters in which she has appeared, that is, Mdlle. Déjazet has shown herself pre-eminently the artist. No small touch that can add to the beauty of a picture is ever wanting. She possesses in perfection the art of disguising herself, and carries still the costume of a man, or rather of a boy, as no living actress can wear it. At the present moment, when the devices to which age drives are apparent in those who are false enough to art to investigate too profoundly the source of their gratifications, Mdlle. Déjazet is inimitable, and the style of her acting is a lesson to our actresses such as we should gladly see them take to heart. Everything is perfect as polish and daintiness can make it. There is no kind of coarseness. The word which in other lips would be coarse does not sound so when delivered by her. Movement, gesture, conduct of voice are equally admirable, and the style in which a song is given seems almost to add significance to words and melody to music. Such has been the career of the admirable actress now among us. With an individuality so strong she possesses, and with a talent such as hers, there is matter for rejoicing that the characters she has assumed are shaped for her. She is in herself almost a vindication of the star system. Among the characters she has played one or two must not be forgotten. In addition to those named she has appeared as the Lisette of Bernager, as Sophie Arnould, and once as herself, having played in a piece entitled Mademoiselle Déjazet au Serail. J. K.

HEARTS OF OAK.

(For Music.)

The Hearts of Oak, are Oak Hearts still,
And Watchful every Hour;
And should the Russians make a noise,
To quiet them, the British Boys
Will use their utmost power.

In the Crimean War, and many an Historical Champaign,
Side By side They Charged the enemy
And Hundreds Were slain.
But still they marched to victory
Which was Their Country's gain.

Then let the young ones Show
If justice Be their Cause,
That the good and Brave veterans,
Fought not in vain their wars.
And at the Bugle Sound,
March as they Did of old,
And Prove to all There enemies
That they Can their Country's fame uphold. G. E. T.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The success of the Nilsson concerts has absolutely killed the season here, as far as any other troupes are concerned, and during the absence in Boston of the fair Swede there has been an entire dearth of Music. Nilsson in Boston has created a profound impression, and the enthusiasm there about her has been shown even more than in New York. Her return is eagerly awaited by our amateurs, especially as she is to give us some idea of her skill in oratorio. The Messiah is announced for the 25th of November, with Miss Pauline Canissa, Miss Cary, Mr. Simpson, our recognized oratorio tenor, and Mr. Whitney, the Boston bass, as the other soloists. The Mendelssohn Union will provide the chorus, and Mr. George Bristow will conduct the orchestra. Bristow, by the way, has been rather prominent of late by the production at Niblo's Theatre of his opera, Rip Van Winkle, with Mrs. Richings-Bernard, Mr. Castle, and Mr. Henry Drayton in the principal parts. The work was played four nights, but contains too much dull dialogue to be an entire success. The music is very pleasing in several points, and the chief ballads—which in style are not unlike those of Balfe—were warmly encored. The orchestration is good, and often effective, especially so in the scene where Rip meets Hendrik Hudson among the demons of the Catskill. Mr. Drayton was in every way admirable as Rip Van Winkle, singing and acting in the most satisfactory manner. Of the other performers but little can be said. The opera was first brought out here in 1855 at the same theatre, with Louis and Susan Pyne, W. H. Harrison, and Mr. Stretton in the cast; and the performance was in every way superior to the present one.

The English Opera Company played at Niblo's for three weeks, and gave satisfaction, though it did not crowd the house. The singers worked hard, and gave a great variety of operas, including such elaborate works as The Huguenots and Oberon; but these two did not draw as well as Trovatore and the Bohemian Girl. The other operas produced were Martha, Marriage of Figaro, and Rose of Castile. Mrs. Richings-Bernard, as a general thing, sang with great intelligence and correct taste, and showed more dramatic force than she has ever done before. The contralto of the troupe—Mrs. Zelda Seguin—is always a favourite here, and is likely to visit England soon, having received propositions from her cousin, Madame Anna Bishop. She is a very pretty young woman, at home on the stage, and gifted with a most charming voice. She was formerly a Miss Zelda Harrison, of this city, and is married to Edward Seguin, a son of the once celebrated basso. Her husband is also a member of the opera company. It is expected that, in the spring, this company will sing at Booth's Theatre.

The Opéra Bouffe troupe, at Fisk's Theatre, have produced Offenbach's Brigands with fair success. The second act contains some very pretty melodies, and the singing of Mdlle. Teralli, who takes the part of a lover—who ought by all operatic tradition to be a tenor—is much admired. Madame Montaland is the prima donna. She has, like conscience, a "still small voice," but is noted for the sweetness of her smiles. The opera is splendidly mounted. It contains a large proportion of dialogue, but is free from the vulgarity which characterises most of the librettos to which Offenbach has set his music.

The German Opera troupe is doing well at the Stadt Theatre. Only the Germans attend. Scarcely half a dozen native Americans are to be found in the house. Mdlle. Lichtenau, the prima donna, has made a very great hit in Norma, Lucrezia, and The Jewess. A very charming, young girl—Romer by name—is the seconda donna, and there are three tenors, Bernard, Himmer, and Hablemann, the two latter belonging to our resident talent. The basso, Franoch, is excellent. The performances are altogether the best that have been given here in the lyric line for years, though to the great mass of our musical amateurs know as little about them as they might about operatic representations in Kamschatka. Wagner's Tannhäuser and Lohengrin are both underlined for production by this company. The Prophete, with Clara Peri, is indefinitely postponed. Rose Csillag, the Hungarian prima donna, is in town, and will make her American début at the first Philharmonic concert of the season. Efforts are making to organize an Italian opera troupe with Csillag as prima donna, Lefrano as tenor, and Susini as basso. Nothing will be done in this line, however, till Nilsson is out of the way, for her attractiveness with the public is too great to admit of any competition.

The death of Balfe is sincerely regretted here, and much surprise is expressed at the comparatively little attention paid to the event by the English papers. The best and most appreciative biographical notices of Balfe have appeared on this side of the water. Here his music is as well known as in England.

The German Liederkrans Society has given a performance of Liszt's oratorio, St. Elizabeth, which was listened to with greater attention than pleasure by a purely Teutonic audience. A Frau Werner sang with great taste, but the solo music of the oratorio is so ungrateful that the best artists can make but little effect in it. TROVATOR.

MUSIC IN BRADFORD.

(From our own Correspondent.)

We have had two highly interesting concerts here lately. The first was a subscription concert, at which Beethoven's septet was most beautifully performed, Herr Wilhelmj, the leading violinist, being associated with Messrs. Rastens (viola), Vieuxtemps (violoncello), Neuwirth (contra basso), Grosse (clarionet), Willmann (horn), and Raspi (bassoon). It was evident that the performance had been preceded by careful rehearsals, and the beauties of this sublime composition were brought out with a delicacy and a spirit which gave great satisfaction, the entire work being listened to with the profoundest attention. Mr. Hallé played Weber's Allegro, in A flat, a prelude of Mendelssohn's, and one of those exceedingly pleasing compositions by Heller, called "Dans les Bois." Herr Wilhelmj's playing in octaves we have never heard equalled, and he appears to advantage in the small "Pièces de Salon," with which he understands how to fascinate his audience. The programme was agreeably interspersed with vocal pieces by Madame Leon Duval, Mdlle. Scalchi, and Signor Ciampi, who each contributed a share to the pleasures of the evening, Mdlle. Scalchi's beautiful voice in particular being greatly admired and applauded.

The second concert was given last Monday by the Festival Choral Society, in commemoration of the Beethoven centenary, and had been got up with great care in order to make it as worthy a festival as the resources of the society would admit. A small but efficient band of forty-four performers had been engaged for the occasion, and the solos were entrusted to Miss Amy Dimpsal and Mrs. Lincey Wilson, both of Bradford, and Mr. W. Coates and Mr. W. Winn, both formerly our townsmen. The first part was occupied by Beethoven's Mass in C, which was very effectively rendered under the talented conductor, Mr. Broughton, who had taken especial pains with the rehearsal. The second part opened with the quartet in E flat, Op. 16, played by Messrs. Broughton (piano), Iles (violin), Bowling (viola), and Vieuxtemps (violoncello). After the Mass, this work feel rather flat at starting, but the performance was so full of life and warmth, that it soon engaged the attention of the vast audience, who showed, by hearty applause, their appreciation of classical music. The trio for soprano, tenor, and bass, "Tremate empi," Op. 116, and the lovely canon from Fidelio were effectively sung. Mr. Linck, an amateur with a powerful and melodious voice, gave "Adelaida," and was much applauded. Mrs. Lincey Walton obtained a well-deserved encore in "In questa tomba," and Miss Empsall sang the aria, "Per Pieta," Op. 48, with great feeling. The chorus gave "Meeresstille und glückliche fahrt," Op. 112, and the "Dirge," composed for four trombones, and afterwards arranged for male voices and trombones for Beethoven's funeral. This was sung almost to perfection, the four trombones also doing their part remarkably well. The concert closed with the grandest of all choruses, the "Hallelujah," from the Mount of Olives. The extraordinary variety of music, all by one composer, all beautiful, and to a great extent not heard here before, helped to make one of the most enjoyable musical evenings we have had for a long time, and we must congratulate the Bradford Festival Chorus Society upon its success achieved. The book of words had been arranged and embellished with great taste, and contained a very excellent likeness of Beethoven on the first page.

COLLEGE OF MUSICIANS.

(From an Occasional Contributor.)

At the monthly term meeting of the College of Musicians, at Shaftesbury Hall, Thursday evening week, Mr. W. Harvey read a paper on "The Structure of the Vocal Organs," exhibiting the laryngoscope and other instruments. Mr. J. J. Haite read a paper on "Beethoven." The programme of the evening included the Sonata in A flat, Op. 26, and "Moonlight Sonata," played by Mr. W. C. Filby; "Hallelujah," from Mount of Olives (Beethoven); "Il prego" (Reisseger), by Misses Carter and Jones and Mr. Collier, with a selection from Bishop's glees by the College choir, under the conductor-ship of Mr. Alfred Mullen. Mrs. Mullen and Miss Haite presided at the pianoforte.

The second of the Saturday chamber concerts was given on the 3rd inst. Miss Carter was encored in "The Soldier Tired," and joined Mr. G. Carter in "La ci darem." Miss Marion Clifford sang "The Night Winds" (Sullivan), and "The Nightingale's Trill" (Gana). Mr. E. Carder was encored in "Now join Andrea." Mrs. Falkner sang "My truant love is near" (Haite). Mr. G. Carter and Mr. A. de Frey also contributed songs. Miss Moore was the accompanist.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Will you allow me to point out an error in the recent programmes of the Crystal Palace. The operetta of The Forester's Daughter is ascribed to the celebrated composer Offenbach, instead of to yours obediently,

NEW SALOON ORGAN BY M. GERN.

The following is a description of the new organ just erected at West Lodge, Clapham Common, for J. W. Dixon, Esq., by M. August Gern, of Queen's Buildings, Pancras Street, Tottenham Court Road :—

Ditto, ditto.

The Consol, which comprises the manuals and all couplers, is about (the furthest point) 30 feet away from the organ; considering the long action the manuals are very light touch. The case is of black and gold in Louis XVI. style, with burnished tin front pipes. There is in the instrument large self-regulating reservoir supplied by two feeders from the bottom of the house, which are put in motion by an hydraulic engine. All brass squares are used in the key action, and everything is of the best material and workmanship; all interior pipes are of metal, of a composition of ten per cent. of lead only. The whole is very compact, and easily got at if out of order.

The organ was "opened" on Thursday evening by the Rev. F. Scotson Clark, who ably displayed all the varied excellences of the instrument, its sweet tone, and light touch—so light, in fact, that a lady might play upon it with ease—being specially noticeable. Mr. Clark played several extempore pieces in addition to his clever Fantasia in F, and his bright and spirited "Marche aux Flambeaux." The organ music was agreeably varied by some duets, in which Herr Oberthür's harp playing was much admired, and his own nocturne, "La Prière," with its charming melodious subject, formed one of the features of the programme. As a specimen of a perfect saloon organ on the best French model, this instrument is unique, and M. Gern may fairly be congratulated on the success of his work. The case is most elegant in design, and the mechanism is perfect.—Choir.

"Some time ago"—adds one of our own correspondents—"a similar organ was built by M. Gern for a gentleman in Kensington, at which inauguration a concert took place, with the co-operation of Mdme. Osborne-Williams, Mr. Silas, Mr. Hallett Sheppard and M. Oberthür. The beautiful tone of this organ was greatly admired by everyone present, and it was particularly observed that its power could so nicely be regulated, as perfectly to suit the organ playing in a drawing-room. Nor must we omit to mention the very fine organ erected by M. Gern for the church of Notre Dame de France in Leicester Square, having been present at several very interesting organ recitals given there by Mr. Hallett Sheppard, who on such occasions was assisted by M. Oberthür. The combination of harp and organ produces most lovely effects, and Gounod's 'Meditation' and also M. Oberthür's own composition, 'La Prière,' for harp and organ, have been particularly admired. Mr. Hallett Sheppard's splendid execution, tasteful combination of the various stops, of which the 'Vox humana' was a particular fine one, and his wonderful pedal playing came out to the greatest advantage in the grand works of Seb. Bach, Mendelssohn, &c. We hear that M. Gern is now building a large organ of three manuals, which is intended for Belfast."

"THE PAREPA."

The following letter has been addressed to Madame Parepa by the directors of the New York Steam Navigation Company :—

DEAR MADAM,—We have been called upon to give a name to a three-masted schooner. Not having time to obtain your consent we have taken the liberty of calling her "The Parepa." * * * Trusting that the name so honoured and beloved in America may be to "The Parepa" a token of the success it represents, and that our action will not be disapproved,—We are, dear Madam, your very respectful and obedient servants,

B. J. MITCALF & Co.

107, Wall Street, New York, November, 1870.

PESTH.—The Abbate Franz Liszt intends giving, after the Beethoven Centenary Festival, a few Matinées Musicales. At Christmas, he will proceed to Weimar, where the Grand Duke has offered him one of two estates, at his choice, in order that he may settle down there and devote himself entirely to music.

NILSSON IN BOSTON.

Mdlle. Nilsson's success in the American home of classic music continues unabated, if we may judge by the following extract from the Boston Post :—

"The Nilsson matinée in Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, was a success in the best sense of the term. The treasury was a delight; the audience an enthusiasm; the performance a triumph. We might foot up or down the column here—but that would not be just to the public, the performing artist, to Strakosch, or to the Post. As a matter of course, the programme was up to the occasion; and the occasion was up to an exacting standard. First of all, Nilsson is a northern Swedish luminary. She showed sunrise. If Music Hall was lit by nothing else, it was unmistakably brilliant. As upon her first graceful bow to a Boston public, she sang Handel's Angels ever bright and fair.' Into it even more than formerly, she infused a feeling, fervour, and spirit of devotion that won all hearts (and ears). Her second effort was the mad scene from Hamlet. Of this we have already remarked upon when presented at a former concert. It is not only a vocal but a dramatic triumph. It is not so much Nilsson as Ophelia that impresses and infuses the auditor. It was full of lyric power and melodious expression, and simply took the audience by storm. She was recalled in the most emphatic manner and gave 'Home, sweet Home,' with a simplicity, sweetness, and pathos that won all ears. Its melody was like nectar. In the second part of the programme she sang 'The Last Rose of Summer,' which fairly entranced the audience. If some were not electrified by the scene from Hamlet at least there were none who did not comprehend the melody and appreciate the sentiment of this simple but touching melody. 'The Last Rose of Summer' has a most extraordinary popularity; and into it on this occasion was breathed the odorous harmony and delicious freshness of all that could be extracted even from the first rose in summer—one of those delightsome flowerings which make of early June the poetic floral offerings of the round season. In response she sang a Swedish bolero, and still later, 'Old Folks at Home.' The touching memories of the latter were a positive delight to all hearers.

"The Nilsson troupe gave a sacred concert in the Church of the Disciples, North Bridgewater, in aid of the Swedish Lutheran Church. Nilsson on learning that the church needed assistance to complete a favourite enterprise, volunteered with alacrity to give her services. The result was that the sum of 2500 dols. was realized. This is a splendid contribution of genius to charity, and will be remembered when even some of Nilsson's greatest artistic achievements fade from memory. She sang in the finest manner 'Ave Maria,' with violin obbligato by Vieuxtemps, and subsequently a bouquet of Swedish melodies. In each her efforts fell upon entranced ears. The other members of the troupe Miss Cary, Brignoli, Verger, Vieuxtemps, and Bosoni, also took part in the entertainment each imitating the generous example of the fair nightingale of Sweden."

WEIMAR.—Herr Gottschalg has been appointed Court-Organist.

MAGDEBURG.—Rebling's Vocal Association for Sacred Music lately gave a capital performance of Mozart's Requiem.

SZEGEDIN.—The Abbate Franz Liszt has just written a new composition entitled "Mosonyi's Grabgang," and consisting of a "Lamento" and "Triumpho."

SALZBURG.—On the occasion of the St. Cecilia Festival, which is, also, the anniversary of the foundation of the Salzburg "Liedertafel," Herr MAX BRUCH'S Scenen aus der Frühjoff's Saga were performed. The principal vocalists were the Countess Hedwig, Gattesburg, Herren Strehlen and Huber. The chorus and band, under Herr Bach, were highly effective.

POSEN.—Miss Watson, a young English artist, has been singing here with marked success. She made her first appearance as Agatha in Der Freischütz, and was most cordially welcomed, but her triumph was still greater in the part of Alice, in which she quite carried away all the audience. Her voice—a high soprano, of pleasing character—has been carefully trained. Her acting is good, and her pronunciation of German capital. She was called on the fall of the curtain.

CASSEL.—The first of the series of "Wippingen's" Quartet Soirées augured well for those which are to follow. The programme contained three quartets by three great masters—Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. The audience were at first rather cool; they did not seem up to such music, for the first movement of Haydn's quartet failed to elicit the slightest mark of approbation or delight from them. Gradually, however, they warmed up, becoming more and more demonstrative, until their enthusiasm reached its culminating point during the performance of the Quartet by Beethoven.

CARLSRUHE.—The members of the Singacademie lately gave a concert when they were assisted by Mdlle. Mathilda Wekerlin and Herr Göthe, both from the Royal Operahouse, Dresden. The programme was of a somewhat varied character, containing the Symphony in D minor, Op. 120, Schumann; scena and air from Der Freischütz, Weber; "Frühlingsbotschaft," Gade; overture to Der Haidenschacht, Holstein; air from Elijah, Mendelssohn; songs, Mendelssohn and Schumann; and "Schön Ellen," Bruch.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Sunday Times," Dec. 4th.)

The programme of the fourth concert, given last Monday in St. James's Hall, was exceedingly attractive to the lovers of Beethoven in his most readily fascinating mood. Here it is:—

PART I.

Quartet in A major (Op. 18. No. 5). Songs—"Andenken," "Abendlied." Sonata in A flat (Op. 26), for pianoforte alone.

PART. II.

Sonata in A minor (Op. 23), for pianoforte and violin. Song—"Der Abend," "O Kostliche Leit," Quartet in E flat (Op. 18. No. 6).

It will be observed that the final instalment of the Lobkowitz set of quartets figures largely in the above scheme, and seeing that No. 6 came last of all, it will be assumed that the audience sat out the concert to its end. Without disparaging the quartet in A major, we must say that the one in B flat speedily put it out of mind, notwithstanding the charming Andante, with variations, by which the former work is best known. Indeed No. 6 has a peculiar attraction apart from the beauty which is spread over it, like sunshine over a summer landscape. We can admire the unaffected grace of the opening Allegro, the ever-flowing melody of the Adagio, and the quaint freedom of the Scherzo; but it is hard to avoid being absorbed by the Finale (a movement as suggestive as the first fluttерings of a young eagle in the direction of the sun). It shows us the promptings, so to speak, of that genius which has not yet freed itself from tradition and precedent; and we watch it as some admirer of "muscular paganism" might have watched the infant Hercules at work upon the serpents. Both quartets, but especially the No. 6 were admirably played by Madame Neruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, and most thoroughly enjoyed by a crowded house.

The Sonata in A flat—a Fantasia-Sonata, if ever there was one—ranks among the best known of Beethoven's pianoforte compositions—at least two movements, the Air with Variations and Funeral March, being the cherished property of every amateur. It was fortunate that music about which the audience knew enough to be exacting fell to the lot of Madame Arabella Goddard, an artist competent to meet any amount of "requisitions" to the perfect satisfaction of the requirers. Madame Geddard did entire justice both to Beethoven's work and her own reputation. Nothing could have been more exquisite than the inerring, et always expressive manipulation of the variations; and nothing more solemn, without a particle of affectation, than her delivery of the March. But the accomplished artist's greatest success was made in the brilliant Toccata finale; a movement she struck off with lissom fingers, and with such fairy lightness that the applause which followed her last note seemed as much an outburst of astonishment as an expression of pleasure. An encore was the natural result, and elicited a new rendering not less admirable than the first. The Sonata in A minor afforded another treat of rare value; and in response to a unanimous summons, Madame Goddard and Madame Neruda returned to acknowledge approbation never better earned.

Herr Stockhausen sang all his songs artistically.

(From the "Daily Telegraph," Dec. 8th.)

As the scheme of Mr. Arthur S. Chapp ll's Beethoven concerts avoids selections from the master's later works, it allows a tolerably exhaustive treatment of their precur ors. Those, for example, which were produced during the first few years of the present century, have almost exclusively filled the last two programmes, out of eight compositions six being attributable to the period named, and four of the six bearing date 1802. As illustrating the development of Beethoven's genius, this may be slow progress; but whoever knows the wealth of those prolific years, and the beauty which makes the works in question so generally acceptable, will readily find excuses—if, indeed, there exist any necessity for the search. Not without reason might it be urged that the director is following precisely the right course, and utilizing the Beethoven centenary in the most obvious way. At least, it is beyond a doubt that more "outsiders" are likely to become converts to Beethoven by the exhibition of his earlier graces than by a display of the later characteristics which sometimes puzzle even veteran followers. Only two quartets have been given at the last two concerts. Monday's programme containing none, but serving as a division between the Lobkowitz and Rasoumowsky sets. We need hardly dwell upon the features of works so well known as Nos. 5 and 6 of the former group. Least of all is there necessity to discuss those movements which made the greatest impression upon the audience. In No. 5 the lovely adagio cantabile with its brood of variations, each worthy of the others, and of the parent theme; and, in No. 6, the finale, an effort as masterly as it is original, met with special favour. Let us add, that both quartets were well led by Madame Norman Neruda (her last appearance for a time); who was, in turn, ably seconded by Messrs. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti.

The two pianoforte sonatas, Op. 26 in A flat), and Op. 29 (in D—the so-called Pastoral), were played in order by Madame Arrabella Goddard. To name the former is to recall the favourite air with variations at the opening of this irregularly constructed "sonata," and also the solemn Funeral March which—so says Herr Nohl—sprung from Beethoven's jealousy of a similar movement in Paer's Achille. The great man's friend and pupil may be right as to the origin of the March—for greatness and littleness are often found together; but who thinks of Paer or Achille, while Beethoven's inspired strains fall upon the ear? Surely he alone who, when listening to Judas Maccabæus, charges Handel with fawning upon a sanguinary Royal duke. The Pastoral Sonata—for so it must be called, whether we like Herr Grant's godfathership or not—belongs to the household words of music; and, therefore, we need only add a remark about the performance of both compositions by Madame Goddard. The average merit of this artist's doings ranks among the highest; but there are times when she acquits herself exceptionally well—as, for example, in the rendering of Op. 26. Rarely we imagine, has the piano better served the functions of an orchestra than in the Funeral March, which came out with most impressive grandeur; while an enthusiastic encore proved that not often has the finale been dashed off with greater brilliancy or precision. The 'Pastoral' was given in a style quite as much beyond reproach. In short, Madame Goddard's success on both occasions sufficed to gratify the warmest upholder of that usually ill-requited article—native talent.

The works in the two programmes connected with the same period, as all the foregoing, were the sonata (Op. 23), for pianoforte and violin, and the second quintet (Op. 29), for violin, violas, and 'cello—the former dedicated to Beethoven's patron, Count Moritz Fries, the latter to Count Ferdinand of that ilk, who, it will be remembered, subsequently gave the master a commission for another and similar work, which never appeared. The graceful beauty of the sonata could have had no better exemplification than it received at the hands of Madame Arabella Goddard and Madame Neruda; nor did the quintet suffer by the leadership of Herr Straus, who has once more taken a place he fills with great acceptance. The tried efficiency of Mr. Hann being added to the permanently engaged quartet, there is no need to say how the German violinist was followed.

For the remaining two instrumental pieces Mr. Chappell went back to the most elementary Beethoven, and selected the pianoforte and violoncello sonata in G minor (Op. 5) and the trio in G major (Op. 1) for the same instruments and violin. Both were brilliantly played; but in the former the association of Madame Goddard and Signor Piatti had a well-nigh perfect result, each artist being worthy of the other and of the composer.

Herr Stockhausen continues to act as vocalist, and gives a selection of Beethoven's songs at each concert. With reference to the Scottish melodies introduced last Monday, we have only to point out that when a German arrangement is sung by a German in the German language, the Scottish element is pretty well covered up.

(From the "Shipping and Mercantile Gazette," Nov. 30.)

The Beethoven concerts of Mr. Arthur Chappell are progressing very satisfactorily, and the audiences which have attended them up to the present time have been so large as to give the present series of Christmas meetings a remarkable pre-eminence in that respect over former years. This is quite as it should be, inasmuch as it celebrates the centenary year of Beethoven's birth with obvious credit to the good taste and intelligence of English amateurs. On Monday night the attendance was more numerous than upon any former occasion, the back of the area and of the orchestra, as well as the several galleries, being filled to the doors. The programme comprised the remaining two quartets of Op. 18 (Nos. 5 and 6), the pianoforte sonata in A flat (Op. 26), and the pianoforte and violin sonata in A Minor (Op. 23), all belonging to the earlier period of the composer's art-history, and among the most beautiful of its varied and melodious fruit. The quartets were played by Madame

Norman Neruda, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, it need hardly be said with all the refinement that characterized the delivery of the former quartets of the same group, the silvery tone and graceful bowing of the lady being, as before, the theme of universal admiration and eulogy. Nothing more delicate and finished n the way of violinism could have been desired. Madame Arabella Goddard the pianist of the evening, rendered the solo sonata, one of the noblest and most impassioned of the set, with matchless ability, her delivery of the impetuous allegro exhibiting all the freedom and elasticity of finger which distinguish her so conspicuously from her contemporaries; while in graceful and animated point the reading were a clothing of its own eminently original, poetical, and fascinating. Pianoforte playing, in short, was illustrated in this case in its highest physical and intellectual perfection, and no wonder that the repetition of the movement should be demanded with an unanimity at once spontaneous and irresistible. The second sonata, Op. 23, is of lighter material, but there was a novel interest in the fact that the two ladies, Madame Arabella Goddard and Madame Neruda, would, for the first time, play it; and the consummate excellence of the result may easily be imagined. The intervening vocalisms, consisting of a brief selection of Beethoven's occasional songs, were contributed by Herr Stockhausen, and Mr. Benedict, as usual, was the accompanist.

NATIONAL TRAINING SCHOOL FOR MUSIC.

The following report from the Musical Committee was laid before the Council of the Society of Arts at its last meeting, when the same was adopted:—

1. In order to carry on the work already begun by the Society of Arts, with the view of establishing a National Training School for Music, the Committee recommend the Council to make music—as one of the Fine Arts—an object of the Society's attention.

2. For promoting this purpose, the Committee recommend that a musical section of the Society be instituted, with a separate fund, in order to give concerts annually in the Royal Albert Hall.

3. These concerts to consist of performances of vocal and instrumental music of the highest character.

4. After paying the expenses of the concerts, the profits to be applied to the establishment of a National Training School for Music.

5. Members of the Society, for every subscription of one guinea paid to the musical fund, to have the privilege of obtaining a transferable ticket for six evening concerts in the arena and balcony without further payment, providing that no member as such shall have the privilege of receiving more than five tickets on these terms.

6. Persons not members of the Society shall have the liberty to purchase tickets on such terms as the Council may from time to time determine.

7. That the Musical Committee of this Society, consisting of:—

The Lord Henry G. Lennox, M.P., or the Chairman of the Council for the time being.	Henry Cole, C.B.
	A. S. Cole, Esq.
	Capt. Donnelly, R.E.
The Vice-Chairman of Council for the time.	The Honourable Seymour Egerton.
	W. Hawes, Esq.
Lord Gerald FitzGerald.	C. Wren Hoskyns, Esq.
The Right Hon. Sir J. Pakington, Bart., M.P.	Frank Morrison, Esq.
	J. Puttick, Esq.
Sir John Rarrington, Bart.	S. Redgrave, Esq.
Sir Francis Sandford.	Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, R.E.
E. A. Bowring, Esq., C.B., M.P.	E. C. Tufnell, Esq.

be authorised to carry out the arrangements for the six concerts, as soon as a guarantee fund for not less than two thousand pounds has been obtained, and one thousand subscriptions of one guinea.

That Sir Michael Costa be asked to meet the Committee, to discuss the necessary details.

A guarantee fund for assuring the Society against loss has been commenced.

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—The 18th annual meeting was held on Tuesday, the 6th inst., at the Norfolk Street Offices, Viscount Ranelagh in the chair. The annual report of the Executive Committee stated that the receipts for the year were £133,276 15s. 11d., and the grand totals to Michaelmas, 1870, £1,583,359 15s. 2d. The last share number issued to Michaelmas, 1870, was No. 34,756, which, at £50 per share, represents a subscribed capital of £1,737,800, the total withdrawals being £399,971 3s. 9d. After leaving the Reserve or Surplus Fund at £10,500 (exclusive of office premises and furniture account, which now stands at the present value of £2,333 10s. 6d.), the report adds that every payment on the shares on the register will realize five and a half per cent. for the present year. The following members of the board who retired by rotation were re-elected:—The Hon. Robert Bourke, M.P.; Sir Lawrence Palk, Bart., M.P.; Colonel Augustus Merrick, and Nesmham Win-tanley, Esq. The report referred to the success of the system of combined action, as proved by the readiness displayed by the members in the taking of the shares of the United Land Company (Limited), on their third issue.

OPERATIC HANDBOOKS.

(From the "Sunday Times," Dec. 4.)

It may often have been a matter of surprise that, till within the last few weeks, nobody has attempted to do for opera what was long since done for oratorio; we refer to the publication of books for the use of the audience. In the case of oratorio, the idea has been carried out with triumphant success; and copies of the great sacred works are scattered broad-cast throughout the land. Making every allowance for the greater popularity, and more extensive employment, of sacred over secular dramatic music, there yet remains a margin for surprise that the handbook notion did not quickly spread from one to the other. That it has spread at length must be taken as an evidence of increased interest in the lyric stage; for which reason the movement is doubly welcome. We observe that two of our great publishing firms have almost simultaneously occupied the new field of enterprise and, it is to be hoped, of profit; Messrs. Boosey & Co. taking ground first, closely followed by Messrs. Novello, Ewer, & Co. The handbooks of the latter house are not in evidence—a sufficient reason for saying nothing about them; but three of those issued from Hollies Street have reached us, and may fairly claim prominent notice.

When considering the outline of their scheme Messrs. Boosey & Co. must have found themselves called upon to make a difficult choice. Two courses were open before them: either to print the original words of the various operas, or to adopt the accepted Italian version. On the one hand, the first plan commended itself to purist and all who value such a series of works mainly for library purposes. On the other, the second was certain to be of greater practical utility in regard to the primary idea of the enterprise. Messrs. Boosey & Co. yielded to the latter consideration, and, as we think, acted wisely. In England, whether for good or evil need not be discussed now, operas are chiefly presented in an Italian dress, and it is plain that operatic handbooks, to be such really as well as nominally, must contain an Italian version. What, for example, would it avail to take a German edition of Fidelio to Covent Garden, or what interest would it excite in the homes of those who are familiar with the work in the accepted Italian form? Here, however, we may state that Messrs. Boosey & Co. intend leaving, as a supplement to their "Royal Edition," the more important non-Italian works in the original language, thus removing all objections to the utilitarian plan upon which their main design is carried out.

The chief features of the Royal Edition of Operas are such as command high approval. In the first place, the text is printed with rare correctness, looking at the magnitude of the work, and the fact that only a first issue has come to hand. Again, the pianoforte accompaniment, while neglecting nothing essential, is not over-crowded in such a way as to be unsuited to the average amateur. Moreover, it gives the chief features of the "score" with all the greater clearness through being free from subordinate matter. Another noticeable fact is the presentation of unaccompanied recitative in the form of spoken dialogue merely. Here, also, Messrs. Boosey & Co. have yielded to the claims of a handbook pure and simple, diminishing the bulk of their volumes by a step which entails no sacrifice upon the handbook user. With reference to the edition of Don Giovanni, however, the absence of the passages for trombones which occur in the cemetery scene demands attention and rectification. The second and third volumes (Fidelio and Il Barbiere) show increased care in the editorial department, Mr. Arthur Sullivan having now the co-operation of Mr. Josiah Pittman, whose regard for details is not less great than we may assume Mr. Sullivan's to be for his own reputation. The general "get-up" of the Royal Edition demands unqualified praise. Indeed, the work is an édition de luxe. Clear and legible type, good paper, printing of the highest class, and, in the case of the four-shilling copies, binding which is a model of elegance and good taste, prove the thoroughness with which the publishers have gone into their serious enterprise and the reliance they place upon public support. That that support may be ungrudgingly extended every one will wish whose desire for the progress of art does not stop at unpractical aspirations.

THE MESSIAH.

A performance of this great work took place on Wednesday week, in St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Henry Leslie. The conditions were favourable to a result of special excellence, for not only did Mr. Leslie's choir undertake the choruses, but the orchestra was that of the Royal Italian Opera, and the principal singers comprised Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Trebelli, each of whom achieved some striking successes. Mdlle. Tietjens' rendering of "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was equal in beauty of style and propriety of expression to what it has been on any former occasion—which is saying much; while in "He shall feed His flock," Madame Trebelli won an enthusiastic encore by means indisputably legitimate. Mr. Nordblom, in the absence of Mr. Sims Reeves, did his best with the tenor airs, and Signor Foli delivered those for the bass with effect. The choruses were, without exception, well sung.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite.—The Civil Service Gazette remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Each packet is labelled: JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London. Also makers of Epps's Chocolate, a very thin Evening beverage.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1870-71.

DIRECTOR—MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

THE BEETHOVEN CONCERTS.

THE present year being the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, the Director has thought that it would be a fitting tribute of respect to the memory of that immortal genius to confine the programmes before Christmas exclusively to Selections from his Instrumental and Vocal Works. Every concert, until the end of the year, will therefore be a Beethoven Concert. In the course of the series, the Six Quartets, Op. 18; the Three Quartets (Razoumowsky), Op. 59; the Quartet, No. 10 (E flat); the Five Trios for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; and as many of the Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violin, Pianoforte and Violoncello, and Pianoforte alone, as can be comprised within the limits of eight programmes, will be given. The Vocal Music will in all instances be selected from the Chamber Songs, with Pianoforte Accompaniment.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1870.

CONCERNING SOME PUTTERS-TO-RIGHT.

THE philosophic mind is never at a loss for objects of interesting and instructive contemplation. It can see "sermons in stones" and "books in the running brooks," if not exactly "good in everything." Even failing all other, there is a never-exhausted subject of study in the apparently odd working of what Dr. Watts, at a moment of special inspiration, called "this vast machine," and the resultant evolution of events which make history. Our pages are no place for a discussion upon the providential government of the world; but we may say, without fear of contradiction, that the government of the world, whatever it may be, is astonishingly fertile in surprises. Count Bismarck takes credit for two or three by no means despicable efforts in that line; but a greater Chancellor than he is continually doing things which are, to even extraordinary statecraft, as the Himalayas to a mole-hill. From events seemingly competent to nothing arise the mightiest issues; and the greatest deeds are done by those who appear least likely to attempt them. History is full of illustrations. A shepherd-boy is taken from the fields of Judea, to found a line of kings; a young girl quits tending pigs, in the woods of Lorraine, to drive the English out of France; a burly Fen farmer is chosen, to shake his fist at the Pope, and interpose the shield of England between persecution and its victims; and—greatest example of all—a Nazarene carpenter founds the dominant faith of the world. We are become so used to such marvels that, when an emergency arises, we look anxiously at the "residuum," for the man who is to meet it, rather than to those upon whom the task would seem to fall; and the man usually emerges out of the great sweltering crowd, at the very hour when he is wanted. What a blessed arrangement is this; and how it buoys up with hope a poor, distracted world! Moreover, how it warns us not to "despise the day of small things," nor heedlessly to reject a sling and stone, when some armour-plated Goliah is bearing down upon us with big words and bigger weapons. Apropos of what in particular is all this? Let the reader read and learn.

Everybody knows that the art of music in England is not quite as flourishing as it ought to be. Some progress we have made during recent years, it is true; and we are not exactly standing still at the present moment—thanks to the efforts, necessarily weak, of modest individuals and institutions throughout the country. But the fact remains that only a minority can boast of musical culture—the majority being still in the darkness of ignorance. There is need, as we are all painfully conscious, for some supreme effort to be made, by some supreme man or men, so that light may shine where now reigns gloom. True to the logic of history, we have anxiously watched for the coming man, or men, in the most unlikely quarters; and, at last, our reward seems at hand. The apostles of musical culture—eighteen strong—have come out of Adam Street, Adelphi; and England may now expect a regenerative process, startling in its thoroughness and speed. Of course our readers are burning with anxiety to know the names of these artistic saviours, and, without further preamble, here they are :—

The Lord Henry G. Lennox, M.P., or the Chairman of the Council for the time being.	Henry Cole, C.B.
	A. S. Cole, Esq.
	Capt. Donnelly, R.E.
The Vice-Chairman of Council for the time being.	The Honourable Seymour Egerton.
	W. Hawes, Esq.
Lord Gerald FitzGerald.	C. Wren Hoskyns, Esq.
The Right Hon. Sir J. Pakington, Bart., M.P.	Frank Morrison, Esq.
	J. Puttick, Esq.
Sir John E. Harrington, Bart.	S. Redgrave, Esq.
Sir Francis Sandford.	Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, R.E.
E. A. Bowring, Esq., C.B., M.P.	E. C. Tufnel, Esq.

That these gentlemen seem a most unlikely lot we are aware; but in that fact lies absolutely our hope. Who can say what may come out of the unknown?—and what great things may not be done by the "residuum" of the eighteen? The logic before referred to does not permit us to base our hopes upon the few excellent amateurs, with Mr. Seymour Egerton at their head, who form the apparent salt of this Committee. No; we are compelled to rest all upon the majority of nobodies (musically-speaking) with whom they are associated. Which of them is to be chief regenerator? Perhaps, "the Vice-President of the Council for the time being;" or, perhaps—we speak with bated breath—the illustrious Cole, C.B., himself will emulate in music the fame he has acquired in Boilers. But a truce to speculation, in the presence of fact. The Committee are going to work in stern reality. They propose to give six concerts, in a hall standing half-a-day's journey from the centre of London. And by this expedient is to be accomplished our musical regeneration!

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

It was stated the other day by one of the Berlin correspondents of a contemporary that Herr Joachim had resigned his post as chief of the Berlin Conservatory of Music, and the statement has been widely circulated. It should be added, however, that the resignation of Herr Joachim was not accepted by the Minister under whose jurisdiction such artistic matters come, and that a statement of Herr Joachim's causes for dissatisfaction—the reasons, in fact, which led to his resignation—has been forwarded to King William at Versailles. Should his Majesty accept this statement as the great musician would have it understood, Herr Joachim will in all probability retain his position.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A few days ago the Queen visited that ugly excrescence yclept "the Royal Albert Hall" (alias "the Stilton Cheese"), and naturally desired to learn whether a place built for music was in a fair way to answer its purpose. What followed must be told in language "communicated" by South Kensington (mayhaps by the renowned Cole, C.B. himself) to the daily papers:—

"In the first instance Frederick Brittan, one of the boys employed by the contractors, was permitted to sing, and afterwards Mr. Healey, an officer of the Science and Art Department, was called upon to play a set of scales. This having been done, Miss Anna Williams, an amateur, was commanded to sing, and her Majesty, in order to put to a somewhat severe trial the effects of a female voice in the large building, ascended to the balcony of the third story, and there we are informed the most delicate notes were perfectly audible."

We quote this passage for the sake of drawing attention to the terms "permitted," "called," and "commanded." Can anybody tell us why Frederick Brittan was "permitted" to sing instead of being "commanded" like Miss Anna Williams, or "called upon" like Mr. Healey? Did the contractor's boy, eager to distinguish himself, petition Majesty for leave to pipe his childish treble? Did Mr. Healey keep in the far background with his fiddle, "set of scales," "delicate harmonies," and all? Did Miss Anna Williams incline to rebellion, and need peremptory orders? Who shall unravel these mysteries except South Kensington and Cole, C.B.? No doubt the terms used have a meaning, upon which, possibly, hang serious issues, unsuspected by outsiders.

At Bordeaux, in the College of Guienne, George Buchanan, Professor of Latin, composed two sacred dramas, the Jephtha and the Baptist, for his pupils on the Academic boards. One of the performers was Michael de Montaigne, Buchanan's favourite disciple, afterwards author of the Essais. The enthusiastic reception accorded to these dramas, not merely at Bordeaux but at other university towns, was only second to the delight with which they were read in private. Roger Ascham says of one:—

"Some in Englande, moe in France, Germanie, and Italie also, have written tragedies in our time, of which, not one, I am sure, is able to abyde the trew touch of Aristotle's precepts, and Euripides' example save onely two, that ever I saw. M. Watson's Absalon and Georgius Buchananus' Jephthes."

Why are these plays not revived at Westminster, for example? At that foundation the annual performance of the Plautian or Terentian comedy is to be suspended for this year. Why not make another innovation on time-honoured custom, and produce one of the sacred dramas which gave pleasure to Academic and courtly audiences of both sexes in the sixteenth century? Dr. Scott might take the experiment; and while retaining for his pupils the scenic recitation of pure Latin, furnish an entertainment at once novel and attractive.

The directors of the Oratorio Concerts have issued a capital prospectus for their approaching third season. We are promised, among other things, the following works:—Bach's Passion-Musik; Elijah; the Mass in D of Beethoven; Spohr's Calvary; a selection from Mendelssohn's Psalms, and Handel's rarely-heard Chandos Anthems; Benedict's St. Peter; Hiller's Nala and Damayanti; and Smart's Bride of Dunkerron. It is evident from this that the directors aforesaid have lost none of their youthful enterprise. Looking at the supineness which reigns around, they "point to better things, and lead the way." May their shadow never be less! Mr. Joseph Barnby, it is needless to add, will continue in his post of conductor.

An agitation against street music has been revived by letters to the Times. To a person with a severe headache, to an invalid requiring sleep, to a man engaged in head work, or to the rider of a restive horse, the sounds from a barrel organ or a German band are the reverse of soothing; but there are many who delight in street music. Grim people, rarely seen to smile, twitch the corners of their mouths when Ethiopian serenaders are giving a concert in front of a drawing-room window where children flatten their noses against panes. Street music, is an institution requiring regulation rather than abolition, and there is no occasion for those who dislike it to go into a passion or assume the airs of martyrs. The Act of 1864 is in existence, and it is their fault if they do not enforce its provisions. Some of the remonstrances show want of common sense. One gentleman implores the Times not to allow the agitation to rest. "Nothing," he says, "is so likely to act upon the apathy of police magistrates, or to reform the law, as thus evoking the almost unanimous opinion of the middle class against this absurd 'barbarism.'" It is hardly necessary to bring forward the claims of any particular class on the subject of street music. The law is not supposed to favour one class above the other. Possibly the higher and lower classes may like street music as much as the "great middle class" detest it. There is nothing which tends to make "a class" so offensive as elevating it above the heads of its fellows and claiming for it especial consideration. The "working class," which includes nearly all the community, has incurred much ridicule owing to the practice among agitators of applying the term exclusively to the dirty or discontented as one of sentimental adulation when advocating some lucrative hobby. All classes are so interwoven that it is impossible to define the limits within which any one of them is contained. They are, for good or evil, equally affected by the barrel-organ question, with the exception of Mr. Babbage, who forms a class of himself; but there are more babies than Babbages, and while this is the case street music will have its supporters as well as its opponents. If those who excite themselves can induce the performers to keep their instruments in tune, to play in good time, and to avoid neighbourhoods where they are not welcome, they will do good service; but a crusade against street musicians indiscriminately is unjust.

THE Westminster Play is to be suspended this year. No similar break in the annual celebration of the Latin comedy in the dormitory of St. Peter's College has occurred since 1847. As far back as the days of Queen Elizabeth "the Latin play enacted by the scholars of Westminster" was a regular institution—the remnant, unquestionably, like the Eton montem, of the dramatic performances with which in mediæval times the religious festivals of the Church were observed, and conceived in the same spirit as the miracle plays. The Westminster exhibition had from the first a distinctly educational purpose. Dean Nowell, when second head-master of Westminster, was the first to introduce the reading of Terence for the better learning of the pure Roman style. The letters of the Westminsters, from the time of Atterbury, teem with allusions to the play. On one or two occasions some English drama has been acted. In 1695, Dryden's Cleomenes was performed. It was only in 1839 that the attempt was made to reproduce the dresses of the Roman Forum; and the attempt was due to the attention drawn to the question of correctness by Dr. Williamson, head-master, in a pamphlet entitled Eumekus Politicus. The earliest regular scenery was arranged by Garrick, himself a spectator of the Westminster play, and presented to the school by Archbishop Markham. The new scenery with which the Westminster playgoers of the last few years are familiar was painted by Mr. C. R. Cockerell, a Westminster boy.

AN anecdote used to be current that the famous song, "Adelaide" was saved for posterity by Herr Barth, a singer in the Austrian Imperial Chapel. Barth happened to call on Beethoven, when the latter handed him a manuscript, saying—"There I—I have composed this to-day; we have a fire in the stove, and in it shall go." Barth, however, read the composition through, and then tried it over. Upon which, Beethoven, who had listened with great attention, immediately took back the manuscript, and said—"Barth, my dear old fellow, we will not burn it." Mr. A. W. Thayer, however—the American dilettante, who contributed for many years to Dwight's Boston Journal of Music under the signature of "Diarist"—as great an enthusiast for Beethoven as Herr Lenz himself, with a larger amount of judgment and far more solid and various information to guide him in his researches—demolishes the authenticity of this "anecdote" at a blow:—

"A gentleman directed my attention to a long and excellent article (as he said) in a literary periodical, which would give me certain valuable facts and traits in Beethoven's character. So, from bookstore to bookstore, I went in search of the periodical. After much loss of time and trouble, it occurred to me that the Imperial Library must have it. Sure enough, half a dozen bound volumes were brought me, and I set myself to work searching for my article. At last, it proved to be a lot of anecdotes printed with 'pictures to match,' the last of which was an old acquaintance, which I had ten years before carefully copied, and found afterwards to be—bosh. It is the old story how the tenor singer Barth visited Beethoven one day, and found him just about to burn a piece of music. 'Let me first sing it,' says Barth. He did so, and Beethoven exclaimed, 'No, we will not burn it.' It was the 'Adelaide!' Is it not a pity that so good a story should be met by this fact:—Barth first came to Vienna in 1808, when 'Adelaide' had already been printed over ten years."

The date of "Adelaide" may be inferred from the first advertisement which appeared in the Vienna Journal of Feb. 8, 1797, to this effect—"'Adelaide,' by Matthison, a cantata for a solo voice, with accompaniment of pianoforte." Matthison's little volume of poems had appeared but a short time before. Two of them interested Beethoven greatly, the "Adelaide" and the "Opferlied," which latter he set to music twice—once for voice and pianoforte, and again, some twenty years later, for chorus with orchestra.

THE Beethoven contributions to the Crystal Palace Concert to-day are the overture, Coriolan, and the Septet, to be played by 16 violons, 12 violas, 10 violoncellos, and 10 double-basses. We wish it "God speed."

DR. ARTONELLI WOLFF, editor of the Dresden Laterna Magica, has had an action brought against him by Mdlle. Marie Krebs, whom he criticized unmercifully in a recent article. Dr. Wolff was condemned to a fine of twenty thalers, and the costs, while the number of the paper containing the objectionable article was ordered to be confiscated. The father of the fair plaintiff wanted to have the pecuniary fine changed into a term of imprisonment, but the Court refused to alter its decision.

AFTER the death of Professor Otto Jahn, of Bonn, his collection of musical works, a collection perfectly unique of its kind, was sold by auction in the month of April last. The Prussian Government, materially assisted by the liberality of Herr Kullmann, of this town, succeeded in securing for the Royal Library, Berlin, the entire Mozart Collection, the most important numbers of the Haydn Collection—several from the Beethoven, and the Gluck Collection, &c. This is a very valuable addition to the Royal Library, which is now the only one in the world that possesses Mozart's entire works. It has, moreover, already obtained the rarest and most costly of Haydn's, so that in time the collection of that composer, also, will easily be completed. Bach, Handel, and Beethoven, likewise, are almost completely represented. With regard to those works of Gluck, and those of Haydn, which are still wanting, manuscript copies may be procured at a trifling cost.

ITALIAN OPERA BUFFA.

Advertisements in the public papers have made known that the Lyceum Theatre will open next month for the performance of Italian Opera Buffa. Certain particulars of the enterprise are now to hand, and may be thus summarized:—A company (limited) has been formed with a capital of £3500; the directors of which are Signor Mattei, Charles L. Hutchings, Esq., and Signor Verger, the Paris operatic agent. Signor Mattei will officiate as musical chief, first-class artists are promised, and among the works to be performed is a new opera by Signor Bottesini. We need scarcely add that, if the venture shows itself worthy of support—and we have no reason to anticipate the contrary—support it will have.

GHENT.—M. Flotow's opera, L'Ombre, is in rehearsal.

BRUSSELS.—A new one-act comic opera, La Coupe Enchantée, will be shortly put in rehearsal at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. The words are by MM. A. Pellier and Hyacinthe Kirsch; the music is by M. Th. Radoux.

THE funeral of the late regretted Signor Ferrari took place on Friday, the 2nd inst., at Kensal Green. There was a very large attendance of friends and members of the musical profession. Among them were Mr. G. F. Anderson, Professor W. Sterndale Bennett, Signor Garcia, Dr. Carpenter, Dr. Rugg, Messrs. Vallance, Tamplin, Tapson, Fenning, Sagrini, T. Chappell, W. Chappell, Hills, Phillips, Bird, W. Dorrell, W. D. Davison, W. Farren, F. B. Jewson, W. G. Cusins, Stanley Lucas, E. Aguilar, George Wood, Lamborn Cock, J. Goss, J. Hullah, M'Murdie, W. H. Holmes, Holmes, jun., King, Svensden, Brinley Richards, Charles Stephens, W. Kirkman, and many others, members of the musical profession, including students of the Royal Academy of Music. The number present has been estimated at upwards of one hundred. Mr. J. W. Davison, one of Signor Ferrari's oldest and most intimate friends, was compelled to be absent in consequence of severe indisposition.

MR. BENEDICT'S new oratorio St. Peter, which was so entirely successful at the late Birmingham Festival, is to be performed for the first time in London on Tuesday evening next at St. James's Hall. The principal singers will be the same as at Birmingham, with the exception of Mr. Santley, who will be replaced by Herr Stockhausen. We have no doubt that all who are interested in music will avail themselves of this opportunity of hearing Mr. Benedict's masterpiece.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Miss Ellen Horne, a rising young vocalist, gave a concert on December 1st, at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon Street, and met with good patronage. Miss Horne was successful in the different pieces she sang, and obtained an encore for "Parto" (La Clemenza di Tito), when she substituted Spohr's "The Bird and the Maiden"—(the clarionet obbligato to both being beautifully played by Mr. Lazarus. Miss Horne received the same compliment after singing Macfarren's "Pack clouds away" (clarionet obbligato, Mr. Lazarus), and assisted very much in the success of Leslie's "The Fen," and Rossini's "E ben per mia memoria," which she sang with Madam Poole. Mr. Lewis Thomas's fine voice was heard to advantage in Formes's "In sheltered Vale," which he gave with power and feeling; and Mr. Wilford Morgan's ballad, "My sweetheart when a boy," is never better sung than by its composer. Several encores were given, including Benedict's "Hunting Song" (encored). Madame Poole made a genuine "hit" with Smart's "The lady of the Lea" (encored), and Mr. Lewis Thomas was compelled to repeat "Largo al factotum," which he sang with great spirit. Mr. Lazarus played a clarionet solo, on airs from Les Prescieuses and was warmly applauded. The concert ended with Walter Macfarren's part-song, "You stole my love." Mr. J. G. Callcott and Mr. John C. Ward were the conductors.

PROVINCIAL.

Stratford.—The Mercury of October 26th says:—

"The Town Hall was largely attended on the occasion of the concert given by Mr. Lazarus and his party, consisting of Miss Blanche Cole, Mdlle. Drasdil, Messrs. Frank Elmore, Carl Stepan, Welly and Sidney Naylor. The pieces that attained the most marked success were those played by Mr. Lazarus and Mr. Welly, and the songs, 'O, ruddier than the cherry,' 'The Bell Ringer,' and 'Ben e ridicolo.' This concert was quite as successful as expected, and the proceeds were devoted to the local charities."

Plymouth.—In a local paper we read the following:—

"The Plymouth Amateur Vocal Association have inaugurated a series of chamber concerts which promise to be highly successful. The room was well filled; and the programme, which contained, however, only three pieces of chamber music proper, was exceedingly attractive. Mr. Lohr occupied his place as conductor with efficiency, and Mr. H. Reed led the band. The members are to be congratulated on the success of this concert. It shows that there is a way open for them to display their abilities and to entertain the good folks of Plymouth more frequently than could be the case were they to confine their efforts to oratorios and similar great works. May they go on and prosper, and may these chamber concerts foster a taste for classical music."

Malvern.—A correspondent favours us with the following:—

"On the 24th ult, Mr. Haynes' annual grand concert took place in the concert room, and attracted a large audience. It is feared, however, that the honour of having provided such a treat is all Mr. Haynes will ever get out of it. The programme contained chiefly English compositions, which were finely rendered by the following artists:—Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Maybrick, M. Sainton, and Mr. Stanislaus. Miss Edith Wynne delighted the audience with her truly artistic style, and was several times encored. The beautiful voice and expressive manner of Miss Julia Elton were also greatly admired. Mr. Cummings gave several favourite songs in capital style, being rapturously encored in 'Tom Bowling.' A buffo duo by Messrs. Cummings and Maybrick won a similar honour. The violin solos of M. Sainton greatly charmed the audience, and the success of the whole was enhanced by the efficient pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Stanislaus. On the 16th ult, an entertainment was given by a few members of the Literary and Mechanics Institutes' United Choral Society, in aid of its funds. Miss Plant, Mr. E. Page, Mr. Inglis, and Mr. Vaughan sang in good style, and were deservedly applauded! Mr. Lough played two cornet solos, and Messrs. T. T. Hornblow and Rogers accompanied. The concert was held in the Concert Hall, and was quite successful. On dit that this society will give its first concert on the 15th December, to be followed by one given by the Philharmonic. The entertainments at Malvern, Malvern Link, and North Malvern—arranged by Captain Davis of Cradley, and Mr. J. Morris of the Link—were fairly successful. All of them were in aid of the "Captain" Fund. The programmes consisted of patriotic, serio-comic, and sentimental songs. The sum of £5 was realized, and handed over to the Fund. Madame Bodda-Pyne, with Miss Emily Donse, Mdlle. Annetta Zuliani, Mr. Braham Nolan, and Mr. George Donnnelly gave a grand operatic and ballad concert in Mr. Haynes's room, on the 6th inst."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Sims Reeves.

In its notices of the last Saturday Concert at the Crystal Palace the Morning Post, of Dec. 5th speaks thus of our greatest English tenor:—

"Mr. Sims Reeves, who was welcomed upon his appearance on the stage with a mingled greeting, sang most splendidly, and with all the old powers of declamation, pathos, and passion that have placed and maintained him at the head of his profession as a vocalist, his reading of the Liederkreis of Beethoven being one of the wonders of vocal art. Mr. Arthur Sullivan accompanied the 'circle of songs' in a delicate and completely artistic style."

Herr Pauer's Lectures.

The following remarks upon Herr Ernst Pauer's Musical Lectures at the South Kensington Museum, are extracted from an article in the Standard of Dec. 5:—

"The first lecture took place on the 16th, the second on the 23rd ult., and the third on Wednesday last. The lectures are given for the purpose of describing the invention and gradual improvements of the harpsichord, clavecin, clavichord and pianoforte; for the explanation of terms used in pianoforte music, as well as of the various kinds of compositions known as concertos, sonatas, suites, caprices, fugues, preludes, allemandes, sarabands, courantes, gigues, gavottes, &c. Biographical notices of some of the composers are also included. The musical illustrations introduced at the first lecture were by Byrd, Ball, Gibbons, Purcell, Scarlatti, Rameau, Couperin, and others of a similar period. At the second there were selections from Handel, Bach, and Krebs; at the third from Emanuel Bach, Haydn, Eberlin, Mozart, Haessler, and Clementi. In order to show the most influential composers for the clavecin and pianoforte since 1660, Mr. Pauer has drawn up a chronological table for Italy, France, Germany, and Great Britain. The table for Germany is extensive. That for France Mr. Pauer limits to five names, and after Rameau only two are given; so that from 1764, the date of Rameau's death, to the present time, only two composers can be mentioned—Schubert, and Berthui. Italy does not fare much better. Only ten are placed on the list. Since Paradies, 1795, no one only are mentioned, Clementi and Pollini. England, according to Mr. Pauer, is richer than either France or Italy. "J. B. Cramer is honoured with an English nationality; but Cramer was born at Mannheim on the 24th February, 1771. The lectures are well attended by ladies, Mr. Pauer's skill as a pianist rendering them attractive. The last on Wednesday was illustrated by extracts from Dussek, Hummel, Weber, and Beethoven."

Madame Viardot.

In a notice of the concert recently given at St. James's Hall in aid of the "French Refugees' Benefit Fund," the Athenæum of December 3rd speaks as follows of the celebrated artist, Madame Pauline Viardot-Garcia:—

"The great French basso was succeeded by Madame Viardot, who sang another Arpigon air, as it were—Rossini's patriotic 'Pensa alla Patria,' from the Italiana in Algeri. How describe the fervour provoked by the genius of her delivery of the recitative—by her marvellous compass in the cabaletta? Her voice is fresher than it was ten years since; in the lower notes it is decidedly richer and more sonorous. That her vocalization is such a marvel as from the indomitable will that she displays in battling with nature, which has not endowed her with a fine organ. With her, the singing is of the heart and intellect; the voice itself is but secondary. When she has to execute one of those daring scales which she alone can invent, and in which she has to attack high notes, the effect on the ear is harsh and grating for the moment, but in the next instant there emanate thrilling tones which touch the heart. The upper part of her register she absolutely drags out, by sheer courage, and quite irrespective of the physical difficulties she has to contend with. Her glorious sister Malibran excepted, no artist can be cited who has exercised such a potent spell over an auditory, no vocalist gifted with the most sympathetic of organs, and no singers possessing the faculty of florid execution to the most brilliant degree, can be quoted who have such dramatic powers as Madame Viardot. Of every style of art she is a consummate master; in the delivery of any gradation of sound she has never been approached; and thus it is that in the portrayal of varied emotions, she enlists the sympathies so irresistibly. In the 'Pensa alla Patria' she exhibited an elevation of style and power of declamation that raised the words to a national import, as if some patriot was striving to rouse his country to a supreme effort. In the subsequent scena from Gluck's Orphée, 'J'ai perdu mon Euridice,' the vocalization was of another order of excellence; herein the passionate appeals of Orpheus for his lost spouse were rendered with such acute sensibility, that the emotions of many of the listeners were conveyed more by sympathetic tears than by the ordinary tokens of applause."

Mdlle. Nilsson.

With reference to this admirable artist's American tour the Sunday Times observes:—

"Everyone who knows aught of the genius of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson must be interested to trace her progress through the cities and towns of our new somewhat exacting cousins across the Atlantic. As we once before observed, when writing on this topic, the Americans have outlived the period of childlike dependence in the matters of art; and, asserting the wilfulness of youth, are inclined to their independence to an extreme. It would, perhaps, be wrong to say that they put independence before conscience; but we may safely believe that when an artist highly thought of elsewhere (in England especially) cannot honestly be approved in the States, the first fact adds next to any expression of the second. Whatever the success of Mdlle. Nilsson, there, it may be accepted as genuine—all the more genuine because, through some means or other not perfectly clear—offence has been given to a portion of the press which follows up the Swedish artist with a persistent detraction known only to American journalism. The hostility in question may be contemptible in its origin; but can hardly be so in its influence upon a people whose newspapers are the most powerful 'estate' of the commonwealth. When, therefore, we find Mdlle. Nilsson asserting her artistic supremacy without suspicion of failure anywhere, it may be assumed that the Americans have deliberately ratified the judgment of Europe with regard to her claims. Special interest was excited by the lady's visit to Boston, the artistic capital of the New World, a city the inhabitants of which are used to sitting in judgment upon grave pretensions, and not at all averse to expressing a decided opinion. It was felt that Mdlle. Nilsson might command success everywhere else, and yet fail in her appeal to the supreme tribunal. That the result has been justified, need an apprehension all accounts show. Mdlle. Nilsson won the hearts of the Bostonians with an ease which must have astonished the Bostonians themselves."

Digitized by Google

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The programme of the ninth concert added two more important works by Beethoven to the list of those previously given. No symphony was performed; the place usually occupied by a great orchestral composition being allotted to the music to The Ruins of Athens (Op. 113), which has only obtained a hearing at rare intervals, though detached movements, the Chorus of Dervishes and Turkish March, for example, are familiar. A few lines may be made to comprise the entire history of the music in question. It is Beethoven's share of a "Nachspiel mit Gesängen und Chören," in the preparation of which he was associated with Kotzebue, and the object of which was to inaugurate a new theatre at Pesth. After being employed for its original purpose in February, 1812, portions of the music were used at the opening of a Vienna theatre in 1822, in which year the "March" was for the first time published. It was printed in 1823; and, as for the balance of the work, it remained in MS. till 1846. Such is the uneventful history of one of Beethoven's finest efforts at writing dramatic music. Neglect seems to pursue it with unrelenting vigour, the Crystal Palace performance being the first in London for many years, if we except an inadequate attempt at the Oxford Music Hall. Of the twelve numbers not one is destitute of great and striking merit, and concert-givers will do well to bestow occasional notice upon a work certain to repay with interest whatever attention it may receive. A better performance in some respects than that given under Mr. Manns's direction would be hard to imagine. The solos might have had more effective delivery; and the choruses were not faultless; but the orchestra atoned, and won three encores in succession, the favoured pieces being the Dervish Chorus, March, and Interlude of Wind Instruments. That a majority of those present are ready to welcome another performance of The Ruins of Athens may be assumed. The second work by Beethoven was his Violin Concerto in the execution of which Madame Norman Neruda displayed all the ability which has justly given her so distinguished a position. The rest of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's splendid overture, Hebrides, and a selection of vocal pieces, included Schubert's Wanderer, sung by Herr Stockhausen to Ferdinand Hiller's orchestral accompaniments.

WAIFS.

A leader of a country band says that when he finds a piece written in four flats, he never uses more than two of the flats.

The Ely Diocesan Musical Society has offered a prize of five guineas for the best full anthem for a festival of parish choirs.

Mr. M. W. Balfe's will has been proved under £6000. Madame Balfe has been named the executrix.

Messrs. Webster and Chatterton have arranged to produce an operatic extravaganza on the subject of Gil Blas, at the Liverpool Princess's Theatre, at Christmas, and have specially engaged Mrs. Howard to play the character of the hero.

The Emperor Joseph II., having composed an aria, asked Mozart's opinion of it. "Your Majesty" returned the honest composer, "the aria is good, but the composer of it is much better!"

The Herald and Presbyter of Cincinnati thinks that singing is the reason why "the Methodists have become the leading denomination of this country;" while "the Friends, who had an earlier and better planting, have dwindled almost into non-existence."

The story of Don Juan began with romance in the middle ages. It passed thence to the stage, afterwards to poetry. Four years ago, George and Maurice Sand gave Le Don Juan de Villaps to the French theatre; and now a Don Juan in Ireland is announced, by a poet, under the pseudonym of "Leon."

Beethoven, a drama in five acts, by Signor Pietro Cossa, just brought out at the Apollo Theatre, Venice, has according to the Gazzetta di Venezia, failed to interest the public. The drama represents the humours of a vain, egotistical and discontented nature; and throughout the five acts Beethoven wearies the audience by his selfish complaints and by his railings at society.

We observe that the annual concert of Mr. George Russell, whom we need hardly describe as one of our best native pianists, takes place at the Public Hall, Croydon, on Tuesday next. Mr. Russell will be assisted by Miss Banks, Mr. Nordblom, Herr Straus, Herr Ries, Mr. Zerbini, and Herr Daubert. A capital entertainment is assured.

Last year some announcements went the round of the papers as to the probability of Mr. Martin Tupper giving some public readings. An accident postponed his appearance, but arrangements have now been made with Messrs. Chappell, of New Bond Street, for two readings, the first of which took place in St. James's Hall on the 6th, and the second is fixed for the 15th inst.

The Queen having accepted the dedication of Mr. Benedict's St. Peter, a copy of the oratorio, bound in elegant style, has been prepared for her Majesty's acceptance. The oratorio, which was a great success at the last Birmingham Festival, is to be given at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening next, with the original cast, a single exception (and that a grave one) allowed for—that of Mr Santley, who will be replaced by Herr Stockhausen.

Miss Charlotte Cushman has returned to her native land. Some time since she disposed of her house in Rome, also her stud of horses, and went to Edinburgh (Scotland) to reside. Subsequent, where she passed some time, and then removed to the water cure at Malvern, from which place she went to America. She is in good health, save the organic trouble for which the best physicians declare there is no cure. She is stopping at the house of a relative in New York, and will shortly go to Boston. It is rumoured that Miss Cushman will fix upon Newport, R. I., for her future residence.

At a meeting of the directors of the New Music Hall, Sheffield, held on Thursday, a letter was read from the Duke of Norfolk, promising two hundred guineas towards the erection of an organ. The meeting was then made special to consider the best means of obtaining a grand instrument, equal to any in Yorkshire. The following makers were named as likely to be asked to send in specifications and tenders, viz.:—Cavaillé Coll & Co., Paris; Shulze, of Germany; Willis, of London; and Brindley, of Sheffield. The cost of the instrument is not to exceed £2,000, and a sub-committee was appointed to make inquiries previous to the next general meeting. The share list, we are informed, is increasing, 30 new shares have been allotted since the corner-stone was laid on the 1st September, 1870. The committee appeal to all lovers of music either to take shares in the building or to send in donations to the organ fund, which will be received by the Sheffield and Rotherham Bank for the account of the Sheffield Music Hall Company (Limited).

The Thomas Concerts at Boston (U. S.) began on the 4th of October and closed on the 15th, eleven concerts having been given. Mr. Thomas had an orchestra of sixty, and Miss Mehlig, the pianist, assisted at every concert except one. There were both symphony and popular concerts, and at some a blending of the two, the first part being made up of classical music and the second part of lighter pieces. Two Beethoven concerts were made up wholly from the great master's works, and presented selections which illustrated the different periods of his genius. Of Beethoven symphonies, the third, sixth, and eighth were played, and of pianoforte concertos, Miss Mehlig performed the fourth and fifth. An arrangement for all the clarionets, bassoons, horns and strings, of the Septet, Op. 20, proved one of the most successful things of the entire series. Of course Mr. Thomas gave a liberal allowance of Wagner and Liszt, and Boston listened attentively thereto; but at the same time looked towards the statue of Beethoven, as if it were expected to dismount from its pedestal, and stop the clangor. A prelude from Lohengrin, which chanced to be first of the Wagner contributions (and by far the best of them all), set the critics by the ears to such an extent that nothing but more Wagner prevented a serious outbreak. Taken altogether, the concerts were the finest ever given in Boston. Mr. Thomas was earnestly requested to continue them.

LEIPSIC.—In order to render the approaching Beethoven ceremony in some degree worthy of the great master, all the musical institutions here have combined and formed the resolution to devote an entire week, during which only works by Beethoven will be performed, to the celebration of the festival. The "Beethoven Week" will commence on Sunday, the 11th inst., with a grand performance of sacred music. On Monday, there will be a performance in the Theatre; on Tuesday, chamber music; on Wednesday, performance in the Theatre; on Thursday, a concert at the Gewandhaus; and on Friday and Saturday, a performance in the Theatre.—At the 6th Gewandhaus Concert, Herr Franz Bendel, pianist, from Berlin, made his first appearance here; but, probably because he was suffering from nervousness, or indisposition, failed to produce any very particular impression. Dr. Gunz sang the Priest's song from Die Meistersinger, by Herr R. Wagner, and songs by Schubert. Herr Bruckner's second Symphony, in F minor, was very far from proving a success; the majority of the audience listened in icy silence, while some indulged in open marks of disapprobation.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"

SUNG BY

MR. SANTLEY.

Price 4s.

"In a song entitled 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mdlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

"MISS AMY COYNE'S GERMAN SONGS.—It may be a relief to many of our musical readers, tired of the eternal 'Watch on the Rhine,' from the sad scenes which the famous German war-song recalls, to turn to a charming set of lieder typical of the love chansons which have now so sad an interest attached to them, sung, as they are throughout Vaterland, by fair mourners whose loved ones have found a last home in France. The six songs before us have that one rare quality which the poet longed for: appropriately sung, these compositions are low while the poems are of so lyrical a nature that they at once recommend themselves to anyone who (to continue the quotation) can say—

'for with my mind I listen,
And when the leaves of sound are shed upon it
If there's no seed, remembrance grows not there.'

Miss Amy Coyne, a daughter of the late Mr. Stirling Coyne, is the composer of these sweet lieder; and she has also translated from the German the felicitous words with which the music so well harmonizes. Six in number, their titles are—'Farewell for Ever,' 'Fidelity,' 'Parted,' 'The Request,' 'The Voice of Spring,' and 'Evening Sounds,' which last has a delightful Mendelssohnian ring about it. Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, are the publishers of these exquisite songs, and also of Miss Amy Coyne's latest composition, 'Madalena,' a sparkling serenade which we had the pleasure of noticing favourably when it was first sung by Mr. W. THE BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL FESTIVAL REPRESENTATION of "FIDELIO," Dec. 17.

THIS EVENING.

THIS EVENING, Dec. 17, 1870, being the Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of BEETHOVEN, that sublime genius, whose compositions are in no part of the world known fully appreciated, and, it may be added, understood—not only by art critics and connoisseurs, but by the public at large—than in England. Mr. Hayllenon avails himself of the opportunity in obtaining the use of the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN, for the purpose of this celebration. It is also a singularly advantageous circumstance that he is able to avail himself of the eminent services of the great artist, Mdlle. TIETJENS for the occasion. This distinguished lady is universally acknowledged as the only singer capable in the present day of realising the sublime conception of the illustrious composer of "FIDELIO," in the single opera of its gifted originator. Previous to the Opera, the Orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera will perform the Overture to "LEONORA." After the first Act, the Overture to "FIDELIO," designated "No. 4 in E," will be played.

THIS EVENING.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.*

(From a Contemporary.)

That large section of the music-loving community whose taste inclines towards opera is just now much indebted to Mr. Mapleson. With a really strong company, supported by an orchestra and chorus which, if not quite up to the standard we are accustomed to during the regular season, are still efficient, he is giving a series of performances at Mr. Gye's theatre not easy to surpass in variety of interest. Without discarding those popular Italian operas for which genuine amateurs do not greatly care, his enterprise is chiefly devoted to works of the highest order of merit; and it is not overstating the truth to assert that in the course of this short winter season, which is to extend a little over a month, more good music will have been heard than was heard at Covent Garden this year during the whole of the summer period, when the theatre derived countenance and support from what is denominated "fashion." Mr. Mapleson, who knows the public, must be well aware that the tendencies of an "autumn" and winter audience are far more serious than those of a full-dress summer audience; and, acting upon this certainty, he produces for one ephemeral opera three operas that are not ephemeral. Thus up to the time at which we write, we have had, in the one category, the Flauto Magico and Don Giovanni of Mozart, the Otello of Weber, the Barbiere of Rossini, and the Fidelio of Beethoven; in the other, Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia and the Trovatore of Verdi; while for the current week we are promised Le Nozze di Figaro, Semiramide, Faust and, for the third time, Oberon. It is a feature in the plan of this campaign to bring forward, with rare exceptions, no opera more than once during the series of performances; and it says no little for the popular feeling just now that such a work as Oberon should have proved so attractive as to warrant its being played three times within a fortnight. It says, moreover, no little for the company which Mr. Mapleson has been able to secure at this time of year, that they should be so thoroughly prepared in many of the most difficult operas in the repertory, and especially German operas, as to enable him to give one after another in such quick succession. It is also evident that the large audiences which have attended every performance are attracted mainly if not exclusively, by the music, under the expectation, of course—an expectation which, we may say parenthetically, has been fully justified—that it would be adequately presented. True there has been no Adelina Patti, no Pauline Lucca, no Christine Nilsson, no Mario, no Faure; while, on the other hand, it is clear that now of each work has necessarily depended on such resources as were immediately at hand in the theatre. Not a new scene has been prepared, not a new dress provided. For Oberon the scenic accessories belonging to the Africaine were drawn upon, to say nothing of the Christmas pantomime, from which, carol, so long as the genial melodies and exquisite fairy music of Carl Maria von Weber were going on? That such temporary make-shifts would not satisfy Herr Richard Wagner, who in the getting up of his remarkable productions makes it a sine qua non that all the scenery shall go hand-in-hand, is clear; nor would it have satisfied Wagner's arch-enemy, Meyerbeer; but that it has satisfied all who lean towards what Wagner calls "absolute music" is shown by the unanimous applause bestowed upon piece after piece. This time, indeed, the magic horn of Oberon has even borne away the palm from the magic flute of Tamino. True, Mozart's opera, the extravagantly mysterious libretto of which has only been paralleled by the extravagantly mysterious libretto supplied by Mr. Planché (anything but a Schickaneder) for Weber, was performed but once, in consequence of the lamentable departure of Mdme. Ilma di Murska—in her peculiar way the most extraordinary of singers. That remembered, however, the interest excited by Oberon has been worthy of note as a sign of the times. Nearly half a century ago Oberon comparatively failed at Covent Garden Theatre, for which it was expressly written, and where it was produced (in 1826) under the composer's own direction. Whether Weber would have approved the transformation his work has undergone at the hands of Mr. Jules Benedict, who has not only set the dialogue to accompanied recitative, but added other music (all from the fountain-head, of course), to that originally set, as in no other way, perhaps, could it have been fitted for the Italian lyric stage, immoderately fond as he was of his own music, he might possibly (like Rossini with the Siege of Corinth and Moses in Egypt, Meyerbeer with the Etoile du Nord and Pardon de Ploermel, and Auber with Fra Diavolo) have done something of the same kind himself; though even Weber, we are persuaded, could hardly have done anything more masterly than has been done for Weber's cherished opera by Weber's favourite pupil.

A detailed criticism of the performance of any of the operas which up to this period Mr. Mapleson has brought forward will not be expected of us; and indeed, for evident reasons, it would be superfluous. A word or two, however, about his principal singers is only a fair tribute to their zealous exertions. Mdlle. Tietjens has been indefat-gable. She has, in fact, been doing rather too much. She has undertaken arduous parts in every one of the seven operas we have enumerated, with the single exception of the Barbiere. The consequence is that on Saturday night as Leonora (Fidelio), the most important and trying of them all, she showed here and there, and most conspicuously in the great quartet of the prison scene, signs of fatigue. And yet what an artist she is!—and what legitimate triumphs has she not earned in the course of the twelve years she has been amongst us! It seems but yesterday that she first astonished musical London in the Huguenots, at Her Majesty's Theatre, with the famous "high C" and descending scale, in the duet with Marcel. And since Mr. Lumley first introduced her, she has been working almost incessantly, in town and country, year after year, all the years round. Even now, when she does not overtax her means, the voice of Mdlle. Tietjens, one of the noblest soprano lyric existence, is as fresh and vigorous as ever. How wide and varied is her repertory her recent performances above would suffice to prove: Amina, Lucrezia Borgia, Leonora (Verdi's Leonora), Reiza, Donna Anna, and again Leonora (Beethoven's Leonora), have all been represented, and all admirably represented, within the space of a fortnight. And to these she is now about to add Countess Almaviva, Semiramide, Valentine, and the Medea of Cherubini. In contraltos Mr. Mapleson is as strong as could be wished; Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, though French by birth and education, is still the contralto who most worthily fills the place in which for so many years Alboni, the Pisaroni of her day, with the advantage of being as pleasant to look upon as Mr. Pisaroni was the contrary, knew no rival; while the early promise of Mdlle. Scalchi, one of Mr. Mapleson's own discoveries, is being fairly carried out. The prominent characters entrusted to Mdme. Trebelli have been Maffeo Orsini (Lucrezia), Fatima (Oberon), and Zerlina (Don Giovanni); the last, inasmuch as she is compelled to transpose, and thus to injure Mozart's divine melodies, the least in her way. To Mdlle. Scalchi has been confided the sorceress Azucena, that "unspoicons and ghastly woman" of Signor Maginoni's English version, and the by no means (thanks to Mr. Benedict) insignificant character of Puck in Oberon. As comprimaria, the clever Mdme. Sinico is, as ever, useful; and it would be difficult to meet with a more competent representative of Papagena, Donna Elvira, and Marcellina (Fidelio). In small parts—as, for example, the Ermanzi (Oberon)—Mdlle. Baumeister, a comprimaria of less high rank, is also acceptable. The Barbiere di Siviglia introduced a new singer, Mdlle. Léon Duval, who possesses a good mezzo-soprano voice, the French character of which at once attracts observation, who has considerable fluency as a vocalists who (like most French singers) is a lively actress, who boasts of a more than ordinarily good stage figure, who is young, and who, last not least, sings "Una voce poco fa" in Rossini's own key (E), though overlooking it with what probably she herself, or the professor who taught her, may regard as embellishments, but what the admirers of Rossini's music are likely to relegate by another epithet. Mdlle. Duval, we may add, to-day, was successful; but we would rather hear her in another opera before pronouncing a definite opinion about her qualifications for the high position to which, seeing that she chose Rosina for her debut, she apparently aspires.

In the tenor department, if numbers mean riches, Mr. Mapleson may boast of an embarras de richesses. He has no fewer than four, who all lay claim to be "first tenors absolute," di primo cartello. These are Signor Gardoni, whose Almaviva, Mario's alone excepted, is the most gentlemanly and artistically the best now on the stage, and whose Florestan (Fidelio) would be still more remarkable if he could sing the music as Beethoven wrote it; Signor Bettini, especially noted for the alacrity with which he undertakes any part in the repertory of opera, Italian, German, and French, and who has already exhibited his versatility as Tamino, Oberon, and Don Ottavio; Signor Fancelli, who came out three or four years ago at the Royal Italian Opera, and may be criticised now in pretty much the same terms as formerly—as a singer with a voice of some power and a certain earnestness of manner which, in such a part as Edmano, served him well enough, but is hardly equal to Ruiz in the Ice Torch; and Signor Virzani, a new acquisition to the Royal Italian Opera last summer, whose Manrico (Il Trovatore), though by no means a great performance, was sufficiently good to warrant the encouragement awarded him from the first. With baritones and basses Mr. Mapleson is also tolerably well supplied—that is, as far as numbers go. True, the loss of Mr. Santley, now the vocal hero of the Gaiety, is to be deplored; but a more useful substitute could hardly have been secured than Signor Cotogni, for some time Mr. Gye's baritone in chief, who has talent and versatility, feeling as well as voice, and, if he would only get rid of that eternal "tremolo"—which we cannot too often insist (seeing how much it is misunderstood by our contemporaries), is not a vice of style but a physical defect, the result of imperfect early training—would be worth as much again as, with that defect unredarded, he can ever possibly be. How ready and versatile is Signor Cotogni may be gathered from the fact that, within the short space of time the history of which we are recording, he has played, and played more or less well, Papageno (Il Flauto), Duke Alfonso (Lucrezia), the Conte di Luna (Il Trovatore), Sharasmin (Oberon), Figaro (Il Barbiere), and Don Giovanni. In short Signor Cotogni, like Mdlle. Tietjens, has appeared in every opera but one; and, moreover undertaken characters of the highest importance. Further than this, he is about to add Mozart's Figaro to the Figaro of Rossini—besides other responsible parts. Such a man as Signor Cotogni in a speculation like that of Mr. Mapleson's, where ready preparation counts for so much, is of inestimable value. He is not a perfect singer; nor does he exhibit any particular talent, either serious or comic, as an actor; but he is, above all, serviceable, and that to a degree rarely exceeded. The other baritones demand no notice. The basses are not remarkable. Signor Antonucci's Sarastro is about on a par with his Bocco; and that says but little for either. Signor Caravoglia, who on Saturday night played havoc with the music of Pizzaro (Fidelio), is a nullity; while the mere notion of such a singer and actor as Signor Ciampi following the position of Lablache (comic side, be it understood), and occasionally that of Ronconi (again comic side), is a proof that with regard to certain departments our Italian opera nowadays is very poorly off. Signor Ciampi has played Bartolo and Leporello, and the small part of the Oratore in Il Flauto Magico. We prefer him in the last-named, because he has more opportunities of display. Signor Tagliafico, an old favourite, has chiefly distinguished himself by his grotesque impersonation of Don Basilio (Il Barbiere). The voice of this gentleman belongs to the past; it is now neither baritone nor bass. In subordinate characters, like Gubetta (Lucrezia Borgia), he still retains his supremacy; but his Mascetto, in Il Flauto Magico, a part admirably played by Mr. C. Lyall, was a grave mistake. His Masetto, however, is natural and good; and in such parts as Ferrando, where he has to fill up what is conventionally termed the "carpenter's scenes," Signor Tagliafico stands alone. What that awfully dreary first scene in Il Trovatore would be without him who can tell?

However, enough has been said to show that Mr. Mapleson is giving a very attractive series of operatic performances, and, for the most part, giving them well; that is, with every advantage immediately at his disposal. We are sorry that he adheres to the system which has prevailed since Sir Michael Costa left the theatre—that of having two conductors, which simply tends to disorganize the orchestra. Mr. Mapleson has in Signor Arditi a very good conductor, second, indeed, perhaps only to Sir Michael Costa; and in Signor Bevignani a very indifferent conductor, as indifferent as Signor Li Calsi, who shared the place with Signor Arditi, under Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, the year before last. The idea, we believe, was Mr. Gye's; and a more mistaken idea could not be imagined. The orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera was for many years one of the first, if not the first in Europe. What is it now? Second-rate at the best. The fault be it understood, is not the fault of Signor Arditi but of managers, who, paying exorbitant sums to their prima donnas, grind down the orchestra, &c., to make matters even. The result is in every way bad. What, for example, would a prima donna do without an orchestra? Simply nothing. Whereas, on the other hand, an orchestra without a prima donna could play one of Beethoven's symphonies, and thus, unaided, give audible expression to music that is divine. The system of two conductors was projected in order to deprive the orchestral chief of his moral power; but if a conductor has no moral power there can never be any discipline in his orchestra; and an undisciplined orchestra is just as worthless as a grand opera without a grand orchestra is only half what it should be. At least such is, and must ever be, the opinion of those who care for music as music, and who believe that the composer of an opera must necessarily count for something in the general effect. Possibly Sir Michael Costa may have spoiled us; but for this we may safely vouch—not only musicians, but earnest amateurs of music are with him art and soul.

THE ITALIAN OPERA BUFFA COMPANY.

Encouraged by the success of French opera bouffe, which appears to have become an established amusement in London, the projectors of this company are about making a strenuous effort on behalf of Italian opera buffa. Whether the good fortune of the one will attend the fortune for the other, may perhaps be doubted by those who know in what respects MM. Offenbach and Hervé differ from Signori Petrella and Pedrotti; but "without a trial there's no denial," and as all events Italian opera buffa boasts great names and no small repute, for which reason the new enterprise is entitled to the good will of the public. The directors are three in number, and each doubles his part, Signor Tito Mattei acting also as conductor, Mr. C. L. Hutchings as treasurer, and Signor Verger as theatrical agent. The Lyceum Theatre, "the original home of opera buffa in England," has been secured, and on January 2 its doors will be opened for the first performance of the season. With regard to musical preparations, the prospectus conveys an idea that it is intended, first of all, to gratify a desire for novelty. At any rate, such an array of unfamiliar titles has rarely appeared in a document of the kind. Out of twenty-four operas advertised, there are only eight which the English public may be said to know, amongst these being Rossini's L'Italiana in Algeri, Il Conte Ory, Cenerentola, Cimarosa's Il Matrimonio Segreto, and Mazzi's Convitato di Pietà. Of the works altogether strange, the more important are Bottesini's Ali Baba, Petrella's Carneeale di Venezia, Pedrotti's Tutti in Maschera, Rossi's I Falsi Monetari, and Cimarosa's Giannina e Bernardone. Pedrotti's opera, as observers of contemporary musical doings need no telling, will excite a special interest, owing to the rising reputation of its composer. The list of artists is even more an example of the unfamiliar than the list of operas; and to give the names it contains would be to give names, and nothing else, since—with the exception of Signor Fallar—they are wholly unknown to the English public, who must wait in hope of a possible galaxy of talent. The band, led by Mr. H. Weist Hill, one of our best violinists, contains many names associated with the idea of efficiency; the chorus, we are assured, will consist of singers of the highest merit; and due attention will, no doubt, be paid to the mise-en-scène. With these remarks we leave the Italian Opera Buffa Company to such fortune as it may deserve.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS ON CHURCH MUSIC.

"There are societies of all kinds throughout the kingdom for the performance of oratorios and music of elaborate character, but we cannot disguise the fact, that congregational singing is still in many places in a very unsatisfactory state, and I am obliged to acknowledge—although I am myself a member of the Church of England—that if we want to hear earnest and hearty congregational singing, we must ask for it, not in our own churches, but in the chapels of the Nonconformists. Mr Hullah, in the preface to his 'Psalter,' alludes to the strong attachment shown by the people to metrical Psalms and hymns." He says:—"Music connected with metrical words conveys but little notion of melody or tune to the common ear, and though the utmost amount of musical license be taken in the setting of the prose Psalms and hymns, their performance amounts to little more than 'chanting'—a species rather of musical elocution than music, beautiful as it may be. But chanting can never supply the place of singing, in which alone the human heart can find adequate expression.' In another place he indignantly exclaims about the neglect of singing:—'To the shame of the upper and middle classes of society be it spoken, congregations do not sing—the praise of God is left to charity children—it is not gotten' to sing!' I fear there is too much truth in what he says. There are many churches in which we find an excellent organ, and a number of children in a gallery, or possibly a well-trained choir; but these alone do not constitute congregational singing. In many places the singing is too often a mere matter of routine. It is mechanical and without reverence—as though it were a thing apart from public worship and to be hurried through as quickly as possible. The question resolves itself into this—Is congregational singing a part of divine service—or a matter of form? I was on a visit last autumn to a parish in North Wales—the name I cannot now call to mind—in a mountain district, thinly populated. I attended the service, there was very little singing, and neither organ or choir. I happened in a conversation with the vicar, to allude to the singing; he lamented the state of things, but explained that it was impossible to get any vocal talent in such an out-of-the-way place, and he had no funds for organ or choir. How was it then, soon afterwards, I heard a volume of sound, from a small building where a congregation was singing most earnestly? The answer is soon found—the hearty singing to God's praise had listened came from a little chapel about within a stone's throw of the church. But Wales is not the only place where such things exist. I was once at a church in Leicestershire; the congregation was not only select, but highly aristocratic, but during the entire service the only music performed was sung as a solo by the clerk, and he took care to embellish it in true Sawyer place, and he had no funds for organ or choir. How was it then, soon afterwards, I heard a volume of sound, from a small building where a congregation was singing most earnestly? The answer is soon found—the hearty singing to God's praise had listened came from a little chapel about within a stone's throw of the church. But Wales is not the only place where such things exist. I was once at a church in Leicestershire; the congregation was not only select, but highly aristocratic, but during the entire service the only music performed was sung as a solo by the clerk, and he took care to embellish it in true Sawyer style with a trill! I have previously alluded to the congregational singing of Nonconformists, and though it may now seem strange, their well-known inclination to sing hymns was at one time made a subject not only of reproach, but of ridicule. I do not speak of my own authority alone, and I am, therefore, glad to be able to quote from a work published by the Society for the Promotion of Church Music. The writer says, 'We have heard some Churchmen ridicule the Psalm-singing propensities of Dissenters, but we may depend upon it, their propensity is a Catholic one, which, had the Church been true to herself, they would never have sought to qualify beyond her pale—that very habit of exciting devotion by hymns and songs, now unhappily characteristic only of Dissenters, was peculiarly characteristic of the earliest followers of Christ.'—I have one more remark to make—the Church of England has, of late years, wisely followed the example of Nonconformists in regard to congregational singing; and I sincerely hope that the latter will follow the example of the Church, by banishing from public worship all music of a frivolous or unsuitable character."

A MARGATE CONCERT.

Our readers, if they have been as "constant" as we hope, know that Mrs. Francis Talfourd has given an annual concert, for some years past, in the Margate Assembly Rooms, on behalf of a deserving local charity. The generous lady's efforts have proved successful on all occasions, but rarely more so than on the 5th inst., when the entertainment for the season took place. More than one of these occasions—that is to say, the Assembly Rooms full to repletion—attended; at least £70 was realized, and everybody went home in a state of supreme content with the return made for the admission money. No wonder; seeing that, besides Mrs. Talfourd herself, whose amateur talent is of the highest order, the following professionals appeared:—Miss Katharine Poynts, Miss Lucy Franklein, Signor Gardoni, Mr. Paque, Master Hatton, Mr. T. Cobham, and Signor Ciatatta. Signor Tito Mattei was to have been the pianist; his place, however, was well supplied by Signor Romano, all of whose solos were received with acclamation. Not to dwell minutely upon the evening's work, in which it is scarcely necessary to say Mrs. Talfourd took a distinguished part, we may observe that Signor Gardoni was the hero of the occasion. He sang Prince Poniatowski's "La Margherita," Paladilhe's "La Mandolinata," and (with Mrs. Talfourd) Verdi's "Parigi O cara," being encored or recalled after each with the greatest enthusiasm. So successful a concert has rarely been given in the popular Thanetian resort.

A COMMUNICATION TO MY FRIENDS AS A PREFACE.

By Richard Wagner *

The reason that at present induces me to publish this edition of three of my operatic poems is the fact of my feeling the necessity for explaining the apparent or real contradiction between the poetic quality and artistic structure of the poems, as well as the musical compositions springing from them, and the views and assertions which I recently wrote down, at some length, and shortly—perhaps, simultaneously, with this book—shall submit to publicity under the title of Opera and Drama.

It is my intention to give this explanation in the present Communication, which I prefix, as a preface, to the poems, and address to my friends, because I cannot hope to be understood† by any one except by those who feel a desire, and also the necessity to understand me, and such can only be my friends.

I cannot, however, regard as friends those who proclaim that they like me as an artist, but feel bound to refuse me their sympathy as a man. ‡ If the separation of the artist from the man is something as impossible to imagine as the separation of the soul from the body, and if it is an established fact that an artist could never be loved, and that his art could never be understood, unless—at least unconsciously and involuntarily—he was loved as a man, and unless his life was understood as well as his art, at the present moment even more than ever, when our public art-matters are in so disgraceful a condition, no artist with my views can be loved, and his art in consequence understood, if the understanding of it, and the loving the latter possible, be not founded above all things on sympathy, that is to say, on a co-suffering and co-feeling in the most human part of his life.

But least of all can those be regarded as my friends, who, swayed by the impressions produced through an imperfect acquaintance with what I have done in the way of art, tran-fer whatever is vacillating and uncertain in their own conceptions to the artistic object itself, attributing to its peculiar character things for which the reason is to be found only in their own bewilderment. The position these persons assume towards the artist, and endeavour, with the most laboured expenditure of cunning, to maintain, they call a position of impartial criticism, and, under all circumstances, claim to be the artist's "true friends," properly so-called, while they assert that those who range themselves with perfect sympathy on his side are his real enemies. Our language is so rich in terms, that, after having lost the instinctive comprehension of them, we think we may employ them arbitrarily, and establish distinctions between them. It is thus that, like other terms, "love" and "friendship," are employed. Since my consciousness has grown, I have never been able to imagine, far less feel, friendship without loving; and still more difficult is it for me to make out how modern art-criticism and friendship for the artist criticized could be synonymous.

The artist addresses himself to the feelings, and not to the understanding; if he is answered with the understanding, it is just tantamount to saying that he has not been understood, and our criticism is really nothing but a confession that we do not understand the work of art, which can be comprehended only by means of the feelings—of course of cultivated feelings, not spoilt in the process of enlivation. Whoever feels impelled to furnish testimony of his non-comprehension of the work of art ought reasonably to determine on investigating only one thing, namely—the cause of his being without comprehension. Hereby, he would, at least, certainly get at the nature of the work of art itself, but not till he had become enlightened upon the matters nearest to him, namely—upon the nature of the material semblance in which the work of art appealed to his feelings. If this semblance could not excite or satisfy his feelings, he would be obliged above all things to make an endeavour to obtain an insight into the cause of the manifest incompetence in the work of art, especially into the reasons for the want of harmony between the intention of the artist and the character of the means by which he tried to convey his intentions to the feelings. Only two points could in such a case present themselves to his consideration, namely—whether the means for conveying the impression to the senses corresponded with the artistic intention, and whether this intention itself were really an artistic one. We do not speak here of the works of plastic art, in which the representation, as a technical effort, is the essential creation of the artist; but of the drama, the material embodiment of which only depends upon, and is not realized by, the skill of the poet—as it is in the case of the plastic artist—and which can obtain such a realization only through a peculiar and separate art, the art of dramatic representation. If now a certain and determining impression is not produced upon the feelings of a critical friend, by the material semblance which is here the work of the art of dramatic representation, that friend must, above all things, perceive that the performance was, at any rate, an unsatisfactory one, for the essence of every material representation is that it has to work surely and determiningly upon the feelings. Having recognized the inadequate nature of the means, he would only have to discover on what the incongruity between the intention and the means was founded—whether the intention was of such a kind as to be either unworthy of realization, or generally not adapted for realization by artistic means—or, whether the incongruity depended simply upon the inappropriateness of the means, which, at a definite time, at a definite place, and under definite outwardly given circumstances, proved inadequate for the realization of the definite artistic intention. What a person would have to do here would be, therefore, to understand with complete definiteness an artistic intention, realized only so far as is possible for the limited means at the disposal of the skill of the dramatic poet. But this very comprehension, in conformity with the nature of every artistic intention, cannot be grasped by the pure understanding, but only by the feelings; and, moreover, by feelings cultivated more or less artistically, and which can belong only to those who find themselves in the same position, more or less, with the artist, who are developed under conditions of existence similar to his, and, from the bottom of their nature and heart, so sympathize with him that they are capable of adopting, under certain circumstances, the said intention as their own, and taking a necessary inward interest in the aspirations for its realization.

Such persons can evidently be only the really loving friends of the artist, and not the critic who purposely keeps aloof from him. If the absolute critic looks from his point of view upon the artist, he sees absolutely nothing at all; for precisely that which he is alone capable of seeing, reasonably—nothing. The incompleteness in the semblance of the work of art, he does not, in the first place, perceive where its cause really is; he perceives it at most only in the unsatisfactory impression he has himself experienced, and seeks to justify this by the nature of the artistic intention itself, which intention he was absolutely unable to understand. He has had so much practice in this process that he no longer even once attempts to allow himself to be determined by the material embodiment of the work of art, but believes he may, thanks to his professional experience, content himself with the printed or manuscript books in which the author or the musician—as far as his technical capacity allowed him to do so—has revealed his intention as such, and he so far transfers to this intention his own dissatisfaction—unconsciously felt beforehand—that he imagines it is contained by the intention. While such a position is the worst adapted generally for comprehending the work of art, especially at the present time, it is the only thing which enables the art-criticism of the day to sustain its eminently paper life. But with this—unfortunately also paper—communication of mine I do not appeal to those who feel happy and proud in this position; I reject every mark of their critical friendship for me, because anything I could say to them even about myself or my efforts in art, they would not be able to understand, and that just because they think they must understand everything in the world.

Having thus explained to whom I do not address myself, I have naturally indicated those for whom my communication is intended. They are those who so far sympathize with me as an artist and a man as to be capable of understanding my intentions, which I cannot represent to them in a perfectly satisfactory realization, by material embodiment, because the necessary conditions are wanting in the public art-life of the present day, and with respect to which I can render myself intelligible only to those who have emotions and feelings similar to my own; in a word—to my friends who love me.

* This Communication was prefixed to the books or poems "of Der Fliegende Holländer, Tannhäuser, and Lohengrin."

† I must state here—once for all—that, when, in the course of this Communication, I speak of any one's "understanding me," or "not understanding me," I do not intend to convey the idea of my being too sublime, too profound, or too highly-gifted to be understood; I merely stipulate that the individual who is to understand me shall see me as I really am, and not otherwise, and shall acknowledge as essential in my artistic communications only absolutely that which is asserted in them according to my views and my power of pourtrayal.

‡ In reality, by the way, they understand by the word "man" only a "subject."

Dresden.—Music illustrative of Macbeth was lately performed with success. It is from the pen of Herr Wilhelm Heimsoth.

Cassel.—The Orchestra at the Theatre Royal have announced a series of Subscription Concerts. The programme of the first concert contained: Symphony, G minor, Mozart; Recitativo and Arie from Faust, Spohr (Madame Soltaus); Concerto for Violoncello, Taubert (Herr Friedrich) Grützmacher); Concert Overture, A major, Rietz; Songs, Schumann, Schubert (Madame Soltaus); Sonata for Violoncello, Beccherini (Herr Grützmacher); Overture, "Im Hochlande," Gade.

JULLIEN.

(From the "Choir.")

This celebrated composer of dance music was the son of Antonio Jullien, band-master of the Cent Suisses in the revolution of 1789. Upon the massacre of his regiment at the Louvre, he emigrated to Rome, where, attaching himself to the body guard of the Pope, he formed an alliance with an Italian lady of some distinction. Some time after the union M. Jullien determined on revisiting France, and while on the journey, in the French Alps, on the 23rd 1812, at a chalet near Susterou, young Jullien was born. The intervention of circumstances altered the original intention of proceeding to France, and the family remained at Susteron amid the wild solitudes of the Alps. Here Antonio taught singing, and his little son, with an intuitive genius for music, it is said, learned the solfeggios from casually hearing them several times, so as to be able to repeat them with astonishing precision and fluency. His father, surprised and delighted at this wonderful power of acquirement, cultivated his infant voice, taught him a number of pleasing French and Italian songs, and gave concerts in the most important towns of the south of France, where the child was regarded, in all the fondness of public enthusiasm, as le petit phénomène. At the age of five, doubtless from the too premature exercise of a delicate organ, he lost his voice, and returning to his mountain home, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of the violin, on which instrument he displayed so much skill as to induce his father to project a series of concerts in the principal Italian cities, where he met with universal favour. On one occasion, after performing the difficult variations of Rode at the Teatro Reale at Turin, he was lifted from the stage into the Queen's box by command, to receive the royal marks of gratification and delight. This incident brought him into great favour with the court, and for a whole season he was the caressed of the Sardinian noblesse. Whilst sojourning for professional purposes at Marseilles, his father met the Admiral de Bigny, then commander of the squadron of the Levant, who induced him to abandon his musical pursuits and enter his service. This strange mutation in their affairs of life led to father and son remaining in the French navy for three years, both being present at the Battle of Navarina, in 1827. Returning to France at the end of this time, young Jullien, inspired with a passion for heroism, enlisted as a soldier, and for six months bore the drudgery of a musket in the 54th regiment of infantry. But this dull routine of stringent discipline was ill-adapted to the temper and restless genius of our hero. His regiment being ordered to Brianson on the Piedmontese frontier, he deserted for the purpose of visiting his father, then living at Turin, whom he had not seen for several years. Returning to the quarters at night in a deep snow, he scaled the walls of the ramparts, and seeking the colonel in command, sued for clemency at his hands. The officer was, it seems, was a benevolent man, had seen his story, understood the filial love of the young soldier, interceded, and thus saved him from the fate of ignominy and death. His father, shortly after this occurrence, purchased his discharge, and with the secret love of the musical art burning in his soul, young Jullien set out on foot, and walked to Paris, determined, if possible, to enter the Conservatoire. Firm will and indomitable energy overcame every obstacle, and in less than six months after his arrival, he was entered as an élève in that institution. On retiring from this establishment, Jullien received the appointment of director of the concerts at the Champs Elysées, and the balls of the Academie Royale. In this position he soon became unconsciously before the public of the French capital, and a well-earned popularity induced him to lease the hotel of the Duke of Padua, which he converted into a gray salle for balls and concerts, that long were the rage of Paris. So successful was his initial introduction of the Italian opera into France, that several managers of the leading theatres formed a clique to subvert the efforts of the devoted entrepreneur, the end of which was, that the year 1839 drove him to England. He commenced his excellent promenade concerts at Drury Lane Theatre, at the same period, and from that time until 1859, his brilliant festivals created, not only in London, but throughout the United Kingdom, the most enthusiastic feelings of interest among all classes. Amid the vivacity of his ad captandum levities, Jullien never lost sight of the sterling and beautiful compositions of the great masters. In this respect he may be said to have educated the public at large, familiarising by degrees the general ear with a class of music that formerly was confined to the sympathies and appreciation of the select few. This popularization of the works of such authors as Beethoven, Mozart, and Mendelssohn, is an achievement in itself worthy of conferring honour on Jullien, who undeniably had the public taste to a considerable extent, under his direction. With a laudable desire to establish in London an English opera, he organized in 1847 a troupe of artists of celebrity, and produced a series of works in a style of splendour, unprecedented in the annals of the English lyric stage. But this effort, like many others of a similar nature, was ill requited; and at the end of the season the manager found himself loser of an enormous sum, the results of at least ten years of active professional labour. It was during this time that he introduced to the English public in opera Mr. Sims Reeves, whose fine voice had attracted his attention in Italy. M. Jullien's most ambitious work was the opera of Pietro il Grande, produced in 1853, at the Operahouse, Covent Garden. Its production was characterized by a magnificence and splendour of ensemble, rarely witnessed even at the first Operahouse of the metropolis; but in spite of the show it did not succeed. M. Jullien was not quite up to the mark in writing a grand opera. To enumerate his smaller works—his "waifs and strays" of music—would be like naming the leaves of the forest. They have been taken into custody by the world, and many have become "household sounds." If Jullien passed the greater part of his life in gilded salons, surrounded by dance and revelry, his end showed a fearful reverse. Confined for debt in a French prison, he breathed his last amidst poverty and wretchedness, at the beginning of the year 1860. Poor Jullien deserved a better fate! He was a simple, kind-hearted, honourable man, wishing well to everybody. Had he put less trust in his fellow-men, he might have prospered in the world's affairs, and still have been amongst us. E. CRYSTAL PALACE.

The following scheme was placed before a crowded audience at the concert given on Saturday, the 3rd inst:—

PROGRAMME.—1. Overture (Egmont), Beethoven. 2. Rondo, "Non più mesta" (Cenerentola), Rossini; Mdlle. Scalchi. 3. Concerto, No. 1, C, Beethoven; Herr Pauer. 4. Scena, "How many hired servants" (Prodigal), Sullivan; Mr. Sims Reeves. 5. Canzone, "Fanciulle" (Dinorah), Meyerbeer; Mdlle. Scalchi. 6. Symphony No. 8, in F, Beethoven. 7. "Liederkreis" (a series of six songs), Beethoven; Mr. Sims Reeves. 8. Pianoforte solo, Rondo in E flat (Op. 62), Weber; Herr Pauer. 9. Overture to Schiller's Demetrius, Hiller.

With regard to the Egmont overture—a work needing no description, performed in a manner beyond reproach—we must congratulate the able amanuensis of "G." on having accepted the true theory of so-called "programme-music." He says:—"Surely the aim of orchestral music is not to give a definite picture of each personage and each event in a story—pictures which, however well executed, no two hearers will agree about—but to pourtray the general emotions excited, and bring the audience into the same frame of mind as that with which the contemplation of the theme inspired the composer." This is precisely the idea for which we contended when "G." was busy with minute interpretations, and trying to discover a special meaning in things to which the composer attached no special meaning at all. It is needless to say that we welcome so valuable and influential an ally. The pianoforte concerto in C can hardly complain of injustice in that it rarely gets a hearing. Beautiful it is, no doubt; but not with the distinctive beauty of the illustrious musician whose name it bears. The work is almost wholly a reflection of Mozart; and amateurs may well be excused if they prefer to receive Mozartian ideas direct rather than through a medium. Herr Pauer played in the vigorous style for which he is noted. A better performance than that of the symphony No. 8 it would be vain to wish; nor could the greatest stickler for Beethoven reasonably desire the work to have a more flattering reception. As a matter of course, the charming Allegretto Scherzando was encored and heartily, and a second time with even increased delight. What need is there to tell how Mr. Sims Reeves sang the Liederkreis? He has on former occasions enchanted every listener by his exquisite rendering of these exquisite songs; above all, by his profoundly artistic perception and expression of their varied sentiment. He did not lose well on Saturday; and was materially helped by the tasteful accompaniment of Mr. Arthur Sullivan. With regard to the extra-Beethoven selections we have only to say that few words need be wasted upon the new overture by Herr Hiller. For our own part, we decline to waste any at all.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

At the public rehearsal on Tuesday afternoon the first and second parts of J. S. Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" (Weihnachts Oratorium) was tried, for the first time (more shame for us) in England. The solos were entrusted to Misses Maudsley and Marion Severn, Messrs. Shakspeare, Howells, Wedmore, and Parry. This music is very difficult, and when we say that the principal singers did their parts well and that the choruses went for the most part fairly, enough has been said to prove at least the industry and earnest good will of the young artists. The orchestra was not quite at all that could be wished, or all that might be easily effected with further and diligent preliminary practice. Nevertheless, it was interesting to hear a work so little known, proceeding from so great a man as Bach; and we trust the Academicians may persevere till they have mastered it. Mr. John Hullah directed the performance.

In the second part we had Hummel's Retour à Londres, played by Miss Bairnsfather, a promising young pianist; an air from Meyerbeer's Crociato, in which Miss Rebecca Jewell was very successful; the last two movements of Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in C, by Miss C. Gardener, who shone to most advantage in the allegro scherzando; and the fine sestet from Mozart's Così fan tutte, extremely well sung by Misses Goode, Pocklington, and Rebecca Jewell, Messrs. Guy, Wadmore, and Parry. Mr. Hullah seems to take these rehearsals con amore, and has infused unwonted spirit into them—which becomes him thoroughly, as an old Academician.

ROSSINI'S MESSE SOLENNELLE.

The Franco-Prussian war has wrought out many unexpected results, not the least interesting being the apparent transfer to our metropolis of Parisian musical society. Prince Poniatowski issues his songs from the shop of a West-end publisher; M. Gounod holds weekly receptions near the Regent's Park and accompanies his own melodies to the singing of M. Faure, in St. James's Hall; M. Pasdeloup, of Cirque Napoléon fame, addresses letters to a musical contemporary from Brompton; and there only needs, to complete the picture, M. Auber, trotting through Hanover Square on his way to our English Conservatory, after finishing a new work for our Opéra Comique. Wanting the illustrious composer of Mozaniello we have had the illustrious contralto who, years ago, filled so large a space on the stage of our lyric theatres, and since her retirement, has been kept well in mind by force of contrast with those who have essayed to fill the vacated place. When it was announced that Madame Alboni sought refuge in England from the storms of war, few expected that she would break in upon the otium cum dignitate earned by so many years of conscientious and successful work. So it has turned out, nevertheless, thanks to the good luck which persistently waits upon Mr. Mapleson's efforts; and on Wednesday week we saw the reappearance in an English concert-room of a great artist erst a prime favourite with the English public. The circumstances were peculiarly appropriate, the work performed being Rossini's Messe Solennelle, which, as few need to be told, was written expressly with a view to Madame Alboni's co-operation. No wonder, therefore, that St. James's Hall was crowded by a brilliant audience, and that expectation stood on tiptoe. It is needless to say that when Madame Alboni appeared, in company with Mdlle. Tietjens, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Foli, she was received with the heartiest demonstrations of welcome; after which the first tones of her admirable voice were eagerly awaited. They came with the "Kyrie;" but neither in that movement, nor in the "Gloria" and "Gratias agimus," did Madame Alboni satisfy probably over-strained expectations. No real effect was made in the lovely duet, "Qui tollis" (sung with Mdlle. Tietjens), and, above all, in the still more lovely "Agnus Dei." Time has effected the artist's once glorious voice beyond dispute; but enough is left to justify a great reputation, while the artist herself remains untouched; for proof of which there needed only the passionate emphasis and unaffected pathos that made her delivery of "Agnus Dei" a thing to be remembered. Madame Alboni received an "ovation" on retiring, and another still more demonstrative when she reappeared in answer to prolonged applause. There only remains to add that Mdlle. Tietjens sang the "Cruciftxus" in irreproachable style; that Mr. Sims Reeves delivered "Domine Deus" with that apt expression which seems, in his case, the result of unerring instinct; and that Mr. Nordblom and Signor Foli each did good service. Mr. Henry Leslie conducted; the choruses being well rendered by his famous choir, to the accompaniment of Mr. J. G. Callcott (pianoforte), Mr. J. C. Ward (harmonium), Mdlles. Jansen and Waldteufel (harp).

A miscellaneous selection followed the Messe Solennelle, but nothing was done calling for special remark.

BADEN.—Madame Jeanne Pohl, formerly Mdlle. Eyth, who enjoyed a high reputation as a lyrique, died here on the 23rd November. She was the wife of Herr R. Pohl, the writer on music.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—At the third Museums-Concert, Herr Carl Reinecke, of Leipsic, made his appearances here in a three-fold capacity—namely, as composer, pianist, and conductor. The orchestra performed his new "Festouverture," and he himself his Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor. Neither is a work of genius, but both display talent, and were favourably received. In addition to the above, Herr Reinecke played Mendelssohn's Lied ohne Worte (No. 1, E major); "Marcia giocoso," by Heller; and "Am Springbrunnen," by Schumann. He was encored in the s-cond. The concert began with Schumann's Fourth Symphony, in D minor.—Handel's Joshua was executed at the first Subscription Concert of the Cecilia Association.

BRUNN.—The grand concert, given by the members of the Musikverein, in honour of the Beethoven Centenary, was highly successful, being attended by amateurs and professionals, from all parts of Moravia, anxious to testify their veneration for the mighty master. The programme contained, as a matter of course, only works by Beethoven. It commenced with the Egmont overture, finely played by the orchestra. Then came a prologue, written for the occasion, by Dr. Ludwig Goldbaum. The third number was the "Elegischer Gesang," for chorus and stringed instruments. Then followed the songs: "Neue Liebe, neues Leben," and "Die Wonne der Wehmuth," the vocalist being Mad. Marie Wilt. The second part of the programme was extensively taken up by the Ninth Symphony.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Here is the programme of the fifth Beethoven concert given on Monday last:—

PART I.—Quintet in C major, for strings. Songs—"Ich liebe dich, "Mit einer gemahlten Band," "Kennst du das land." Pastoral Sonata in D major (Op. 28).

PART II.—Sonata in G minor (Op. 5), piano and violoncello. Songs—"The Lass of Inverness," "The Sweetest Lad was Jamie." Trio in G major (Op. 1), piano, violin, and violoncello.

The second and last of Beethoven's quintets is chiefly remarkable for its finale, a movement of singular construction, and of bewitching beauty, as well as open, so says M. Lenz, to at least twenty interpretations. Otherwise the work, though masterly and interesting, does not claim to rank among its composer's specially distinctive effusions. It is a favourite at these concerts, having now been played sixteen times; and there are reasons in plenty to account for the result, though we need not go beyond the fact that the quintet can be "understanded of the people." Its performance (led by Herr Straus, who has succeeded Madame Norman-Neruda in the first violinist's chair), gave much satisfaction and was warmly applauded. Madame Arabella Goddard was again the pianist, this time doing a larger share of the work owing to the absence of a quartet in the second part. Madame Goddard played the beautiful and ever-welcome Pastoral with an unaffected simplicity of style admirably in keeping with the subject, also, with a faultless precision and a rigid adherence to the composer's intention deserving the highest praise. How delightedly the audience followed her faithful interpretation of Beethoven's well known music was evinced by the unanimous applause and recall which rewarded the artist's labour. The sonata in G minor gave occasion for another exercise of triumph, as did, scarcely less, the final trio. In short, the concert was remarkable for the complete manner in which its principal selections were rendered. Herr Stockhausen gave the songs in his usual earnest manner.

MARIE KREBS IN AMERICA.

A recent performance by the young German pianist, first introduced to the English public at the late Alfred Mellon's concerts, is thus noticed in Watson's Art Journal:—

"Miss Marie Krebs' concert was one of the most delightful that we have attended for a long time. Miss Krebs had not only ably vied for herself, for she tilted against all the schools, and came off victorious. The whole of the Mendelssohn Trio, Op. 49, was beautifully played, and the efforts of Miss Krebs were most ably sustained by Messrs. Hamm and Werner. The Preludium and Fugue, of Bach, displayed the perfect technique of Miss Krebs to the greatest advantage, while, at the same time, it showed her intellectual grasp of this form of composition. The subjects were given out clearly and firmly, and the answers were pointedly defined, so that the fugue appeared simple and easy to be comprehended. The perfect equality of her fingers, and her nice sense of balance in the parts, enables her to individualise each part, while subordinating each to the scheme of the whole. It was a brilliant effort of pianism, and deserved the applause it received. Her most perfect performance was, perhaps, the Sonate Characteristique. In this all the fine points were displayed, whether of execution, taste, or intelligence. She had not only mastered the technical difficulties, but had fully grasped the sentiment. Her phrasing is admirable, not merely on account of its intelligent accuracy, but for its freedom from lameness and its beautiful sentiment. We have rarely, if ever, heard a more intellectual and sympathetic interpretation of this work, and we can think of no point on which it could be improved. Miss Krebs has fully established her position among the leading pianists of the day. We know no one better adapted to render a series of pianoforte recitals attractive and interesting than this young artist, for her interpretations of every school are distinguished by a rare appreciation of the broad characteristics and the deep inner sentiments of each."

COLLEGE OF MUSICIANS.

The third and last of the series of chamber concerts was given at Shaftesbury Hall, City, on Saturday evening, 10th inst., when the hall was quite filled. Madame Gilbert sang "Angels ever Bright and Fair" (Handel), "Dove Sono" (Mozart), and "Rose softly blooming" (Spohr), receiving a hearty encore for the latter. Mr. Davis and Mrs. Mullen played "Duo for Flute and Pianoforte" (Hummel). Miss Carter received a recall for her pleasing rendering of "Voi che sapete" (Mozart). The quartets for female voices, "La Carita" (Rossini), and "The Guardian Angel" (Gounod), were sung by the Misses Elder, Carter, and Joyce, and Mrs. Mullen. The last named lady also played Tarantella in C minor (Mullen), which was unanimously redemanded. Mr Carter sang "Pro peccatis" (Rossini), and Mr. Mullen gave "Oh, thou, my Beauteous" (Wagner). Several duets, in which Misses Elder and Carter, and Messrs. Filby and Mullen took part, were well sung. Dr. Bennett Gilbert, Mr. Alfred Mullen, and Mr. W. C. Filby accompanied.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1870-71.

DIRECTOR—MR. S. ARTHUR CHAPPELL.

THE BEETHOVEN CONCERTS.

The present year being the Centennial Anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, the Director has thought that it would be a fitting tribute of respect to the memory of that Immortal genius to combine the programmes before Christmas exclusively to Selections from his Instrumental and Vocal Works. Every concert, until the end of the year, will therefore be a Beethoven Concert. In the course of the series, the Six Quartets, Op. 18; the Three Quartets (Rasoumowsky), Op. 59; the Quartet, No. 10 (E flat); the five Trios for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello; and as many of the Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violin, Pianoforte and Violoncello, and Pianoforte alone, as can be comprised within the limits of eight programmes, will be given. The Vocal Music will in all instances be selected from the Chamber Songs, with Pianoforte Accompaniment.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

N.B.—The Entrance to the Orchestra will, in future, be by the door in Piccadilly Place only.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Hic Hæc.—Hock.

G. H. P. (Liverpool).—Too late for this week.

Anaximander Solomon Hogg.—No. Beethoven was only fifty-seven when he died. The English composer mentioned in one of his letters is Mr. Cipriani Potter, happily still living. In his other suppositions Mr. Hogg is correct.

Horace Mayhew.—In autumn come medlars. Suspicions amongst thoughts are like bats amongst birds; they ever fly by twilight. In autumn come medlars.

Thomas Hiss Adder.—M. Gounod's opera, Sappho, was produced at the Royal Italian Opera in 1851. Madame Viardot-Garcia, Madame Castellan and Signor Tamberlik were in the cast, the minor characters being sustained by Signors Marulli, Rommi, Soldi, and Polonini. Signor Tamberlik first appeared in London at the same theatre, as Manuriello, in 1849. In 1851 Fidelio was played both at Her Majesty's and the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Lumley's heroine was Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, Mr. Gye's being Madame Castellan.

DEATH.

On December 7, at Talbot Road, Bayswater, Stephen Glover, Esq., aged 68.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1870.

GET UNDER THE BUSHEL.

WHAT a much-needed piece of advice is wrapped up in the above four words! There was a time—we know it on high authority—when men, having lit a candle, never put it under a bushel, but instead thereof, set it on a hill, that the glimmer might travel far and wide. The habit was an exceedingly proper one; and showed a determination to be philanthropic, without regard to the market-price of tallow. A candle, moreover, is a respectable light, whether it be the plebeian "dip" or the aristocratic "wax;" and he who buries it in a dark place ranks, after his degree, among the benefactors of our species. But, in the times now present, we improve upon those that are past. So eager is the desire to have a place among illuminators that many mistaken folks are sticking up their farthing rushlights on every little eminence, and that in the glare of the summer sun; a most sinful waste of energy and fat. We see the operation going on all around us in every department of life. There are political burners of mid-day rushlights; there are rushlights social, scientific, philosophical, and—which concerns us most—there are rushlights artistic. The last named are poor spluttering things, illuminating nothing, and guilty of evil smells; yet, they are kindled with no less confidence in their efficiency than those which burn before the favourite shrines of the Breton peasant. How we wish somebody would put them all under a bushel. Nobody would suffer in consequence; and their united rays might cheer and warm the bushel.

Specially apply the foregoing, most sympathizing reader, to an institution called the "Civil Service Musical Society," which will persist in ignoring its proper and limited sphere. If the Civil Servants would stay under the bushel, well and good; their privacy would be sacred; and they might indulge shining propensities to their heart's content. But "the last infirmity of noble minds" possess them. They desire a larger area; they want to be on a hill, that men may wonder and admire. Hence, as we all know, the "Civil Service Musical Society" takes St. James's Hall—the home of the Monday Popular Concerts, by the way—and its members disport themselves, from time to time, in presence of thousands who may admire or not. But some one says,—"The assemblage, though large, is private; admission being complimentary." If this were so—if the Civil Service rushlight were in its proper place—we should abstain from criticism; but, on the contrary, certain reporters are invited; and, we need hardly say, that where the public press goes, privacy cannot be. So feeble, however, is the glimmer of Civil Service talent, that not even friendly prints can praise it. Take, for example, an extract from the last number of the Choir, which gives a special report of the Society's recent concert:—

"The performance was very much inferior to the previous concerts. The defect which we noticed in the band on the last occasion, the comparative weakness of the strings, has been altered as regards quantity, but at such an expense in quality that Mr. Foster would have done better to have left it as it was. A great number of those gentlemen, particularly among the second violins, appeared to be either devoid of all idea of time, or else wilfully regardless of the conductor's beat, so that the result was at times absolutely excruciating. It is not too much to say we heard two or three of the worst performances it ever was our misfortune to hear in a concert room. The overture to Masaniello was a decided failure. In addition to the defects in time before mentioned, the band was badly out of tune. Concerning the overture to Der Freischütz the less said the better, although it was the best performance of the band throughout the concert. The band drove everyone away with the Cornelius March, of which it is sufficient to say that it was going so badly that Mr. Foster was forced to stop and commence afresh! We sincerely hope that before the next concert the band may be either weeded of its unruly members, or reduced to a proper state of discipline, so as to avoid such an exhibition as that on Monday last."

Digitized by Google

We need add nothing to the above remarks, unless it be an expression of hope that, after such an "extinguisher," the Civil Service "rush" will be put under the bushel for good and all.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Benedict's oratorio, St. Peter, so successful at the Birmingham Festival, for which it had been expressly written, was performed as St. James's Hall, under the composer's own direction, and received with every mark of favour. The chorus was that of Mr. Barnby's admirably trained Choir; the orchestra, with Mr. Carrodus as leading violin, was in every respect highly efficient, and the chief solo vocal parts were entrusted to Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Patey-Whytock, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Stockhausen (Mr. Raynham taking some of the less important tenor music). A more powerful "cast" could scarcely have been desired by Mr. Benedict himself, who at the end of the oratorio was enthusiastically cheered. We shall return to the subject of St. Peter, which is unquestionably one of the serious works of most distinction bequeathed to the musical art in recent years.

Last night, the occasion being the eve of the anniversary of Beethoven's natal day, the Sacred Harmonic Society were to perform his Mass in C and his oratorio, The Mount of Olives. Full particulars in our next number.

Monsieur Gounod honoured Mr. Waterson and the band of the 1st Life Guards with a visit to their practice-room at Knightsbridge Barracks, on Tuesday, 13th inst., when they played the following selection of music:—

La Reine de Saba (Gounod); Danse Bohémienne, La Nonne Sanglante (Gounod); Selection, Faust (Gounod); Ballet Music, La Nonne Sanglante (Gounod); Overture, Oberon (Weber); and Marche aux Flambeaux (Meyerbeer).

M. Gounod was pleased to express his admiration of the manner in which this programme was performed.—(Communicated.)

That band of rougha called the Partida de la Porra has been again at work at a small theatre in Madrid, where a farce, Marcaroni I., ridiculing the Duke of Aosta and the principal men in power, was being acted for about the 24th time. The manager, aware that there was to be a row that evening, had applied to the Alcalde, who promised to send policemen to avoid a disturbance. As soon as the first act began, about thirty armed with sticks, knives, and revolvers, attacked the house, pelting the actors, and destroying the scenery, stalls, &c. The confusion was immense, the exit from the theatre being difficult. Neither authorities nor policemen were at hand. These criminals will remain—not undiscovered, for everybody knows them—but unpunished. The manager of another theatre, aware that he was to be favoured by a similar visit, hired another gang to oppose to the "Partida de la Porra." The effect was complete. The play went off quietly. The latter scandal is the greater in that it was witnessed by respectable people, the minor theatres at Madrid being frequented by a different sort from those in Paris.

The Leeds Critic, a journal of some water (on the brain), contains the subjoine l unexampled critique on a recent performance of the Anemoic Society:—

"At the Town Hall on Saturday night, Dr. Spark had provided a rare treat for all lovers of first-class music. The Anemoic Union, consisting of five of the most talented players upon wind-instruments, gave a performance which was both excellent and unique. The members of the Union were assisted by Mr. William Shakspeare, pianist, and Madame Thaddeus Wells, whose vocal powers are of the highest order. The Programme included pieces which combined the full powers both of the Union, Pianoforte, Organ, and in these instances the effects were no less pleasing than powerful. The Quartett, 'Naaman' was performed by the Union with extreme felicity; the light and shade of the piece being tuned to perfection; and the 'Meditation sur Faust,' arranged for Piano, Organ, Clarionet, and Bassoon, was a performance entitled to the highest praise. An instrumental Solo was played on the Clarionet by Mr. Sagarus, on the Horn by Mr. Mann, and on the pianoforte by Mr. Shakspeare, and each performer received his well-merited meed of applause. Madame Wells, who possesses a full note Soprano voice, sang Weber's beautiful Romance, 'When the gentle Eve descending,' with excellent feeling, and received an encore; but the really brilliant powers of this gifted vocalist appeared in a trying Aria, 'Horatius Aglmus,' which was faultlessly rendered. Madame Wells also sang a French Aria, 'La Fauvette,' and the Old English Song, 'Come, lasses and lads.' The audience was not so large as might have been expected from the character of the programme, and the performance itself proved somewhat too long for the patience of its patrons."

We shall feel grateful to Dr. Spark if he will be good enough to send us a copy of the Leeds Critic weekly. By the way, who is Mr. Sagarus?—and what has become of Mr. Lazarus?

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

What has been, probably, the most successful of Mr. Mapleson's "short winter seasons" terminated on Saturday night. The opera was the Huguenots, there was a crowded house, and among the audience were the Prince and Princess of Wales. It is unnecessary to say more about the performance than that the life and soul of it was Mdlle. Tietjens, whose Valentine, the best since Mdme. Viardot's (Sophie Cruvelli never having been heard in London), will always carry with it more than ordinary interest, if only because it was as the heroine of Meyerbeer's greatest opera that Mdlle. Tietjens first appeared before an English audience in 1858, near the close of the memorable reign of Mr. Lumley. The other chief parts were filled by Signor Vizzani (Raoul), for whom, not without valid reason, a printed apology was circulated; Signor Tagliafico (Nevers), Signor Caravoglia (St. Bris), Signor Antonucci (Marcel), Mdlle. Scalchi (Urbain), and Mdme. Sinico (the Queen). Signor Arditi was the conductor.

In the course of the series of performances—which commenced on the 31st of October with Il Flauto Magico, and ended on Saturday night with the Huguenots—Mr. Mapleson has supplied those amateurs of Italian opera who remain in London during the winter season, as well as the vast number of "provincials" and foreigners who select this period of the year for visiting the capital, with a variety of entertainments to meet all tastes. We have had operas "classical"—like the Flauto Magico, Don Giovanni, and Nozze di Figaro of Mozart, the Fidelio of Beethoven, the Medea of Cherubini, the Barbiere and Semiramide of Rossini; "semi-classical"—like the Oberon and Der Freischütz of Weber, the Huguenots and Robert of Meyerbeer; and what may be conventionally termed "popular"—such as the Lucia and Lucrezia Borgia of Donizetti, the Norma of Bellini, the Faust of M. Gounod, the Trovatore and Traviata of Verdi. What sort of company Mr. Mapleson has had at disposal, what orchestra and what chorus, what means of placing the various works we have enumerated upon the stage, with more or less propriety, and, it may be almost said, à l'improviste, need not again be stated. He has had two musical directors, the chief of whom, Signor Arditi, as thoroughly well versed in the operatic repertory, stands nearest of contemporary orchestral conductors to Sir Michael Costa; and he has had, in Mr. Augustus Harris, a stage manager who, let no matter what material he placed before him, would, with his long experience and singular ability, make more or less of a good show. That there has been nothing new in the way of scenery and decoration it is nothing new to say. Such is the rule, not the exception, in these out-of-season operatic representations, the reduced prices of admission to which would scarcely admit of extra outlay. But for those who care about music of the kind to which we are chiefly accustomed at the Italian Opera, and care little or nothing about say-thing else, Mr. Mapleson has certainly been a liberal and successful caterer. His principal artists have been especially good, and one of them, the most indefatigable, especially great. We naturally refer to Mdlle. Tietjens, who in the course of less than six weeks has supported, and supported admirably, such a variety of characters as, it may safely be affirmed, is, under similar circumstances, almost without precedent. Pamina (Il Flauto Magico), Lucrezia Borgia, Leonora (Il Trovatore), Reiza (Oberon), Norma, Donna Anna, Fidelio, Countess Almaviva (Le Nozze), Semiramide, Valentine, Agatha (Der Freischütz), and last, and greatest of all, Medea, have been successively represented by Mdlle. Tietjens within this brief period of time. It is rare to meet with an artist who has so wide a repertory at command; still rarer to find one equal to the adequate embodiment of character after character. Such, nevertheless, is Mdlle. Tietjens, whose Fidelio and Medea, unsatisfactory as in more than one respect were the performances of the masterpieces of Beethoven and Cherubini, would of themselves have sufficed to make this winter season noticeable. But take away Mdme. Sinico (always well prepared) and Signor Gardoni from the one, or Mdme. Sinico alone from the other, and it must be admitted that Mdlle. Tietjens was but indifferently supported.

The contralto parts, represented by Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini and Mdlle. Scalchi —the first incomparably the greater artist, although the last possessed the voice of richest quality—have left little to desire. Mdme. Trebelli, however, would do wisely not again to meddle with Zerlina. To transpose Mozart's music is simply to spoil it.

The only soprano who, on account of exceptional means, can be placed side by side with Mdlle. Tietjens, left for Moscow after the first performance of the season. We refer to Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, whose execution of the arduous and difficult music which Mozart has put into the mouth of the Queen of Night (Die Zauberflöte) is something apart and phenomenal. Mdlle. Scalchi—whose recent performances in Lucia and the Traviata, not to speak of Zerlina (Don Giovanni), the traditions of which seem as yet unfamiliar to her, have given a pleasant variety to the season—took the place of Mdlle. di Murska, longo intervallo, as the Queen of Night. Of the tenors little need be said. Signor Gardoni, one of the few remaining masters of the genuine Italian style, can, with the readiness and skill of a true artist, easily accommodate himself to both French and German music—witness, to cite a single instance, his excellent performance as Florestan in Fidelio. Signor Bettini as a "utility tenor," ready at any emergency, whether as Almaviva, Otello, or Raoul di Nangis may be wanting, is invaluable. Signor Fancelli does not progress as might be desired; nor should he by any amount of persuasion again be induced to attempt such a part as that of Assur in Medea, for which he is utterly unsuited. Equally out of his element was Signor Vizzani, Mr. Gye's new tenor, as Don Ottavio (Don Giovanni), the music of which character is beyond his resources. Among the baritones and basses, whose name is legion, may be singled out Signor Cotogni, who's facility is remarkable, and who, whether in comic or in serious opera, invariably does much which not only extorts praise but gives hopes of something still better. Now that Mr. Santley has temporarily retired from the Italian operatic stage, a more capable substitute than Signor Cotogni could not easily be found. Signor Cotogni has neither the voice nor the style of our great English baritone; but he seems to possess all Mr. Santley's versatility and very much of Mr. Santley's diligence and earnestness. From the artist who can play Hamlet and Figaro, and both with credit, no little may reasonably be expected. Signor Antonucci, faute de mieux, has filled some principal bass parts, and occasionally it must be allowed, in a very satisfactory manner; Signor Ciampi has exhibited his acentsomed "dry humour" (whatever, Signor Ciampi taken into account, that may mean), as Dr. Bartolo (the Barbiere), and other characters; while Signor Tagliafico, as of old, has proved equal to any task assigned to him—from that of swearing the preposterous hat of Don Basilio to that of breaking across his knees into two equal pieces the sword of the chivalrous and disinterested Nevers. Signor Foli has appeared less frequently than might have been desired, but always giving a certain weight to the ensemble.

Two new comers, Mdlle. Léon Duval (a Frenchwoman) and Mdlle. Corani (an Irishwoman) have made favourable if not very lively impressions—the former as Rosina and Margaret, the latter as Alice (Robert le Diable). Both ladies were previously known in London, as concert-singers; and both have very recently sung at the Crystal Palace Concerts. It is to be hoped that of both good may come. We are sadly in want of new singers.

On the whole, this winter season, allowing for many (some inevitable) deficiencies, has been satisfactory; and considering that, under the circumstances, no such entertainments could possibly be provided elsewhere, the admirers Italian opera have reason to be thankful to Mr. Mapleson for his spirited enterprise at Covent Garden Theatre.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

TEDDINGTON.—A "grand concert," in aid of the Night Schools, under the direction of Herr Schuberth, director of the Schubert Society, took place at the Clarence Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday, 6th inst.

PART I. Grand Trio, Mendelssohn; pianoforte (Mr. Henry Parker,) violin (Herr Ludwig), and violoncello (Herr Schuberth). Song, "The Vagabond," Molloy (Mr. Frank Massey). Cavatina, "Soave Immagine," Mercadante (Mdlle. Romanelli). Solo Pianoforte, Study, E flat major, Thalberg. Polacca Brillante, in C, M. Weber (Miss Lucy MacManus). Recit. and Air (Lurline) "Home of my heart," Wallace (Mr. Stedman). Air, "O dolce mio tesor," Pinsuti (Miss Amy Strangways). Part Song, "When evening's twilight," Hatton (the Standard Quartett). Solo Violoncello, "Ave Maria" (by desire), Schubert (Herr Schuberth). Ballad, "The Birds were telling one another," Smart (Mdlle. Romanelli). Duet, "One Word," Nicolai (Miss Amy Strangways and Mr. Stedman).

PART II.—Glee, "Crabbed age and youth," Stevens (the Standard Quartett). Solo Violin, Adagio (5th Concerto), Spohr; Perpetuo Mobile, Paganini (Herr Ludwig). Song, "Thaddy O'Flinn, Molloy (Miss Amy Strangways). Glee, "Integer Vitæ," Fleming (the Standard Quartett). Solo Pianoforte, "The Fairy Harp," Romance, H. Parker; "An revoir," Gabiot de Concert (Mr. Henry Parker). Song, "The Village Blacksmith," Weiss (Mr. Frank Massey.) Scotch Song," What's a' the steer, Kimmer?" (Mdlle. Romanelli). Song, "The Anchor's weighed," Braham (Mr. Stedman). Solo Violoncello, "Fantasia on Russian Airs," Schuberth (Herr Schuberth). Humorous Song, "Over the Way," Tom Hood (Mr. Carr Travers). Glee, "Hunter's Farewell," Mendelssohn (the Standard Quartett). Finale, "God Save the Queen."

The rooms were very full, and the concert was a great success.

A NUMEROUS audience attended the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday week, to welcome Miss Poole, who-e benefit concert took place upon the occasion. It was a revival of pleasant memories to hear Miss Poole once more singing the pretty song we remember so well in Wallace's Maritana. Very hearty applause followed "Alas! those chimes," and when, later in the evening, Miss Poole sang "Be sure to call as you pass by," and her favourite ballad, "The Cavalier," a most unanimous encore was awarded to the latter. It was given in the true spirit of ballad singing. Every word was distinct, and a dramatic feeling was imparted which many singers do not understand, or are too indolent to employ. We hope that Miss Poole derived as much advantage from her concert as her merits, character, and services, warranted her in expecting.

THIS evening Mr. Mapleson celebrates the anniversary of Beethoven's birth with a performance of Fidelio (Leonora, Mdlle. Tietjens), at the Royal Italian Opera.

AT to-day's Saturday Popular Concert the programme (see our advertisement) is wholly devoted to the music of Beethoven; and this, with the exception of two songs by Schumann—why introduced on such an occasion Heaven only knows!—will be equally the case on the Monday Popular Concert of the 19th—the last before Christmas.

AT the twelfth concert of the Crystal Palace, to-day (Beethoven's birthday), the Beethoven pieces are the overture to Prometheus, the Choral Fantasia, the 32 Variations on an Original Theme in C minor, the Choral Symphony, and a number of vocal pieces, including the "Canon to Mädzel." The pianist is Mdme. Arabella Goddard; the principal singers are Miss Arabella Smythe, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Herr Stockhausen.

COBURG.—The prelude to Herr A. Lange's opera of Dornröschen (the Sleeping Beauty) has been successfully produced at the Court Theatre. The opera itself is in rehearsal at another and larger theatre.

COLOGNE.—Soirée of the Tonkünstlerverein:—Sonata for Piano and Violin, Reiter; Violin Sonata, Handel; and Duet for two Pianos, Rheinberger.—First Subscription Concert of the Philharmonic Society:—Overture to Der Freischütz, Weber; songs (Herr Pelzer); "Gesangscene," Spohr (Herr von Königslow); Eighth Symphony, in F major, Beethoven.—Third Gurzenich Concert:—Overture to Anacreon, Cherubini; Aria from Die Zauberflöte, Mozart; Fantasia, C major, Op. 15, Schubert-Liszt; Air from Euryanthe, Weber; two Sacred Choral Songs, F. Hiller; Symphony in D minor, Schumann; and finale from Loreley, Mendelssohn.

Three Composition Pedals to Great.
Two ditto ditto to Swell.

The organ, which formerly stood in a gallery at the west end of the church, is now placed in the north aisle of the chancel; the Open Diapason in front of the case being diapered. The Choir organ is entirely new, with the exception of two stops, removed from the old organ, which formerly consisted of Great and Swell only (two manuals). The original Swell organ was of the Tenor C range; but has now been extended to CC, the full compass, and likewise enlarged by the addition of three stops. Many other improvements of importance and utility, including new Couplers of modern construction, Composition Pedals to Swell, &c., combine to make the result of the alterations and additions most satisfactory.

The organ was opened very successfully by Mr. F. N. Löhr, of Plymouth, on Thursday, the 24th ult. Mr. Löhr performed a selection from the works of Handel, Mozart, Rossini, &c., both his playing and the instrument giving great satisfaction.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—The Guardian informs us that:—

"A pupil of Madame Rudersdorff, Miss Margaret Galloway, made her first appearance with a graceful presence, unaffected bearing, sufficient confidence to do justice to the music, and a sweet voice. Miss Galloway's début may be considered perfectly successful. Her share of the music was but small, but, as it was carefully and conscientiously sung, we hope to hear her again."

HEBDEN-BRIDGE.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The large hall was filled to overflowing on the 9th inst., when a concert was given by Mr. W. A. J. Parsons. The following well-known vocalists appeared:—Misses. Clara Sutcr, Emily Withers and Eyles, Messrs. Montem Smith and C. J. Bishenden. The last named gentleman was applauded in a most enthusiastic manner after his singing 'La Marseillaise.' Mr. Bishenden was born in the town, and his friends were of course glad to see and hear him. Messrs. Montem Smith and Bishenden also sang a new duet by H. Smart, 'The Wood and the Wave.' The concert was a success."

DUDLEY.—The Birmingham Daily Gazette notices an amateur concert in aid of the funds of the Ragged School, and especially names, as one of the "features of the evening," a song (MS.) with flute obbligato, "Sing away, ye joyous birds," the words from "Wayside Warbler," by E. Capern. It was sung by Mrs. Bourne, Mr. Rickards playing the flute part.

EDINBURGH.—We read in the Edinburgh Review as follows:—

"Professor Oakeley resumed his open lectures to students and other gentlemen taking interest in the subject, on the 9th inst., at his classroom. The theme was vocal music considered theoretically, and was illustrated by experiments. The 15th inst. was announced as the date of the next organ recital, and the 21st as that of the next lecture, when the same subject will be treated practically."

SALISBURY.—We take the subjoined from a local paper of influence and circulation:—

"The Sarum Choral Society gave a miscellaneous concert on Tuesday evening, under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Read. The vocalist was Madame Talbot-Cluver, whose performance gave every satisfaction to the audience. Mr. H. Blagrove played a violin solo from one of Spohr's concertos, in his usual brilliant style, and Mr. Alexander Rowland delighted the company with his masterly execution upon the double bass. Messrs. C. J. Read and J. Whitehead Smith acted the part of first-rate performers upon the pianoforte. The selection was particularly happy. Mendelssohn's overture to Son and Stranger, and his finale to the unfinished opera, Loreley, are works which any audience might be charmed to hear, and any orchestra be proud to render. Beethoven's Choral Fantasia was an equal treat both to listeners and performers; and not the least in a series of pieces in every way worthy to be called works of art, must be accounted Mr. C. J. Read's own contribution to the programme—a 'Concert Overture' of great beauty, and suited for the orchestra in a most musician-like manner. The choirs did their work well, reflecting credit on their own diligence and their conductor's leadership. The orchestra was first-rate."

LEIPSIC.—Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger was produced here for the first time on the 6th inst.

THE HAGUE.—Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin has been produced here. Some describe it as a great success. Others do no not see it in exactly the same light.

SLIPS OF THE PEN.

Who, amongst all the critical men,
Stands most renowned for "slips of the pen"?
Who lately has scribbled mistakes so numerous,
Their weekly correction is really humorous?
In re Michael Balfe, Benedict, Mendelssohn,
His "slips of the pen" have by multitudes grown;
St. Peter, St. Paul, Elijah, "Bartholomew,"
Are all 'mong the slips, of which there are not a few.
But slippery scribes we have had by the score;
In morals, Lord Byron, and Sterne, and Tom Moore.
Historical "slips" were oft made by Macaulay,
But these latter-day "slips" are those of friend ——.
Call it meddling, mis-meddling, whatever you will,
Poor dear * * * has a slippery quill.

Monday Popular Concerts.

Writing about these concerts, the Daily News says:—

"No musical event of the year is looked for with greater and wider interest than the resumption of these excellent concerts, at which the highest class of chamber music is to be heard executed by the greatest available artists of the day, and is listened to by exceptionally large audiences with an earnest attention that can only arise from a real love of music in its purest aspect, free from all meretricious attractions. The string quartets and quintets, the pianoforte sonatas, duets, and trios, and the chamber songs of the great masters, contain as noble thought and sentiments, and evince as much art and power, as their grander compositions framed for large numbers of executants; and the growing love for what may be called domestic music among the general public is a sign of healthy taste, in welcome contrast to other manifestations in an opposite direction."

Madame Alboni.

The Athenæum of Dec. 10 speaks as follows of the recent appearance of the greatest of all contralto singers:—

"It is not owing to the war that the celebrated contralto Madame Alboni returns to her professional career. After her marriage with the late Count Popoli, she lived for some years in Paris in private, refusing the most tempting offers to sing again in public. At the funeral service of her earliest friend, Rossini, she consented to appear, and, associated with Madame Patti (La Marquise de Caux), the duet 'Ipsi est Homo,' from the Stabat Mater, was given by the two artists with a perfection of voice and style which thrilled the vast assemblage in the church, and caused the venerable Auber to shed tears. The gentleman who bought from the widow of Rossini the proprietary right in the Messe Solennelle, with the view of its performance in various countries, either in theatres or in concert-rooms, with or without the adjunct of secular music, induced Madame Alboni to be the contralto of his traveling troupe. It was on the first execution of the Mass at the Italian Opera-house in Paris, on the 28th of February, 1869, after the original score had been added to by strange hands, that Madame Alboni re-appeared. But for her singing of the interpolated solo, the 'O Salutaris,' the performance would have been a failure. Madame Krauss, a singer of good musician, but has not a sympathetic organ; and Signori Nicolini and Agnesi, the tenor and bass, sang very indifferently, whilst band and chorus were very bad. But the Rossinian mania was strong in Paris, and the Mass was financially a success for the investor, who transferred his right of representation in this country to opera-house directors. It is sad to think that a solemn service should be thus profanely turned to account." The programme in St. James's Hall, on the 7th inst. exhibited a strange mixture—the Mass in the first part, and a miscellaneous selection in the second portion; the 'Ave Maria' of Cherubini being followed by 'My Pretty Jane' of Bishop, and the organ wherewith up with the quartet from Flotow's Martha. Surely the Mass, with Madame Alboni's return therein, might have sufficed to fix the attention of a London musical audience in these days. The 'cast' of the Mass was certainly the strongest yet heard in this country, as it included Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Alboni, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Nordblom (tenor-), and Signor Foli (bass). Madame Alboni, who, before she left the stage, sang soprano as well as contralto parts, resumed her natural position in the Mass, resigning, however, the 'O Salutaris' to Mdlle. Tietjens. The voice of Madame Alboni cannot be expected to retain the rich, sonorous, and sympathetic timbre which it possessed when she first stepped on the Covent Garden boards, in 1847, at the inauguration of the Royal Italian Opera, as Arsace in Semiramide; strain on the high notes for soprano music has affected the once luscious quality of the lower ones; but once an artist, always an artist. Madame Alboni is still the refined exemplification of the great and pure Italian school of vocalization. In the 'Agnus Dei,' the enthusiasm of her hearers was at its height. If she help proposes to continue her career, she will be right welcome."

MUSIC AT VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

Herr Johann Strauss has completed and sent on to the management of the Theater an der Wien the third and last act of his comic opera, which he has finally christened Fantasca.—The members of the orchestra at the Imperial Operahouse were lately thrown into a state of intense excitement by something which occurred one evening during the performance. The opera was Herr von Flotow's Martha, with which the members of the orchestra were all thoroughly acquainted, seeing that it has been a stock opera for more than twenty years. The gentlemen, who only a few days previously had been informed that they were the best-trained body of musicians in Europe, played away with their usual precision up to the passage in the fourth act, where the representative of the heroine, Mdlle. von Balatinsky, introduced Proch's variations. When commencing the third variation, she was unlucky enough, owing probably to a momentary failure of memory, to skip a couple of dozen bars, and seeing something with which the orchestral accompaniment did not, of course, correspond, no small amount of confusion was the result; the members of the orchestra looked at the conductor, and the conductor looked at the young lady on the stage, who at last determined to recommence the variation. On reaching the same place, however, she was unfortunate enough again to commit the same fault. Again did discord reign between the vocalist and the orchestra. One portion of the audience began hissing, and another applauding ironically. The gentlemen of the orchestra had performed their part with their regular correctness, and when, therefore, the young lady, by a significant gesture, gave the audience to understand that the mistake was not to be laid to her but to the orchestra, the fermentation in the bosoms of the various accomplished instrumentalists, constituting that famous body, rose to fever pitch. Out of respect for the public, they went on with the performance; as though nothing had occurred, but in a statement of the case drawn up by the conductor, Herr Hellmesberger, and by him presented to the proper authorities, they say that they feel wounded in their professional honour, and must protest against this attempt of Mdlle. Balatinsky to make them bear the responsibility of a fault she committed.—A short time ago, as announced in the Musical World, Herr Proch bade adieu to the Imperial Operahouse, where he had so long acted as conductor, and was transferred to the Burgtheater. At this establishment, the band had been anything but satisfactory or becoming an Imperial Theatre. Herr Proch was to reorganize it. But, when he set about his task, the management refused to agree to his plans, which they characterized as extravagant. The consequence was that Herr Proch at once retired, and his place is now filled by Herr Durst.

MDLLE. NILSSON IN AMERICA.

Mdlle. Nilsson's last concert in Boston was thus noticed by the Express:—

"It was her thirty-fifth concert in America, and precisely two months from the period on which she gave her first. She was never in better voice than on Saturday, and sang, we need scarcely add, in the most ravishing manner. In 'Let the bright seraphim,' she had a trumpet obbligato by Mr. Gilmore. The performance excited tumultuous applause. She subsequently sang 'Home, sweet home,' in a style that fairly captivated all ears. Of course, in each case she was recalled, and sang a second time. She was assisted by Miss Cary, Brignoli, Vieuxtemps, Verger, and a grand orchestra. Nilsson's concerts in Boston (we believe eight in number) have figured up a total of about 60,000 dols.—an average of over 7,000 dols. At one the receipts were nearly 9,000 dols. The public have enjoyed a series of entertainments that have given great delight, and which will long be pleasantly remembered. To Mr. Strakosch we are also under vast indebtedness. He is always doing clever things, and this, as all will allow, is the cleverest enterprise so far."

Mdlle. Nilsson subsequently appeared in the Messiah at New York—the first oratorio among our cousins—and was thus criticized by the New York Times:—

"She renewed the delightful impression which a superb voice, managed with an art well fitted to display it to the broadest advantage, has on no one occasion since the artist's earliest appearance been failed to make. The most satisfying interpretation of the work given for many years, caused the concert to be worthy of unusual commendation. We anticipated, indeed, little less. We cannot do Miss Nilsson's share of the execution of Handel's masterpiece fuller justice than by recording that it was effective in the highest degree. Without pausing at present to view the subject-matter of the composition, or its grand musical treatment, we may express the opinion that we by no means coincide with the belief of ultra-Handelians, to whom an untraditional reading of the score is sacrilege. There can be no object more deserving of being kept in sight than the endowment of the words and of their illustrative sounds with their most complete significance; and this being attained by means legitimate, the voices of the past will scarcely be numerous enough to overpower the tender sounds of timely gratitude and praise. Miss Nilsson's frequent disregard of the prescribed tempo in passages of the Messiah, and occasional transposition of an accent will not easily escape the censure of the upholders of precedent, although the license obtains, as it did last evening, the sanction of a thousand hearers. The freedom and appreciable beauty of her readings contrasted strongly with the no less artistic, but certainly more formal method of her associates. The recitatives were declaimed with the power and clearness made familiar in secular music, and the airs were executed with a great purity of voice and facility of vocalization. The aria commencing with 'Rejoice greatly,' and abounding in florid passages, was given in a faultless manner, the unwavering ease with which the lady shows the suppleness of her organ being especially prominent. The aria, 'How beautiful are the feet,' was sung with exquisite sentiment, though in the last bars the singer took breath twice or thrice at points where it was at least inexpedient to do so. On the other hand, the grand air of the oratorio, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' had an utterance as nearly united to its sense as can be hoped for it, and the strength and variety of the colour bestowed upon it won recognition in the form of a tumultuous demand for a repeat."

"DIE WACHT AM RHEIN."

For two days Berlin has been suffering from a violent attack of Carl Wilhelm on the brain. Passing by the Hôtel du Nord on Friday evening, I was surprised to find the broad expanse Unter den Linden so thronged, that the five roads which together formed the finest thoroughfare in Europe were all impassable. Immediately in front of the Hôtel a space was kept clear for a compact body of men, each of whom carried a kind of Chinese lantern at the top of a stick. A huge banner floated in the centre, and as a bâton was raised aloft a full rich harmony burst upon the ear. Carl Wilhelm had arrived to conduct a concert, and the singers of Berlin had improvised a serenade in his honour. Of course he had to appear, and he was also compelled to accept the customary Singer-hoch—an osculatory salutation which he seemed not at all to expect. After many cheers and many part-songs, the mass of torch-bearers broke up into separate groups; the tiny lines of coloured lights gradually fading away into different directions, until they were ultimately lost in the damp foggy air. The entertainment had the double advantage of being cheap and harmless; and its spontaneousness must have gladdened the heart of the recipient; as he is said to have been bewildered by so many emphatic proofs of his sudden popularity.

Byron's assertion of himself, that he awoke one day and found himself famous, may be applied with strict accuracy to Carl Wilhelm. If, four months ago, you had canvassed the thousands who, the other evening, encumbered the chief artery of slowly-circulating Berlin, you would probably not have found one person familiar even with the name of the hero of to-day. I have not met with anybody who had heard of the man before the present war. I suppose a few yellowed copies of a certain old song of his lay hidden on some forgotten shelf in a music-seller's warehouse; but the sheets wasted their dust upon the desert air, while the composer vegetated in the heart of the Thuringian Forest. Suddenly the Rhenish frontier is threatened. Somebody recollects an old song suited to the emergency; it instantly strikes the popular fancy; and "Die Wacht am Rhein" becomes the motto of a new crusade. The stirring melody is carried from town to town; it flies along with every train that carries troops to the front; it is re-echoed in every public assembly; and, in a very few days, it resounds through the length and breadth of Germany. Not till everybody knows the song by heart does anyone think of enquiring about the composer, and for some time it is doubtful if he be still alive. At last he is unearthed in Schmalkalden—an old town on the way from Coburg to Cassel, known to the manufacturing world as one huge smithy, and familiar to the historical inquirer as the place were the Protestant League was established in the 16th and Melancthon. The composer seems to have remained hidden in his quiet Thuringian home while his winged melody was leading his countrymen on from victory to victory until they reached the very heart of Imperial France. Happy the man whose name can stimulate his brethren to such noble deeds; happier he who lives to witness the extent of his influence, and to receive a ready tribute to his power.

At last Carl Wilhelm has been enticed aus seiner Heimath—to quote the advertisements which refer to his "home" as though it were in Australia, instead of being within easy railway distance—to conduct a performance of his famous hymn. The great event was fixed for to-night; every place was sold days ago, and it was only from those hateful speculators, who seem to thrive in Berlin now as well as they used in Paris, that tickets could be got at all. The Circus Renz, an area about as large as the Cirque de l'Impératrice in the Champs Elysées, but holding many more people, was crammed to suffocation long before Carl Wilhelm was announced to appear. When the time had arrived for a certain triumphal march of his composition, he came forward in the likeness of a good-tempered, not very clever or bright looking man, on the shady side of fifty. His thin hair and scanty beard are iron grey, his complexion is sallow, his eyes are somewhat dull and heavy, and his general appearance is unquestionably commonplace. If you noticed him in the street, you would take him to be a provincial shopkeeper, or, perhaps, a village schoolmaster. I am quite accustomed to be disappointed by the personal appearance of men whose published works have led their readers to form involuntarily an ideal of their own; but I cannot call to mind any man who has made for himself a name in the world whose face is so destitute of expression as that of Carl Wilhelm. He is very diffident in manner, and seemed utterly bewildered by the storm of applause that burst upon him on every side when he was led upon the platform. I dare say nobody is so much surprised at his sudden elevation to popularity as Carl Wilhelm himself. To say sooth, his Triumph-Marsch is a very sorry affair, such as any bandmaster might write down at a moment's notice. I pitied the poor composer when, at the conclusion of the blatant trash, a gentleman in a very grand uniform, covered with orders stepped upon the platform and kissed him on both cheeks, to the intense delight of some two thousand spectators. If Wilhelm is really as modest and retiring as he looks, he may well have fancied that everybody was bent upon making a fool of him. For, if his "Wacht am Rhein" be not a mere "fluke," he must be heartily ashamed of his Triumph-Marsch.

It was pleasant, after this piece of weak "padding," to hear a song with choral accompaniment by a certain Carl Hennig, entitled "Königseiche," splendidly declaimed. The King is immensely popular, and the stirring words of this song so stimulated the audience, that the band had to strike up "Heil dir im Seigeskranz" as a safety-valve for the explosion of loyalty. To an Englishmen, it was natural enough to rise at the first notice of the National Anthem, but many of the Germans remained seated. This was from no want of enthusiasm, however, for "Barbarossas Erwachen," a poem by Möller von der Werra, recited with extraordinary animation by Herr Bertold, again called out a loyal demonstration. Lastly came "Die Wacht am Rhein," and the familiar strains seemed to take new meaning from the composer's presence and direction. It is rather the fashion here to sneer at the song of 1870, and it may well be that the Berliners have heard somewhat too much of it. It may be, too, that, as I first heard it in the very heart of actual war, the melody speaks to me through the memory no less than through the ear. But it cannot be denied that in "Die Wacht am Rhein" music and meaning are most happily married. In the facility with which it may be rendered by the song fanlis one of the conditions of a true national lyric; and the plaintive character of the piano passage, "Lieb Vaterland magst ruhig sein," renders the hymn much more susceptible of variety of expression than the majority of patriotic compositions. A song must have something in it to become the exponent of a nation's chivalry. When the hymn had been twice repeated, some enthusiast called out for a "Hoch!" to Carl Wilhelm; and the composer had again to stand on the platform while the singers all round him thundered out "Er lebe hoch!" When he goes back to homely Schmalkalden, the echoes of the verses he has heard to-night will surely often come to cheer many a vacant, dreary, desolate day.

REAPERS WANTED.

(From the "New York Herald.")

Without losing any of our intense characteristic energy we have become an eminently philosophical people. A glance at the theatrical record of the metropolis for the first two months of this season will explain. About twenty-five places of amusement of all kinds are open and in general well patronized. No other city in the world can make such an exhibit this season. London can boast of a greater number of theatres; but the half of them might as well be closed for all the patronage they receive. Other European capitals tell the same story; while there is not a manager in New York but receives some encouragement from the public. Again, other species of amusement—yachting, horse racing, base ball, dancing, and billiards—find thousands of enthusiastic admirers here, and have become a necessity to a very large proportion of our citizens. The philosophy of this consists in the belief of the metropolitan public in the old adage—"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." They combine business with pleasure, and love the almighty dollar only for the pleasure they derive in spending it. This is a long progressive step from the time that the aforesaid dollar monopolised a man's thoughts and actions from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof, and a similar cycle of the moon included. But there is an important distinction to be made between music and the drama on the score of success. While the latter is flourishing in every possible phase of its extensive sphere, music has had one great representative here, in the person of Nilsson. She has given sufficient evidence of the appreciation of the public for true art in her line, and her success has exceeded the fondest hopes of her manager. The brief season of English opera at Niblo's also has so far shown the same desire on the part of the public for good music. Why, then, cannot some of our enterprising musical caterers take advantage of the prepared state of the public mind and the splendid opportunity now open to them to engage first-class talent in Europe and give us opera as it should be presented? The unhappy condition of France leaves the artists of the Grand Opera and the Opéra Comique idle and ready for the offer of any responsible American manager. We have two operahouses in this city which can challenge competition with any in Europe or America—the Academy of Music and the Grand Operahouse. The one is closed and silent, and the other is disgraced by a worthless indecent exhibition, which the many patrons of Gran and Bateman's enterprises would hardly recognize as opera bouffe. Now, here is a fine opportunity for some wide-awake managers to avail themselves of the immense supply of talent lying idle in Europe and present opera in its highest form to the American public. Grand opera at the Academy, and Opéra Comique at the Grand Operahouse, would meet with a patronage such as the most sanguine impresario would hardly look for. The experiment is worth the trial.

Punch understands that a popular composer is about to publish a new song, "The Fisherman's Chorus," with a cast-a-net accompaniment.

Miss Rose Hersee has been playing, with great success, Arline, in Balfe's Bohemian Girl, at Philadelphia. Her associates are Miss Fanny Goodwin (Gipsy Queen), Mr. Brookhouse Bowler (Thaddeus), and Mr. Henri Drayton (the Count). The fortunate representative of Devilshoof was not mentioned by the local paper we have seen.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite.—The Civil Service Gazette remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Each packet is labelled: JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London. Also makers of Epps's Cacaoine, a very thin evening beverage.

LA CLEMENZA DI TITO.

Few librettos have been so frequently set to music as Titus, the composition of the celebrated Metastasio.[a] Antonio Caldara was the first to take advantage of it in 1734. Four years after, the celebrated J. A. Hasse used it as a theme for an opera, which was performed at Dresden in 1738. His successor, Chapelmaster Saxman, selected it, in 1760, upon the occasion of the nuptials of the Prince Elector Frederick Augustus of Saxony; and, finally, in 1790, it was adorned by the genius of Mozart, for the coronation of Leopold II. at Prague. Mozart's composition is the only one which has survived; all others have sunk into oblivion, having entirely disappeared from the stage.

It would be highly interesting to hear cursory pending portions of each opera performed. We should then be able to compare the four composers in point of melody, scoring, and appropriate idealization of the text; nor would the interest be diminished by the fact that all four were eminent.

A true and lofty work of art should not be bent to the prejudices of the prevailing fashion; but should be strongly marked by the genius and originality of its author. These qualities are by no means prominent in Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito; in fact, it may be considered, in the history of opera one of the last echoes of the Italian style, as developed in the last century. That rigid and conventional style, which was away extended over Germany as well as Italian opera, is very remote from the lively and dramatic flow which at the present time is demanded in the music of this species of composition.

The aria, divided in three parts—a recitative, a slow, and a lively movement—formed the essential basis of opera at that time, and occupied a corresponding position to the concerted pieces—viz., tercets, quartets, choruses, and finales—which are distinguishing features of the modern school. In the same manner as lengthy dialogues and monologues alternated in the drama, so aria after aria succeeded in the opera. The dramatic and characteristic forms of expression were nearly always subdued by the formal element; and the lyric expression of the passions and emotions of the soul were reduced to a strictly tangible musical form. Mozart has embraced this style in two of his operas, viz., Titus and Idomeneo, both of which are totally unadapted to modern taste, and are replaced by more modern compositions. Nevertheless, we cannot refrain from admiring the exquisite finish of each part and melody, and the perfect musical individuality of the whole.

The opera of Titus is rich in musical beauties, but very deficient in strong dramatic situation, and would, therefore, be most appreciated and enjoyed in the form of a concert, in which each member should take its normal order. Yet though this method of performing it masterly music would be really the best, I question its being the most popular. I may incidentally remark that Titus was written in a shorter period than any other of Mozart's operas.

An opera being required for the coronation of the Emperor Leopold, Mozart was commissioned to deliver the finished score in eighteen days. Metastasio —the Court poet at that time—selected a noble passage from the life of Titus (Augustus), but produced only a very colourless libretto. The hero, after whom the opera is named, is so indifferently treated that he creates only a secondary interest. He meets with refusals from several ladies, and sings some dull apoplegmata relating to the public laws. Mozart did so little for the character of the excellent Emperor that Weigl subsequently composed an aria di bravura, which was added to the opera, in order, if possible, to elevate the ideal Titus from his operative insignificance to somewhat of his real character—a man charming in manners, and beloved by all his people.

If any composer possessed the artistic power to build a musical masterpiece upon a paltry libretto, that composer was Mozart; and his inexhaustible genius would have verified its reputation in this instance had not the limited time allowed for the completion of the work prevented him from improving and maturing it. Several of the numbers in Titus show both inspiration and artistic love; and these are the portions which will hand it down to posterity; but unfortunately the greater part of it was composed in the then prevailing taste of the public, and for the purpose of exhibiting the voices and accomplishments of their favourite singers. In consequence of this, the latter portion is as old fashioned as its original singers and audience. We of the present time can hear it with a feeling of devotion for Mozart, albeit though mixed with much yawning.

Those unpardonable parts which are written for all times are the powerful, dramatic, comprehensive, and highly-finished finale of the first Act, the Overture, the Terzetto between Annius, Publicus, and Vitelia, and the last chorus but one of the Romans. These will remain as masterpieces for the admiration of posterity.

The opera of Titus requires to be rendered in a style in which the best of our modern singers would fail. The aim of opera at that period was to enact a union of the conventional style with the most finished schooling—a thing no longer found in Italy, and which has never existed in Germany.

It not only pre-supposes the singer to be accomplished in technicalities to the minutest degree, but also to have arrived at the highest stage of development in the declamatory mode of singing, which we can only paralled by again referring to the French tragedy. Our present artists are so accustomed to represent the more eccentric emotions of the operas of the 19th century that they are inefficient and unsteady when called upon to perform a broad outline designed in this earlier style, and are frequently unable to fill it out to its proper proportions.

December, 1870. FERDINAND HAHLES.

[a] Metastasio (whose name was originally Trapassi) was born in 1689, at Assisi. He was the son of a common soldier; but the celebrated lawyer Gravina, discovering his great talent for poetry, adopted him under the name of Metastasio, took the greatest care to give him a superior education, and, finally, left him his whole fortune. Metastasio virtually the originator of the Italian Opera Books of the present time, gained a world-wide reputation as a poet. His writings have had the greatest influence, not only upon drama tists, but also upon musical composers. Libretto and Cantatas are his principal poetical productions. They are based upon the true principles of musical poetry; and may still be considered as models. His works have disappeared from the stage, in consequence of the widely-different style now prevailing in both music and poetry; but, in spite of this, they remain highly remarkable objects in the history of art. He was appointed Court Poet at Vienna, in 1729, and died in 1782. The 12th and last edition of his complete works was published in 1781-3.

MUSIC IN MILAN.

(From a Correspondent.)

We can but speak well of the concert given in aid of the Philharmonic and Theatrical Fund at the Scala last night apart from the Persia sinfonia, composed and directed by Ketten, which fell flat being nothing more or less than a combination of abstruse harmony without a bar of real inspired melody. With this exception, every piece contained in the programme was warmly applauded. Cavallici is still the incomparable artist who knows how to handle his clarionet; his lungs could easily compete with those of the youngest man.

Ketten received—by his masterly playing—the old enthusiasm, both in a composition of Litolff as well as in one of his own, which he played in answer to an encore, overcoming the most intricate execution with great delicacy.

Madam Penco sang the cavatina from Norma and the aria from Semiramide with that finish, expression, and accent which stamp the great artist.

A young tenor (De Bassini), who promises to follow in the steps of his father, was much applauded, owing to the magnificence of his voice—one of those glorious organs so rare at the present day. De Bassini sang the duet and song from Donizetti's opera, Belisario, and was twice called before the curtain. The former he sang with a sympathetic young artist, Mr. Campbell (who, a year ago, was introduced by Mr. Mapleson to the English public under the name of Signor Campi), the possessor of a fine sweet-toned baritone voice, and who has learnt to sing with feeling and taste. Mr. Campbell sang, besides the duet, the romanza from Un Ballo in Maschera, the artistic rendering of which earned for him prolonged applause. He was twice called before the curtain.

The entertainment ended with a brilliant chorus from Petrella's bacchanale, Virginia, a chorus of great effect.

Milan, Nov. 12th, 1870.

WAIFS.

Alexandre Dumas died at Puy, near Dieppe, on Monday, the 5th of December.

Herr Maurice Strakosch has returned to Brussels. He will pass the winter with his family at Rome.

We learn from the Liverpool Porcupine that Madame Viardot-Garcia sang at the last concert of the Liverpool Philharmonic (conductor, Mr. Benedict), and was cordially welcomed, as she well deserved.

The volunteer band of Carnarthen are zealously and successfully applying their talents to the "Carmarthenshire March," composed by Mr. Brinley Richards. It is likely to become exceedingly popular. We understand it will be played publicly at the municipal procession on Christmas Day.

"A tribute of gratitude for the music of St. Martin's" (Scarborough), in the form of a donation of £100 to the St. Martin's Organ Fund has been received. And we hope that the appreciators of music who worship at St. Martin's will help to raise the sum required, in order that St. Martin's Church may have a fitting organ for Dr. Sloman, its organist.

The Era, in its notice of the performance of Robert le Diable at the Royal Italian Opera, last week, says:—

"The revival of Meyerbeer's opera was rendered additionally attractive by the first appearance on the Italian stage in England of Madame Corani. The performance of so important a character as that of Alice naturally occasioned some curiosity. Without making comparisons, we would state that Madame Corani's success was most decided, her powerful voice filling the theatre without effort, and her execution of the music giving the utmost pleasure. If there was less enthusiasm than upon some occasions, it must be remembered that the Covent Garden audience is proverbially cold, and not over hasty to welcome a new comer. When Madame Corani has ajpiedfed a few times at Covent Garden, we prophesy that she will become not only a very useful, but also a popular member of the company."

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, having renewed their term at the Gallery of Illustration, will commence another season on Monday evening, December 19th. The new entertainment, by W. S. Gilbert, is not yet ready; in the meantime, Mr. Reed reproduces, for a few nights, the successful operetta, Ages Ago, which will be given for the 216th time. Mr. Corney Grain, however, inaugurates the campaign with a new musical sketch, and the entertainment will conclude with The Rival Composers. In Ages Ago Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, Miss Fanny Holland, Mr. Corney Grain, and Mr. Arthur Cecil will sustain their original characters.

The Era of Dec. 11th said:—

"We regret to announce the death of Mr. Stephen Glover, the popular composer, on the 7th inst. The great success of Mr. Glover as a composer of music suitable for concert and drawing-room performance will make his loss universally felt, and many a happy domestic circle, where his songs and duets have been 'familiar as household words,' will be grieved to know that his graceful labours have come to an end. Mr. Glover was not an ambitious composer; but many of his songs and duets have decided merit. Musicians and amateurs will equally be familiar with the excellent duet, 'What are the wild waves saying,' which is as popular as ever, 'The Gipsy Countess,' 'The Two Cousins,' and a very charming old duet, written many years ago, but lately revived, 'There's a sweet wild Rose.' Of his songs everybody will remember 'The Monks of Old,' 'The blind girl to her harp,' 'I love the merry sunshine,' and others almost as popular. Mr. Glover died at the comparatively early age of fifty-eight."

We take the following eulogy of Signor Ronconi from Watson's Art Journal:—

"Signor Ronconi is recognized by every competent authority as one of the most consummate artists on the lyric stage. He is equally fine, whether he personates the sublime sorrow of a Rigoletto or the quaint broad humour of a Crispino. His genius is so comprehensive that he touches the point of perfection in both departments, holding in his hands, as it were, the fountains of tears and impulses of laughter by which in turns he sways the audience at his will. On this occasion he imparted to that well-known movement from Donizetti's Beatrice di Tenda, a breadth of passionate expression which touched every one present. As a piece of eloquent musical elocution it could hardly be surpassed, and it was keenly relished by the most critical, notwithstanding a slight tendency of his voice to flatten in the sustained portions of the aria. The sun has spots, which its glories overwhelm. In the lively and fascinating duet from Elisir d'Amore, Ronconi came out in full force, and by his genuine and irresistible humour, kept the audience in a roar of laughter, delighting every one, and gaining a hearty encore."

MUSIC.—For more than a year, an announcement has appeared in the bills of the Theatre Royal stating that in consequence of a medical certificate, Herr Bachmann is absent on sick leave. It seems that he has utterly lost his voice. An effort has again been made to grant him a large annual sum—some say eight thousand florins—if he will renounce his ten years' engagement; but he refuses.—Herr Nachbaur has returned, ill with typhus, from a professional visit to Mayence. He now lies in a precarious condition.—Nicolo Isouard's opera, Joconde, has been produced, at the Royal Operahouse, under the title of Monsejokrien. The German version of the book is by Dr. Grandauer, the stage manager for operas.

HAMLET.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"
SUNG BY
MR. SANTLEY.
Price 4s.

"In a song entitled 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mdlle. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—North British Mail.

SIX SONGS,
WITH GERMAN WORDS,
The English Translation and Music by
AMY COYNE,
Price 4s. each.

"Miss Amy Coyne's German Songs.—It may be a relief to many of our musical readers, tired of the eternal 'Watch on the Rhine,' from the sad scenes which the famous German war-song recalls, to turn to a charming set of Songs (lyrics) of the love chansons which have now so real an interest attached to them, sung, as they are throughout Vaterland, by fair mourners whose loved ones have found a last home in France. The six songs before us have that rare rare quality which the poet longed for: appropriately sung, these compositions are low

'An zephyr, telling secrets to his rose;

while the poems are of so lyrical a nature that they at once recommend themselves to anyone who (to continue the quotation) can say—

'for with my mind I listen,
And when the leaves of sound are shed upon it,
If there's no seed, remembrance grows not there.'

Miss Amy Coyne, a daughter of the late Mr. Stirling Coyne, is the composer of these sweet lieder; and she has also translated from the German the felicitous words with which the music so well harmonises. Six in number, their titles are—'Farewell for Ever,' 'Fidelity,' 'Partel,' 'The Request,' 'The Voice of Spring,' and 'Evening Sounds,' which last has a delightful Mendelssohnian ring about it. Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, are the publishers of these exquisite songs, and also of Miss Amy Coyne's latest composition, 'Maddalena,' a sparkling serenade which we had the pleasure of noticing favourably when it was first sung by Mr. W. H. Cummings, and which fully sustains the rising reputation of the talented young composer."—Young Illustrated Paper.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette," Dec. 16.)

The series of Beethoven concerts, the object and plan of which were explained some time since, have been deservedly successful. Six out of the promised eight have been given; the seventh is announced for to-morrow, the anniversary of the great musician's birthday—the 17th of December; the eighth for Monday. With the exception of a couple of Lieder by Schubert, introduced on one occasion by Mdlle. Rosamunda Doria, in consequence of the indisposition of Herr Stockhausen, the six programmes have been exclusively compiled from the works of Beethoven, vocal and instrumental. And yet the sense of variety was just as strong as though each separate piece had been contributed by a different composer. No better test of Beethoven's prodigious fertility could be imagined than this particular method of putting him to the proof. Take for example, the six "string quartets dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz (Op. 18)—in F, G, D, C minor, A and B flat. All were comprised in the first three programmes—two in each programme, one at the beginning and one at the end. It is by placing them thus in such close juxtaposition, that we are best able to judge how little one resembles another in anything but the common quality of excellence. With these bright and beautiful works, Beethoven when scarcely more than thirty years of age, triumphantly established his claim to sit by the side of Haydn and Mozart. Not a little of their charm lies, on the one hand, in the evidence they bear of the spell exercised by the enchanting grace and symmetry of Mozart's style, and, on the other, by the evidence, no less convincing, of Beethoven's inward desire to shake it off, so as to think and act independently for himself. The instances of this determined resolution which lie scattered over the early quartets are many; and in each of them we find traces of that genius for development which, as was subsequently manifested, Beethoven possessed in a higher degree than any other composer. Already we perceive it in the three quartets Op. 59 (Nos. 7, 8, and 9), dedicated to Rasoumowsky, which came into the world some five or six years later (1806). The opening allegro of the first (in F), beginning with a theme which seems as if it might go on for ever, and the finale of the third (in C), one of the most extraordinarily worked out movements to be named, and which, in a scarcely inferior degree than the finale to the Eroica symphony, exhibits Beethoven's thorough mastery of counterpoint, would alone suffice to show how completely he had succeeded in emancipating himself from all preexisting models, even without taking into consideration the scherzo in the first, unprecedented in its time, and the wonderful slow movements of all three—the most wonderful perhaps, if originality is a token, being the andante con moto, in A minor, of the third. In addition to the quartets, we have heard the quintet in C (No. 2, Op. 29), containing the last movement, called the "Storm" by almost every critic except Beethoven himself (his own severest critic), about which such a quantity of unintelligible nonsense was uttered by the Russian critic, Herr Lenz, who in the cause of Beethoven out-Oulibischeffs Oulibischeff himself, Mozart's wholesale and enthusiastic panegyrist. This quintet, written about 1801, and, therefore contemporaneous in regard to production with the first six quartets, is undoubtedly a capital work. Nevertheless, considering the plan of the ante-Christmas concerts, which was, we believe, intended to mark by progressive stages the steady growth of the master's genius, it would perhaps have been wiser and more consistent to give the earliest quintet—the one in E flat, with a minuet and two trios. This minuet with its tributaries, as some insist, is the real origin of the Beethoven scherzo. But surely in such an estimate the scherzi in the pianoforte trios, Op. 1, and still more striking, the scherzo in the last of the pianoforte sonatas, Op. 2, dedicated to Haydn—for whom, notwithstanding all that has been suggested to the contrary, Beethoven entertained a very deep respect—must have been overlooked. Two of the early trios, Nos. 1 and 2, in E flat and G, have been given; but not the No. 3, in C minor, which Beethoven, despite Haydn's verbally expressed opinion, esteemed the best. In place of this the much later trio in D, No. 1, Op. 70, was substituted. We have also had the famous septet for string and wind instruments, of which Haydn thought so much, and which Beethoven in his riper period, whenever it was spoken of affected to depreciate. To these it would have been advisable to add one of the trios for violin, viola, and violoncello. But it is impossible to cram within the space of eight programmes all that one might wish to hear; and even now in the instrumental department we have to mention violin sonatas, violoncello sonatas, and sonatas for pianoforte alone. Among the first-named, the sonata in A minor, Op. 23, has already been played; while the earlier sonata in E flat, last of the set of three dedicated to Salieri, one of Beethoven's several "advisers" in his musical studies (from whom as from the others, his independent spirit not easily brooking control, he derived but little advantage), is to be included in next Monday night's performance. Three of the violoncello sonatas have been produced, in chronological order—Nos. 1 and 2 of Op. 5 (in F major and G minor), and the third, Op. 69 (in A), the most popular, if not the best, of the five which Beethoven wrote. Of course, in accordance with Mr. Arthur Chappell's time-honoured custom, there has been at each concert a solo pianoforte sonata. First, Mr. Charles Hallé played the sonata in E flat (Op. 7)—thus, we cannot but think, injudiciously skipping over the three early and vigorous works dedicated to Haydn; next, the same pianist gave us the sonata in D, unquestionably the finest and most original of the three in Op. 10; then Mdme. Arabella Goddard played the well-known and universally admired sonata in A flat (Op. 26), containing the "Funeral March," with which the jealous Beethoven, vexed at the continual praises of a similar movement in the opera of Achilles, by Ferdinando Paer, annihilated that unfortunate composer at a blow; then the same lady followed with the sonata in D (Op. 28), nicknamed (not inappropriately it must be admitted) "Pastoral Sonata," by Kranz, the publisher, without Beethoven's consent or knowledge; and, lastly, she performed the sonata in G, Op. 31 (not 29 as is so persistently stated)—Herr Paner following at the next concert with the sonata in D minor (No. 2) from the same series.

The chief topic in this article being naturally, Beethoven himself, we have thought proper to refrain from criticism on the performers, who may fairly be presumed, under the circumstances to have played their best, and who did so in fact. In the violin sonata Op. 23 the co-operation of two accomplished ladies, Mdme. Norman-Neruda and Mdme. Arabella Goddard, as might have been anticipated—especially because this was the first time they had ever played together in public—excited an interest apart. In the violoncello sonatas the violoncellist was, happily, Signor Piatti, who in the one in F, was associated with Mr. Hallé, in that in G minor with Mdme. Goddard, and in that in A with Herr Paser. The quartets at the first three concerts were led by Mdme. Neruda; at the others by Herr Straus; the second riolin, viola, and violoncello in each instance being represented by Herr L. Ries, Signor Zerbini, and Signor Piatti. In the first of the trios Mr. Hallé, in the second Mdme. Goddard, and in the third Herr Paner was the pianist; Mdme. Neruda played violin in the first; Herr Straus in the second and third; Signor Piatti taking the violoncello on each occasion.

All the vocal music, too—the songs by Schubert to which we have referred allowed for—has been by Beethoven; and at every concert except the first, when Mdme. Clara Doria appeared, Herr Stockhausen was the singer, bringing forward among other things, the Liederkreis (which we prefer in the original key), some of those interesting "Scottish Melodies," twenty-five in number, harmonized by Beethoven, with accompaniments for violin, violoncello and pianoforte, which have been too long cast in the shade. That Mr. Benedict has continued to act as accompanist at the pianoforte, need hardly be stated; but it is only fair to add that in the occasional absence of this practised musician, Signor Zerbini has honourably filled his place.

At the last concert of the Centenary, on Monday night, we are promised the tenth quartet in E flat (Op. 75)—the "Harfen quartet," as the Germans somewhat fantastically, if not childishly, call it, on account of a certain passage of "arpeggios," in the first movement, for the leading violin; the lovely sonata in E minor (Op. 90), about which so many stories are narrated; and the grand (really "grand") trio in B flat (Op. 97), dedicated to the Archduke Rodolphe—Beethoven's favorite amateur pupil, who is said to have been able to execute the B flat pianoforte sonata (Op. 106), which, as scarcely one practised professor in a hundred has ever been able to do it, we take leave to doubt. Mendelssohn attempted the "106" but once (at the house of a friend in Frankfort), and after playing it—as he writes in one of his most charming letters home—he "straightway drank 212 glasses of punch." At the last concert but one, to-morrow afternoon, besides the third and most elaborate of the "Rasoumowsky" quartets, the programme contains the Waldstein sonata (Op. 53), and the trio in E flat (Op. 70). Here we are taken at once into the composer's prime, a change to which, as the first six concerts were devoted in a very great measure to his earlier compositions, few can object, more particularly as the so-called "posthumous quartets" are kept in reserve for Herr Joachim, who comes after Christmas.

GRATZ.—Herr Herzogenberg's dramatic cantata, Columbus, has been very well received here.

MR. BENEDICT'S ST. PETER.

When Mr. Benedict's new oratorio was produced at the late Birmingham Festival, we spoke of it in brief and general terms, reserving detailed criticism for the occasion of a first performance in London. There were good reasons for this course, apart from the danger necessarily attending upon the hasty verdict. It was probable, for example, that Mr. Benedict would retouch his work, and imperative that he should curtail it. Both things have been done. And St. Peter is now before us in its final shape. This fact, and a performance of the oratorio in St. James's Hall on Tuesday week, supply the desired opportunity for expressing a deliberate judgment. We may add that it would serve little purpose to dwell upon the alterations Mr. Benedict has thought necessary. Our business lies not with St. Peter as it was, but with St. Peter as it is—in other words, with definite results, rather than tentative processes.

It would be idle to expect unanimous acceptance for any method of treating a subject so varied in its aspects as that of St. Peter. The apostle's life, character, and work invite attention from half-a-dozen different stand-points, each certain to have admirers who champion its precedence over all the rest. For this reason the value of Mr. Benedict's plan must remain a matter of opinion, and cannot be settled by the ipse dixit of anybody. We do well, therefore, to trace the progress of the story in subsequent remarks, and leave the reader to form his own judgment thereupon. The oratorio, as we say here, is divided into two parts, which are subdivided, the first into two, the second into three, scenes, each scene bearing an appropriate designation, and, a single exception allowed for, each being distinct from the rest. To indicate the chosen topics, we need but give the names by which they are known. Thus. Part I. contains "The Divine Call" and "The Trial of Faith"; while in Part II. there are "Denial," "Repentance," and "Deliverance." These events of the apostle's life are treated with considerable amplitude; but the diversity of the events themselves happily assisted the composer in avoiding monotony. How Mr. Benedict has dealt with each we have now to show.

The action of the oratorio begins on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, an orchestral introduction depicting the approach of evening. Distinguished by fancy and suggestiveness, this movement leads naturally to an elaborate chorus, "They that go down to the sea in ships," sung by fishermen and women, while preparing to rest from the labours of the day. A tranquil and melodious theme is given out fugally by the various parts, its character being ably sustained both by voice and instrument, till the coverture of night is invoked by soprani and alti (each divided) expressive of confidence in the protection of Heaven. Passing the latter with approval of the contrast it affords, we come upon another movement, for full chorus, to the words, "We will lie down in peace, and sleep," &c., which introduces for the first time the elaborate, modulatory passages so distinctive of Mr. Benedict's music. If any object to these, a speedy return of the first theme brings relief, and leads to a charming coda, which ends the number in satisfactory style. John the Baptist (tenor) then appears, between whom and the apostle a well-wrought dramatic contrast takes place. The former urges repentance because "the kingdom of Heaven is at hand;" and is answered by abrupt queries as to his doctrine and person. This situation being developed at some length, and with not less vigour than perspicuity, repose is brought by an air, "O house of Jacob!" in which the Baptist quotes from the prophets as to the coming of his Lord. A smooth and expressive melody, with accompaniments after Mr. Benedict's most graceful manner, distinguishes this song; between the subjects of which, moreover, an artistic contrast is secured. Moved by what they have heard, the people declare, in a tuneful chorus, "The Lord will not turn away His face," their strong hope of Divine mercy; after which a contralto voice takes up the narrative of Peter's call. In an air, "How great, O Lord, is Thy goodness!" the new disciple pours forth his gratitude to strains marked by all necessary fervour, though tinged with a plaintiveness suggesting a premonition of trials to come; and the people respond with a benediction, "The Lord be a lamp unto thy feet," &c., which is undoubtedly one of the gems of the oratorio. The beautiful themes of this chorus, and its glowing harmonies, both set off by tasteful orchestration, mark it out for special favour wherever the ability to appreciate good music exists. The second scene, "Trial of Faith," opens with the departure of our Lord's disciples to "the other side," and His own retiring "into a mountain apart to pray." This being told in recitative, an orchestral episode describes the prayer and the rising of the storm on the adjacent lake. Here Mr. Benedict once more appears at his best, the movement being distinguished by vivid suggestiveness and picturesque colouring in a high degree. The scoring of the "Prayer," moreover, is ingenious, while the gradual oncoming of the "storm," through the raging of which a voice is heard telling of danger to the disciples, produces an effect appreciable by all. At length, and without a break, the chorus enters upon the words, "The deep uttereth his voice," a short fugato passage of eight bars being given out three times in an ascending progression of keys which imparts exactly the accumulating force required. The movement, however, acts but as prelude to a vigorous though not extended fugue, "Deep calleth unto deep," this, in turn, giving place to a bravura air (soprano), "The Lord hath His way in the whirlwind," the dashing character of which is set off by occasional phrases for chorus in broad, massive harmony. As all these movements really make but one number, an idea may be formed of Mr. Benedict's elaborate treatment, and the sustained vigour of his music. The narrative then describes the appearance of Jesus walking on the sea; and a short chorus for male voices, "It is a spirit," aptly expresses the terror of His disciples. Bidden not to fear, the latter respond in a smoothly written five-part chorus, "Who would not fear Thee?" after which a recitative for contralto and baritone tells the story, to most suggestive orchestral accompaniment, of Peter's trial and failure. An air sung by the rescued disciple, "Now know I that the Lord saveth His anointed," presents no very remarkable features, but the sudden calm is expressively illustrated; and not less effective is the short chorus in which the followers of Jesus declare their assurance of His divine origin. The finale of Part I. then begins with a quartet, "O, come let us sing unto the Lord," wherein unpretending simplicity is accompanied by perfect charm. We may venture to say that no selection from the oratorio will be more popular than this. A stately introduction, heralds the last chorus, "Praise ye the Lord," an elaborate number in two divisions; the first a series of massive progressions in full harmony, the second a fugue on two subjects, with a lengthy coda. The themes of the fugue are diatonic, vigorous, and striking, while its working, if not exhaustive of contrapuntal device, shows the hand of a master of his craft. Indeed, Mr. Benedict might have extended the movement without risk, so thoroughly does it carry the hearer along in its impetuous but artfully regulated course. With regard to the coda, we need only point out the effect of a legato passage, with a counterpoint of quavers in the orchestra. This is one of the happiest touches in the entire work, by reason of the grateful contrast it affords.

The first scene of Part II.—"Denial"—begins with a recitative, and Peter's reply to the words of his Master, "Though all men should be offended," &c. (a fervent yet modest expression of this as not unconnected with a certain tone of reproach; while in the disciple's assurance that he is ready to go with Jesus to prison and to death a touch of pathos is aptly introduced. Moreover, like all the music given to St. Peter in the oratorio, it is pervaded by a dignity in keeping with the destiny of the man. Next comes a short chorus and; a brief chorus for male voices describing the flight of the disciples, and leading to a contralto air, "O thou afflicted," wherein the ultimate triumph of the Saviour is lovingly dwelt upon. We can scarcely praise this song too highly such is the tender beauty of its theme, and the general propriety of its treatment. That it will find favour everywhere may be accepted as a foregone conclusion. After a choral recitative for male voices, which tells how Peter followed his Master "afar off," we are introduced to the servants' hall of the High Priest's palace, and hear the assembled crowd jesting. In a short chorus, "We have a law," their hatred of the prisoner at that moment on His trial. Then follows the scene of the disciples' threefold treachery. Again and again he is accused of being a follower of Jesus, the chorus each time taking up the charge with increasing emphasis, almost to fury. As often does Peter deny his Lord, growing more and more emphatic as the proofs against him multiply. Baffled, if not convinced, the Jewish servants break out into another chorus, "They are all revolters," consigning the entire sect of Nazarenes to perdition, with vigour, and so terminating the episode. All these, strong this portion of his work Mr. Benedict has written with a degree of force and effect deserving the highest eulogy. So much, however, might have been anticipated from one who has given ample proofs of ability to deal with situations of strong dramatic interest. "Repentance" is fittingly introduced by a tenor air, "The Lord is very pitiful," expressive of Divine readiness to forgive. This air is made one of the brightest gems in the work by its thorough originality, earnest, yet touching emphasis, and admirable skill. This song, in fact, has claims to rank with the best examples of the kind ever by whom composed. The taking of Jesus from Caiaphas to the Roman Governor is then shown, and the procession moves through the Hall where Peter is to the strains of a solemn march, which, suspended while a contralto recitative tells how "the Lord turned and looked upon Peter," finally dies away in the distance. Touched to the heart by the look he has received, Peter pours out his sorrow in an air, "O that my head were waters" quite equal to the exigencies of its position. The opening phrase, set to the words quoted, is, by a skilful device, rarely absent from the orchestra; its reiteration knitting the entire song closely together, and concentrating its meaning into one emphatic expression. From this point to the end of the scene various incidents of the great world-tragedy are made to pass before the eyes of the erring disciple, heightening his anguish and intensifying his self-reproach, till at the last he bursts forth into a passionate cry, "For all these things I weep." The general body of the number is the day of crucifixion, with a mournful chorus, "This is a day of wrath," one of the most powerfully written numbers in the work. The mother of Jesus next takes up the plaint in the soprano air, "I mourn as a dove," which expresses, if music ever did, the bitterness of deepest grief, in union with a tenderness even more pathetic. After this, the procession passes to Calvary; a dead march of no particular merit being first heard, followed by a taunting chorus of Jews (male voices), "Thou that destroyest the Temple," and by a well-constructed full chorus of disciples, with organ accompaniment. "He is like a lamb." At last both choruses are worked together in most effective style, the con molto being as interesting and imposing as any in the oratorio. A tenor solo then takes up the words of Jesus, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me," and affords another striking proof of Mr. Benedict's ability to deal with profound emotion. He has never written anything more impressive than this song. There are grief and tears in every bar of it; but more especially in the closing phrases, the merit of which could hardly be excelled. Irritated by the phrophecy of Jesus, the Jews exclaim against Him in a chorus, "He is worthy to die," the dead march being simultaneously resumed; and, as the latter fades away in the distance, Peter's utterance of sorrow falls upon the ear. The scene ends with a double chorus, "He will swallow up death in victory," a chorus Handelian in its breadth of treatment and grandeur of effect. "Deliverance" begins with a recitative setting forth the Herodian persecution, the imprisonment of Peter, and the coming of an angelic deliverer, who addresses the apostle in a vigorous and striking air, "Gird up thy loins." Composed for Mdlle. Tietjens, it is doubtful whether this number will have a place in the repertory of any artist less exceptionally gifted, its range being as uncommon as are its demands upon the singer's endurance. A chorus for angels, "Fear thou not," written for divided soprani and alti, comes next, but presents nothing exceptionally demanding notice. In a brief air, with harp accompaniment, Peter speaks of opened heavens and "visions of God," after which a recitative continues the narrative of his deliverance, and leads to a song, "The Lord hath sent His angel," expressive of the apostle's gratitude. Overmuch modulation here somewhat tells against the effect of music otherwise dignified and appropriate; but, on the whole, Peter's last air is not unworthy of its predecessors. The Apostle's restoration to his waiting friends is told in the next recitative; and a chorus for the latter, "Sing unto the Lord," ends the oratorio, the final number being distinguished by a double fugue, masterly and vigorous enough to show that Mr. Benedict left off as fresh as he began. We need scarcely add that the orchestration throughout is remarkable for fancy and variety, and that the music generally is in the composer's well-known and distinctive style.

That St. Peter has weak points nobody will dispute; but, on the other hand, few will contest that it is a remarkable and meritorious production, worthy to hand down the name of its composer to posterity, and to give him a place among the masters of his art.

We can find but small space for the details of a performance which may be described in one word—success. Mr. Benedict had at disposal the best available means. Mr. Joseph Barnby's choir supplied a chorus of rare acquirements; the orchestra was efficient; and the principal vocalists were—save that Herr Stockhausen replaced Mr. Sautley—the same as at the first hearing of St. Peter in Birmingham. Each artist gained more than one striking success. Mdlle. Tietjens, for example, made a profound impression in "I mourn as a dove," and the very different "Gird up thy loins," both being sung to perfection. The audience absolutely rushed to receive Mdlle. Peter's first recitative, and insisted on hearing twice "O thou afflicted," to which her lovely voice gave all needful expression. The tenor airs, but especially "The Lord is very pitiful," were sung by Mr. Sims Reeves's best manner, the last named making an unexampled sensation, and the trumpet in Peter was interpreted very artistically by Herr Stockhausen, whose rendering of "Oh, that my head were waters," ranked among the best efforts of the evening. Bearing in mind how unfamiliar and difficult was the work in hand, Mr. Barnby's choir deserves high praise for the success they achieved; nor should the efforts of the orchestra be passed without commendation. We must add also that Mr. Raynham was an efficient second tenor, and that the organ—a very important instrument in St. Peter—was well played by Mr. Docker. Mr. Benedict conducted, and at the close received an ovation from an audience comprising the "everybody" of the world of art. No tribute could have been better earned, but the talented composer doubtless found sufficient reward in the indisputable success of his crowning work.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The competition for the Westmorland Scholarship and Potter Exhibition took place on Monday the 19th inst., at the Institution in Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, the examiners being the Principal (Professor Sterndale Bennett), Mr. F. R. Cox, Mr. W. Dorrell, Mr. John Hullah, Mr. H. C. Lunn, Mr. G. A. Macfarren, Mr. Walter Macfarren, and Mr. Brinley Richards. The results were as follows: Westmorland Scholarship—Miss Mary Crawford (elected), Miss Pocklington, Miss Rebecca Jewell, Miss Frith, and Miss Goode (highly commended). Potter Exhibition—Miss Agnes A. Channell (elected), Miss Field, Miss Taylor, Miss Gardner, and Miss Waite (highly commended).

MUSIC AT BRIGHTON.

(From a Correspondent.)

Mr. Mapleson's Italian Opera Company have been giving a series of representations at the Theatre. Il Trovatore was performed on the opening night, when the house was crowded and Mdlle. Tietjens, the heroine of the evening, received with unbounded applause. La Traviata and Lucia di Lammermoor were the other operas, with Mdlle. Sessi in the principal parts.—Miss Walton's matinée musicale at the Pavilion was numerously attended, the Duchess of Cambridge having granted her name as patroness.—Mr. Hallam has given his "Musical Celebrations," which were hardly so well attended as they deserved.—Signor Mario's "farewell concert" was held on Saturday in the "Dome."—Other concerts have taken place during the last fortnight. The "Queen of watering places" is crowded with visitors.—Q.

ENGLISH OPERA IN AMERICA.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

Of all the numerous attempts to present English opera, hitherto made in America, that of Mdme. Parepa-Rosa last season was the best and most successful in every sense. Before her remarkable enterprise there had been no such conscientious preparation, artistic care, nor general completeness. Parties had travelled through the States with one or two capable players in the orchestra, and a few efficient choristers upon the stage, the rest of the instrumental and choral "forces" being composed of "extras," gathered by the wayside in the various cities "done" by the itinerant troupe; and who were utterly destitute of the requisite knowledge and experience. The conductor was consequently a kind of musical "rough," his business being chiefly to help out deficiencies with a tinkling little cottage piano, and tinker up scores in which, as a matter of course, there must otherwise have been such "gaps for rain's wasteful entrance" as would have rendered the unfortunate composer's meaning perfectly unintelligible. A good soprano, contralto, tenor, bass, and buffo, represented respectively by Miss Caroline Hitchings (now Mrs. Bernard), Mrs. Bebia Seguin, Messrs. W. Castle, S. Campbell, and E. Seguin, had to bear the entire burden of the repertory; for beyond these excellent performers there was literally nothing and nobody to depend upon. Nevertheless, the "Richings Opera troupe," as it was termed, went on for some years unchecked by any very conspicuous financial calamity. There was, however, a better time coming; and when it became known that Mdme. Parepa-Rosa, the greatest favourite of the day in this part of the world, was about to throw all her talent and the prestige of her name, together with a large sum of money into a new English opera scheme, the most sanguine expectations were raised.

Two gentlemen, Messrs. C. D. Hess and, W. Crosby, well-known here in theatrical circles, through their connection with the Chicago Opera House, went substantially into the project by risking seventy-two thousand dollars upon it; and thus the enterprise rested ab initio upon the solid basis of ready money.

But the next thing, and, indeed, the most important, was the use to which the ample funds in hand were to be put. Mr. Crosby, a sleeping partner in the concern, took no part in its direction. Mr. C. D. Hess, a theatrical manager of ability, and a commercial man of unimpeachable integrity, unswervingly faithful to all his engagements—energetic, too, in business—was still not qualified by education or experience to select a company of musical artists, or interfere profitably in the direction of a strictly lyric theatre. The onerous duties of the management devolved then naturally upon Mr. Carl Rosa, and to his spirit and judgment must be rightfully ascribed a very large portion of the unexampled success achieved by the Parepa-Rosa English opera troupe.

Of course the name of the prima donna herself was a tower of strength. No singer ever held a higher position with the American public, and although Madame Parepa had already sung in concerts, oratorios, and Italian operas with splendid results, whether artistic or pecuniary, she had yet to be heard in English opera; and so the charm of novelty was added to the magnetic attraction, which had drawn crowds to all her previous performances. Another advantage the enterprise was that it was inaugurated shortly after the great Boston Jubilee, where Madame Parepa carried off the chief honours, eliciting from an audience of 50,000 people such enthusiastic and genuine applause as I have rarely heard in the course of a pretty long experience. In short, the eminent artist's name was "up" all over the Union, and the moment consequently most propitious for the nascent English opera.

Mr. Carl Rosa, however, was sufficiently prudent and conscientious not to depend wholly upon his wife's name, even upon that associated with his own reputation, which stands very high in America; but set himself earnestly to the task of producing that excellence of ensemble which had hitherto been wanting in transatlantic English opera companies.

In my next letter I will furnish you with an account of the principal singers who travelled with the Parepa troupe (many of whom are unknown to you), the orchestral and choral organization, and a list of the operas performed during a brilliantly successful tour of nine months, believing that nothing relating to British art and artists, as, indeed, to the progress of music among our American cousins, can be indifferent to British musicians.

New York, December 9.

MESSICA.—The production of Isonard's opera, Joconde, at the Theatre Royal, has not turned out a success.—Cherubini's Medea, with the recitatives composed for it by Herr Franz Lachner, is in rehearsal at the same theatre.—Herr Nachbaur is better, but it will be some months before he can resume his professional duties. People do not recover from typhus fever in a day, any more than the City of the Seven Hills was erected in that period.

THE OVERTURES TO FIDELIO.

Every amateur knows the three overtures in C major, written by Beethoven for his opera, Fidelio; and how they represent, in a fashion wholly without parallel, the development of a first musical idea, through distinct and well marked stages, to proportions which are to it as the man to the child. The singular interest connected with these overtures must, from the first, have marked them out for more than the study which falls to the lot of any other work. Nothing, we need hardly say, has a greater fascination for intelligent observers than the mental processes by which great results are worked out. We have as keen a desire to know the How as the Where; and as eagerly seek to penetrate the mysteries of creation, as to discern whether creation itself is tending. In its own way, these Leonora overtures gratify us. To use the words of the eloquent and enthusiastic annotator of the Crystal Palace programmes, "Beethoven has admitted us, as it were, into his very work-room. All who have eyes to see and ears to hear, may behold him there, engaged in the actual head and labour of composition and revision; here pruning and there compressing; rejecting old materials; snatching up new ones; erasing ineffective passages; extending and enforcing effective ones; laying in here a brilliant spot, and there a trenchant line; elaborating, altering, fusing all in the glowing fire of his genius, till the result is that wonderful work of art (Leonora, No. 3) of which the world may well be proud." Such a peep into the laboratory of a mighty alchymist (who really possessed the philosopher's stone, seeing that everything he touched turned to gold) is as precious as it is rare; and we may well be astonished that, till yesterday week, the three overtures had never been heard in England at any one concert. The greatest ideas always appear the most obvious when once they have been enunciated; and the thought of hearing the Mendelssohn of treating the Leonora overtures as a single work in three stages, seems the least far-fetched in the world. English concert-givers, however, have been slow to act upon it; and concert-goers have had to wait the doings of those vigorous pioneers at the Crystal Palace. Here, however, we are reminded of "historic doubt," to which G., the annotator already quoted, evidently leans. We are not disposed to look with much favour upon historic doubts; regarding them as the troublesome out-growth of that feverish intellectual activity which, in our days, is ever seeking new fields of exertion. As a matter of fact, historic doubts are becoming a nuisance; and there seems every probability that they will succeed in reversing history; making the bad good, and the good bad; putting that first which is last, and that last which is first. But let us examine this historic doubt with which we are specially concerned. Looking at evidence furnished by Beethoven's sketch-book, Herr Nottebohm is disposed to think that Leonora No. 1 was written subsequent to Leonora No. 3—in other words, that Beethoven made a movement far in the spirit (represented by Leonora No. 2) whence he started. Setting aside the inherent improbability of such a thing, we may urge that the nature of the evidence influencing Herr Nottebohm's opinion makes the evidence itself worthless if it be not convincing. Herr Nottebohm, who probably can better judge the testimony supplied by Beethoven's sketch-book than any man, is not positive about its conclusiveness, and that fact, to us, ends the matter. Abundant evidence exists in favour of the generally received opinion, and no mere speculation will upset it. As already stated, G. leans to the side of the doubter, which fact the following extract from his remarks upon Leonora No. 3 shows:—

"May it not have been a feeling on Beethoven's part that his overture was too great for his opera, that made him, on its reproduction in 1814, write a fourth prelude to it, in which the drama is sketched in proportions more befitting the dimensions of the story? This will be corroborated if, as is possible, the first overture should eventually prove to have been composed after the third, in the year 1808."

With much deference to one who speaks as an authority, it appears to us that, in the passage quoted, G. has fixed himself on the horns of a dilemma. Admitting that Leonora No. 1 was written in 1808, under the circumstances stated, what becomes of the reason why the Fidelio overture (in E) subsequently appeared? Beethoven had suited the opera with an adequate prelude, by a special effort, and it was not likely that he would make another with results every way less valuable. But as G. allows us to infer that somewhere or other he will give a reason for the faith that is in him, the dilemma may, in the light of his explanation, turn out more apparent than real.

We have neither time nor space for the elaborate comparison of overture with overture which the subject invites; but every purpose is served if we refer our readers to G.'s masterly exposition in a recent Crystal Palace programme. An attentive perusal of the annotator's remarks will make any one interested about the matter au fait with its details. On one point, however, we shall be glad to find the general opinion in disagreement with G., who offers the following observations in reference to Leonora No. 3:—

"The only accusation that can be brought against the overture appears to be that it is too vast, not only for an operatic prelude, but for the subject of the story on which the opera is based. Instead of foreshadowing the personal griefs and joys, however momentous, of Leonora and Florestan, the anxieties of a gaoler, the perplexities of a clownish lover, the sufferings of a few prisoners, and the villainy of a petty commandant—instead of shadowing forth such petty occurrences as these, the 'Overture to Leonora,' always appears to me to be a fitting prelude to any of the most tremendous events or most terrible catastrophes that have occurred in history. The grief and the joy are the grief and joy not of private persons but of whole nations, the conflicts are the 'battles of shaking' of the Hebrew prophet. The whole overture appears to me to be lifted far above even the greatness of the opera which follows it—lifted far from the particular to the universal, from the individual to the national, from the simple to the complex, from the petty to the tremendous, from a misfortune to a catastrophe."

This is well expressed, but we must be pardoned for accounting it unphilosophical. The phenomena of which G. speaks as being more adequate to the lofty grandeur of Beethoven's opera, are but the aggregate outcome of individual emotions. There is nothing in this world greater than a human soul. Within it takes place revolutions, battles, victories, defeats, catastrophes, the manifestations of which makes history. A worm, when trodden on, "feels a pang as great as when a giant dies," and the single human soul is capable of all the joy and grief which strikes us as so imposing when manifested by many human souls at once. Beethoven was right, therefore, when he brought all the force of his genius to illustrate the divine affection and self-sacrifice of Leonora. The greatest event in the world's history was the execution of a Nazarene peasant; and, after it, Beethoven could have chosen nothing grander as a subject, than the woman who, risking the penalty, unbarred her husband. Entering, therefore, we disagree with G.; and to use his own illustration, the trumpet-call which breaks in upon the turmoil of the orchestra, hushing it to silence, could have no greater result than arresting the criminal sword, and heralding the triumph of right.

TRADUTEUR ESQ.

QUERY.

It was in London, and in eighteen hundred and eleven. Weber was in a boat on the river with some ladies, and began to perform on the flute, which he played to great perfection. But seeing that his boat was followed closely by another, in which were several young officers, he put his flute in his pocket.

"Why do you stop playing?" said one of the officers to Weber. "For the same reason that I began," replied the composer. "And that is?" "Because it pleases me." "Well, then," said the officer, "take up your flute again, or it will cost me dear to throw you into the water!"

The composer, seeing that the dialogue was unpleasant to the ladies he was with, gave way, and began playing again. When leaving his boat, however, he accosted the bold son of Mars, and said:—"Sir, the fear of annoying the people who were with me made me brook your insolence; but to-morrow I will have entire satisfaction. We can meet in Hyde Park at ten o'clock. If you have no objection we will fight with swords; we need no seconds; the quarrel is only between you and me, and it is quite useless to bring in strangers."

The officer accepted the challenge. He was at the rendezvous at the appointed hour and met Weber as agreed on. He drew his sword, and put himself on guard, when Weber presented a pistol at his throat. "Do you wish to murder me?" said the officer. "No," said Weber, "but be kind enough to put up that sword, and to dance a minuet, or you are a dead man."

The officer made some objection, but the authoritative and determined tone of Weber seemed to influence him, and notwithstanding the arrival of some people on the scene of action, he went through what he was asked, or rather told to do. "Sir," said the musician, "you compelled me yesterday to play against my wish—I have now compelled you to dance against yours. Our bond is over. However, should you be dissatisfied still, I am quite ready to give you any satisfaction you may wish for."

The officer held out his hand, and begged his adversary to honour him with his friendship. From that moment an attachment sprang up between them, which lasted to the day the illustrious composer died.—Orpheus.

["Orpheus"—thou art to be respected as an equestrian! We have heard this anecdote ere now; but, if we remember not egregiously, the hero was either Spontini or some one else.—A. S. S.]

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Mdme. Artôt-Padilla and her husband have been singing successfully at the Stadttheater. They appeared, also, at the Museum Concert, where they met with an equally gratifying reception.

STUTTGART.—Herr Robert von Hornstein has just completed the music of a ballet entitled, Der Blumen Rache (The Revenge of the Flowers), and founded upon Freiligrath's poem of the same name. It has been accepted, and will shortly be produced, at the Theatre Royal.

PROVINCIAL.

Malvern.—A correspondent favours us with the following:—

"The Literary and Mechanics' Institute United Choral Society which comprises members of the Mechanics' Institutes in and around Malvern, gave their first concert on Thursday, December 15, at Mr. Haynes's room, which was tolerably well filled. The programme consisted of anthems, choruses, &c., followed by glees, songs, and secular choruses. All were rendered with precision and expression by the numerous choir, under the able bâton of their conductor, Mr. J. T. Hornebluw, organist of Tewkesbury Abbey Church. The choir was assisted on this occasion by Master Nowth and Mr. Milward, of Worcester Cathedral Choir. The former sang several ballads very prettily, each time being rapturously encored, and Mr. Milward, who possesses a fine baritone voice, sang several solos, his power and expression being much admired. The concert passed off satisfactorily.

Bedford.—The Messiah was given by the Amateur Musical Society of this town on Tuesday week, and a local journal says, with regard to its performance:—

"Miss Robertine Henderson was the soprano, and the society also availed themselves of two eminent professional violinists. As it would be impracticable to go in detail through the programme, we may say that the society was, on the whole, most successful in the production of this arduous work. The Pastoral Symphony was rendered with admirable sweetness and effect. The recitatives and airs were also appreciated; while the choruses were sustained with power and precision. 'Thou art gone up on high' was rendered with much feeling and effect, while 'Why do the nations?' was also creditable to local talent. 'Let us break their bonds,' and the 'Hallelujah,' were also amongst the most successful efforts of the evening. 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' was the gem of the evening, Miss Henderson infusing into it a depth of feeling and devotional earnestness which indicated not only professional powers of a high order but also dramatic taste and refined culture, qualities and gifts which were apparent in the rendering of every passage sung by this talented lady throughout the evening. The 'Amen Chorus,' was a fitting conclusion to an excellent performance."

Liverpool.—The Liverpool Mercury of Dec. 20 says:—

"The Societa Armonica, on Saturday evening, commemorated the centenary of the birth of Beethoven by devoting the whole of the public concert programme to selections from his works. The hall of the Liverpool Institute, was filled, and therefore the object in view will be satisfactorily attained. The chief composition in the programme was Beethoven's No. 2 Symphony. If the opening adagio and allegro were not so steadily played as one could have wished, the larghetto was interpreted with rare sympathy and intelligence, while the two remaining portions of the symphony left little to be desired. In the opening overture to Prometheus, the band also showed that careful study and thorough appreciation were not wanting. The chorus rendered the 'Kyrie and Gloria' from No. 1 Mass, 'Susceptible Hearts' and 'Hail, mighty Master' from the Mount of Olives and the 'Hallelujah' from the Mount of Olives, with great spirit, and marked precision. The long and trying air, 'Ah! perfido,' was sung by Miss Monkhouse in a most artistic and finished style, while Mr. T. J. Hughes showed both vocal power and musical intelligence in his robust money all to sorrow (Fidelio). The famous trio, 'Tremate empi tremate,' rendered by Miss Monkhouse, Mr. Hughes, and Mr. James M'Ardle, was a most interesting item. Mr. Lawson's playing of the Romance in F was brilliant and effective, and Mr. Armstrong ably fulfilled his duties as conductor."

Croydon.—Referring to a very interesting concert given by Mr. George Russell on Tuesday week, the local Advertiser says:—

"It is the fashion to decry classical music as 'dry.' Propose a sonata by Beethoven or Mozart at 'a few friends and a little music party,' and you are likely to be outvoted in favour of Sydney Smith or Virginia Gabriel. In seaside places we have often felt oppressed by the noise of a band, drowning for a few moments that ineffable ceaseless music of the ocean which we had come miles to hear and feel; but we knew that minutes measured the existence of that noise whilst ages could not alter the grandeur of that music. Such state of things as we have alluded to (as the strongest striving against, and for a moment mastering the permanent—the changing surpassing by its glitter the steady glow of the lasting. No one who was with us in the Public Hall on Tuesday and heard the hearty and continued applause which greeted the Kreutzer sonata, and that loveliest of the Beethoven string quartets No. 5 (in A major), could have failed to see that common drawing-room music is the noisy seaside band, prevailing temporarily against the resistless wave of true taste and true music. That an audience should remain, with but few exceptions, to the close of a long concert, entirely composed of classical masterpieces, all the work of one man's brain, shows that the musical press and popular concerts have made their first step in the musical education of England. Mr. Russell selected as his solo the grand sonata in C, Op. 53. The great difficulties of the composition, are the explanation at once of Mr. Russell's exclusive 'copyright' (at Croydon), and of its selection for this concert. Nevertheless, we wish he had chosen another. The difficulties, of course, were well surmounted, but the plan of the work is not so clear as that of many other sonatas by the same composer; and the work is not to our mind so beautiful nor so representative of its many-sided author as half-a-dozen we could name. In one word, the player sacrificed himself to the author. We confess to have enjoyed much more keenly the matchless duet sonata for pianoforte and violin, which has immortalized Kreutzer, to whom it was dedicated, and which, as regards difficulty, is almost child's play to the solo sonata in C of which we have just spoken. By the deep attention and appreciative applause given to one of the best performances we have ever heard proved that our own delight was shared by all present. After the 'Kreutzer,' the work which gained the most applause, was the quartet, No. 5, in A for stringed instruments only, played by Messrs. Straus, Louis Ries, Zerbini, and Daubert. These artists play so much together—notably at the celebrated Monday Popular Concerts—that we might have expected a finished performance, but the delicacy and perfect expression which characterized the playing of all four, especially of Messrs. Straus (violin) and Daubert (violoncello) were far beyond our anticipations. Two great works still remain to be noticed: the duet sonata, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and the trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, No. 1, in E flat, which opened the concert. In both Mr. Russell completely won the ear of his audience, and was well matched by Messrs. Straus and Daubert in the trio, and Mr. Daubert in the duet. Miss Banks sang 'Ah, perfido' (Beethoven) and 'The Quail,' as well as 'Come in das Feld,' Nordblom sang 'Adelaide,' in German. When we say that Beethoven's centenary was worthily celebrated on Tuesday last, we think that higher or truer praise to the artists concerned, especially to Mr. George Russell, it is not in our power to give."

Edinburgh.—The Scotsman of December 16, contains the following:—

"Professor Oakeley gave yesterday afternoon an organ performance in honour of Beethovan, whose birthday was the 17th December, 1770. The programme consisted entirely of arrangements, as the great master wrote no organ music, and ran as follows:—

"Kyrie Eleison, Mass in D; Larghetto, from Symphony No. 2; Adagio and Tempo di Menuetto, from Septuor; Song, 'Adelaide;' Allegretto, from Trio for Pianoforte, Violin, and 'Cello; Adagio, Fragment from P. F. Concerto, No. 5; Overture, 'Egmont.'

"'Adelaide,' admirably sung by a distinguished amateur tenor, was an unexpected and acceptable variety. Mr. Oakeley's prefatory remarks related in part to the various Beethoven celebrations going on this year in Germany and in Britain. He drew a contrast between the Missa Solemnis in D and the Mass in C written twenty years earlier, speaking of the former (together with the vocal portions of the Choral Symphony) as the most elaborate and difficult choral music ever conceived. He ended by characterising Beethoven as the greatest composer in pure music, independent of the association of words, and therefore the greatest composer whom the world has yet seen."

Weymouth.—We read as follows in the Southern Times:—

"Herr Van Heddeghem and Mr. Avant's concert on Monday was by no means so extensively patronized as it deserved, but this was due more to uncontrollable circumstances than to the apathy of the musical public of Weymouth. The first piece on the programme was Beethoven's sonata in F for violin and piano, the performers being Herr Van Heddeghem and Mr. Avant. The violin being master of the situation in a great measure, effectiveness depends much on this instrument, and Herr Van Heddeghem was, as usual, perfect. His mastery of the mechanical intricacies of the violin, renders him peculiarly qualified to execute music of this elevated standard, and his colleague at the piano ably maintained the place he has won as a first-rate executant. Mr. Avant's pianoforte solo, a selection from Mendelssohn's 'Songs without Words,' obtained a large share of the honours of the evening, the touch, phrasing, and purity with which it was delivered being remarkable. The first part terminated with the violin concerto of Mendelssohn, played by Herr Van Heddeghem, with Mr. Avant as accompanist. It was one of the most superb displays of talent we have had the good fortune to hear. The second part opened with Mozart's sonata in A, for violin and piano, executed with the same finish that had characterised the previous part of the concert. Mr. Avant's piano fantasia (Weihl) was another of the gems of the evening, as was a violin fantasia, by Herr Van Heddeghem, written by him some years ago. The theme is original, and the variations founded in it present the greatest diversity without losing the identity of their source; nevertheless, Herr Van Heddeghem acquitted himself with wonderful certainty and precision. The concert concluded with Gounod's 'Meditation on Bach's First Prelude, for violin, piano, and voice. We hope another concert of this delightful character will shortly be given."

THE BEETHOVEN CENTENARY.

A CONTEMPORARY well observes, that "England, represented by her metropolis, need not be ashamed of the manner in which the hundredth birthday of Beethoven has been kept." We are a people not given to making a fuss and pother over every feast in the calendar. Saints' days, high days, and holidays (one or two of the latter excepted) come and go so quietly that only students of the almanack or microscopic observers know anything about them. The reason is, that Englishmen hate "demonstrations;" accounting life much too serious a matter for any part of it to be wasted in mere effusiveness. Whether they are right or wrong is a point not now for discussion; but the fact nobody can dispute; and in view of it there never was a doubt that the Beethoven Centenary, if observed at all, would be observed in a businesslike manner, and for business purposes. The result is one more proof of how far private enterprise in England amounts for the absence of that organizing spirit which, elsewhere, gives something like national importance to public festivals. Ours is essentially the country of self-help; and if men want anything done they must either do it themselves or show others that the task can be made profitable. We very well know that such a state of things smacks more than a little of the shop; but this is an imperfect world, and the good of independent action and self-reliance cannot be had without the stimulus of private reward. The millenium has not yet come; when it has, journalists of the time may be able to report astounding instances of unalloyed public spirit.

We should hesitate to call the circumstances unfortunate which placed the observance of Beethoven's Centenary in the hands of professional entrepreneurs. The work was not only done in businesslike fashion, as we have already observed, but in precisely the way adapted to effect most good. Suppose a monster "demonstration" had been organized at the Crystal Palace, combining the energies of every interested party, or else making efforts elsewhere futile, what would have been the result? Doubtless, great prominence for the event of the day, great talk about Beethoven, and considerable wonder at the growth of modern musical resources. But the affair would have bettered nobody by an increased knowledge of the master's works; it would have been, in fact, mere "sound and fury, signifying nothing." Happily, there was no chance of such a thing passing; and, therefore, it was not attempted—an obvious preference being given to many modest performances over one pretentious exhibition. It is satisfactory to count up the resultant gains. What, for example, have the London public heard within the last two or three months, to say nothing of works presented at other periods of the centenary year? At the Monday Popular Concerts a large proportion of Beethoven's earlier chamber compositions have been heard, including the first ten quartets and the Septet, including also a selection of songs not often brought forward. At the Crystal Palace the nine symphonies, the five pianoforte concertos, and all the master's overtures, two excepted, have formed but part of a rich and varied programme. The Sacred Harmonic Society has given the Mass in C and the Mount of Olives, while Fidelio has been played at Covent Garden and smaller musical associations scattered over the wide metropolitan area, have energetically followed in the wake of their larger brethren. Beyond question here is a goodly list; and when we add to it works performed in the chief provincial towns—Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, for example—it is impossible to say that England has been backward in honouring Beethoven whatever country may take precedence. The ultimate issue of all these doings can only be guessed; but in the very nature of things, it must be great, since to a great result the cause is adequate. How many who understood and appreciated Beethoven before, now understand and appreciate him more thoroughly than ever? And how many, to whom he was but an undefined shadow, now discern in him attractive lineaments, to see which is to love?. We cannot but have faith in abundant outcomes such as these; nor can we refuse to believe that the first Beethoven Centenary has done more to advance Beethoven's rightful fame than the propagandism of many foregoing years. For this, let us insist once more, thanks are due to a mode of keeping the feast which, while it glorified nobody but the hero of the time, was of the greatest public service.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

At the 31st general meeting of the shareholders in the Crystal Palace Company, held on Monday, the President, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Q.C., M.P., made the following reference to the late general manager, Mr. R. K. Bowley:—

"The shareholders would remark on the last page of the report a reference to the loss which the company had sustained by the death of the late Mr. Bowley, the general manager, and most, if not all, the shareholders present would feel with him that the order of the items should be so far reversed as to admit of his paying a small tribute to the memory of a gentleman who had passed from amongst them, but who had, for a long series of years, devoted a vast amount of energy and ability to promoting the success of the company. When Mr. Bowley was appointed general manager, the company, in consequence of the very extravagant outlay in early years, was in considerable difficulty, and from the moment of his appointment he devoted his time, and great ability, and talent to remedying the mistakes which had been made, and putting the company upon a sound footing by earning a dividend for the shareholders. (Loud cheers.) Of course it would be simply impossible for any man to be able to please every member of a large body of shareholders such as composed the Crystal Palace Company, but there was no man who had devoted more time, attention, ability, and energy to promoting the interests of the company he served than the late Mr. Bowley, and the shareholders owed him a deep debt of gratitude."

How thoroughly deserved was this graceful tribute of respect we need hardly remind our readers.

A CONTEMPORARY has the following curious paragraph:—

"Apropos of the pedants who have been cruder in nothing than their talk about 'inner meaning,' 'plagiarism,' and such matters, attention is due to a recent article in the Orchestra touching the misdeeds—nay rather the good deeds—of Handel; who, rich and noble as he was, laid hands on and beautified whatever it pleased him to appropriate, or recurred to his memory unconsciously. This paper contains the plain, healthy truth as regards musical question—or rather the adaption and application of certain notes to certain phrases of expression. Mozart's 'Life let us cherish' is reproduced (consciously) in the prelude to Rossini's Semiramide overture and Rossini's phrase again (by merely a transformation of the tempo), in that most magnificent piece of modern combination in oratorio music—the 'Sanctus,' in Mendelssohn's Elijah.

First—we recognize in the above, not the accredited musical critic of the Athenæum, but his predecessor. Secondly—what is Mozart's "Life let us cherish"? Thirdly—Rossini never confessed anything of the kind; had he done so he would have been (which he was triumphantly not)—a donkey Fourthly—the talk about Mendelssohn's "Sanctus" is nonsense.

A WRITER in an American paper (the Hartford Post) thus sums up his opinions of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson:—

"She is Like a Railroad Train at Highest Speed, with a Load of Hearts—She Sails, Also, and upon a Full Tide—She suddenly Reverses Her Steam, Stops Short, Ceases Out, Strong in her Self Passages, and Goes Across a High Bridge Over a Torrent Firm an its Foundations, the Hushed Atmosphere, Meantime Being Highly Charged with Romance." How is that for high?

How is that for high?—appropriately enquires the Philadelphia Evening City Item.

THE New York Herald of Nov. 22nd has the subjoined reference to Mdlle. Nilsson:—

"At the recent Steinway Hall concerts Christine Nilsson exhibited wonderful power in the scene from Hamlet and the scene from Faust. For the nonce all the drawbacks and deficiencies of a concert room were forgotten. The audience caught a glimpse of the real scope of her genius. The emotional and intellectual expression of her face was intense, and her acting was no less superb than the management of her pure, sweet-toned voice was faultless. Each scene was a fine dramatic illusion. A strong desire was at once awakened to see and hear this consummate artist in opera, the sphere in which her greatest European triumphs were won."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Pall Mall Gazette of the 16th has the following, Apropos of the most recent Public Rehearsal of the Royal Academy of Music:—

"The last 'public rehearsal' by the students of the Royal Academy of Music was one of more than ordinary interest, the conspicuous feature of the programme being a selection (Parts 1 and 2) from John Sebastian Bach's Weihnachts Oratorium (Christmas Oratorio). Mr. John Hullah conducted. Bach's choral music is always more or less difficult; and in the present instance it was wholly strange, the oratorio never before having been publicly tried in this country. The attempt was therefore highly laudable, and the young singers to whom the solo parts were confided (Misses Mandsley and Marian Severn, Messrs. Shakspeare, Howells, Wadmore, and Parry) are entitled to much credit. The chorus was, on the whole, tolerably efficient; not so the orchestra. There was enough of good, however, in the performance to deserve all encouragement. The students of the Royal Academy can hardly be better engaged than in such endeavours."

To Dr. Abraham Saboke Silent.

MY SINGULAR GOOD SILENT,—The readers of your incomparable Musical World will have seen with interest the subjoined announcement in the Times:—

"CONSCIENCE MONEY.—The Secretary of the Inland Revenue has received, by the Collector of Langbourn Ward, from 'B. O. S.,' half-notes for £30, on account of income-tax."

It may occur to some musicians that half-notes for £30 on account of income-tax, will, when re-united to their other relatives, amount to what is familiarly called a pretty tune. This consideration may suggest to income-tax payers, that if the pipe of peace should be broken with Russia to the tune of some hundreds of millions, they alone will have to pay the piper. In that case, anybody who pays any more income-tax than he can help, and voluntarily sends any money "on account" of it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the Secretary of the Inland Revenue, may well sign himself "B. O. S." His name would be Bovis in the genitive case; he would be a beef-headed fellow, and a Blessed Old Simpleton.—I am, my singular good Silent, yours as ever,

PUNCH.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

CAMBERWELL.—Miss Charlotte James's annual concert took place in Camberwell Hall on the 13th inst., and was attended by a numerous company. The pianoforte performances of the fair bénéficiaire, who proved herself a talented and accomplished artist, formed an attractive feature, and commanded the warmest approbation. Herr Otto Booth (violin), Mr. Wrenar (violoncello), Signor Felix Bitti (flute), and Miss Ehrenberg, an apt pupil of Miss James, assisted in the interpretation of some well chosen classical subjects; and the list of vocalists comprised the names of Miss Annie Sinclair, Mr. Henry Guidon, Mr. Ralph Percy, and Mr. Henry Clive. Altogether the programme was of a very pleasing nature, and afforded the liviest satisfaction to Miss James's many friends.—W. H. P.

MR. CHARLES STANTON gave an entertainment at the Vestry Hall Chelsea, on Tuesday evening, December 6th, entitled "Over the Border." The first part consisted of the expedition and misfortunes of Prince Charles Edward, with appropriate songs; and the second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Stanton's singing of the Jacobite songs, especially "Wha'll be King but Charlie," obtained for him deserved applause. "The Hundred Pipers," "Wae's me for Prince Charlie," "He's o'er the hills that I lo'e west," "Will ye no come back again," "Wha wadna fecht for Charlie," were also admired. The late Mr. Rodwell's martial song, "Draw the sword, Scotland," concluded the first part of the entertainment. The miscellaneous songs given were "Mary Morrison," "Auld Robin Gray," "Scots, wha hae," "The Laird o' Cockpen," "Hame cam our gudeman," &c. Mr. Stanton was listened to throughout by a select and attentive audience, who manifested their appreciation of his ability, by enthusiastically recalling him at the end of both portions of his entertainment. We wish Mr. Stanton every success. The lovers of Scotch music had a treat of no ordinary character.

BRIXTON.—The residents in this suburb have had abundant opportunities of listening to high-class music lately, and, to do them justice, let it be said that they have not been backward in using them. Since the commencement of the present month these concerts, each of which has attracted some peculiar interest of its own, have been given at the Institute in the Gresham Road. Taking them in order, the first event was a performance of Mr. Barnby's new Scriptural idyll, Rebekah, and Professor Bennett's May Queen, by the Brixton Choral Society. Whether the two works were placed in juxtaposition with a view of provoking a comparison is not known, but the light and graceful music of the pastoral certainly carried away all the honours. Mr. Barnby's work was recorded a very pull nt and attentive hearing, and received justice at the hands of Mr. Lemare's well rehearsed choir, which, with the exception of the solo and chorus, "Who shall be fleetest?" the numbers failed to elicit decided approbation. The solos of the evening were sung by Miss Emily Spitler, Madame Estelle, Mr. Broadman, and Mr. J. S. Beale.—A day or two subsequently the Amateur Musical Society held their second concert, when the orchestra performed Haydn's "Letter Q" symphony, the Athalie march, an operatic selection on Faust, and the overture to the Domino Noir. The playing was characterized by more than the usual amount of care and precision, and each effort evoked warm applause. Mdlle. Berri contributed two pianoforte pieces, which met with the recognition they merited, whilst vocal solos were given by Miss Frederica Taylor, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Wilson.—The third concert, and to the musical student, the most interesting, was given by Mr. Ridley Prentice last week. The programme was then constituted entirely of Beethoven's chamber compositions, and included the serenade trio, Waldstein sonata, pianoforte trio in C minor, and the romance in G for violin. The sonata was played by Mr. Prentice with great brilliancy, and more than ever evinced his fine capabilities as a solo performer. Mr. H. Blagrove rendered the violin romance to such perfection that the audience insisted upon its repetition, and carried the point. In the concerted pieces, the concert-giver was aided by Mr. H. Blagrove, Mr. Richard Blagrove, and Mr. Aylward, from which it may be gathered that all went satisfactorily. Miss Blanche Cole, Mr. Harley Vining, and Mr. Billiter supplied the vocal pieces, which, like the instrumental, were Beethoven's; and Mr. G. S. Minson conducted. The audience on this occasion was more than ordinarily large.—W. H. P.

PRAGUE.—Herr Jules de Swert lately appeared at a concert with great success. Among other things, he played a Concerto for Violoncello, by Mullique, and a composition by J. S. Bach.

CARLSRUHE.—The Cecilia Association recently gave a concert in honour of the German Soldiers who have fallen in the war. The programme was thus constituted:—Choral, "Wenn ich einmal soll scheiden," Bach; chorus of lamentation from Judas Maccabæus, Handel; "Die Wacht am Rhein; Verses with connecting Music; Funeral March from the Sinfonica eroica, Beethoven; chorus from St. Paul, Mendels ohn; and Requiem, Cherubini.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The last of the twelve ante-Christmas concerts at the Crystal Palace, in the programme of which, for reasons unnecessary to state over again, so large a share has been devoted to the music of Beethoven, was given on Saturday afternoon. This concert was not only the last, but the best, of the series. Mr. Manns had prepared a selection rich in variety and excellence, the most conspicuous feature being the Choral Symphony—the unparalleled "No 9," which it is difficult to imagine that the "No 10," projected though never carried out, could possibly have surpassed, although, if certain authorities may be credited, it was conceived by Beethoven on a still vaster scale. The solo vocal parts in the final movement of the symphony were entrusted to Misses Arabella Smythe and Julia Elton, Mr. Vernon Rigby and Herr Stockhausen, who did their best to give effect to that which it is scarcely within the bounds of possibility to make effective. All the rest of the performance was magnificent. It is superfluous to praise the orchestra of the Crystal Palace, which, by force of unceasing earnestness and diligence, Mr. Manns has p'aced at the head of all our orchestras; but we are glad to be able to say a word of emphatic praise in favour of the Crystal Palace Choir, which, though at first showing no great promise, has recently exhibited such signs of improvement as to justify a hope that not long hence Mr. Manns will have a first rate chorus as well as a first-rate orchestra at disposal. The choral portions of the Ninth Symphony—how difficult need hardly be said—were for the most part extremely well sung; and we may almost say, for the first time in our remembrance, that those in the Choral Fantasia—another feature in the programme—were done to perfection, not a "hitch" being observable. The pianoforte part in this fanciful and exquisite composition—interesting not merely on its own account, but because it was produced immediately after the "C minor" and "Pastoral" symphonies (Nos. 5 and 6), and immediately before the fifth, last, and greatest of the pianoforte concertos (in E flat)—was entrusted to Madame Arabella Goddard, who for many years has been its worthiest interpreter, and who never played it with more brilliant success than on the occasion under notice. A still more remarkable performance, however, of our English pianist was that of the "thirty-two variations on a theme in C minor" (composed in 1807, the year before the Mass in C), perhaps Beethoven's most original and masterly essay in this style. The variations referred to are, probably on account of their extreme difficulty, seldom played in public; nor are they, at a first hearing, very easy to appreciate at their worth. The now (thanks to Mr. Manns) pretty well cultivated audience of the Crystal Palace, however, seemed to understand them almost as well as they understood the more familiar, because more frequently played, "Choral Fantasia," and called back the performer at the end of one as heartily as they had called him back at the end of the other. The remaining instrumental piece in this most attractive programme was the overture to Prometheus (Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, a ballet to which Beethoven set music in the year 1800—"Ein heroisches, allegorisches Ballet," as it was styled in the bills of the Burg-Theater at Vienna, where it was originally produced). This opened the concert with wonderful spirit, and was well in place, if only on account of its being the first of Beethoven's orchestral compositions ever made known to England. Our grandmothers were more or less familiar with this overture, and tried more or less successfully, to play it on the pianoforte, in alternation with Kotzwara's famous "Battle of Prague," Nicolai's scarcely less famous "Sonata in C," and Pleyel's even more famous "Concertante" and "Variations on the German Hymn" (the "German Hymn," be it remembered). Now, however, that not only the "Sonata in C" of Nicolai is forgotten, like its hundred-and-one companions, that Pleyel's "Concertante" and his "Variations" on the "German Hymn," rest equally in oblivion, and that even the "Battle of Prague" itself is neglected by our pianists (shame upon them!)—the overture to Prometheus flourishes as an evergreen, and, so long as music exists, so long will it flourish in the same wise.

The vocal selection, also exclusively from Beethoven, included one of his arrangements of Irish melodies for two voices, accompanied by pianoforte, violin, violoncello, to Johanna Baillie's words, "Sweet power of Song" (better known in England as "Rich and rare were the gems she wore," thanks to Tom Moore), sung in duet by Misses Ellen Horne and Julia Elton; the inevitable "Adelaide," by Vernon Rigby, who, in consequence of the non-appearance of the appointed pianist, was accompanied on the pianoforte by Mdme. Goddard; the four settings of Goethe's stanzas, "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt," given by Miss Arabella Smythe (accompanied by Mr. Deringer), with a certain monotony of style, as though Beethoven had intended them to be all the same, whereas he intended them to be all different, or he would not have set them four times over; and two of the Lieder from Op. 75, to the poetry of Goethe, for whom at one period of his life Beethoven had an almost rabid enthusiasm. These last-named—"Kennst du das Land" (Mignon's song in Wilhelm Meister), and "Herz, mein Herz" (or "Neue Liebe, neues Leben")—were admirably given by Herr Stockhausen, who was accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Franklin Taylor. Altogether, this concert in honour of Beethoven was one with which no lover of Beethoven could have felt otherwise than content; and not a little of the gratification derived was owing to the erudite and entertaining annotations by "G," which go so far to open the eyes of the Crystal Palace public to the merits of each particular piece in the programme.

The next Saturday concert will not take place till the 21st of January.

MR. HOWARD GLOVER.

We take the following notice of a concert given by Mr. Glover from Watson's Art Journal:—

The complimentary benefit of Mr. Howard Glover, at Wallack's Theatre, on Wednesday morning last, was a failure, miserable beyond expression. The public is a strange mixture of coolness and enthusiasm; now liberal as the day for remote purposes, and again stony-hearted and close-fisted to appeals near at hand. It seems only necessary to inform the public of the needs of some worthy artist, to look up every generous sentiment and to insure an empty auditorium. An excellent programme was offered, to be executed by such artists as Mrs. Zadine Anna Bishop, Mrs. Zadine Segnin, Mlle. Marie Krebs Mdme. Krebs-Michalesi, Signor Ronconi, Mr. J. R. Thomas, and Mr. Alberto Lawrence; and yet there were scarcely a hundred persons present, including the free list! But if the public expressed their indifference by their absence, a more criminal indifference was shown by some of the artists whose names appeared on the programme. Neither Madame nor Miss Krebs, nor Mrs. Zaida Seguin, nor Mr. Lawrence, put in an appearance, and only a general apology as to sickness was made for their absence. We think some explanation is due to the public for such a breach of faith to them: for it would have been the same if the audience had been composed of thousands instead of a hundred. What epidemic was it that thus incapacitated four artists at the same time? Was it a real indisposition, or only a disposition not to appear? Did they volunteer their services in a good cause, or were their names used without their consent? We should like to know the facts of the case, and if their explanation is due either from the recusant artists or from the bénéficiaire if Mr. Glover can be so named in this instance. Those artists who were present exerted themselves nobly, Madame Anna Bishop, like the true woman and splendid artist that she is, supplied some deficiencies by adding to her number of pieces, and her kind efforts were cordially appreciated by all present. Signor Ronconi, whose services are so freely and generously tendered for charitable purposes, and Mr. J. R. Thomas aided the efforts of Madame Bishop in the same, and put the audience in a good humour by their admirable singing and their generous zeal. It was a pleasure to listen to two such highly cultivated artists. Mr. Harry Sanderson came forward at a moment's notice, in place of Miss Krebs, and played with his usual dash and brilliancy. Mr. Howard Glover conducted his orchestra in a most able manner, and the selections from his opera made a pleasurable sensation and were very cordially received, considering the slimness of the audience. The whole affair was every way worthy of liberal public patronage and we most sincerely regret that his efforts to deserve and secure that patronage should pass so utterly without response."

CASSEL.—Beethoven's Centenary waf to be duly celebrated at the Theatre Royal, and the celebration was to last three evenings. Fidelio and a Prologue were to be given on the first evening; Egmont on the second; and the Ninth Symphony on the third.

ROME.—An old custom of the Eternal City has been summarily swept away with the temporal power of the Holiness the Pope. Every year, shortly before Christmas, the Pifferari used to come down from the Abruzzi, and sing their simple recitatives, to the accompaniment of their shepherds' pipes, and their bag-pipes, before every effigy of the Virgin. They considered it a religious duty to minister those shepherds who once visited the manger where our Saviour lay. It is true that their strains disturbed the morning slumbers of many persons who happened to have returned late from some ball or party; but the fact of these skin-clad musicians of the mountains appearing in the streets at this peculiar season had a whiff of antiquity about it very grateful and refreshing to a large number of individuals, especially foreigners. However, in the eyes of the Italian police authorities, a pifferaro is nothing more nor less than an organ-grinder is in the estimation of that highly-sensitive but deeply-respected mythematician, Mr. Babbage—a nuisance to be summarily removed; and so, removed he has been.

SCOTTISH ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

(From a Correspondent.)

This society has brought over from Berlin, for the season, an orchestra of fifty performers, and, under the conductorship of Mr. Adam Hamilton, is giving a series of subscription concerts, of which the fourth took place at Edinburgh, on Monday, the 12th instant. The strings were, as usual, reinforced by Miss Bertha and Miss Emmy Drechsler Hamilton, daughters of the conductor, who have a high reputation, not only in the modern Athens, but at Leipsic, as solo-violinists.

The orchestral part of the concert included the overtures to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Der Freischütz, and Le Siège de Corinthe, all well played and with spirit, and the gala de résurrection the Reformation Symphony. The last named work has only been heard once before in Edinburgh, at the Reid Concert of 1868, and it was not quite so satisfactorily rendered on this occasion. Herr Rothfeld, a resident pianist of some note, played Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor; and Miss Agnes Drechsler Hamilton, aged fourteen (a sister of the ladies already named), gave a very excellent rendering of De Beriot's first violin concerto, playing with a tone and expression that betoken great future excellence. The vocalist was Mdme. Vanzini, first known in Edinburgh two years ago. She is at all times an acceptable visitor both as an operatic and a concert singer, and had on this occasion a warm reception. Her voice has gained both in flexibility and power since we first heard her, and not a little disappointment was felt in many quarters when she did not sing one of Mr. Mapleson's company during their last visit to this city. Her first song, "Bel raggio," is very exacting, but the difficult runs and embellishments were all, except perhaps the closing cadenza, given with great perfection. Her two other songs, Sullivan's "Lullaby" and Spohr's "Rose, softly blooming," had each the compliment of an encore; the former being given very sweetly, while in the latter—differing entirely from the style of music in which we have hitherto heard her—Mdme. Vanzini sang with much feeling and expression.

The society gave a similar concert at the City Hall, Glasgow, the next evening; and the programme included the selections above-named, with Carl Reinecke's entr'acte from König Manfred. This charming entr'acte, for strings con sordini, was delicately played and repeated; and the movement suggests that it might be desirable to know more of the music written by Reinecke to Frederick Röber's drama. The vocalist was again Mdme. Vanzini, who is as great a favourite at Glasgow as at Edinburgh, and whose singing of the Queen of Night's music in the Zauberflöte is still remembered. She gave the same songs at Edinburgh with equal success, and being recalled after each, she added an air—we believe especially written for her by Mr. Harrison of Edinburgh—with much feeling as to make her hearers wish they may again have the pleasure of listening to this favourite artist.

Pips from Punch.

The Vicar of Wakefield will shortly be produced as a ballet. "Shortly" applies to the costumes.

An enthusiastic habitué being present at Drury Lane on the appearance of Miss Victoria Vokes as Amy Robsart, broke out into the following impromptu:—

"The others may be clever folks,
But Miss V. Vokes my praise evokes."

The gentleman is supposed by the stall-keeper to have been Mr. Alfred Tennyson in disguise.

In consequence of the enormous success of The Midsummer Night's Dream at the Queen's Theatre, Mr. Phelps will appear as Othello.

A composer has set the Poet-Laureate to music. The new volume of twelve short poems is soon to appear with Notes by Mr. Arthur Sullivan. One of the short pieces is entitled (we hear) The Gemini; or the Birthday of Cox and Box: An ode.

COLOGNE.—First Soirés for Chamber Music: Serenade for Piano and Violoncello, Op. 109, Ferdinand Hiller; Quartet, Op. 18, No. 1, F major, Beethoven.—Concert of the "Tonkünstlerverein:" Variations for four Hands, Beethoven; Romance for Violin, Tartini; Pianoforte Quartet, Kiel; Andante and Scherzo for a stringed Quartet, Rotlitz; Pianoforte Pieces, Handel; and Songs for Soprano.

KREUZNACH.—The musicians among the French prisoners of war lately petitioned for, and received, permission to give a concert. The landlord of the Odeum thus announced the unusual entertainment: "On Sunday, the 11th inst, a Grand Military Concert will be given, by twenty-five French military bandsmen, prisoners of war, in uniform, and under the direction of their bandmasters, MM. Baume and Bonselle." A similiar concert came off a short time ago in Breslau, and attracted thousands.

NEW MUSIC.

"God speed the Galatea" (Williams) is a song for which Mr. Alfred B. Allen is wholly responsible, both words and music being of his concoction. Here is a sample of the former:—

"God speed her, oh, may God speed her,
O'er the ocean, without fear;
O nations, let your prayer be—
'God speed the Galatea.'"

We commend this verse as a puzzle in scanning not less heartily than we admire the contempt of ordinary rules which makes the last two syllables of Galatea rhyme to "fear." Mr. Allen's music is entirely worthy of his words, and both are unique, for which reason, perhaps, they have been "graciously accepted by her Majesty the Queen." In "Look at Home" (Weippert & Co.), the poet, P. T. Sullivan, Esq., deprecates English generosity to foreigners when so many of our poor are starving. Here is the warning he enforces:—

"Should a foe compel old England
Her bright honour to maintain;
Money gone, as freely given,
England's poor may ask in vain."

The music by William Wilson, is extremely simple, and, perhaps, judiciously so, if the object be to preach as widely as possible the fact that true charity begins at home. A setting by James F. Simpson, of "Cease, rude Boreas" (Weekes & Co.), has considerable merit, though we cannot reconcile ourselves to its upward resolution of minor seventh in the melody. Apart, however, from grammar which is, at least, open to question, the song displays appropriate vigour and descriptive force. May we ask, in passing, why the Introductory symphony is described as "Yo North Wind"? With our present light, it strikes us as a bit of absurd alliteration. "La Viola, parole di Valerio Pistrichei, musica di Sybil" (Weekes & Co.) has a very pretty and lightsome melody in 6-8 time, accompanied simply, but with good taste. Lovers of Italian songs will do well to give it a share of their attention. "I gave my love a little rose" (Boosey & Co.) is a work of merit. The verses, by Greville H. Chester, are evidently modelled on the exquisite love lyrics of the earlier English writers, and are far from unworthy to be in their company. Lines more graceful rarely appear set to modern music. The composer, Comyn Vaughan, is favourably known by his "Rothesay Bay;" and the song before us we note all the good features of its predecessors, especially the propriety with which ideas are wedded to music at once spontaneous and apt. If "I gave my love a little rose" does not become a favourite with tenors everywhere, we shall be much surprised. "The Blind Girl's Dream," written and composed by Louisa Gray (Chappell & Co.), is one of the simplest of ballads, and also, when properly sung, one of the most touching. As a ballad should, it relies for effect as much upon the singer as upon the music and words, allowing the former all needful scope for the exercise of his gifts. Moreover the theme is one which "makes the whole world kin," it is handled with an unaffected tenderness constituting not the least element in the charm of the whole. "The Blind Girl's Dream" deserves a good place in the ranks of its modest order. "The Buccaneer" (Chappell & Co.), a work of the kind represented by "A Life on the Ocean Wave," shows to advantage the ability of Mr. Berthold Tours as a song composer. Its words, by Robert Reece, are full of dash and vigour, and the music reflects their spirit in an uncommon degree. Mr. Tours being a musician of pretensions, always, of course, aims somewhat above the ordinary level. His mark has been well hit in this case, for the song possesses qualities of a high order which should win more than a passing regard. We observe that "The Buccaneers" is dedicated to Mr. Santley, in whose repertory there are, assuredly, worse things.

"Select Practice for the Pianoforte" (Davison & Co.) consists of forty-two progressive lessons, intended as an introduction to the works of the great masters, and edited with fingering, &c., by Mr. Benedict. The name of the veteran pianist and composer affords a sufficient guarantee as to the excellence of his work, since nobody knows better how a pupil should be trained to an intelligent execution of classical music. Beginning with pieces of extreme simplicity, the student is led on by easy stages till at last he reaches a Mendelssohnian presto, and is competent to work in a larger field. We know no more excellent system than is here laid down, and cannot do better for aspiring amateurs than recommend them to follow Mr. Benedict's guidance with carefulness, always remembering that "slow and sure goes far in a day." Mr. F. H. Cowen's ballad, "Longing" (Boosey & Co.), though a pleasant one, is scarcely such as might have been expected from the known ability of its composer. The melody has little originality, and the accompaniment is of an ordinary character. Of his "Deux Valses Caprices" (Boosey & Co.) we must speak in a different key. They are exceedingly graceful effusions, full of fancy, and marked by a fluent expression which carries the listener irresistibly with them in their capricious course. As drawing-room pieces of a high class, these valses have claims not to be ignored.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite.—The Civil Service Gazette remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Each packet is labelled: JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists, London. Also makers of Epps's Cassaine, a very thin evening beverage.

THE QUEEN'S CONCERT ROOMS ORGAN.

The new organ erected in the time-honoured Hanover Square Rooms was to have been opened last night, by Mr. W. T. Best, whose programme included selections from Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, and Gade, with other pieces by minor composers. As regards the instrument itself, we cannot do better than transcribe an account of it which appears in the second edition of Hopkins and Rimbault on the Organ:—

"The new organ has been built by Messrs. Thomas C. Lewis & Co., of Shepherd's Lane, Brixton, London, and fully sustains the reputation they have achieved for high-class work. The Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, so long associated with the progress of classical music in this country, exhibits a welcome innovation on the usual treatment accorded to organs in London concert rooms. The instrument newly erected here is not only a fine work of ornamental art, but is in every sense satisfactory to the musician—grandeur of tone and charming variety in quality, consorting with elegance of appearance and chasteness of style. An organ so minutely carried out both in external design and in tonal character, is a standing protest against the false economy of setting up instruments merely for show, regardless of, or indifferent to, the purposes of musical usefulness. In building this organ, Mr. Lewis has given special consideration to the demands of the classical concert room; power, richness, and variety are the three essential requisites for rendering true service in aid of orchestral effects, and in accompanying solo and choral singing in the many and varied styles which characterize the musical art. The specification to this end has been compiled under suggestions from three of the most eminent organists.

"The case of the instrument has been executed from the designs of Mr. John F. Bentley, in the style of the modern French renaissance, and harmonizes well with the general decorations of the rooms and the orchestral accessories. The whole front is ebonized and highly polished, its dark surface lit up with the reflected lights of the multitude of sharply defined lines of the mouldings on cornice, frieze, and panels; the silvered glass with old Venetian bevel filling the upper compartments, the lower panels ornamented with choice inlay of gold and colour, and the bright array of spotted metal pipes intersected with fluted ebony pillars, all combine to give an imposing dignity and richness of effect. The centre composition of the case stands on a bold dado extending the entire length of the front, and rising several feet above the highest seat of the orchestra, and is divided into three compartments by columnar fluted balusters rising on a richly panelled and moulded plinth. Each of the three bold compartments is filled with pipes raking inwards, whilst those of the intermediate division advance forward on a circular corbel, breaking the line of the frieze and cornice. A cluster of balustrades on a square pilaster makes the outer angle of this portion of the design. These balustrades are connected with others in the return ends by a moulded stay, following the line of the dado below, and supporting a series of pipes raking towards an angle; an enriched cornice and a pierced frieze take a quadrantal curve, against which rest the pipes of the Open Diapason. The sides are treated similarly to the front. Completing the design, the cornice and panelled frieze cap the sides and front and mitre round the blocks of each division, and at the angles; the cornice is still further emphasized with a segmental pediment over the centre cluster of the pipes of the Diapason.

"It is worthy of notice that contrary to all custom of organ building in this country, the whole of the wood pipes, including the open diapason of 16 feet, are varnished, as a protection against damp, and display a choiceness of wood rarely seen in connection with organ work; the tracker-are also saturated with varnish, thereby preventing changes of temperature influencing their length and disturbing the accuracy of the musical touch. Although the organ is of medium size it possesses the advantages of a separate air reservoir for the manual sound-boards, on the system introduced so effectively by Mr. Lewis in his large organ at St. Mary's Cathedral, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The main reservoir is weighted to half an inch heavier than the upper reservoir; consequently, the wind from the feeders passes through the main reservoir without expanding it, and by means of flexible trunks ascends to the upper reservoir, which, when full, immediately closes itself with an automatic valve, and then the lower reservoir takes up its supply; by this arrangement the pedal sound-board, which draws only from the heavier supply, leaves the upper manual quite unaffected by its changes of activity, and a perfect steadiness of wind is secured for the manual stops. An entirely new form of pallet has been introduced into this organ for the first time; it combines lightness of touch with complete soundness.

"Under the name of 'Flûte d'Amour" a new stop will be found. It has been devised by Mr. Lewis for the special requirement of this instrument, and possesses a strikingly characteristic quality between the stringiness of the Viol di Gamba and the roundness of the Flute, with either of which stops it blends admirably, yet with a distinctness of its own which marks it with individuality as a new stop. The Flûte d'Amour is a valuable addition to the resources of the organist, and is distinguished as much by the body of tone it gives in support of the lighter stops, as by its sympathetic and singularly beautiful quality."

A STORM IN THE NORTH.

There has been some remarkably plain speaking in the Glasgow Herald lately, and plain speech is refreshing on account of its rarity. For this reason, and in spite of Christmas "peace and good will," we transcribe it here.

Mr. Julian Adams gave a concert at the Corporation Galleries one Saturday, to which, in the discharge of his duty, the Herald critic went. On Monday, the following appeared in the Herald paper, much to the discomfiture of Mr. Julian Adams:—

"Mr. Julian Adams, formerly conductor of the Grand Orchestral Concerts in Paris, London, &c., and the Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Greenock Philharmonic Societies' (as the programme of last Saturday's concert hath it), gave the first of a 'series of six pianoforte recitals, and chamber concerts of classical and popular operatic music' (again as the programme hath it), those of these concerts is to be given every Saturday afternoon in the Corporation Galleries. At the first, the attendance was good, and the series promises to be attractive and well-patronized. The orchestra consists of about sixteen members, with Mr. Adams at the piano, at once executant and conductor, playing with one hand and conducting with the other. We quite acknowledge the admirable skill displayed by Mr. Adams in his double capacity, and also the ability shown by him in assisting the orchestra by filling up the bassoon and other parts. His concert commenced with a creditable performance of Rossini's overture to Semiramide followed by one of Strauss's waltzes. Mr. Adams then came what the programme stated to be Hallerg's Les Elegantes, and so far it was; but Mr. Adams, not content with the music as written by the composer, added thereto many interpolations and elaborations in very questionable taste. Mr. Adams's other solo, Handel's 'Harmonious Blacksmith,' was one of the most extraordinary performances we ever heard, and in the interests of the art we must protest against the many liberties taken with the text. We do not so much object to his playing wrong notes. Mishaps will happen, and yet there is little excuse for these in a piece which every school-girl should know note-perfect, but it is inexcusable to miss its spirit and to add grace notes and flourishes to old Handel's music. By continuing to do so, Mr. Adams may do irreparable injury to the taste of many of his hearers. This propensity of adding embellishments to all music seems to be with him an idiosyncrasy, for even when playing with the band at the Saturday overtures—in which we had fancied Rossini was brilliant enough of himself—Mr. Adams superadded some extraordinary effects. Had Rossini been present, we could have imagined him complimenting Mr. Adams, in one of his most polished and sneering sentences, nothing as he did to Velluti, 'A very charming, but, pray, use your embroidery (fioriture) elsewhere;' but had irate Handel been there, we fear the gruff old master (a man of few words) would, in one or another, have astonished the executant. Mr. Adams must be content to play the music as set down for him—in this respect acting upon Hamlet's advice to the players; and if he does so, we heartily wish him and his scheme all success."

We have said that Mr. Adams was ill-comfitted by the above; he was also indignant, and straightway wrote to the editor as thus:—

"Sir,—So long as the conductors of the press confine themselves to giving publicity to their own candid opinions of the merits of works which come before them, or of the performances of musical artists, no one has a right to complain, be their opinions favourable or the reverse. But when the press is permitted to become, under the disguise of editorial criticism, a vehicle for the furtherance of the interest of one party to the prejudice and injury of another, the abuse calls for correction; and it is high time that those who indulge so freely in scribbling anonymous letters, and publishing them in the newspapers as criticism under the cloak of the editorial wing, should be exposed to the public, in order that a check may be put upon such a system of malevolence."

"In the Herald of Monday last, December 12, I observe the following article:—

"'Mr Julian Adams, formerly conductor of the Grand Orchestral Concerts, &c. (as the programme hath it), gave the first of a series of six pianoforte recitals and chamber concerts of classical and popular operatic music (again as the programme hath it),' &c.

"Now before going any further into the article in question, I beg leave to ask if this is musical criticism, or is it meant to convey an impression that the announcement in the programme is a deception? I leave it to the public to judge; but I will venture to say that the writer of the anonymous letter (not critique) set out with the deliberate intention of conveying a false impression, and of commenting unfavourably upon the performances. I therefore deem it necessary to inform your readers that no artist can appear in Glasgow without the risk of being depreciated and insulted by these soi disant musical critics (friends of a certain concert agent and music-seller in Buchanan Street), unless they can secure the interest of the said agent by giving him a share in the proceeds and a monopoly of the management, sale of tickets, &c. It should be made known that most of the elaborate articles on musical performances which appear in the newspapers are written in London or out of order for concert agents, and are liberally supplied to the musical critics in Glasgow, who thus lead the public and even the proprietors of newspapers to think they are written by themselves, and then get the credit of being learned connoisseurs in the science which they really know little or nothing about.

"If artists of long-established reputation are left to the abuse of these pretenders who use the criticism for the purpose of furthering the interests of their friends at the expense of the artists' reputation, the sooner this system is exposed the better for art progress in this country.—I am, &c.,

"J. JULIAN ADAMS."

Now it was foolish of Mr. Adams to address the editor at all; but doubly foolish to write so manifestly absurd a letter. The annexed rejoinder is all he took by his motion:—

"We have no hesitation in publishing Mr. Adams's letter, although it is of such a nature that we might not unreasonably have declined inserting it. Before doing so, however, we considered it right to show the manuscript to the writer of the article in question, who assures us that he went to the concert on Saturday last totally ignorant as to who sold or did not sell Mr. Adams's tickets, and equally ignorant and indifferent as to the name of his agent or agents. Mr. Adams' modesty has not permitted him to give in full the quotation from the programme which was made in the notice alluded to. It ran thus:—'Mr. Julian Adams, formerly conductor of the Grand Orchestral Concerts in Paris, London, &c., and the Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Greenock Philharmonic Societies.' Not being personally cognizant of these facts, and desiring to speak only from personal knowledge, the writer gave the statement in the programme upon the authority of the programme. Mr. Adams evades all reference to our notice regarding his incorrect interpretation of some of the works. With respect to his sweeping charge, unsupported by a shadow of proof, as to the authorship of 'the elaborate articles on musical performances which appear in the newspapers,' we have only to say that it is perfectly absurd.—ED. O. H."

Well done, "Ed. O. H.;" also the critic of the "G. H." It is clear that all is not "mist" down north, even in December.

WAIFS.

Madame Arabella Goddard played in a concert at Nottingham on Monday night, the entrepreneur being that zealous and indefatigable promulgator of good music, Mr. Henry Farmer, himself an artist of eminence.

M. Faure has gone to Brussels.

Miss Marie Courtenay, a young and promising vocalist, is announced to appear as the witch, Sybilla, in the Drury Lane Pantomime.

Madame Csillag made her début in America, at the first New York Philharmonic Concert, towards the end of last month.

Mdlle. Marie Krebs gave a concert recently at New York, her various performances at which extracted high approval from the Weekly Review of that city.

We learn from the American papers that Georgio Ronconi ("Ronconi the great") is about to give a series of operatic performances in New York. Luck attend them!

Mr. A. Sullivan's charming Ouvertura di Ballo, written for the Birmingham Festival, was recently performed at one of the Liverpool Philharmonic Concerts, with complete success.

Mr. C. W. Le Jeune, assisted by his sons, Charles and Arthur Le Jeune, gave an evening concert on the 14th inst., to exhibit their new instrument, the Clavo-Glissando. It is played with the key-board; but the inventors claim the credit of being able to produce a perfect glissando or portamento, hitherto peculiar to the fiddle and voice, and also the tones of various wind instruments.

An action has been raised in the Edinburgh Sheriff Court by Mr. Sims Reeves, the English tenor, against the Edinburgh Choral Union, for the recovery of his fee for singing at the Choral Union Concert on the 14th of November last. The fee, we understand, was ninety guineas, and the Choral Union have offered to pay sixty guineas. Payment of the full fee is refused on the ground that Mr. Sims Reeves failed to complete his engagement, having left the orchestra when the performance was only half finished.

M. Gounod is said to be devoting his hours of exile to the completion of his opera, Polyeucte (Corneille), and to the composition of an oratorio, the book by M. Gounod himself, the subject being Calvary and the Redemption. A set of part-songs for male voices, by M. Gonnod, has just been published in Germany.

Another new oratorio will be produced in due course: in this instance by an English composer—Mr. Cusins, conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts. He takes as his theme Gideon, but proposes to confine the music within the limits of the sacred cantata, not to exceed one hour and a half in performance.

An inquest was held on Tuesday on the body of Madame Dallot de la Genevoage a professor of music (the wife of a merchant in Paris from whom she separated in 1847), lately arrived from Boulogne. A verdict was returned of "Death from pulmonary apoplexy, accelerated by excitement and temporary insanity." They expressed a wish that the press would notice the case, and thus bring the matter before the friends of the deceased.

On Monday week the Lord-Lieutenant of Warwickshire, Lord Leigh, presided at the College, Binswood, Leamington, on the opening of the new boarding house, which now forms the western side of the quadrangle of the extensive building, in this favourable inland watering place. The head-master, the Rev. H. G. Woot, Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Oxford; J. R. Thursfield, B.A., Fellow and Tutor of Jesus College, Oxford; and other well-known educationalists took part in the proceedings. A number of scholarships were awarded to the most successful students; the annual speeches made, and prizes given.

Apropos of Mdlle. Nilsson, we read the subjoined in the Philadelphia Age of Dec. 2nd.

"There will be a matinée performance on Saturday, at which Mdlle. Nilsson will appear. After this Mdlle. Nilsson will visit the West, and we hardly expect to hear her again before February, and perhaps only at a very limited number of performances then, for she has to return early in the spring to fulfil engagements in Europe. But the people of this city who have supported the concerts so liberally will not be satisfied unless they see this charming prima donna in opera before she leaves America. We hope Mr. Strakosch will give us a short season of opera when Miss Nilsson returns from the West."

Amongst the performances for the celebration of the anniversary of Beethoven's birthday in Germany have been the following:—At the Court Theatre of Munich there was a concert which commenced with a prologue in verse by Herr Martin Greif, and the programme of which included one of the symphonies and the Mass in C. At Bonn the new Beethoven Hall was solemnly opened, and at Leipzig, the members of the Art Institutes joined together to do honour to the festival-day, and a week was devoted to Beethoven, during which his compositions were solely performed. This began on Sunday the 11th inst., with a church service. On Monday in the evening, at the Theatre some of Beethoven's greatest compositions were performed; on Tuesday a selection of chamber music; on Wednesday, a second performance at the Theatre; on Thursday a Gewandhaus concert; and on the two last days of the week festival performances at the Theatre.—Athenæum.

STANDARD THEATRE.

The Wife's Tragedy, a new play, in blank verse, was produced with success on Saturday. Mr. Douglass is to be congratulated for having ventured on a piece, the attraction of which depends neither upon the carpenter, the scene-painter nor the display of female beauty, and which nevertheless succeeded in riveting the attention of a vast audience during five acts and a prologue, drawing forth repeated marks of hearty approval. The principal actors, Miss Edith Hernd, Miss Mary Saunders and Mr. G. Hamilton, were summoned before the curtain after each of the last two acts, and at the end of the performance in response to an unanimous call, the authoress (Mrs Edward Thomas) bowed her acknowledgments from a box.

A PROTEST.

SIR,—Having read in your valuable paper of the 17th inst. an article copied from a contemporary, in which my name is mentioned, with regard to the Royal Italian Opera, will you kindly allow me to say that I consider it a great liberty of an anonymous writer, who evidently does not understand the subject he is prompted to write upon, and more so, as I have not belonged to Covent Garden Theatre since the opera season of 1869.—Yours obediently, 23, Norfolk Road, Brighton, Dec. 21, 1870. T. LI CALZI.

SALZBURG.—The celebration of the Beethoven Centenary at the Mozarteum was fixed to take place in August, but had to be postponed in consequence of the war. It will now not be held before next year.

LEIPSIC.—Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger von Nürnberg is still being performed at the Stadttheater. At the eighth Gewandhaus Concert, Herr Carl Tausig played Chopin's Concerto in E minor; a "Valse Caprice" on Strauss's "Nachtfalterwalzer," and Schubert's "Military March," arranged by the same composer. He was greatly applauded and several times recalled. Mdlle. Wilhelmine Gips, from the Hague, was the vocalist. Mendelssohn's "Hebrides Overture," and Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Schumann, were finely played by the band.

"MARINELLA,"

CANZONE.

Parole del SIGNOR CIABATTA.

Musica di ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

Price 4s.

"This canzone is written throughout with Signor Randegger's unfailing fluency and grace. The melody is really charming, while not a few devices of accompaniment are used which, besides giving piquancy to the song, show once more the composer's ingenuity and his constant desire to obtain that variety which accompaniments, as a rule, so sadly lack. We recommend 'Marinella' to all lovers of Italian music."—Sunday Times.

ROYAL AMPHITHEATRE,

GREAT CHARLOTTE STREET, LIVERPOOL,

SHOPS ADJOINING,

By Mr. BRANCH.

ON WEDNESDAY, the 11th day of January next, at Two for half-past Two o'Clock precisely in the afternoon, at the Law Association Rooms, Cook Street, Liverpool, in one or more lots, and subject to such Conditions as may be determined at the time of Sale,

ALL those valuable LEASEHOLD PREMISES, known as the ROYAL AMPHITHEATRE, Great Charlotte Street, Liverpool, and the FOUR SHOPS adjoining thereto and fronting Roe Street, and in the respective occupation of Mr. Duncan, Mr. Barker, and others.

This property has a frontage to Great Charlotte Street of 71 feet 10 inches, extending backwards to Roe Street (to which last-mentioned street there is a frontage of 99 feet 5 inches), and comprises an area of about 1,400 superficial square yards.

The tenure of the whole is Leasehold under the Corporation of Liverpool, for the residue of a term of 78 years, from the 7th day of May, 1845, at a Peppercorn Rent.

The Royal Amphitheatre was constructed for many years, with great success, by the late Mr. W. H. Copeland, the proprietor, and is well known as a highly desirable theatrical property. It is now in the hands of Mr. Copeland's representatives, who have just received an offer for a Lease of the Theatre at a rent of £2,000 a year, the Lessee undertaking to expend a large sum in decorations, &c.

The premises fronting Roe Street are in the line of improvement proposed by the Liverpool Improvement Act, 1867.

Further particulars may be obtained on application to Mr. P. F. GARNETT, Solicitor, 54, Castle Street, Liverpool.

THE 17TH DECEMBER, 1870.

A time may, perhaps, come, when our almanacks, instead of containing an endless number of the names of saints—of whose life and doings even the firmest believer possesses but a slight knowledge—when, we say, our almanacks will record the days on which were born or on which died those men who have exercised a prominent influence on civilization, in the broadest acceptation of the word. When such is the case, we shall write, at least in Germany, under the date of the 17th December: Ludwig van Beethoven. On this day, a century ago, was our great tone-poet baptized; so much we know. It is considered probable that he was born the day before. When a nation does honour to the memory of a great man, it really honours only itself, for it shows that it knows how to recognize and appreciate a great mind sprung from itself. Ludwig van Beethoven was a genius such as but rarely appears in the art-history of any age or people. It has sometimes been asserted that, among the millions whom birth, education, and circumstances do not permit to participate in a highly intellectual life, thousands would become great men, were fate to favour them. We do not think so, but even were it the case, we should recognize, in his importance as well as in others, the wise economy of Nature. Men cannot master too much at one time, and a considerable period is always needed ere any important, and therefore great, man has worked out his due effect.

The material points in Beethoven's earthly pilgrimage are pretty generally known—some few, however, require further elucidation. On the whole, his career was simple and quiet. There were none of the wonderful successes which surrounded with brilliancy the youth of Mozart—nor of the passionate and almost historical struggle such as Gluck and Handel underwent in Paris and in London. Nay, even a journey to England, like that which crowned the old age of Father Haydn, is wanting in the life of Beethoven. The life of Johann Sebastian Bach alone offers still fewer points of contact with the wide, wide world! Even in his early youth, Beethoven's art became for him everything: a permanent source of employment; a delight; and the means of profit and of distinction. He was only twelve years old when he entered the musical establishment of the Elector Max Franz, filling in it the post of organist, pianist, and, subsequently, even of tenorist. Thus, at his entry into life, he proved the support of his family, and felt, no doubt, a certain self-confidence from the consciousness that, though scarcely a youth, he was, in his artistic as well as his social character, satisfying requirements, that we are justified in making only on mature manhood. The friendly reception with which he met in all circles at Bonn, especially at Madame von Breuning's, enlarged the sphere of his accomplishments, and, when hardly more than a youth of five and twenty, he went, well prepared, to the Imperial capital in which his genius and his reputation were destined to burst forth into bloom.

Through the Elector (a son of the Empress Maria Theresa), and those about him, numerous and intimate relations existed between Bonn and Vienna; and, thanks to the intervention of his old patrons, Beethoven was admitted into the first families of the Austrian aristocracy. The dedications of his works would prove, even were we not aware of it from other sources, how deeply interested the artist felt in those of high birth. It is solely to what they did that Vienna owes the fact of being able to call the great man more particularly her own. It is true that, during the long period of thirty-four years which he spent there, he never sought or held any permanent appointment—as a teacher, a conductor, or even as a virtuoso. He gave the Viennese public an opportunity of hearing his works before any one else heard them—an opportunity by which they did not always profit. The concerts at which he did so—and at some of which he appeared as a pianist—were, perhaps, the only occasions that brought him personally into contact with the Viennese public. He had something better to do than to conduct an orchestra or assist young beginners with good advice—for he was one who directed minds into new paths, and, by his works, exerted an elevating and guiding influence upon hundreds of thousands.

As far as a serious artistic life can be so, Beethoven's, taken all in all, may, perhaps, be termed particularly favoured. He was able to live entirely for his work, and quickly met with the highest appreciation; while the miseries attending a somewhat badly-managed bachelor's establishment—miseries springing from his amiable weakness for brothers and nephews—must not, in conclusion, be estimated too highly. But there was a grey thread running through his life. When only in his eight-and-twentieth year, he felt a diminution in his power of hearing. For about twenty years the malady seems sometimes to have increased and sometimes to have diminished, until it terminated in total deafness. In addition to the pang of only half receiving the living impression of his productions, and of subsequently not receiving it at all—in addition to the rent in his intercourse with the world, which, from the very first, possessed great attractions for him—he was most painfully worried, being a sensitive man, by all the experiments with which the disciples of Æsculapius assailed him, and ashamed, for a tolerably long time, to confess his malady, concealing it, and thereby, probably, rendering it worse. Attempts have been made to explain, by this want of the material sense of hearing, many compositions of the last period less practicable and less charming than the rest; but the man who, with his inward ear, could hear the Adagio of the Ninth Symphony and the "Benedictus" of the Missa Solemnis required no excitement of the senses. Whatever the amount of sorrow which the idea of the deaf composer may inspire, it is a great question whether his inability to hear did not contribute to render his nature more profound. A musician, as such, is, in general, indebted to his ear for more pain than pleasure—and how little of all we are obliged to hear is worth being heard, every one knows!

How, too, can we speak of solitude in the case of a man who, really and truly, was at home in a different world from that which surrounded him? Every one to whom he was granted, in any degree, the privilege of being artistically productive, can perhaps conceive, with blessed envy, what sort of an existence that of such a genius must be. If the slightest original notion exerts a vivifying influence, how shall we describe the ecstasy which must have been Beethoven's, when the first half-dreamy-like notion of a new composition sprang up in his brain, assuming more and more distinctness of shape, and gradually filling his whole being, till all within him breathed, sang, sounded in melodies, of which he himself, a short time before, had no presentiment? And these tone-pictures filling the entire man did not vanish from him like light dreams—he knew how to grasp them with a hand possessing the strength of a giant; to hold them fast; to give them form and shape—to cast, as it were, even the most ethereal in bronze. Combined, too, with the marvellous charm that power as a thinker afforded him, was the ever-increasing and refreshing consciousness of his own intellectual power, the feeling of his mastery, the only true power and true freedom upon earth.

Especial interest is taken now-a-days in investigating most minutely all the details in the social position of great men. There is no objection to this, as long as we do not attempt to establish too close a connection between their works and their circumstances, for such an attempt leads to the most outrageous errors—or as long as we do not, with our enthusiasm reversed, endeavour to perceive the importance of their productions in the most trivial thing we learn concerning what they said and did. It is certain that excellent qualities of heart and disposition generally adorned Beethoven, and people readily forgave him his weaknesses. He met the poetry, the history, the great deeds of his time, with an active intelligence, nay, with passionate sympathy. But there were, and always are, thousands of men, his equals in elevation of character, in social virtue, and in noble conception of life, but not competent to produce anything that shall advance mankind. Beethoven, however, was able to express in wonderful works of art the lofty emotions and views that lived within him—and that is what makes him a great man.

Many, on the other hand, attempt to perceive the most essential greatness of such works in certain ideas, which, they assert, serve as a base, and which every one then endeavours to explain after his own fashion. But it is not that which a work of art conceives, but that which it says, and the way in which it says it, that constitute its greatness. This greatness, moreover, is to be found in the conditions of that art of which we are treating. What elevates and inspires us, when we hear any of Beethoven's music, is the abundance, the originality, the boldness of imagination, the endless diversity of the melodies, and the charms they have for the senses, combined with their feeling, kindly power; their ingenious simplicity; their passionate energy; and their proud, high character—it is the way, so logical, and yet so free, in which they are carried out—it is the treatment, healthy, unaffected, and yet so original, of the harmony—the highly-coloured, individual employment of the instruments of sound—in a word, the fulfilment of all the conditions which a musical composition demands, if it is to satisfy all that can be expected from it. What that means is known to the many who, gifted and talented as they are, have endeavoured, and still endeavour, but in vain, to attain it.

Though Beethoven's name is full of import for the educated in all nations, and though his works have, since the beginning of the present century, continued to spread more and more in all countries, we Germans have a right to call him more especially ours. In political matters the bias of our nature towards the ideal and the Spiritual may have been an obstacle in our way—but how much that is magnificent has it not produced! Such is the case with the love of instrumental music, that wondrous blossom of German genius, that most true poetry, without material subject, and without doubtful thoughts. Truly, it is a lofty people, from among which hundreds of thousands are continually assembling, in all directions, for the purpose of listening, with pious devotion, to the utterances which their harmony-inspired seers have delivered! In the very strictest, and, consequently, most energetic signification of the words, the instrumental works of our great masters are tone-poems—and those of Ludwig van Beethoven are the most magnificent and the most sublime of any. How deeply what we owe him is felt on all sides, is shown by the festivals, now being consecrated to his memory. Neither the thought of all the great things that have been done and achieved upon the blood-drenched fields of battle, nor anxiety for what still remains to be achieved, has scared our minds into forgetting to consecrate the day which, a century ago, gave us the musician Beethoven. Let us hope that, in the fullness of the power it has victoriously attained, our nation will preserve its noble sense for the Beautiful, and its proud delight in all the magnificent things which its poets, in words, and its tone, have presented to it. And so, on Beethoven's Day, we exclaim to it, in the words of Schiller—

> "Freue Dich, dass die Gabe des Liedes vom Himmel herabkommt,
> Dass der Sänger dir singt, was ihn die Muse gelehrt!
> Weil der Gott ihn beseelt, so wird er dem Hörer zum Gotte,
> Weil er der Glückliche ist, kannst Du der Selige sein."

ENGLISH OPERA IN AMERICA.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

In my last I promised you an account of certain American operasingers whose merits are almost unknown to the British public. Among the ladies the foremost is Mrs. Belza Seguin, recently the contralto of the Parepa-Rosa troupe, a genuine artist whose vocal means and comprehensive talent enable her to do justice to every style of music, although it is in the works of the best masters that she shines most brightly. The music of Fatima in Weber's Oberon, Bridget in Anbert's Domino Noir, and Cherubino in Mozart's Marriage of Figaro, could not be more chastely or beautifully sung than it was by this lady during the late tour. She taught the masses to love that which had hitherto been supposed to be above their appreciation, and such gems as "A simple Arab Maid," "Araby, dear Araby!" the convent song in Le Domino Noir, and "Voi che Sapete," were as sure to be encored when heard from her lips, as were the more familiar and generally popular "Alas, those chimes!" the huntress' song in Martha, or any other airs belonging to constantly performed operas, which the public knows by heart. But Mrs. Seguin has not only the voice and style of a richly endowed and thoroughly educated vocalist; she also possesses a rare amount of histrionic ability, though this appears more conspicuously in comedy than tragedy. Few actresses, whether singers or not, have so much natural humour; few can be so spontaneously whimsical, or do droll things in so original and attractive a manner. In the sunny side of her art, Mrs. Seguin seems to revel, and guided by instinctive sympathy with her audience, while obviously enjoying her own sportive fancies, she invariably succeeds in making others enjoy them too. Mrs. Seguin is, in short, an experienced and thorough artist, worthy to take a leading position in any theatre in the world; though nothing I believe, would induce her to leave the English operatic stage, where, so far as I know, she is at present without a rival on either side of the Atlantic.

With Mdme. Parepa-Rosa as soprano, and Mrs. Seguin as contralto last season, there was already a combination such as had never previously existed in America, and that the entourage was for the most part worthy of these very distinguished performers, is what I propose to show in my next letter. Meanwhile, I would wish to remind my readers that I am writing specially of the Parepa-Rosa company, because I consider it as the representative English opera company—the best there has ever been in the States, and consequently the fairest test for judging America's lyrically productive power, and artistic appreciation.

A MODEL STUDENT.

(Reported by Duff Short.)

Fashionably-dressed Joseph Cooke Cox, Barnard's Inn, Holborn, summoned Bow Street not paying cab fare.—Garlick, cab-driver, took defendant and lady Amphitheatre, left vehicle without paying fare. Waited, defendant came out, asked fare, 1s., and 1s. 6d. Defendant declined. Defendant swore, said: Am captain 20th Regiment, half-pay, also theatrical student. Got out cab, put shilling on roof. Cabman perjured. Why not respectable cab-drivers, why not gentlemen courage, as I, to come forward such occasions? Thing soon put down them.—Flowers: You behaved badly; pay the money and 4s. —Defendant: Lock me up.—Defendant placed in cells commenced to sing.

Cox again at Bow Street Thursday, assaulting Griffiths of Gaiety Theatre. —Griffiths deposed in room at theatre, heard kicking at door. Defendant split panels, struck Dolby, and attempted follow on Hollingshead. On way to station dealt witness blow in face. Defendant been nuisance at theatre some time. Defendant remanded. Friends consulted on sanity.

THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL AT BOSTON.

We take the following from our excellent contemporary, Dwight's Journal of Music (Dec. 3rd):—

"The programme of the birthday week in Boston is settled, we presume, in its main features, though some societies and artists are still in doubt what they will do. The want of a fit hall for chamber concerts proves one serious drawback. The series of Beethoven performances will begin, according to the original plan, with the Fourth Harvard Symphony Concert on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 15, when the programme will include:—Part I. The third and greatest overture to Leonore; the great soprano scena from Fidelio, to be sung by Mme. Bertha Johannsen; Seventh Symphony in A. Part II. Andante and Adagio from the Prometheus ballet; and the Choral Fantasia, with Mr. Perabo for pianist, a select choir from the Handel and Haydn Society, and orchestra. The Choral Fantasia, as it contains the germ of the choral symphony, will be interesting to hear so soon before the performance of that sublime work on the 19th.—The Ninth Symphony Concert, which was to have closed the series on the evening of the birthday itself (Saturday, the 17th), is postponed to Monday afternoon, Dec. 19, owing to the engagement of many members of the orchestra at the theatres on Saturday afternoon and evening. This concert will be given under the joint auspices of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Harvard Musical Association. The symphony will be preceded by a short first part, consisting of the overture to Egmont; quartet from Fidelio; Andante and Adagio from Prometheus; Hallelujah Chorus from The Mount of Olives.—It is more than probable that Fidelio will be given on the Saturday evening of the birthday (and possibly on other evenings of that week), by the united Eichings and Parepa English Opera Troupe at the Boston Theatre. They are to give it in New Haven next week.—The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who will return to Boston in season to take part in these festivities, will, besides rejoining the orchestra, give a chamber concert of their own in honour of Beethoven, probably on the Friday evening, at the Piano Rooms of Mr. Russell Hallet, Tremont Street. The programme will consist of one of Beethoven's earlier piano trios, the entire septet, one of his latest (posthumous) quartets, and some songs.—Mr. Ernest Perabo has already announced his purpose of giving a Beethoven concert at Harvard Hall on the birthday (Saturday) at noon. Other artists, probably, have similar intentions, but their plans are not yet stated. Enough, however, is already sure to make a commemoration worthy of Beethoven and of Boston."

J. A. RÖCKEL.

There died at Cöthel, on December 19, Joseph August Röckel, at the age of 67. His name is known in connection with the introduction of German opera into England. The fact of his being a friend of Beethoven, and the Florestan selected for Fidelio, is matter of history, and will lend interest to a short sketch of his life. Born on August 28, 1783, at Neuenberg, in the Upper Palatinate, and originally intended for the Church, he enjoyed an education which proved the more serviceable to him, as, at twenty, he exchanged theology for diplomacy, entering the service of the Elector of Bavaria, as Secretary of Legation. On the outbreak of war between Bavaria and Austria in 1804, and the dissolution of the embassy at Salzburg, Röckel accepted an offer from the Imperial Theatre at Vienna, to be first tenor. Here his success was such that he decided on following up the operatic career. It was in the summer of 1805 that his "creation" of the part of Florestan gained him the recognition of Beethoven. In 1823, Franz I. appointed Röckel Professor of Singing at the Imperial Opera. In this capacity he produced some distinguished pupils, among whom was Henrietta Sontag. In 1828 he accepted the management of the Opera at Aix-la Chapelle. The year following he introduced German Opera in Paris, by means of a complete operatic company. In consequence of the success attending this scheme—the impression produced by his chorus being remarkable—Röckel remained in Paris till 1832, when Monk Mason, manager of the King's Theatre, induced him to try the same experiment in London. We still recollect the enthusiasm excited by this first introduction of German opera in England, and the impression produced by the first performance of Fidelio, Der Freischütz and other masterpieces of the German school, with a company including Schröder-Devrient and Haitzinger, and, as conductor, Hummel (Röckel's brother-in-law). In 1839, Röckel withdrew from the theatre, but continued to follow up his career of musical usefulness in his adopted country. In 1853 he returned to his native land, to enjoy the well-earned fruits of his active life. B. E. E.

HAMBURGH.—In honour of the Centenary of Beethoven's birth, none but pieces of his composition were played at the third Philharmonic Concert on the 16th December. The Sinfonia eroica, and the third Leonore-Overture were executed in a spirited manner by the band. Mdlle. Clara Schumann played the E flat minor Concerto and the grand Variations in C minor. Mdlle. Marianne Brandt, from the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, sang the scene and air, "Ah, perfido," and three Scotch songs, with violin and violoncello accompaniment. This young lady, who is a pupil of Madame Viardot-Garcia, appeared, also, in Fidelio. Both in the concert-room and on the stage she was much applauded.

THE THEATRES AT CHRISTMAS.

If we look over the long list of playhouses open at this the most theatrical season of the year, we shall find in Central London a still increasing tendency among managers to overlook the Christmas holidays as a time demanding any special kind of entertainment. There is, of course, a pantomime at Drury Lane, which is still really the people's theatre, and there is another at Covent Garden, which, having lost its nationality in other respects, elects to be ostentatiously national at Christmas. But here ends the list of pantomimes, as far as Central London is concerned. The Lyceum, which has sometimes been conspicuous as a third pantomimic theatre, is closed, and pilgrims in quest of harlequin beyond the precincts of the two "large houses" must cross the water or penetrate the remote suburbs.

A few years ago the absence of pantomime from a theatre open at Christmas would have implied a preference for burlesque, but now at many leading houses even the less national mode of celebrating the holidays has been abandoned. Mr. Buckstone, of the Haymarket, is so perfectly satisfied with Mr. Gilbert's Palace of Truth and Mr. Thorne Smith's sparkling comedietta, that he not only leaves his bill unaltered, but triumphantly calls attention to its unchanged condition. Mr. Halliday's Nell has taken up her abode at the Olympic, and does not consider the 25th of December as the quarter-day by which her lease is determinated. Mrs. John Wood, of the St. James's, and Miss Marie Wilton, of the Prince of Wales's, once set a high value on burlesque; but the former still continues to announce Fernande, the latter Mr. T. W. Robertson's successful comedy, Ours. Faithful to the "legitimate" cause ever since the production of Mr. Tom Taylor's Arden and Crown, the manager of the Queen's relies upon A Midsummer Night's Dream and Mr. Phelps.

Some managers, not especially believing in the virtues of a particular day or week, but retaining a vague reverence for Christmas, have to anticipate the holidays. Elisabeth, which is now the burlesque at the Vandeville, and Whittington, which holds the same position at the Royalty, were both brought out some time ago. The practice of bringing out novelties on Christmas-eve, which was forbidden by the old theatrical law, but which has long been prevalent in the suburbs, has been this year adopted by two of the central houses. Besides, of course, Good Friday and Christmas-day, Ash-Wednesday is the only weekday throughout the year on which, by the existing law, theatres are peremptorily closed.

As the holiday-makers of the season necessarily comprise many semi-Puritans, who are ready to encourage every amusement that is not formally theatrical, the directors of non-theatrical places of entertainment are naturally astir. Foremost among these are the Christy's Minstrels, who have not lost one iota of their huge popularity, and who, as usual, celebrate Christmas not only by adding new songs to their programme, but during the present week abandon the Egyptian for the larger St. James's Hall, which is gorgeously adorned for the occasion, and perform twice a day. Mr. and Mrs. T. G. Reed have returned to the Gallery of Illustration, and Mr. Pepper, of the Polytechnic, has provided a goodly banquet of diversion and instruction, at which the tale of the Yellow Dwarf, as told by Mr. George Grossmith, jun., holds a conspicuous place. There is no wind so ill that it blows no good to the representatives of Madame Tussaud. The war, regarded everywhere else as a dire calamity, supplies Baker Street with several new and interesting figures.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The annual choral festival in connection with this College took place at the Church of St. George the Martyr, Queen Square, Bloomsbury, on Friday, the 16th inst. The choir comprised about one hundred voices from St. Paul's Cathedral, the Foundling Hospital, Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, Lincoln's Inn Chapel, St. Michael's, Cornhill, St. George's, Bloomsbury, St. Andrew's, Holborn, &c., &c. The music used included an admirable service in B flat, by Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, which was first sung at the society's festival last year, and the three prize works of Mr. F. E. Gladstone, organist of Chichester Cathedral, who has carried off the whole of the prizes offered by the council during the present year. Mr. Gladstone's compositions consist of a very excellent hymn tune, a highly original anthem, and an exceedingly effective "Andante" for the organ. Mr. Gladstone himself presided at the organ, and his magnificent playing of Bach's Fugue in D minor, as a concluding voluntary, gave especial delight to many present. Mr. J. Hamilton Clarke's anthem, which took the first prize offered by the College in 1864, was also performed. Mr. Lumpa, Hon. Sec. conducted the music. Owing to the wet night, the congregation was not so large as on former occasions.—The Choir (abridged).

REGIO.—"Hi tenore Hemming," says L'Europe, of November 10th —"who possesses a sympathetic voice and sings with much sentiment, was encored in the duet with Nobini." The opera was Don Pasquale.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This society gave its sixth soirée musicale at St. George's Hall, on the 14th inst., and laid a very interesting programme before its guests. Here are some examples of the selections made:—Hummel's Pianoforte Trio in E was very well played by Mdlle. Bondy, Mr. Otto Booth, and M. Paque, and much applauded. Madame Eugene Oswald gave a pianoforte solo by Warzischek, and Miss Alice Mary Smith played, with Mr. Lazarus, her own clever Duo Concertante in A, for piano and clarionet. Other features of the evening were a capital violoncello solo by M. Paque, the singing of Miss José Sherrington and Herr Nordblom, and a solo on the pianoforte by Mdlle. Leonora Ferrari. Need we add that the company went away delighted with their entertainment.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

This great and zealous body of amateurs was not likely to let the centenary of Beethoven's birth pass by without recognition. Consequently, on the eve of that event, a very fine performance was given, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, of the First Mass (in C) and the oratorio, The Mount of Olives. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, Exeter Hall was crowded; and both Mass and Oratorio (about which we have nothing new to say) were heard with evident delight. That Sir Michael Costa directed the performance con amore it was easy to observe; and his example did wonders for those who acted under his guidance. The Mass (perhaps the most perfect in existence)—with Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Drasdil, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Lewis Thomas, as the quartet of principal singers—was well performed throughout, the chorus doing their part admirably, and the orchestra being what it seldom fails to be under the direction of its most popular conductor. Rarely has the chorus of soldiers, or that in which the conflicting sentiments of the Saviour's persecutors and disciples are simultaneously put forth—one of the most striking and characteristic passages in the one oratorio of Beethoven—been delivered with more effect; and never, perhaps, has the splendid final chorus, which crowns Handel in his simple majesty, thundered as the hand of Beethoven is visible all through, been sung with more emphasis and precision. The solo vocalists in The Mount of Olives were Madame Sinico, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Lewis Thomas, who all did their very best, and succeeded accordingly. On the whole, this performance was worthy the occasion.

The first Christmas performance of the Messiah, on the 23d inst., was interesting, not merely on its own account, but because Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia sang the whole of the contralto music. Madame Sinico was the soprano; Mr. Kerr Gedge (in place of Mr. Vernon Rigby, who was indisposed), tenor; and Signor Foli, bass. The second Messiah performance was to take place last night, with Mr. Rigby as tenor, and Mr. Santley as bass—the ladies as on the first occasion.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Allow me to thank you for the kind notice you gave of my concert, Dec. 13th; at the same time, I must beg a correction of the statement respecting Miss Ehrenberg, who is not my pupil, but, with myself, a pupil of Herr Lehmeyer. The insertion of this in your next number will greatly oblige.—Yours, obediently,

3, Camberwell Park, S.E., Dec. 27. CHARLOTTE JAMES.

AN URGENT PROTEST.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

DEAR SIR,—Relying on your well-known courtesy, I take the liberty to acquaint the musical public through your greatly extended journal, that the reports which your contemporary, the Musical Standard, gives of my lectures on the Clavecin and Pianoforte, contain so much nonsense and errors that a most decided protest against such reporting is demanded in order to self-protection. The Musical Standard's reporter is either not blessed with a good hearing, or my pronunciation of English is so faulty, that the contrary of what I wished to say is understood. I must therefore beg a musical public not to judge of my lectures by the reports given in the Musical Standard.—I remain, dear Sir, your obedient servant,

39c, Onslow Square. E. PAUER.

COLOGNE.—At the fourth Gürzenich Concert, dedicated to the memory of Beethoven, the programme comprised Overture, Op. 124; March and Chorus from Die Ruinen von Athen; Violin Concerto (Herr Singer); Pianoforte Fantasia (Herr Hiller); and the Sinfonia eroica.—The Philharmonic Society also devoted a concert to the same pious purpose, when the pieces were: Nachtmusic; E flat major Concerto (Herr Heymann), and C minor Symphony.

J. S. DWIGHT ON CHRISTINE NILSSON.*

We had no room to give our notes in order on the Nilsson Concerts. Let us go back and gather up a few.

Of the second concert, the main feature was the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet. Of the music itself we could hardly venture an opinion, so absorbed were we in the wonderfully dramatic revelation of the singer and the actress. It showed a true and rare dramatic genius. Such an impersonation of Ophelia we have not seen before. Such swift and perfect changes of expression; the voice, the quality of tone always in quick sympathy with look and action; such alternation of violent mad mirth and wild despair and pretty maiden dreams of friends and love and pleasure; such beauty and such startling power of song, were worth going far to witness. And it was as a whole beautiful; whereas we commonly would rather turn away from these questionable stage imitations of the morbid anatomy of passion. She also sang the "Ave Maria" of Gounod (they have done mentioning Bach at all in this business!), in a high and pure religious style, nobly sustained by the violin obbligato of M. Vieuxtemps; and the "Last Rose of Summer," with Swedish dance air and "Old folks at home" for encores.

Third Concert, Monday, Nov. 7.—A tender and poetic French air ("Kennst du das Land?") from Thomas's Mignon, sung with refined and subdued feeling, and the "Miserere" from Il Trovatore, were her principal selections. The latter was given on her part with such thrilling vocal and dramatic power and intensity, that we almost enjoyed the hackneyed scene for once. Brignoli, outside, sang the tenor solo, with chorus of monks, entirely too loud; nor were the sounds subdued to due proportion in the repetition which was wildly insisted upon.

Fourth Concert, Nov. 8.—Best programme of the whole series. Mdlle. Nilsson sang two arias by Mozart: first, the recitative and air, "Non più di fiori" from Tito, with clarionet obbligato—(it was a pretty, but a silly freak, however, to drag the clarionet to the front); and then, for encore, Cherubino's song, "Voi che sapete." Both were sung with pure artistic style and feeling, although our "east wind" had been trifling with the singer's throat. The recitative was truly noble. But first, in charming contrast, we should have mentioned the airy, playful duet by Blangini (better known in parlours here some two score years ago), which she sang in sotto voce with Signor Brignoli. It was lady-like grace and playfulness itself. Here voice and smile were one. The tenor, too, did well in the little responsive phrase. "And Robin Gray" was sung with such a power and truth of pathos, as we have not heard before since Jenny Lind.

Meinder, Saturday, Nov. 12.—Enormous crowd. Programme mostly repetitions. For Nilsson, "Angels ever bright and fair," which we liked better this time; Ophelia's mad scene; ballads as usual ("Home," Declecarlian dance, "Old Folks").

Sixth, Nov. 14.—This time Nilsson sang the "King of Thule," ballad, and the "Jewel Song" from Gounod's Faust,—not in her best spirit, something had ruffled its serenity; also in the quartet from Martha—rather a weak selection. But she was saving herself, no doubt, for the great effort, "Let the bright Seraphim," in which, as we have said, she showed a sustained power and splendour of voice which she had been keeping in reserve till then. The effect was electric.

Seventh.—Grandest of all Nilsson's efforts was the great dramatic scene of Beethoven, "Ah, perfido," in which she sounded the whole gamut of passion. It was given with orchestra, of course, and was felt, we think, by all to be an instance of great and noble singing. Surely the response of the entire audience both after this and after the Mozart arias should encourage the management to put in their programmes more of the music which is most worthy of a noble singer. Rossini's "Una voce" was also sung by her in a most sparkling, subtile, and enchanting style, with quite a dash of originality.

The closing matinée was rather a sentimental, popular farewell occasion. "Let the bright Seraphim" (even better than before), and the "Miserere" scene were repeated. For the rest Mdlle. Nilsson sang only ballads—the same three or four that have figured in all her concerts. We never heard ballad singing which we liked better; but the variety was certainly too limited. Why not more Swedish melodies?

* From Dwight's Journal of Music.

ESSLINGEN.—A anti-factory performance of Mendelssohn's Athalia was recently given by the Oratorio Association.

BONN.—Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, Mdlles. Unschgens and Schreck, took part in the Beethoven Anniversary performance on the 17th Dec., when the programme consisted of Overture, Op. 124; Prologue, by Herr Simrock; March with Chorus from Die Ruinen von Athen; C minor Concerto; "Kyrie" and "Gloria" from the Mass in C major; and the 8th Symphony.

ABOUT NILSSON.

(From the "Providence" Press.)

Nilsson made a great impression in Boston, both in private and in public. There has been some damaging criticism upon her singing, but it does not represent the sentiment of the public at large, nor of the most intelligent class of the music-loving public. The enormous success of the concerts, in a pecuniary sense, represented the opinion of the general public pretty fully. No artist who has ever visited Boston, save Jenny Lind, has been able to draw so much money. Nilsson received many attentions from our best people. She was several times visited by Longfellow and others of the Boston literati, and on one occasion dined at Longfellow's residence in Cambridge, with a choice company. She also had personal friends in Boston, one a young lady now married and living in the vicinity of Arlington Street, who was a schoolmate in Paris, at Madame Collinet's establishment, where many wealthy young American ladies have been educated. She has found some of her schoolmates in nearly every city she has visited. A young Swedish workman in the organ factory of the Messrs. Hook, was a youthful schoolmate of the now great cantatrice in their native land. He called upon her one day, and was very heartily received, and the two, it is said, chatted a long time over the reminiscences of their childhood. Mdlle. Nilsson speaks English fluently, as might be gathered from her singing of English ballads. She seems to have a genuine affection for Stephen Foster's ballad of "The Old Folks at Home," which she sang at nearly every concert, and which she invariably gives with a degree of sadness and plaintiveness that lifts the homely song into positive sublimity. It doubtless reminds her of her own far-off home. Her singing of this song challenged the admiration of even such a fastidious critic as Mr. John S. Dwight, and here let me add that one of the best estimates of Mdlle. Nilsson yet written in this country proceeded from his pen. Nilsson is very charitable, it is said, and gives away much money among her poor countrymen and others. She is beset the while time, however, as every public artist is sure to be, by charity beggars, and besought to give her services in behalf of every sort of a charitable undertaking.

Her concert in North Bridgewater in behalf of the Swedish church at that place was a very generous act, both on her part and the members of her troupe. It netted nearly 2,500 dollars, a sum sufficient to finish the church and place the society, which is made up almost wholly of poor Swedish shoemakers and their families, entirely out of debt. Her country people were very grateful to her, and entertained their appreciation of her generosity in the most extravagant manner. When she returned to the cars the pastor of the society presented to her a Swedish prayer-book. I chanced to meet her in the evening after her return from the Bridgewater concert. She talked in the most animated manner of the affair, alluding very modestly, however, to the part she had borne in it.

Nilsson's engagement with the brothers Strakosch (both Max, who is in this country and manages the concerts, and Maurice, the brother-in-law of Adelina and Carlotta Patti, who is in Europe, are combined in the enterprise) is for one hundred nights at five thousand dollars a night in gold, and an equal share of the receipts after four thousand dollars. The latter provision gives her half as much again as her salary amounts to, so that by singing four times a week, which is about the average she receives some fifteen or sixteen hundred dollars a night.

At one of the Boston concerts the receipts were nearly nine thousand dollars, which gave her considerable over three thousand dollars as her share, and the average receipts of the eight concerts were considerably over five thousand dollars per night. The great part of the four thousand dollars goes over to pay the heavy expenses of the management in other directions. He has several other expensive artists on his hands and must also expend large sums for advertising, printing, agents, travelling, etc. Nevertheless the managers of the Nilsson concerts will probably clear one hundred thousand dollars by their speculation, while Nilsson herself will be able to swell her bank account to the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand. Mdlle. Nilsson has a smart and active agent, Mr. Henry C. Jarrett (not the well-known New York manager but an eminent operatic manager and agent of London), who looks closely after her interests. She also has a travelling companion, Mrs. Richardson, a devout English lady, who was formerly connected with Madame Collinet's school, and who has accompanied her since she first went on the stage. The fair Swede is much pleased with America and with Boston especially, and it is extremely probable that she would arrange to prolong her stay beyond the allotted time, but for an imperative engagement which takes her to London in April.

WE learn from the Utica Morning Herald (U.S.) of the 9th inst, the important news that General Tom Thumb is in England.

MILAN.—The Trovatore writes as follows:—

"The tenor Hemaing is a débutante with a voice sympathetic and delicate; he sings in excellent style and when he shall have better learnt the Italian language he will be able to anticipate a brilliant career."

BRESLAU.—The fifth Concert of the Orchestral Union commenced with a Beethoven Overture, founded upon motives from the great composer's works, by Herr Ed. Lassen. The overture was exceedingly well received. Dr. Damrosch was vehemently applauded and recalled for his execution of Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Palace pantomime is written by Mr. H. B. Farnie, and entitled Gulliver; or, Harlequin Brobdignag, the Fairy Enterprise, and the Demon Bowwow. Miss Caroline Parkes personates Gulliver. In the first scene the reckless youth makes his way into the kennel of Snarleyyow (Mr. Yarnold). He is threatened by this fiend, but the Fairy Enterprise (Miss Cole) releases him. Gulliver resolves to emigrate, but, before making final arrangements, goes down to Wapping to see his sweetheart, Saccharissa Sugarplum (Miss Thirlwall). The young lady is persecuted by two fine gentlemen of the period, Sir Lardy Dardy Doo and Captain Jinks (Miss Clara Shelley and Miss G. Chir). Saccharissa's father, Alderman Sugarplum (Mr. Arthur Williams), advises Gulliver for a son-in-law, and the scapegrace of Wapping has another trouble to fight against in the untiring pursuit of the Sheriff (Mr. Marshall. Gulliver's mother (Mr. Friend) belabours her son's pursuers, and after a scrimmage at Wapping the scene closes, and Gulliver is next seen wandering through the capital of Lilliput, the country of the pigmies. This scene of the distant city, the bridges, the river, and the palace, is very picture-que. A great many small boys and girls are employed to represent the Lilliputian army and populace. The somnolent Gulliver is made captive by tiny policemen, and astonishes the Emperor (Master Percy Roselle) and the whole of his subjects by bursting his bonds with ease. The review of miniature troops, and the introduction of the small engines with their attendants are particular features. Brobdignag is next presented, and in the palace Gulliver defies the Giant King. His mother and Master Sugarplum have visited the island, been captured, and made into a pie, but our hero appearing soon inspires vigour into the captives. The upshot is that Gulliver gets taken prisoner, in prison he has to do fearful battle with cats, but when things have come to the worst the transformation takes place, which is very effective, and is elaborately constructed. It has one change—from a cool green water cave to a fanciful landscape, glowing with golden colour and studded with fairies, which is a brilliant success. The transformation is elaborately contrived, and enough to ensure the success of the pantomime. The comic business is never dull, thanks to Mr. Boleno, who has arranged this part of the entertainment. A bed room scene full of practical joking causes hearty mirth. There is no doubt that Gulliver will prove a greater hit than any other pantomime yet produced at the Palace. Christmas decorations are very plentiful about the building, and the interior presents a gay and animated appearance. The Christmas tree is, of course, loaded with trinkets.

Frankfort-on-the-Maine.—Speaking of the fourth Museum Concert, the correspondent of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung observes that, on the announcement that Madame Artôt-Padilla and her husband were engaged for the occasion there was such a demand for tickets that the stock was quickly exhausted. "Despite this," the writer goes on to say, "their engagement struck us as being neither a necessity, nor calculated to advance the high-art objects of the Institutions. The inhabitants of Frankfort had enjoyed every opportunity of hearing the two artists, who had then appeared nine times in opera, the regular sphere of their exertions and of their triumphs. This rendered it doubtful whether they would have anything new to offer us. It was, indeed, equally doubtful whether they would feel at all at home in the domain of classical music—the great aim and end of these concerts. The result proved that our opinion was not an erroneous one. Without her admirable singing of Rode's Variations, to which, in obedience to an uproarious demand, she added the extraordinary popular but somewhat too often heard, Mandolinata, we already knew that Madame Artôt was a first-class bravura singer. The air, 'Verdi Prati,' from Handel's opera of Alcina, though beautifully composed, and though tenderly and feelingly sung by the lady, was not calculated to produce any particular impression. The well-known charming duet, between the Countess and Susanna, from Le Nozze was indisputably loses in effect when withdrawn from the stage and detached from the story, and when, moreover, it is given to a German audience in Spanish; more especially, if it has not become part and parcel of the singers, but is read by them from music. Stanziori's Romance, sung by Señor Padilla alone, with great feeling and delicacy, as well as the Spanish duet, 'Los Estudiantes,' sung by him in company with his wife, who herself played the pianoforte accompaniment, was not at all adapted to these concerts. Except in the one case mentioned, the public were exceedingly moderate in their appreciation." The orchestral pieces, under the direction of Herr Muller, suffered in no way from juxtaposition with the vocal "stars" of the evening. They were, on the contrary, listened to most attentively, and vigorously applauded, especially the first movement of the unfinished Symphony in B minor, by Schubert, and Weber's overture to Oberon. The other pieces were Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, and Spohr's overture to the opera of Der Berggeist.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Christmas performance of Handel's sacred masterpiece was given by this society, on Monday evening. Though the concert was shorn of one of its attractions, by the absence of Mr. Vernon Rigby, on account of sore throat, the interest of the event brought together an immense audience, whose satisfaction was testified by frequent applause. The orchestra comprised a band and chorus of 300 performers, with the following principal vocalists:—Mdme. Vanzini, Mdme. Patey, Mr Wilford Morgan, and Signor Foli. Mr. W. C. Stockley, as usual, conducted, and the organist was Mr. Stimpson. The execution of the choruses left little or nothing to desire on the score either of precision or expression, as will be readily understood; and though the society's band has not yet attained perfection, it is chosen with such care, and is so well disciplined, as not to be easily matched out of London. In general, the unity and precision of the choral singing were quite in keeping with the reputation of the choir, but in one or two instances, some slip in the orchestral accompaniment caused momentary unsteadiness. This was especially noticeable in "He trusted in God," and "All we like sheep." In the "Hallelujah," defects were clearly referable to the inequalities of the accompaniment.

Mr. Wilford Morgan was necessarily at a disadvantage in undertaking at short notice the principal tenor music, but he acquitted himself on the whole very fairly. His voice is one of considerable power; and though he failed to produce a great effect in the "Passion" music, he won and deserved considerable applause by the spirit and judgment displayed in the other tenor solos, especially "Thou shalt break them." Mdme. Vanzini confirmed the very favourable impression produced by recent performances here, and successfully overcame the prejudice with which a section of the Handel loving public are wont to regard the efforts of every new aspirant in this trying part. Her brilliant voice and finished execution are admirably suited in "Rejoice greatly," which she sang with immense effect, but by far her most successful effort was in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," to the fervour and majesty of which she did full justice. Indeed, the success of this latter performance was so great that with difficulty the fair vocalist resisted the encore which the repeated acknowledgments of the applause merely served to stimulate renewed demonstrations. Mdme. Patey's singing has been so often and deservedly eulogized that we can really find nothing new to say about it. She gave "He shall feed His flock," with exquisite tenderness, and nothing could well exceed the fervour and pathos of "He was despised." Signor Foli in "Why do the Nations," displayed great vigour and dramatic spirit, as in "The people that walked in darkness," and "The trumpet shall sound." The quartets in the third part were unsteady, and one phrase was actually left unfinished.

Prague.—A new comic opera, Der St. Nicolaus, music by M. Kopkoschny, words by M. Sabina, has been favourably received at the National Theatre.—The concert given by the Conservatory in honour of Beethoven's Centenary (!) was certainly not the best got up with the same object, but, at any rate, for originality, the programme was unrivalled. It contained three pieces for the oboe and the double bass, by other composers, and only two comparatively unimportant compositions by Beethoven himself. Assuredly, the science of "How not to do it," is in a flourishing state in the Hungarian capital.

Breslau.—The following compositions by Beethoven were performed during the "Festival Week" just devoted to celebrating the Centenary of his birth. 1. Sunday, the 11th December, in the Thomas-Kirche, by Riedel's Verein, Missa Solemnis, Op. 123. 2. Monday, the 12th, in the Conservatory, song by Gellert: "Gott, deine Güte;" Sonata for Pianoforte, Op. 109, E major; Trio, Op. 97, B flat major; "Abendlied für eine Singstimme;" "Elegischer Gesang" for four voices; Menuet and Finale from the Stringed Quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3. 3. Tuesday, the 13th, Chamber Music in the Gewandhaus: Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin, G major, Op. 30, No. 3, Quartet for Stringed Instruments, C sharp minor, Op. 131; Sonata for Pianoforte, E minor, Op. 90; Septet, Op. 20. 4. Wednesday, the 14th, in the Theatre, music to Egmont. 5. Thursday, the 15th, Concert at the Gewandhaus:—Overture to Coriolan; "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Op. 112; Triple Concerto; Ninth Symphony. 6. Friday, the 16th. In the Theatre, Die Ruinen von Athen; Die Grabkapelle des Feandiliens, ballet. 7. Saturday, the 17th. In the Theatre: Fidelio. It may, moreover, be mentioned that, on the 11th December, the Amateur Orchestral Union performed the overture, No. 1, to Leonore, and the music to Egmont; while the concert of Chamber Music, given on the 15th December, by Riedel's Verein, was especially devoted to the great master; the pieces executed being Stringed Quartet, F minor, Op. 95; Pianoforte Sonata, in C minor, Op. 111; Liederkreis aus die ferne Geliebte; and the Quartet in C sharp minor.

N.B.—The Entrance to the Orchestra will, in future, be by the door in Piccadilly Place only.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NEMO.—Mr. Santley has only played three parts at the Gaiety—Zampa, Tom Tug, and Fra Diavolo.

SIR HUGH HOUGH.—No. Mercadante was born in 1796, Rossini in 1792, Meyerbeer in 1794, Auber in 1784. The English poet who was born in the same year as Rossini was Shelley. Mozart died in 1791.

SIR CAPEL O'CONAY.—By no means whatever. The actual and pious King of Prussia and Emperor of Germany in posse, is not nearly so musically, or, indeed, in any way artistically, given as his late enthusiastic brother, to whom we owe the Antigone, Œdipus, and Athalie of Mendelssohn.

A. YELLOWHAMMER.—The date of Mercadante's death was that of Beethoven's birth—December 17; the date of Sterndale Bennett's birth was that of Handel's death—April 13. Rossini, although he lived to a ripe old age, had very few birthdays; he was born on February 29. "Yellowhammer" has simply muddled his facts.

A. T.—The verses of "A. T." are wonderfully graphic, but their immediate publication might possibly crush the new speculation in the bud, which would do less good than harm to the new speculation, which would rather at this juncture have good done to it than harm, and which we have reason to believe has had no reason hitherto to feel grieved at any expressed opinion of "A. T.," which must be a consolation to "A. T." for the non-insertion of his verses.

PISCATOR.—There have been young lovers and young lovers—Romeo, the Chevalier de Grieux, Muller's young Miller, also the hero of his Winter Journey, and now the hero of The Window, or, The Songs of the Wrens, for which A. S. Sullivan has supplied music to the Laureate. Moreover, Othello was a lover; and surely so was Antony. We might multiply instances, but decline. Nevertheless, Paul was in love with Virginia. There have been young lovers and young lovers. Clive, for instance (not to multiply instances), was in love with Ethel (both Newcomes)—yes sorely in love; and so was Nemorino with Adina, Ravenswood with Lucy of Lammermoor, and (not to multiply instances), others with others. There have been (and are now) young lovers and young lovers.

HORACE MAYHEW.—Our correspondent must consult a certain poet. "Si ci va di galantomen, dis el Prina sparagnand, obbligato dell aria!"

ALDERMAN BEST.—Certainly not. It was not Tintoretto, but Leonardo da Vinci. Cimarosa was not even born; and Baptista Porta could have had no more to say to the matter than Cornelius Agrippa.

DEATHS.

On December 17, at Naples, MERCADANTE, the well-known composer.

On Christmas Day, Mr. THOMAS BRAWER, Hon. Sec., Sacred Harmonic Society, and Secretary to the City of London School.

On December 24, HENRI SCHMIDLIN, brother-in-law to Mr. JOSEPH WILLIAMS, music publisher, Berners Street.

On December 22, at Upper Norwood, WILLIAM CROZIER, 1st Oboe of the Crystal Palace and other orchestras.

NOTICE.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.'S, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1870.

SIMPLY GOSSIP.

'TIS Christmas time, and we don't feel in the humour for serious disquisitions. Why should we? Nobody would read such things just now, were they written with ever so eloquent a pen. But this, though a sufficient, is not the actual reason why we decline the rostrum and prefer the seat of the gossip. It suits our fancy so to do; and, really, if a "leader" may not unbend at such a season as the present, the case is hard enough to justify recalcitrance, in the form of an unbending determination to unbend willy-nilly. We shall, therefore, "gang our ain gate," which leads us in the direction of a very easy chair, and free and easy utterances.

Great defeat of the Germans in the North, it seems;—not in the French North (though that may come one of these fine days), but in the Scotch North. We reported the invasion of "Caledonia stern and wild," by a band of Berlin fiddlers and trumpeters, when it took place a few weeks ago, and indulged hopes of their speedy expulsion. If what we hear be true, the end has come very quickly indeed, and the enemy will either have to disperse or take himself off en masse to the place whence he came. Let us hope for the latter course, because the former would surely result in a descent upon the plains of the South. Only fancy such an accession to the Teutonic guerillas already in our midst! Why, good gracious!—it would realize the Prophet Joel's description of the northern locusts. Besides, there are quite enough who come south from Borean climes already. We look to see "blue bonnets over the border"—they merely obey a natural law of gravitation; but the smoke of German meerschaums on the summit of the Cheviots—faugh! Go home, then, worthy fiddlers and trumpeters from the much be-trumpeted Vaterland. You may be needed there, not to play, but to join the "Wacht am Rhein."

Who are the Moray Minstrels? Are they amateur relatives of the Christy's? Do they black their faces—and, when bones and banjo are silent, ask each other conundrums? Not to know the Moray Minstrels may be to argue ourselves unknown; nevertheless we must frankly acknowledge that state of ignorance. It seems, however, that there are such people, and that they give "smoking concerts," whereat the sedative influence of tobacco presumably counteracts the irritation of minstrelsy, and keeps both mind and body in a state of equilibrium. A "smoking concert" took place on Beethoven's birthday; and the Moray Minstrels observed the feast by singing, in lugubrious concord of heart and voice, "Miserere mei, Deus, secundum magnum misericordiam tuam." Moreover, they put their programme into mourning. Does this seem odd? If so, we hasten to remove so entirely false an impression. The Moray Minstrels did perfectly right, and acted with a just appreciation of what was due from them. Beethoven and "minstrelsy" are like children playing at see-saw; when one goes up, up, up, the other of necessity goes down, down, down. At present, as everybody knows, the master is in the ascendant, and there is danger that the "minstrels" will have to wash their faces. No wonder they lift up their voices and weep, while surrounding fumes speak eloquently of cloudy prospects. By the way, how did the "White Lilies of the Prairie" behave under the provocation of a Beethoven centenary? Did they, also, put on sackcloth, and smoke?

Monsieur Hervé has cropped up again, both at the Gaiety and at Covent Garden. We are glad of it. Is there not an old saying to the effect that nobody can escape eating a "peck of dirt?" Well, it might be inconvenient to take one's allowance of "matter in the wrong place" at a sitting; but, since we must have M. Hervé, by all means let the affair be got over as soon as possible, unless, indeed, the composer of Chilperic will confine his energy to illustrating pantomimes. We can tolerate him once a year, along with Dutch metal.

That is a very charming volume to which Alfred Tennyson and Arthur Sullivan, in conjunction with certain nameless but artistic "operatives," have set their hands. It will receive more extended notice by-and-by, but, meanwhile, the beauty of it may give a theme for Christmas gossip. Poet, musician, and handicraftsman have combined to produce if not "a joy for ever," certainly a joy for as long as paper and binding last. Another pretty contribution to the store of Christmas gifts is the book of "National Nursery Rhymes," issued by Messrs. Novello, Ewer, & Co. All the familiar stories which amused our ancestors when the world was young, and will be laughed at when the world is old, are in it, set to congenial music by Mr. J. W. Elliot, and illustrated by pictures calculated to send the nursery into a trance of admiration. If anybody were likely to make us a present of the volume, we would even wish ourselves young again for its sake. Last, and not least, we have to thank Mr Henry Leslie for his extremely pleasant "Musical Annual," in which he gives us music of his own, music by Henry Smart (always thrice welcome), and illustrations by Millais, Marcus Stone, Val Prinsep, &c.—a most acceptable Christmas offering.

Talking of youth reminds us of how the years pass by. When these lines are read, 1870 will have but a few hours to live, and, dying, will give place to 1871. Let the old year go. It broke the promise of its first fair days—grew up into a thing of horror, "with garments rolled in blood," and now leaves a terrible legacy to its young successor. The outlook of the latter may be gloomy; but there is always hope in the unknown, and 1871, born amid storm and trouble, may die amid peace and joy. "So mote it be," above all in the experience of our readers, for whom our wish that the new year may be "happy" is not one of the empty "compliments of the season."

THE performances of Italian opera buffa at the Lyceum Theatre commence on Monday, with Rossini's Italiana in Algieri, a charming work too seldom heard. Signor Bottesini's Ali Baba, one of the most important novelties of the season, is, we are informed, in active preparation.

THE fifth season of the London Ballad Concerts, directed by Mr. John Boosey, commences on Wednesday evening, with a programme full of attractions. Six concerts are to be given on the first six Wednesdays in the New Year. No entertainments of the kind—and, indeed, Mr. John Boosey may be said to have invented this kind of entertainment—could possibly be conducted with more spirit, or better deserve public support.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE death is announced of Mr. Thomas Brewer, secretary of the City of London School. Mr. Brewer, born in 1807, at the age of sixteen entered the service of the Corporation of London, in the Town Clerk's office, and at the time of his death was senior servant of the Corporation. Mr. Brewer was elected secretary to the City of London School in 1836. In recognition of his services the freedom of the City was awarded to him in 1842. He was one of the founders of the Sacred Harmonic Society, in 1832, and its honorary secretary from that date until the commencement of the present season, when he was elected president, at the death of Mr. Harrison.

MERCADANTE died at Naples, at 7 a.m., on the 17th December, after a short illness having been struck by apoplexy on the 25th of November. The infirmities of age rendered him less active of late years, though his mind retained considerable vigour and fertility. Saverio Mercadante was born on the 4th of December, 1796, at Altamura, in the province of Bari, and belonged to a family in easy circumstances. From early youth he gave indications of musical talent which decided his future career. He was entered pupil in the College of Music at San Pietro a Majella, Naples, where he was educated under Zingarelli. He was still a pupil when he wrote his first two operas for Rome and Milan, and his success was such that he was specially commissioned to write for San Carlo at Naples. After this he visited Paris, Spain, Madrid, and other cities. For many years he occupied a post of authority at Novara, until in 1840 he succeeded Zingarelli, as Director of the College of San Pietro a Majella, over which institution he has presided ever since, except during a short interval when he incurred the displeasure of Ferdinand II. by his liberal tendencies. Mercadante lost his sight in 1861. He was the author of nearly a hundred pieces for the theatre, and produced a large number of sacred pieces and much chamber music. His funeral was solemnized on the 17th December.

MELBOURNE papers publish a letter from Mr. Sothern, in reply to a previous hint he should visit Australia. The writer says:—

"I should lose a good 16 weeks in the passages to and fro. That loss of time means to me a loss of £1,800—call it even £4,000. That amount has to be considered when making an engagement, for I leave a certainty here to run the risk of an unbounded uncertainty there. The public has nothing to do with this, you'll say; but I have, and as mine is the risk, so am I naturally anxious to lessen that risk as much as possible. Ergo, unless I see my way to a probability of making three times as much in Australia as I can do in England I should be unwise in leaving home."

Bravissimo! my Lord Dundreary. We are quite of your opinion.

WE extract the following from the admirable series of letters now publishing in Punch, under the heading of "Strawberry Leaves," and signed "Horace Walpole":—

"You Continentals behave so decorously in the theatre, that you will scarcely understand that in London it is the fashion with sundry persons to chatter and jabber in private boxes, to the annoyance of the audience and the disturbance of the actors. A few nights ago, one of our cleverest leading actresses had to come down to the footlights, and publicly complain that such interruptions, from a certain box, made it impossible for her to do justice to her part. But vulgarians are not a new invention. I remember seeing Mdme. Vestris, who was playing Apollo in Midas, walk deliberately up to a box, in which sat a chattering old she-creature in a turban, and sang point-blank at her, Pray, Goody, please to moderate the rancour of your tongue.' The audience shouted the box party out of the house. Aristocrat though I am, I have no patience with aristocratic insolence. There is the excuse that by audacious puffs and untruthful criticism folks may have been lured to a play, said to be good, and they find it is bad. Then they can go away, and not disturb those for whom it is good enough. No, sir, that is not quite an answer. They may not have ordered their carriage for an hour or more. Besides, if a man sells me a rotten apple over his counter, must I not say it is rotten for fear of annoying other folks who are content to munch his trash? But the fact is, the sort of people who make disturbances are the last people to know whether a piece is good or bad, or if they knew earlier in the evening, they are seldom competent to judge at the time they come in. The words of Mercury would be harsh after the popping of the corks of Bacchus. I wish the pit would try a bombardment of oranges."

It is easy enough to guess who is the author of these letters. Nothing better, if so good, has been done in their way since Thackeray's Esmond.

We all remember the tenor, Brignoli, at the Royal Italian Opera, playing, with Madame Fioretti, in Martha and other operas. In America, Brignoli is not only a favourite with the public, but he frequently brings actions for damages against railroad companies, wins them, and has to wait indefinitely. Here is a fresh instance, which we borrow from the self-illumined pages of the Cincinnati Chronicle:—

"The tenor of Signor Brignoli's present life runs largely towards damage suits against railroads. He has just recovered over seven thousand dollars for injuries received in an accident near Logansport, Ind. But he has not yet got the money—only the judgment. Some of these Western railroads make very fast runs, but the scale of their payments for injuries is rather more moderato than crescendo."

Brignoli is known to be an "original," but it is doubtful whether he will be content to put up with a simple "judgment."

A CRITIC writing in the Utica Morning Herald (U. S.), compares M. Vieuxtemps and Ole Bull, and says:—

"Vieuxtemps' violin is above praise from us. In the matter of execution, we think he is equal if not superior to Ole Bull. But he is not as massive and grand. He plays with feeling and delicacy—often with real fervour—but he lacks Ole Bull's power. In his sphere however, it is doubtful if he has a peer."

Massiveness, grandeur, power, and Ole Bull! What a combination! With Vieuxtemps playing second fiddle to it, moreover! Are they not wonderful critics out Utica way?

ALTHOUGH new theatres are cropping up luxuriously in every quarter of London and the suburbs, with the sole exception of the City, and although theatrical patents now belong to not very modern history, there are still numbers of Her Majesty's subjects who do not believe they really "go to the play" save when they patronize Drury Lane, where the actors, reverring ancient tradition, yet boast that they are "Her Majesty's servants." At Yuletide the persons entertaining this conviction are especially conspicuous for, though high tragedy and pantomime comedy have disappeared from boards once consecrated to "legitimacy," the truly national drama, the Christmas pantomime, survives in full vigour, and this, in many minds, is associated with the theatre that, in spite of many vicissitudes, remains an exceptionally national institution. As the Dutchman who, as a rule abstaining from theatrical enjoyments, makes a point of seeing Vondel's Gysbrecht van Amstel on New Year's Day, so does many a Briton, who despises all plays save those of Shakspere, which he does not read, make a principle of beholding a Christmas pantomime performed in a "large house." A stern belief that pudding and pantomime are essential to the ceremonies wherewith we celebrate one of the most important festivals of the Church, has long been deeply implanted in the breast of every genuine Cockney, and within the last few years the faith in Harlequin has been diffused over provinces where previously pudding alone was revered as the Christmas symbol. The audience of Boxing-night is not as other audiences, nor must the foreigner, relying on the evidence of St. Stephen's Day, infer that the English people generally look upon an overture played in the orchestra as an accompaniment to a vocal performance in the gallery. It is in the holiday week only that the "gods" vouchsafe to supply words to instrumental music, and on "Boxing-night," from the topmost seats of a house crowded to suffocation, they usually perform that musical duty to admiration.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MR. J. B. BOLTON, a new candidate for vocal honours, has recently given a series of four operatic and ballad concerts at the North Brixton Hall, assisted by Miss Pelham, Miss H. Pelham, Miss F. Taylor, Messrs. Stanley Mayo, G. F. Tear, Wade Thirlwall, F. Cramer, Lansdowne Cottell, and others. Mr. Bolton is young, but, evidently, knows how to use a good baritone voice. During the series he sung a varied selection of operatic songs and ballads, which proved that his repertory is far from limited.

MR. AGUILAR'S last performances of pianoforte music, on Dec. 15th, consisted of the following compositions:—

Sonata Pastorale (Beethoven); Aréthuse, Melody (Aguilar); Fantasia-Impromptu (Chopin); Arabesks (Schumann); Study in E flat (Thalberg); Four hand Sonata (Aguilar). Miss Grace Aguilar and Mr. Aguilar; Lieder ohne Worte (Mendelssohn); Fantasia on Faust (Aguilar); Le Soir, Nocturne (Heumel), Esmeralda, Morceau caractéristique (Aguilar), Miss Grace Aguilar; Dream Dance, Couleur de Rose, Galop brillant (Aguilar).

PROVINCIAL.

COALBROOKDALE.—MR. John Macfarren gave a pianoforte and vocal recital on Tuesday, Dec. 20th, with remarkable success. A correspondent writes:—

"The Lecture Hall was well filled by an audience who warmly appreciated a programme which included a sonata by Beethoven, an impromptu by Schubert, Weber's 'Capriccio,' Sterndale Bennett's 'Musical Sketches,' and some pieces by Prudent, Brissac, &c. Miss Jessie Royd sang, with charming expression, Macfarren's 'The Golden Heart,' and Benedict's 'Rock me to sleep;' and gave the Scotch ballad, 'Within a mile o' Edinboro' town,' with arch vivacity. Mrs. John Macfarren was much applauded throughout the evening, and by general desire repeated one of her brilliant solos, Brissac's fantasia, 'Scotia.'"

LEEDS.—We take the following from the Yorkshire Post and Leeds Intelligence of Dec. 22nd:—

"The opening of the organ erected in the Methodist Chapel, Woodhouse Lane, by Messrs. W. Holt & Son, of Leeds and Edinburgh, took place last night. The instrument, which, compared with others in the town, ranks about third in size, will cost, when fully completed, about £800; and contains 35 stops. On the great organ there are ten stops, of which the claribel and the harmonic flute are very fine, whilst the sesquialtera and doublette are remarked by all. Best is very brilliant in tone. On the swell organ, containing 20 stops, the stop diapason and the karaulophon are particularly beautiful. The instrument is provided with the unusual number of eight couplers. It is provided with Holt's patent touch, and is blown by hydraulic pressure, also Holt's patent. Mr. W. T. Best, of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, presided last night; and the programme was eminently qualified to demonstrate the capabilities and varied beauties of the instrument, and we are glad to add that the organ gave satisfaction, whilst Mr. Best acquitted himself admirably. Mr. Best, we understand, expressed a very high opinion of the merits of the organ."

DUNDEE.—This town has been enjoying a very musical Christmas, what with two orchestral concerts, a Messiah performance, and other smaller doings. Of the first-named we read:—

"The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's 'Pastoral' symphony, his overture to Fidelio, No. 4. Nicolai's overture, The Merry Wives of Windsor, and Weber's Jubel. Great neatness of execution, careful management of details, and true expression, characterized the symphony performance. The overtures were also well played, and full opportunity was given to judge of the merits of compositions hitherto unknown to the local public. Madame Rudersdorff and Mr. Byron were the vocalists. Both sang two solos. Through some mischance the instrumental parts for Madame Rudersdorff's chief effort, Medea, had not reached the town, and we had to listen to Rudegger's composition as sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Herr Rothfeldt. Encored for 'Lucinda's' She never told her love,' Madame Rudersdorff substituted an Irish ballad. As almost the only light piece of the evening, it was acceptable to the audience. Mr. Byron's solos were 'Il mio Tesoro,' and a ballad from Mr. Barnby's Rebekah—the latter a melody in the Gounod style, richly set with operatic harmonies after Spohr and his school. Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor was played by Herr Rothfeldt and the band. Mr. Carl Hamilton played a remarkably neat fantasia on Scotch airs on the violoncello. On this occasion he excelled himself."

BELFAST.—The local Evening Telegraph speaks as follows about a concert recently given by Dr. Leo Kerbusch:—

"The programme consisted of selections from the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Macfarren, Pinsuti, Kerbusch, &c.; the feature of the evening being an original cantata by Dr. Kerbusch—In the beginning was the Word. This work reflects great credit on the author. Freshness and variety mark the entire composition. The opening chorus is succeeded by a recitative and solo for the bass, which Mr. Wood, a favourite in Belfast, rendered in a finished manner. A tenor solo follows, which was sung by Mr. Thackeray. This gentleman who possesses a fine round voice, of considerable compass, sang the part allotted to him with taste and finish. A duet for soprano and contralto was well rendered by the Misses Richardson. The cantata concludes with a chorus, 'And we beheld His glory,' in which the composer makes use of the fugue to great advantage. Fesca a grand trio in B flat, for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte, was performed with much ability, and contributed not a little to the enjoyment of the evening. The concert was brought to a close by Beethoven's grand chorus, 'Hallelujah,' from the Mount of Olives, sung in honour of the centenary of the composer. Dr. Kerbusch acted as conductor, and presided at the piano."

NOTTINGHAM.—The following is a condensation of an article from the Nottingham and Midland Counties Daily Express of the 20th ult:—

"Last night the second of a series of Monday Popular Concerts took place in the Mechanics' Hall. The concert opened with the trio in C minor of Mendelssohn, played by Madame Arabella Goddard (pianoforte), Mr. Henry Farmer (violin), and Mr. Selby (violoncello). This was brilliantly given, the playing of Madame Goddard being especially remarkable for purity of expression and delicacy of manipulation; indeed, we cannot sufficiently express our admiration at the merits of the performance, which, as a whole, could scarcely have be n surpassed. In 'Deh Vieni' (Mozart) the soprano voice of Miss Margaret Galloway was heard to advantage. Mr. Henry Farmer (first violin), Mr. Leverton (second violin), Mr. Myers (viola), and Mr. Selby (violoncello) were conspicuously successful in the quartet in E flat of Mendelssohn (Op. 12), and deservedly applauded. Miss Galloway sang with exquisite taste 'Rosebuds on thy grave are sleeping,' after which Madame Goddard played magnificently Handel's 'Harmonious Blacksmith.' The applause which followed this performance sufficiently attested the appreciation of the audience. Miss Galloway sang 'My mother bids me bind my hair,' and the concert was brought to a close by the concerto in G minor of Mendelssohn, the performers being Madame Goddard, Mr. Farmer, Mr. Leverton, Mr. Myers, and Mr. Selby. Mr. G. Essex, jun., acted efficiently as accompanist on the pianoforte, one of Broadwood's new patent 'iron grand,' which was generally admired."

MALVERN.—A correspondent has been good enough to send us the following:—

"On Wednesday the newly-organized Philharmonic Society, formed from the materials of the old Malvern Choral Society, gave a concert in the College School-room, which was kindly lent for the occasion by the head master. Much credit is due to the conductor, the Rev. A. Sewell, one of the masters of the college, for the great interest he has taken in the society. He brought about on this occasion the best body of performers ever known at an amateur concert in Malvern or neighbourhood. Moreover, a considerable number of professional vocalists and instrumentalists greatly enhanced the success of the concert. The performance consisted of a few secular pieces, and a selection from the Messiah. 'The winds whistle cold' was rendered with good taste, but in Sullivan's part-song, 'Christmas,' the tenors were weak and unsteady. Mdlle. Romano sang several recitatives and airs from the Messiah, which were most of them warmly applauded. 'His lady possesses a sweet voice, but of little power. The Rev. G. Custance sang several solos—' Why do the people?' being the most suited to his style, for which reason the audience seemed anxious to have it repeated. Mr. Smith, of Upchurch, Cathedral, rendered several of the tenor recitatives and airs with very good expression. As regards the choruses, some wanted due reverence for the subject. 'For unto us a child is born,' 'Glory to God,' and 'Lift up your heads,' were given evenly, and the first-named was repeated. Signor Romano played two pianoforte solos. The concert was a good one, and the result must be satisfactory to the promoters of the society."

NILSSON IN ORATORIO.

Steinway Hall (New York) was of course filled when Mdlle. Nilsson sang in oratorio for the first time in this country. The Sun says of the performance:—

"Mdlle. Nilsson fully justified the great reputation that she brought to this country as an oratorio singer. There were many who at her concerts objected to her method of singing 'Angels ever bright and fair,' and who, founding their anticipations on that performance, concluded that Mdlle. Nilsson's oratorio singing would be characterized by an over-strained sentiment, and much liberty with the time and even with the notes of the composer. But these anticipations proved entirely erroneous. Mdlle. Nilsson sang Handel's music in a most devout spirit, with a reverent regard for the music as the composer wrote it, and for the sacred text. Her spirit was certainly in perfect accord with the theme, and she unfolded to us more completely than at any previous occasion the secret of her great reputation. There was, in the first place, a unity about the performance such as there never has been at her concerts. In place of the scattered fragments of song, first about one subject and then about another, the whole was knit together in sentiment. The key of feeling that the orchestra set with the solemn introduction was sustained to the end. And Mdlle. Nilsson did everything to keep that feeling intact. She laid aside the débonnaire manner that she is accustomed to wear at her concerts, and was in manner in accord with the occasion. Her voice seems specially adapted by its exquisite purity to sacred music, and in her singing of the great solos, 'Rejoice greatly,' 'How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace,' and 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' there seemed to us everything to commend and nothing to warrant objection. The intonation was pure and true, the phrasing especially beautiful, and the effect devotional and ennobling."

SCHUMANN ON THE FOUR OVERTURES TO FIDELIO.

"It ought to be printed in golden letters what the Leipsic orchestra performed last Thursday: all four overtures to 'Fidelio' one after the other. Thanks, ye Viennese of 1805, that the first one did not take hold of you, until Beethoven in a God-like furor hurled out one after another. If ever he seemed powerful to me, it was on that evening when we could overhear him better than ever in his workship,—moulding, rejecting, altering,—ever hot and glowing, in the midst of his labour. Most gigantic did he show himself perhaps in the second onset. The first overture would not please; hold, thought he, bear the second and go wild,—and he set himself to work anew, and let the thrilling drama itself pass before them, and sang the great sorrows and the great joys of his noble lovers once again. It is demoniacal, this second overture; in some of its details even bolder than the third, the well-known mighty one in C. For even this did not content him; so he put it aside, and only retained single pieces from it, out of which, in a more calm, artistic way, he formed the third. Later followed that earlier and more popular one in E major, with which Fidelio is commonly opened in the theatre.—Such is the great Four-Overture work. In the same way that Nature fashions her productions, we see in it first the tangled roots, out of which in the second the gigantic trunk rears itself, spreads out its arms to the left and to the right, and finally concludes with light and graceful foliage and blossoms."

We too, all of us, who listened for the first time to that first overture, can thank "the Viennese" for provoking the composer into giving us three more; but we cannot thank them for consigning so beautiful, so ideal a creation to comparative obscurity. Our feeling is that this No. 1 stands by itself, a thing complete and altogether lovely, the product of a deep, sweet, tender feeling; while No. 2, much bolder in its reach, more thrilling in its grand melodramatic effect of the trumpet scene, &c., is interesting chiefly as a rough, crude sketch of the inimitable No. 3. The pervading tone of feeling in the first is gentle, quiet, and reflective; it begins with a musing soliloquy of the violin,—a thinking over as it were in memory of "my prisons,"—after time has healed the wounds and wrought sweet reconciliation. The tragedy is past when this is written; the sentiment remains, a meditation on the beauty of the wife's devotion and the noble love of Leonora and her martyr husband; this lends the deep, warm, quiet inspiration to the overture. Naturally it was too unexciting, too fine, too idyllic, to make a hit at once in a Viennese theatre filled in great part with French soldiers. So he set to work to give them something more effective, more dramatic, even melodramatic, without being any the less a noble work of art. To do so, in the first attempt, he breaks the perfect spell, the rounded unity of the first prelude, retaining and placing at once in the foreground, as the heart and central motive of the drama, the prison aria of the Tenor, which here is introduced towards the end, and keeping up a family resemblance in the general character of themes and phrases; so much so that the yearning, soaring, syncopated swift melody that pervades the second and third overtures, seems naturally and logically born out of the first, although only vaguely hinted there. The overture lacked neither fire nor delicacy in the rendering, and it produced, we think, a general desire that it shall not again become a stranger to us.

BEETHOVEN AND THE BRITISH PUBLIC.

On the evening of Saturday last week the centenary of Beethoven was celebrated at Covent Garden by the performance of Fidelio. The house was crowded, particularly in the cheapest part. I was in the cheapest but one—the amphitheatre stalls; should, if worth a three pound a year certain, have occupied a pit stall; nay, perhaps the centre of a box, with a suitable companion on either side of me. The people encored the overture first played—to wit, Leonora, No. 3. They listened most attentively to the whole performance from beginning to end. Now, Fidelio is an opera of which the interest does not consist in sympathy with vice. Beethoven was not the composer to write music descriptive of breaking the Seventh Commandment. On the contrary, in Fidelio he glorifies conjugal loyalty—worthily, both by voice and acting, expressed by Tietjens. The public appreciation of a work founded on the basis of sentiments proper to man (especially woman), and not at all on that of the nature which mauked share with apes and the rest of the lower animals, appears to me a cheering indication. It is a symptom of progress, though partial, which may afford some little comfort to melancholy persons, disgusted and disheartened by the scene of brutality and backwardation at present generally exhibited by the surrounding world. BEETHOVEN AS AN ORCHESTRAL COMPOSER.

We extract the following from a thoughtful article on the Beethoven Centenary, which appeared in the Glasgow Daily Herald on Tuesday week:—

"In writing of Beethoven's compositions, it is difficult to abstain from what some may consider exaggerated eulogy. Fully conscious of this, we have no hesitation in saying that we regard Beethoven as the only composer who ever had complete mastery over an orchestra. We are not blind to his shortcomings. He essayed to write melodies for the voice as flowing as those of Mozart, and sacred choruses as broad and as devotional in spirit as those of Handel, but in doing so he failed; and yet by many degrees he is the most consummate musician that ever lived. No one has ever approached Beethoven in his compositions for the pianoforte or for the chamber, but in his orchestral works especially he transcends all others. In these he seems to pour out his whole soul. Under his command the orchestra appears to possess powers which no other writer knew how to call into existence. He does not treat it as composed of many parts, but as one and indivisible. How varied is his manner—how capricious at times appear his details; and yet we find all tending to one harmonious result. How he fondles and nurses his muse with all the kindly sympathy shown by a mother to her wayward child; suddenly he raises a storm of restless passion which seems beyond his power to control, and anon—as if by the waving of Prospero's wand—all is gentleness and serenity. The great secret of his power lies in the intensity of his own feelings being so eloquently expressed by the orchestra, and thereby communicated to the listener.

We regard Mozart as the only writer of instrumental music entitled to stand upon the same platform as Beethoven. There was, however, a vast difference in the natures of the men, which shows itself alike in their lives and in their works. Mozart took the world as it came, enjoying it when he could, and when he could not, yielding himself to fate, living and writing, but not feeling, in mild and tender—never feeling stormy passion, and therefore never expressing it in his writings. Yet with these differences, and being judged according to his light, he stands next to Beethoven. In saying so we do not forget the great talent shown by Haydn in his Salomon's symphonies, by poor Franz Schubert in his instrumental compositions, by Spohr in his Power of Sound nor by Mendelssohn in his Scotch symphony.

It is not to be expected that in one hearing of these wondrous inspirations the listener can derive even a passing satisfaction. To be able to enjoy them, even superficially, one must know something of the music, and only repeated hearings sufficiently disclose their endless beauties—indeed, to reach their depth, one must study every phrase, every variety of that phrase; nay, even every bar of the composition. A simple comparison for purely apparent form a performance of these works is to learn the subjects on which they are constructed; but the key to the proper understanding of Beethoven's symphonies is to bear in mind that each movement is generally written with a subject and counter-subject, into which are introduced one or more episodes. These episodes constitute the greatest charm of his writings. One can never tell how or when to expect them. They are somewhat startling at first, and appear, though spontaneously, as intrusions. They usually break in upon some charming idea which has captivated the ear, and the skill of the composer is nowhere more shown than reuniting the broken threads, and thus augmenting the interest. Other composers have attempted to imitate Beethoven in this respect, but without success; he stands alone as being the one who created the idea and who perfected it. But, to gain close sympathy with the composer, and be able thoroughly to enter into his wonderful creations, more is needed than a technical knowledge of the music. The young and thoughtless, and those whose lives have been one continued sunshine, will derive more pleasure from the sparkling music of Rossini or the luscious melodies of Italy. Those only who have known days of sorrow, who have endured heavy trials or had their most sensitive feelings stirred, or above all, who have mourned the loss of their nearest and dearest, can fully appreciate Beethoven, for they only are able to realize the mental agony which he must have experienced before such conceptions could emanate ever from genius.

THE Christmas supplement to the Graphic contains a striking piece of poetic realism in art, furnished by Mr. Fildes, draughtsman, and Mr. Thomas, engraver. "The Vacant Chair," a faithful picture of the study at Gadshill, in which the last pages of the last book of Charles Dickens were written, is contributed by the young artist who was engaged in illustrating Edwin Drood. The precise minuteness of photography, with a delicate tenderness in which photography is a stranger, characterizes the details of this labour of love down to the grotesque little bronzes of fencing frogs among the writing materials on the author's desk.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite.—The Civil Service Gazette remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Each packet is labelled:—JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London. Also makers of EPPS'S CHOCOLATE, a very fine evening beverage.

NEWS (?) FROM PARIS.

(By Balloon.)

Little by little Paris begins to banker after the drama, and does not see why the theatres should be shut because King William and Count Moltke have cut off the capital from the world. In the first days of the siege the Governement decreed that the theatres should be shut up. The plays of M. Sardou and M. Dumas fils would not, it argued, lead to that grave dignity of demeanour which befitted the greatest of sieges and the most awful calamity that had ever befallen France. They were right. Few things could more effectively bring Paris to its senses, and let it know what was meant by a siege, than the fact that, for the first time within its experience, it could not go to the play. But after a while, Paris did not take kindly to the remedy. Paris is not like Venice, the ladies of which, during the time of foreign occupation, would not go to any entertainment with which Austrians had to do. The French capital found the siege dull when General Trochu would not make sorties and the Prussians would not come out to be killed. So, while Fort Valérien was pitching shells, the citizens asked Government why they might not have a little music. The Government responded by so far relaxing its rigour as to permit oratorios in the afternoon. Thus the thin end of the wedge was put into the block of Parisian gravity, and now, it would seem, "vested interests" are driving the wedge home. Under the Empire, the Opera profited by a subsidy from the State, which the Provisional Government withdrew. Consequently the singers have suffered a loss which they bitterly feel; and the Government responded to their prayers by saying that they may sing provided they sing sadly. Henceforth they may give entertainments, if they perform nothing but serious music, appear without costumes, and devote the receipts to the victims of Châteaudun. It is easy to laugh at the odd mixture of gravity and gaiety betrayed by these regulations; but, after all, they are dictated by a just perception of Parisian necessities. The tedium of a siege is undeniable; and there is no form of recreation so much in harmony with the atmosphere of it as the more serious music, made more pure, more effectual in assuaging grief or restoring a healthy tone.—P.

[This despatch has been a very long time coming.—ED.]

MR. BEECHER ON ORGAN CONCERTS.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, in announcing to the congregation of Plymouth Church the new series of Saturday afternoon organ concerts in that church for the season of 1870-71, after giving the names of the performers, made some very interesting and sound remarks; he said:—

"You will allow me to say a word on the subject of these organ concerts. They were begun several years ago at my suggestion. While I was in Europe, both in 1850 and 1853, I was very much delighted and very much interested, in some respects, by the evening concerts that were given in various European cities; and I thought, if it is in the power of a hierarchy, using their cathedrals and their organs to give these concerts, why should not freedom do the same thing? Why should not free churches be able to afford musical entertainment and instruction, and make it accessible to all and common to all? And, when, after my return, the trustees moved, very wisely, I think, as well as very successfully, in the procuration of a new organ, it seemed to me that the time had come when I had Mr. Müller, at my request, gave concerts, in a more quiet way, on Monday afternoons, without fee or reward, for two seasons, and performed himself, from week to week, giving, perhaps a répertoire of music more extended than any other one man has given in either of the two cities. These concerts became somewhat known in that way. When the present conductors of music took their place among us, it was my earnest desire that the same thing should be extended; and another day was chosen on which more persons could come together; and the concerts were in many respects re-ordained.

"Now, it is because it is organ music that I am so much interested in these concerts. I love music from a Jew's harp to David's harp. I love everything that is musical. No hand goes through the street that I do not go with it in thought. Even the more humble minstrels, who perform under false appearances, I publicly confess that I have a sympathy for them, too. And I should go and hear some of these things occasionally if it did not cost more than it comes to. There are many liberties that belong to me that I do not take because I am tired of being hawked through all the papers. It is cheaper to let such things alone than to take my rights, and then be written about, and thought about, and talked about. I love all sorts of music. Give me the French; give me the Italian; give me the German; give me the wild airs of Scotland; give me the wails from Ireland; give me our own negro minstrels music. They all find, in different degrees, a response from my heart. But I cannot bear to see the whole command let off to any one style—certainly not to that which is not always the best style—of music. When I consider what the state of music is in churches, I find that it is largely operatic, a little disguised, but not converted. A great deal of the organ playing is not of organ music. If I am rightly informed, a great deal of the singing in churches is not singing of sacred, but singing of secular music—that is, with all the associations of the week on it. You have in the churches on Sunday a little slower pace of the same thing that you have in the concert-room during the week.

"Now, it has pleased God, in the midst of all the changes of the world to raise up one instrument which in itself is the most complex and the grandest, that has the widest scope, and that has in it more elements of power and beauty than, I had almost said, all other instruments. For it is itself a musical museum. It is the epitome of all orchestras, of all phases, whether stringed or wind. It has pleased God to make that a gift to the Church and the servant of religion. It has also pleased God to inspire men to create for the organ a school and body of music, large, historical, as noble as ever was inspired on earth. And I believe that this was say, during the week to opera and to concert, "Play as you will," we have a right to say on Sunday, "Let us have ecclesiastical music." Let us have music that represents the more sober moods of the mind. Let us have music which, if it rejoices, rejoices in the Lord. Let us have in our organ concerts a representative music of the organ. You can get dances and polkas elsewhere. I do not want to have dances and polkas performed on the organ. That is not its business. Not that the instrument cannot perform these things; not that occasionally they may not be introduced into organ-music in certain ways; but there ought to be in the public mind the means of estimating and of judging of those styles of music which are grave and full of moral feeling, and that take hold of the highest impulses and instincts of our nature. And it is for the purpose of making the community familiar with organ music that I have felt a deep interest in these concerts. And I believe that they have done and are growing in this direction. And though multitudes of persons are not particularly discriminating. I believe—and I believe it from what I saw during the last two years—that the higher classes of music are coming to be more appreciated. I have noticed that the best performers were the most enthusiastically received, and that the really best music was the most cheered, while what might be called clap-trap music, that which goes by the name of popular music, was received the most nearly with silence and disapprobation. I never felt a greater pleasure than that which I felt when I heard alla podrida performance—music made up of snatches here and there—implying that that was all that you could understand, followed by dead silence. It was a compliment of which you yourself did not appreciate the weight. And when some of the noblest things of the most inspired musicians were received with enthusiasm, I felt prond of you, and blessed God, and took courage.

"Now we enter upon another season. The concert will be held one hour. The main performances will be on the organ; but there will also be some singing and lighter music for the sake of interesting you between the more voluminous and weighty passages of the organ music."

THE TRANSLATOR OF TANNHAUSER.

In Paris there lived a young and unknown poet, Edward Roche, of great talent, and of the highest education, but totally unknown, and without a friend, even, to give him a helping hand in the career of letters. Despairing of literary success, Roche obtained an insignificant post in the custom-house. To all appearance he was likely thus to protract a miserable and inglorious existence with no opportunity of exhibiting the talents which he undoubtedly possessed. His luck seemed to have left him, and he was despondent accordingly. One day, while Roche was working in the custom-house office, which happened to be close to the railway station, his attention was aroused by the noise of the expostulation and loud remonstrance heard just beneath the window. An irascible German passenger was loudly declaiming against the absurdity of the rules by which he was troubled through the short-sighted wisdom of the railway administration. Roche went out and heard the stranger, whose passion culminated in a strong vein of soliloquy, address himself as Wagner. The young man seized the opportunity. He stepped forward, bowed to the stranger and speedily by his intervention made his vexed path straight. Wagner was profuse in his thanks; Roche was delighted that he was able to render even the slightest service to so illustrious a man. Wagner's enormous and soul-controlling vanity must have been touched; Roche fancied he saw his opportunity, and commenced to hum some of the melodies from Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. "Oh!" said Wagner, "this is a splendid omen for me. The whole Parisian I meet knows my music and admires it. Liszt shall know this. Sir, we must see each other again."

Such was the commencement of an acquaintance destined to be eventful to both,—tragic to one. Wagner grew to entertain a high opinion of Edward Roche; and when he looked for a translator of Tannhäuser, he thought he could find none better than the young man who had proved his saviour in the railway episode. Wagner offered Roche the work, and Roche in an ecstasy of joy, it is needless to say, accepted it. But the poor fellow little know what he would have to encounter. He gave a whole year to the work, sacrificing many a night's sleep, and devoting to the task every instant of the day which was not employed at the counting house. Roche soon found that his illustrious employer was, to use his own words, "a dreadful man." Never was task-master of the Egyptians so remorsely exacting. Capable of prodigious exertions, Wagner measured the ability of others by himself, and Roche fairly had not a moment's rest. When the young clerk contrived to obtain a holiday from his office, every moment was absorbed by the demands of the author of Tannhäuser. On such occasions as these, Roche thus describes the programme of the day's proceedings:—"At 7 o'clock in the morning we sat down to work, and without rest or pause went on till noon. There I sat over my desk—stooping, writing, blotting, correcting, searching painfully for the syllables which accorded best with particular notes. Meanwhile, Wagner with flaming eyes and angry expression, now strode up and down impatiently. "Forward! forward!"—at 12 or 1 o'clock, wearied and sick, faint with hunger, and with aching fingers, I would let my pen drop, and sink back in my chair. Then would the Master ask me, in tones of indignation and surprise, what was the matter. "Oh, I am hungry," I would mutter. Generally he would reply, "Very well; I did not think of that; we will eat something quickly and continue again." I was suffered to swallow a few morsels, not more, and then I was spurred on to resume my toil, and continued till night. I grew exhausted, but he cared not; my head glowed liked fire. I became driven to desperation at this ceaseless hunt for appropriate syllables and words. It was impossible to please him. As for Wagner himself he was still as fresh as ever. Nothing seemed to tell upon those exhaustless energies. Still he strode up and down the room, or, striking the notes of the piano, shook his head and swayed his body in such a manner that his pointed shadow on the wall, nervous and weary as I was, actually terrified me. It seemed like one of the evil spirits in the fairy tale, screaming forth strange words and phantom notes.

Here this pathetic narrative ends. The translation was at last finished and Tannhäuser was produced. The first night it was an equivocal success; (No it wasn't—A.S.S.) the second it was received coldly; on the third it was an unmistakable failure. Wagner's hopes were wrecked, and his ambitious dreams destroyed; and with the destruction of these there vanished also the last faintly-glimmering promise of good fortune for Edward Roche. Wagner, indeed, recovered from the mortification of the failure, but Roche did not; the poor fellow was simply killed by the collapse of Tannhäuser. He died in the following December.

BEECHER ON BIRDS.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has been writing on this subject in the Christian Union; and thus discourses anent the feathered songsters:—

"People who have been born and bred in the city know nothing of bird-song, except as they hear canaries or other feathered prisoners sing from cages, who sing for a living. This, indeed, is not to be despised, but it is not the singing of free wild birds. Even those who live in the country seldom hear birds sing at their best. People are in bed when the great concert comes off. During May and June, birds wake about half-past three or four o'clock in the morning. Even if one goes to sleep again it is worth his while to be awakened to hear this wonderful outburst. There is nothing else in all the common phenomena of nature that seemed so admirable and so increasingly interesting as this. Birds do not sing alike at all hours of the day. An attentive ear will notice not only very different strains, but a very different spirit. The mid-day singing is casual, not prolonged, a mere interjection here and there. They sing as it were to while away a little time. At evening birds sing next in duration and effect to the morning song, but more tender, less tumultuous. It is in the morning that one must hear them, who would know the full ecstasy. It is very still. The dew lies heavy on all things. In the east there is a coming fast, and twilight every moment gains new radiance. Not a sound gives warning of any coming song. Far off one hears the hoarse bawk of a goose, or the bark of a dog disturbed by some early traveller. Then one hears a single call-note, as if the chorister was calling attention and giving out his song. It is answered in an enquiring way by another bird as much as to say, "We are ready, shall we begin?" Then one launches out, but has not uttered two syllables before a score of birds strike in, and then, from the fields, the forest edges, from orchards and gardens, from the grounds, the fences, and the air, then comes a Babel of sweet sounds, running into each other, clashing overlaying and surging together that one cannot distinguish any single songster's note, but only a wild mingling of hundreds of birds, all singing at the very top of their power, as if fired by an ecstasy of gladness. This great gush of song lasts from twenty minutes to half an hour, and then ceases almost as simultaneously as it began. The birds seem then to occupy themselves with their toilet and breakfast, after which, but in a less general way, they sing again for an hour or two. Then they scatter, and pursue the regular business of the day singing but little until evening, unless the day be clouded.—If the morning is overcast, birds do not have their grand sing. But if on such days the moon be clear or tending to clear up, birds become quite vocal. Sunlight has much to do with their disposition to sing. The electrical condition of the atmosphere it is probable, has much to do with this inspiration of song."

THE Archbishop of Paris has forbidden Nilsson to sing in opera on account of the death of her mother; at all events, so says an American paper. Did his grace convey the intimation per balloon post?

MR. P. S. GILMORE appeared as a soloist at one of the Nilsson concerts in Boston, performing the trumpet obbligato to "Let the bright Seraphim," which was sung by Nilsson. The piece had a tremendous encore, Mr. Gilmore sharing with Nilsson in the applause. Mr. Gilmore had not before appeared as a soloist at a Boston concert for over a dozen years. His appearance on the occasion named was only in compliment to Mdlle. Nilsson, who, it should be added, took occasion to show, both publicly and privately, her appreciation of the compliment.

WAIFS.

Mr. John P. Morgan, the well-known organist of New York, is the director of the new musical enterprise called The Euterpe.

Adelaide Phillipps has entirely recovered her voice, and is travelling through the Western States.

Mrs. Fanny Keller, daughter of Mr. M. Keller, the composer, is soon to make her debut in concert at Boston.

M. Vieuxtemps has met with a hearty reception from the Bostonians, among whom he was exceedingly popular on his former visit.

Mr. Punch's definition of the great plague of London is—"a barrel-organ." Hear! hear!

Mr. John Barnett (composer of the Mountain Sylph) has arrived in London, for the Christmas holidays.

The National Choral Society, under Mr. G. W. Martin, gave its first Christmas Messiah performance, at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday night.

Mdlle. Christine Nilsson has been attending the flower stand of Mrs. Ogden Doremus at the French Fair in New York. Her sales were enormous.

A concert was given at the Music Hall, Boston, on the 21st ult., in aid of the French sufferers in the present war. M. Vieuxtemps, Dr. Guilmette, Mr. J. H. Wilcox, and other well known artists, assisted.

The Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, are making preparations for their Triennial Festival next spring. The guarantee fund has already reached a large sum.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed having arranged for a further tenancy of the Gallery of Illustration, have re-appeared in their successful entertainment, Ages Ago, assisted by Miss Fanny Holland, Mr. Corney Grain, and Mr. Arthur Cecil. Baden Baden and The Rival Composers, made up the evening's amusement.

Miss Annie Louise Cary, the contralto of the Nilsson troupe, was welcomed home with great honours. She had gained great applause at every one of the concerts. She has also sang at one or two other concerts with great success. Her old Boston friends have been delighted to find her so finished an artist.

The question of right to reserved seats at concerts, theatres, etc., which has created a good deal of annoyance in some American towns, was recently decided by one of the judges, who held that all seats previously secured by ticket were the property of the person for whom they had been secured, and might be occupied or allowed to remain idle at that particular entertainment, at his or her pleasure.

We read the following in the Syracuse Daily Courier (U.S.), of December 10th :—

"Miss Annie Louise Cary intends, it is rumoured, to retire from public singing in the spring, after the close of her engagement with Mr. Strakosch. The cause is an engagement of another character—a matrimonial one with Dr. Hunter, of Philadelphia."

If this be true, the Italian Opera will too easily lose its youngest and most promising mezzo-soprano-contralto. From the same paper we subtract the following :—

"Mr. Henry Vieuxtemps, the violinist, closes his engagement with the troupe on the first of April, but will remain in the country until the summer months, making his home in Boston. Next year Mr. Strakosch will bring Adelina Patti to America."

The "troupe" means the Nilsson company, now triumphantly invading every town and city in the States.

A second Daniel writing in a contemporary says :—

"The lovely entr'acte in B minor (Rosamunde) by that somewhat little appreciated genius, Schubert, was a prominent and welcome feature in the programme. There is another entr'acte to the same opera, sweet and most expressive, in B flat; this seems to be little known, at any rate we have never heard it in London."

Daniel the second does does not seem to know that Schubert is appreciated just now quite violently, and that the B flat entr'acte is familiar to every Crystal-Palace-going amateur.

The Germania Orchestra of Philadelphia has profited by its loss of popularity the last few seasons, and the criticisms it has received, and has gone to work with a great increase of spirit. The sectional extension of the programmes is improved and the ambition of the Society seems to have quite a fresh start. The most important work it has as yet given was Liszt's "Preludes." This was not altogether a satisfactory performance, but will be better when it is repeated. It claims a répertoire of twenty-eight symphonies, eighty-five overtures, a complete selection of operatic selections and waltzes.

The harp, the cherished musical instrument of the Twanglangodillo Principality, is now rarely found in Wales. The Welsh harpers have taken to the turf, and their name is changed to Welsh Sharpers, or Welchers. Alas! Alas! That the only remains of their glory should be the Something-bury races, got up by sporting publicans and sinners not a hundred miles from the Welsh Harp of Hendon. Punch.

The Harvard Musical Association of Boston opened their sixth season of Symphony Concerts, on the 3rd. ult. The orchestra is much larger and much better than it was last year. Thomas's visits have done much good, and one of the most marked results has been to wake up this "slow" institution. Mr. Zerrahn is still the conductor, and Mr. B. Listemann is leader. Mr. M. W. Witney and Mr. Hugo Leonard assisted at the opening concert, the former singing two vocal songs by Beethoven, and a bass aria from Bach's Passion Music, and the latter playing Beethoven's Piano Concerto, No. 4, in G. The orchestral numbers included Beethoven's Inaugural Overture, in C, Op. 124; Cherubini's prelude to the third act of Medea, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The performances generally were very good. The second concert took place on the 17th, when the programme embraced Beethoven's first overture to Leonora in C; Concerto for the violin, by Lipinski; Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes; Haydn's Symphony in C minor, No. 9; a chaconne for violin, by Bach; and Rietz's Fest Overture. The violin pieces were played by Mr. B. Listemann.

The veteran ex-conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society, Mr. J. Surman, has addressed the following remarks to a contemporary :—

"When Mendelssohn's Lobgesang or Hymn of Praise was first produced at the Birmingham Festival, the composer himself conducted. St. Paul having had such a favourable reception at the Liverpool Festival and Exeter Hall, something good was naturally expected from the hand of the talented composer; and neither the audience nor the orchestra were disappointed, although most agreed that the instrumental movements were the finest portions of the work. The duet with chorus, 'I waited for the Lord,' certainly produced a marked impression; but there was a depression of head and chorus till they finished the first part of the concert with that old Handel performance—the hymn from Judas Maccabæus, 'We never will bow down,' which roused the whole orchestra from their lethargy. Even Mendelssohn himself could not remain among the audience, but came in the most humble and unobtrusive manner and took part from my book, joining with me and the rest of the tenors most efficiently. His sharp eye and fine ear detected a wrong note in the copy, which, taking out his pencil, he corrected. After a short interval, the second part of the concert commenced with 'Immortal Lord' and 'See the proud chief,' from Handel's Deborah; the whole orchestra seemed inspired, and sang with new life and vigour those matchless compositions. Mendelssohn was again at his post, and joined in most ably through both of the choruses, and when we had finished he admitted that Handel was the 'proud chief,' for he held up both his hands and exclaimed 'All this may come within the category of an air!'"

The following remarks from Land and Water will have the approval of everybody worth consideration :—

"Perhaps the social reformers of the present time will be able to glance a little beyond their regions of theatrical morals and educational perneation at the simple butchery of the acrobat that is of almost daily occurrence in this kingdom. Scarcely a town that can boast of 10,000 inhabitants can exist in these improving days without a musical hall, and no musical hall can exist without catering to the tastes of the million. The million craves for comic songs, break-downs, and acrobats. The last-mentioned must be possessed of as much foolhardiness as agility, if they wish for anything beyond a temporary engagement. The more danger that they can import into their performance, the better the spectators are pleased, the higher their salary. A man who can turn two back-somersaults, at some dizzy height, is worth double the ordinary creature who prefers to do so near the ground. The audience creates the demand—the acrobat must supply it. Only last Tuesday, Liverpool was the scene of two serious accidents; in one a woman, in the other a man, while going through a dangerous feat, fell, and were both seriously hurt. This might have been prevented by the ordinary protection-nets that are generally used in London. There is some expense attached to their use, perhaps, and the morbid craving of a gaping crowd that watches every tremor of a muscle at some terrible height, with a half-stupified gaze and secret wish to be present when the accident occurs—should like just to see it—would receive its quietus, and turn elsewhere for excitement. The police ought to have the same control over the dangers as they do over the morals of music-halls, and then we should protect a hard-working and ill-paid class, the acrobats; and, at the same time, effectually destroy the performance of demoralising feats that, fungus-like, is choking the growth of all legitimate exhibitions. The ipse dixit of an inspector would go a long way to put down these spurious gymnastics."

HAMLET.

"THE DRINKING SONG,"

SUNG BY

MR. SANTLEY.

Price 4s.

"In a song entitled 'O Wine! come drive away the sadness,' we have one of the most pleasing melodies in the opera of Hamlet, produced last year at Covent Garden. It is an Anglicised version of the drinking song which M. Ambroise Thomas has thought fit to allot to the noble Dane, and which was sung with excellent effect by Mr. Santley. Next to the mad scene, with which most of our readers will be familiar from the singing of Mille. Nilsson, this drinking song proved the most popular number in the work."—Morning Herald.

SIX SONGS,

WITH GERMAN WORDS,

The English Translation and Music by

AMY COYNE,

Price 4s. each.

"Miss AMY COYNE'S GERMAN SONGS.—It may be a relief to many of our musical readers, tired of the eternal 'Watch on the Rhine,' from the sad scenes which the famous German war-song recalls, to turn to a charming set of Soulet typical of the love chansons which have now so sad an interest attached to them, sung, as they are throughout Valvisland, by fair mourners whose loved ones have found a last home in France. The six songs before us have that one rare quality which the poet longed for: appropriately sung, these compositions are low

'As sephyr, telling secrets to his rose;'

while the poems are of so lyrical a nature that they at once recommend themselves to anyone who (to continue the quotation) can say—

'For with my mind I listen,
And when the leaves of sound are shed upon it
If there's no seed, remembrance grows not there.'

Miss Amy Coyne, a daughter of the late Mr. Stirling Coyne, is the composer of these sweet lieder; and she has also translated from the German the felicitous words with which the music so well harmonizes. Six in number, their titles are—'Farewell for Ever,' 'Fidelity,' 'Parted,' 'The Request,' 'The Voice of Spring,' and 'Evening Sounds,' which last has a delightful Mendelssohnian ring about it. Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, are the publishers of these exquisite songs, and also of Miss Amy Coyne's latest composition, 'Maddalena,' a sparkling serenade which we had the pleasure of noticing favourably when it was first sung by Mr. W. H. Cummings, and which fully sustains the rising reputation of the talented young composer."—Penny Illustrated Paper.
